

The Abingdon Bible Commentary

Edited by

FREDERICK CARL EISELEN

President and Professor of Old Testament Interpretation, Garrett Biblical Institute

EDWIN LEWIS

Professor of Systematic Theology in the College of Theology of Drew University and

DAVID G. DOWNEY

General Editor of the Abingdon Texts

ABINGDON PRESS
NEW YORK • NASHVILLE

Copyright, 1929, by
THE ABINGDON PRESS, Inc.

All rights reserved, including that of translation into foreign languages, including the Scandinavian.

ZH

Printed in the United States of America

FOREWORD

THE ABINGDON BIBLE COMMENTARY utilizes the rich treasures of present-day biblical scholarship for practical and evangelical purposes. THE COMMENTARY will be found to be characterized by sound but unobtrusive scholarship, evangelical sympathy, social idealism, religious vitality, and directness and simplicity of expression. Many questions concerning the Scriptures which were once hotly debated are now generally regarded as settled. THE COMMENTARY is written from the standpoint of these accepted results while at the same time due attention is given to the processes by which they have been attained, and to all other matters necessary to adequate exposition and interpretation. While the elucidation of the religious and ethical significance of the Bible is the prime consideration, this is possible only as there is scholarly investigation of certain preliminary questions.

That there is need for such a volume is undeniable. The continuous advance in scientific discovery, in philosophic ideals, and in the social application of these discoveries and ideals necessitates a new appraisal and a restatement of religious truth. Within the limits of the distinctive emphases of historical Christianity, the scholars who have contributed to the making of this COMMENTARY have been allowed full freedom of expression. Devout and earnest thinkers of the earlier days met the attacks made upon Christianity by using the intellectual method and weaponry fit for that time. They spoke and wrote an understandable language, a language in harmony with the social, scientific, and philosophic knowledge of the age. The Church is permanently in the debt of such men. But knowledge has increased, vision is vastly widened, the material universe is immeasurably expanded, and life itself has become inconceivably complex. These new material and intellectual expansions and conceptions are providing the enemies of the faith with new weapons for their attack. They must be met on their own ground, with a weaponry and a method suited to the time. THE COMMENTARY has been prepared to help those who are interested in this vital problem of strengthening the appeal of the Christian religion by making clearer and more intelligible its essential message concerning God and man.

An examination of the list of contributors will show that no effort has been spared to make the COMMENTARY an expression of the ripest and most reverent biblical scholarship of the English-speaking world. The United States, Canada, England, Scotland, Wales, Australia, and India have been laid under tribute in the purpose to secure the persons whose spirit and training fitted them for the specific tasks assigned. A study of the general articles and of the individual commentaries will show how well we have succeeded in our purpose. Thoughtful pastors, intelligent laymen, and teachers in Sunday and Week-Day Schools of Religious Education will find in the wealth of material contained in this volume an invaluable aid to their preaching and teaching.

DAVID G. DOWNEY.

CONTRIBUTORS

- HERBERT T. ANDREWS, D.D.
Late Professor of New Testament Exegesis and Criticism, Hackney and New College, London.
Hebrews.
- J. VERNON BARTLET, M.A., D.D.
Professor of Church History, Mansfield College, Oxford.
The Life and Work of Paul.
- GEORGE HERBERT BOX, M.A., D.D.
Davidson Professor of Old Testament Studies, University of London; Fellow of King's College, London; Honorary Canon of St. Albans.
The Historical and Religious Backgrounds of the Early Christian Movement.
- ERNEST WARD BURCH, S.T.B., Ph.D.
Associate Professor of New Testament Interpretation, Garrett Biblical Institute, Evanston, Illinois.
The Structure of the Synoptic Gospels. Acts.
- HENRY J. CADBURY, Ph.D.
Professor of Biblical Literature, Bryn Mawr College, Bryn Mawr, Pennsylvania.
The Language of the New Testament.
- S. PARKES CADMAN, S.T.D., L.H.D., LL.D.
Minister of the Central Congregational Church, Brooklyn, New York; Ex-President of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America.
The Use of the Bible in Preaching.
- SHIRLEY JACKSON CASE, Ph.D., D.D.
Professor of Early Church History, and Chairman of the Department of Church History, Divinity School of the University of Chicago.
Second Peter. Jude.
- FRANK BERTRAM CLOGG, M.A., B.D.
Professor of New Testament Language and Literature, Wesleyan Theological College, Richmond, Surrey, England.
Revelation.
- EARLE B. CROSS, Ph.D.
Hoyt Professor of the Hebrew Language and Literature, Rochester Theological Seminary, Rochester, New York.
Proverbs.
- J. NEWTON DAVIES, B.D., S.T.D.
Professor of the Greek New Testament, College of Theology, Drew University, Madison, New Jersey.
Matthew. Mark.
- CHARLES HAROLD DODD, M.A.
University Lecturer in New Testament Studies, and Grinfield Lecturer on the Septuagint, University of Oxford; Yates Professor of New Testament Greek and Exegesis, Mansfield College, Oxford.
Ephesians. Colossians. Philemon.
- JOHN DOW, M.A., D.D.
Professor of New Testament Literature and Exegesis, Emmanuel College (United Church of Canada), Toronto.
Galatians.
- DAVID G. DOWNEY, Litt.D., LL.D.
General Editor of The Abingdon Texts.
Foreword.
- G. R. DRIVER, M.A., M.C.
Fellow, Classical Tutor, and Librarian of Magdalen College; Lecturer in Semitic Philology, Oxford.
The Formation of the Old Testament.

BURTON SCOTT EASTON, Ph.D., S.T.D.

Professor of the Interpretation and Literature of the New Testament, General Theological Seminary, New York.

First, Second, and Third John.

FREDERICK CARL EISELEN, Ph.D., D.D., LL.D.

President and Professor of Old Testament Interpretation, Garrett Biblical Institute, Evanston, Illinois.

The Bible—A Library of Religion. The Pentateuch—Its Origin and Development.

J. ALEXANDER FINDLAY, M.A.

Professor of New Testament Language and Literature, Didsbury Wesleyan Theological College, Manchester, England.

Luke.

LESLIE E. FULLER, Ph.D., D.D.

Professor of Old Testament Interpretation, Garrett Biblical Institute, Evanston, Illinois; Chairman of the Department of History and Literature of Religions, Northwestern University, Evanston, Illinois.

Bible Manners and Customs. The Literature of the Intertestamental Period. The Religious Development of the Intertestamental Period.

ALFRED ERNEST GARVIE, M.A., D.D.

Principal of Hackney and New College (Divinity School of the University of London).

John.

ALEX. R. GORDON, D.Litt., D.D.

Professor of Hebrew, McGill University; Professor of Old Testament Literature and Exegesis, United Theological College, Montreal, Canada.

The Prophetic Literature of the Old Testament. The Poetic and Wisdom Literature of the Old Testament.

WILLIAM CREIGHTON GRAHAM, Ph.D., D.D.

Professor of Old Testament, University of Chicago.

Ruth. Jonah. Nahum. Zephaniah.

WILBERT FRANCIS HOWARD, M.A., B.D.

Professor of New Testament Language and Literature, Handsworth Wesleyan Theological College, Birmingham, England.

First and Second Corinthians.

W. G. JORDAN, D.D.

Emeritus Professor of Old Testament Criticism, Queen's Theological College (United Church of Canada); Professor of Hebrew Literature, Queen's University, Kingston, Canada.

The Old Testament and Science. The Legal and Historical Literature of the Old Testament. Lamentations.

ALBERT CORNELIUS KNUDSON, Ph.D., Theol.D., LL.D.

Dean and Professor of Systematic Theology, Boston University School of Theology.

The Old Testament Conception of God.

ELMER ARCHIBALD LESLIE, S.T.D., Ph.D.

Professor of Hebrew and Old Testament Literature, Boston University School of Theology.

The Chronology of the Old Testament. Psalms I—LXXII.

EDWIN LEWIS, Th.D., D.D.

Professor of Systematic Theology, College of Theology, Drew University, Madison, New Jersey.

The Miracles of the New Testament. The New Testament and Christian Doctrine.

LINDSAY B. LONGACRE, B.D., Ph.D.

Professor of Old Testament Literature and Religion, Iliff School of Theology, Denver, Colorado.

The Bible as Literature. Numbers. Joshua.

WILLIAM FREDERICK LOFTHOUSE, M.A., D.D.

Principal and Theological Professor, Handsworth Wesleyan Theological College, Birmingham, England.

Job.

WILLIAM J. LOWSTUTER, Ph.D., D.D.

Professor of New Testament Literature and Interpretation, Boston University School of Theology.

First and Second Timothy. Titus.

FRANCIS JOHN McCONNELL, Ph.D., S.T.D., LL.D.

Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The Christian Approach to the Study of the Scriptures.

CHESTER C. McCOWN, Ph.D., D.D.

Professor of New Testament Literature and Interpretation, Pacific School of Religion, Berkeley, California.

First and Second Thessalonians.

JOHN EDGAR McFADYEN, M.A., D.D.

Professor of Old Testament Language, Literature, and Theology, United Free Church College, Glasgow.

Israel's Messianic Hope. Micah. Habakkuk. Haggai. Zechariah. Malachi.

JOSEPH F. McFADYEN, M.A., D.D.

Hislop College (United Free Church of Scotland), Nagpur, C. P., India; Formerly Professor of New Testament Literature and Criticism, Queen's Theological College, Kingston, Ontario.

The Life of Jesus Christ.

JOHN FLETCHER McLAUGHLIN, B.D., D.D.

Dean and Professor of Old Testament Exegesis and Literature, Faculty of Theology; Professor of Oriental Languages and Literature, Faculty of Arts, Victoria University, Toronto.

Exodus.

HENRY H. MEYER, Ph.D., Th.D.

Editor of Church School Publications for the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The Place of the Bible in Religious Education.

NATHANIEL MICKLEM, M.A.

Professor of New Testament Literature and Criticism, Queen's Theological College (United Church of Canada), Kingston, Ontario; formerly Professor of Old Testament Literature and Religion, The Selly Oak Colleges, Birmingham, England.

First and Second Samuel.

JAMES MOFFATT, D.Litt., D.D.

Washburn Professor of Church History, Union Theological Seminary, New York.

The Formation of the New Testament.

CHRISTOPHER R. NORTH, M.A.

Professor of Old Testament Languages and Literature, Handsworth Wesleyan Theological College, Birmingham, England.

The Old Testament in the Light of Archæology. The Old Testament and Criticism. Leviticus.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY, M.A., D.D.

Rector of the Church of St. Mary Aldermary, London; Examining Chaplain to the Lord Bishop of London; Professor of Hebrew and Old Testament Exegesis, King's College, University of London.

Judges.

ISMAR J. PERITZ, Ph.D., Litt.D.

Professor of Biblical Languages and Literatures, and Willard Ives Professor of the English Bible, Syracuse University, Syracuse, New York.

The Chronology of the New Testament.

ROBERT HENRY PFEIFFER, S.T.M., Ph.D.

Associate Professor of Biblical and Cognate Languages, Boston University School of Theology; Instructor in Semitic Languages, Harvard University.

Esther. Song of Songs.

IRA MAURICE PRICE, Ph.D., LL.D.

Professor Emeritus of Semitic Languages and Literatures, University of Chicago.

The Transmission of the Old Testament.

FREDERICK J. RAE, M.A.

Director of Religious Education, Training Center for Students, Aberdeen, Scotland.

How to Study the Bible.

HARRIS FRANKLIN RALL, Ph.D., D.D.

Professor of Systematic Theology, Garrett Biblical Institute, Evanston, Illinois.

The Teaching of Jesus.

ARCHIBALD THOMAS ROBERTSON, D.D., LL.D., Litt.D.

Professor of New Testament Interpretation, Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky.

The Transmission of the New Testament.

JAMES ALEX. ROBERTSON, M.A., D.D.

Professor of New Testament Language, Literature, and Theology, United Free Church College, Aberdeen, Scotland.
Philippians.

BENJAMIN WILLARD ROBINSON, Ph.D.

Professor of New Testament Interpretation, The Chicago (Congregational) Theological Seminary.
First Peter.

GEORGE LIVINGSTON ROBINSON, Ph.D., D.D., LL.D.

Professor of Biblical Literature and the English Bible, McCormick Theological Seminary, Chicago.
Ecclesiastes.

H. WHEELER ROBINSON, M.A., D.D.

Principal of the Regent's Park (Baptist) College, London.
The Religion of Israel. Amos. Hosea.

THEODORE H. ROBINSON, M.A., D.D.

Professor of Semitic Languages, University College of South Wales and Monmouthshire (University of Wales).
The History of the Hebrew and Jewish People. Genesis.

ROBERT WILLIAM ROGERS, Ph.D., S.T.D., D.Litt. (Oxford).

Professor of Hebrew and Old Testament Exegesis, College of Theology, Drew University, Madison, New Jersey; Professor of Ancient Oriental Literature, Princeton University.
Ezra-Nehemiah. Isaiah.

CHARLES ANDERSON SCOTT, M.A., D.D.

Dunn Professor of New Testament, Westminster College, Cambridge.
Romans.

D. RUSSELL SCOTT, M.A., Ph.D.

Professor of Biblical Languages, Criticism and Exegesis, Scottish Congregational College, Edinburgh.
Deuteronomy.

ERNEST FINDLAY SCOTT, D.D., LL.D.

Professor of New Testament Criticism, Union Theological Seminary, New York.
The New Testament and Criticism.

W. A. SHELTON, M.A., D.D., F.R.G.S.

Professor of Old Testament and Hebrew, Emory University, Atlanta, Georgia.
Psalms LXXIII—CL.

DAVID CAPELL SIMPSON, M.A., D.D.

Oriel Professor of the Interpretation of Holy Scripture, University of Oxford; Fellow of Oriel College, Oxford; Canon of Rochester Cathedral, Kent, England.
First and Second Kings. First and Second Chronicles.

CHARLES FREMONT SITTERLY, S.T.D., Ph.D.

Professor of Biblical Literature, College of Theology, Drew University, Madison, New Jersey.
Time, Money, Weights and Measurements.

EDWARD H. SUGDEN, M.A., Litt.D.

Master of Queen's College, University of Melbourne, Australia.
James.

WILBUR F. TILLET, S.T.D., LL.D.

Professor of Christian Doctrine and Dean Emeritus of the Theological Faculty, Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tennessee.
The Divine Element in the Bible.

EDWIN EDGAR VOIGT, M.A., Ph.D.

Assistant Professor of Old Testament Interpretation, Garrett Biblical Institute, Evanston, Illinois.
The Land of Palestine.

W. LANSDELL WARDLE, M.A., D.D.

Principal and Professor of Hebrew, Hartley Primitive Methodist College, Manchester; Lecturer in Biblical Exegesis and Old Testament Criticism, University of Manchester, England.
Ezekiel.

W. GLADSTONE WATSON, D.D.

Professor of Hebrew and Old Testament Exegesis, Pine Hill Divinity Hall, Halifax, Nova Scotia.

Joel. Obadiah.

ADAM C. WELCH, D.D., Th.D.

Professor of Hebrew and Old Testament Literature, New College, Edinburgh.

Jeremiah.

LAURA H. WILD, B.A., B.D.

Professor of Biblical Literature, Mount Holyoke College, South Hadley, Massachusetts.

English Translations of the Bible.

HERBERT L. WILLETT, M.A., Ph.D.

Professor of Old Testament and Semitic Languages, University of Chicago.

Daniel.

HERBERT G. WOOD, M.A.

Professor of New Testament and Church History, The Selly Oak Colleges; Director of Studies, Woodbroke, Selly Oak, Birmingham, England.

The Parables of Jesus.

All rights reserved

Printed in the U. S. A.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

I. ARTICLES ON THE BIBLE AS A WHOLE

	PAGE
HOW TO STUDY THE BIBLE.....	FREDERICK J. RAE..... 3
THE BIBLE—A LIBRARY OF RELIGION.....	FREDERICK C. EISELEN..... 15
THE BIBLE AS LITERATURE.....	LINDSAY B. LONGACRE..... 19
THE DIVINE ELEMENT IN THE BIBLE.....	WILBUR F. TILLET..... 26
THE CHRISTIAN APPROACH TO THE STUDY OF THE SCRIPTURES.....	FRANCIS J. McCONNELL..... 32
THE USE OF THE BIBLE IN PREACHING.....	S. PARKES CADMAN..... 39
THE PLACE OF THE BIBLE IN RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.....	HENRY H. MEYER..... 45
THE LAND OF PALESTINE.....	EDWIN EDGAR VOIGT..... 52
HISTORY OF THE HEBREW AND THE JEWISH PEOPLE.....	THEODORE H. ROBINSON..... 60
BIBLE MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.....	LESLIE E. FULLER..... 73
TIME, MONEY, WEIGHTS, MEASUREMENTS..	CHARLES F. SITTERLY..... 77
ENGLISH TRANSLATIONS OF THE BIBLE....	LAURA H. WILD..... 80

II. ARTICLES ON THE OLD TESTAMENT

THE FORMATION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.	GODFREY ROLLES DRIVER..... 91
THE TRANSMISSION OF THE OLD TESTA- MENT.....	IRA M. PRICE..... 99
THE CHRONOLOGY OF THE OLD TESTA- MENT.....	ELMER A. LESLIE..... 108
THE OLD TESTAMENT IN THE LIGHT OF ARCHÆOLOGY.....	CHRISTOPHER R. NORTH..... 114
THE OLD TESTAMENT AND SCIENCE.....	W. G. JORDAN..... 122
THE OLD TESTAMENT AND CRITICISM.....	CHRISTOPHER R. NORTH..... 129
THE PENTATEUCH—ITS ORIGIN AND DE- VELOPMENT.....	FREDERICK C. EISELEN..... 134
THE LEGAL AND HISTORICAL LITERATURE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.....	W. G. JORDAN..... 145
THE PROPHETIC LITERATURE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.....	ALEX. R. GORDON..... 150
THE POETIC AND WISDOM LITERATURE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.....	ALEX. R. GORDON..... 154
THE OLD TESTAMENT CONCEPTION OF GOD..	ALBERT C. KNUDSON..... 158
THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL.....	H. WHEELER ROBINSON..... 165
ISRAEL'S MESSIANIC HOPE.....	JOHN EDGAR McFADYEN..... 177
THE LITERATURE OF THE INTERTESTA- MENTAL PERIOD.....	LESLIE E. FULLER..... 187
THE RELIGIOUS DEVELOPMENT OF THE INTERTESTAMENTAL PERIOD.....	LESLIE E. FULLER..... 200

III. COMMENTARY ON THE BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

GENESIS.....	THEODORE H. ROBINSON..... 217
EXODUS.....	JOHN FLETCHER McLAUGHLIN... 249
LEVITICUS.....	CHRISTOPHER R. NORTH..... 278

	PAGE
NUMBERS.....	LINDSAY B. LONGACRE..... 298
DEUTERONOMY.....	D. RUSSELL SCOTT..... 318
JOSHUA.....	LINDSAY B. LONGACRE..... 345
JUDGES.....	W. O. E. OESTERLEY..... 357
RUTH.....	WM. CREIGHTON GRAHAM..... 377
FIRST AND SECOND SAMUEL.....	NATHANIEL MICKLEM..... 381
FIRST AND SECOND KINGS.....	DAVID CAPELL SIMPSON..... 412
FIRST AND SECOND CHRONICLES.....	DAVID CAPELL SIMPSON..... 439
EZRA.....	ROBERT W. ROGERS..... 454
NEHEMIAH.....	ROBERT W. ROGERS..... 463
ESTHER.....	ROBERT H. PFEIFFER..... 477
JOB.....	W. F. LOFTHOUSE..... 483
PSALMS I—LXXII.....	ELMER A. LESLIE..... 509
PSALMS LXXIII—CL.....	W. A. SHELTON..... 554
PROVERBS.....	EARLE B. CROSS..... 602
ECCLESIASTES.....	GEORGE L. ROBINSON..... 614
SONG OF SOLOMON.....	ROBERT H. PFEIFFER..... 622
ISAIAH.....	ROBERT W. ROGERS..... 628
JEREMIAH.....	ADAM C. WELCH..... 677
LAMENTATIONS.....	W. G. JORDAN..... 709
EZEKIEL.....	W. LANSDELL WARDLE..... 714
DANIEL.....	HERBERT L. WILLETT..... 746
HOSEA.....	H. WHEELER ROBINSON..... 759
JOEL.....	W. GLADSTONE WATSON..... 768
AMOS.....	H. WHEELER ROBINSON..... 775
OBADIAH.....	W. GLADSTONE WATSON..... 784
JONAH.....	WM. CREIGHTON GRAHAM..... 787
MICAH.....	JOHN EDGAR MCFADYEN..... 791
NAHUM.....	WM. CREIGHTON GRAHAM..... 798
HABAKKUK.....	JOHN EDGAR MCFADYEN..... 804
ZEPHANIAH.....	WM. CREIGHTON GRAHAM..... 809
HAGGAI.....	JOHN EDGAR MCFADYEN..... 815
ZECHARIAH.....	JOHN EDGAR MCFADYEN..... 819
MALACHI.....	JOHN EDGAR MCFADYEN..... 832

IV. ARTICLES ON THE NEW TESTAMENT

THE HISTORICAL AND RELIGIOUS BACK- GROUNDS OF THE EARLY CHRISTIAN MOVEMENT.....	GEORGE HERBERT BOX..... 839
THE FORMATION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.....	JAMES MOFFATT..... 853
THE TRANSMISSION OF THE NEW TESTA- MENT.....	A. T. ROBERTSON..... 860
THE STRUCTURE OF THE SYNOPTIC GOSPELS.....	ERNEST WARD BURCH..... 867
THE CHRONOLOGY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.....	ISMAR J. PERITZ..... 874
THE LANGUAGE OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.....	HENRY J. CADBURY..... 880
THE NEW TESTAMENT AND CRITICISM.....	ERNEST F. SCOTT..... 885
THE LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST.....	JOSEPH F. MCFADYEN..... 891
THE TEACHING OF JESUS.....	HARRIS FRANKLIN RALL..... 904
THE PARABLES OF JESUS.....	HERBERT G. WOOD..... 914
THE MIRACLES OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.....	EDWIN LEWIS..... 921
THE LIFE AND WORK OF PAUL.....	J. VERNON BARTLET..... 931
THE NEW TESTAMENT AND CHRISTIAN DOC- TRINE.....	EDWIN LEWIS..... 944

V. COMMENTARY ON THE BOOKS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

	PAGE
MATTHEW.....	J. NEWTON DAVIES..... 953
MARK.....	J. NEWTON DAVIES..... 996
LUKE.....	J. ALEXANDER FINDLAY..... 1022
JOHN.....	ALFRED E. GARVIE..... 1060
ACTS.....	ERNEST WARD BURCH..... 1094
ROMANS.....	C. ANDERSON SCOTT..... 1135
FIRST AND SECOND CORINTHIANS.....	WILBERT F. HOWARD..... 1169
GALATIANS.....	JOHN DOW..... 1207
EPHESIANS.....	CHARLES H. DODD..... 1222
PHILIPPIANS.....	JAMES ALEX. ROBERTSON..... 1238
COLOSSIANS.....	CHARLES H. DODD..... 1250
FIRST AND SECOND THESSALONIANS.....	CHESTER C. MCCOWN..... 1263
FIRST AND SECOND TIMOTHY.....	WILLIAM J. LOWSTUTER..... 1274
TITUS.....	WILLIAM J. LOWSTUTER..... 1289
PHILEMON.....	CHARLES H. DODD..... 1292
HEBREWS.....	HERBERT T. ANDREWS..... 1295
JAMES.....	EDWARD H. SUGDEN..... 1327
FIRST PETER.....	BENJAMIN W. ROBINSON..... 1338
SECOND PETER.....	SHIRLEY JACKSON CASE..... 1345
FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD JOHN.....	BURTON SCOTT EASTON..... 1350
JUDE.....	SHIRLEY JACKSON CASE..... 1361
REVELATION.....	F. BERTRAM CLOGG..... 1364
MAPS.....	1399
INDEX.....	1409

EXPLANATIONS, ETC.

THE idea of a Commentary such as this was originally suggested to The Abingdon Press by Dr. David G. Downey, for many years past the General Editor of the Abingdon Texts. While the more technical editorial work has naturally been done by Doctor Eiselen and myself, Doctor Downey shared with us in reading the manuscripts as they were received; we have been in constant touch with him during the three years in which the COMMENTARY has been in preparation; he has freely given us the benefit of his wide experience and sound judgment; and for these reasons we have felt it to be only proper that his name should appear on the title-page with our own.

In arranging with the contributors, the editors reserved the right of making such revision of manuscripts as seemed necessary to secure the aims of the COMMENTARY. For the most part, this revision has been confined to eliminations, additions, re-casting sentences, harmonizing or calling attention to differences, and rearranging material. Where in a given case anything more serious than this was required, the changes were made in consultation with the contributor. The contributor is responsible for the accuracy of references to general literature, including quotations, although, as a matter of fact, the editors have verified a great many of these. Editorial notes are nowhere indicated: the editors have preferred to remain as much in the background as possible.

The original plan called for the editorial work on the Old Testament and relevant articles being done by Doctor Eiselen, and the editorial work on the New Testament and relevant articles being done by myself. A very little experience, however, showed that such a division was not feasible, and we have therefore worked alike on the entire COMMENTARY. There were, however, certain mechanical features of the work for which I assumed the additional responsibility. These included the verification of all the Scripture references (except the references to the Pseudepigrapha); all the editorial proof-reading (except that Doctor Eiselen went over the first galley-slips after I had passed them); the task of seeing the COMMENTARY through the press; the insertion of the cross-references; and the preparation of the index. Every care has been taken to secure accuracy and consistency, but it is too much to hope that errors of various sorts have not crept in. Those will be most charitable in regard to such errors who have had some experience of the difficulties of work of this kind. Inconsistencies, however, in the transliteration and accenting of Hebrew words and in the spelling of certain Assyrian, Babylonian, and Egyptian names, are due to the preferences of the different authors.

We have worked consistently with the needs of "the average man" in view. This principle has determined many of the features of the COMMENTARY. The keynote is simplicity, without, it is hoped, any sacrifice of scholarship. We have excluded all Hebrew and Greek words. Where an author felt he needed to use these, they have been transliterated. Abbreviations have been reduced to the minimum. The exegesis is based primarily on paragraphs, not on single words and clauses. The sense or the theme of the paragraph is printed in a black-type heading. Words or phrases taken directly from the Scripture under consideration are in general printed in italics, especially where they are being commented on or explained. Whenever possible, critical notes are kept together. Although the contributors were requested to have before them the English Revised Version, reference is made to important variations from the American Standard Version, especially as noted in marginal readings, so that the COMMENTARY will be equally available with any of the English translations. In many cases new translations are suggested by contributors, and free use has been made of paraphrase, especially in certain New Testament Epistles. Chapter breaks are plainly indicated. To do this cost us considerable space, but we felt that this was justified in the greater ease of reference thereby secured.

The cross-references are by no means exhaustive, but they total many hundreds. Their insertion, of course, had to wait until the entire COMMENTARY was in page form and folioed. This fact sometimes made insertion difficult, which accounts for some slight irregularities in the method of reference. In addition to the cross-references by page-numbers, very free use has been made of Scripture references. The student will find these of great value. This is especially true in the case of the synoptic Gospels, where I have endeavored to indicate all the parallels and many of the resemblances to a given passage, so as to make the discussions, wherever found, at once available. In many cases the word "note" or "notes" follows a reference, but the absence of this word is not to be taken as implying that the reference is not important. To indicate every important reference was soon found to be not feasible.

The preparation of the index proved to be an exceedingly heavy task. It was at first thought that an index limited to the special articles and the introductions to the separate books would be sufficient, but eventually I felt it wise to index the entire COMMENTARY. While I personally listed every reference in the index, I was assisted in the alphabetical arrangement by the Reverend C. A. Whitmarsh, M.A., B.D., of Rye, New York, a graduate student of Drew University, and in other ways by my daughter, Miss Velva Lewis, M.A., and I desire to acknowledge their invaluable services. The thanks of the editors are also due to the contributors for the promptness and sympathetic understanding with which they did their work, to various publishers for permission to use quotations, and to the manufacturing staff of The Abingdon Press for their patience and skill. Here, as so often, the least heeded workman is the most indispensable.

EDWIN LEWIS.

ABBREVIATIONS, ETC.

Books of the Old Testament: Gen., Ex., Lev., Num., Deut., Josh., Judg., Ruth, Sam., Kings, Chr., Ezra, Neh., Esth., Job, Psa. (singular and plural), Prov., Eccl., Songs, Isa., Jer., Lam., Ezek., Dan., Hos., Joel, Amos, Obad., Jonah, Mic., Nah., Hab., Zeph., Hag., Zech., Mal.

Books of the New Testament: Mt., Mk., Lk., Jn., Acts, Rom., Cor., Gal., Eph., Phil., Col., Thess., Tim., Tit., Philm., Heb., Jas., Pet., John, Jude, Rev.

Books of the Apocrypha: Spelled in full except occasionally Ecclus. for Ecclesiasticus, and Macc. for Maccabees.

A.D., anno Domini.

A.V., authorized version.

A.S.V., American standard version.

B.C., before Christ.

cf., compare.

ch., chapter.

edit., edition.

e.g., for example.

Eng. trans., English translation.

f., following verse(s) or page(s). (The plural ff. has not been used.)

intro., introduction.

LXX, Septuagint.

mg., margin.

MS., MSS., manuscript, manuscripts.

N.T., New Testament.

O.T., Old Testament.

p., pp., page, pages.

R.V., or E.R.V., English revised version.

v., vv., verse, verses.

ad loc., at the place.

cir., about (with dates).

ibid., same place.

op. cit., cited above.

A few other abbreviations, such as C.C., for Schaff's Creeds of Christendom, and C.H., for John's Code of Hammurabi, are explained where they are used.

Superior figures are used to indicate verses when the chapters are given, thus: Deut. 8¹⁰ Rom. 12³, 6-8, 10. In a reference to the same book or chapter, the book or chapter is not repeated. Thus 12¹⁰ occurring in Judges means Judges 12¹⁰. In the same way, in a reference to the same chapter, the chapter is not given, but the verse number is preceded by v. or vv., thus: v. 16, vv. 23-28. Where the verse number is followed by a, b, c, thus, v. 8a, v. 12b, v. 24c, the reference is to the first, second, or third clause of the verse, as the case may be. Where page-numbers are followed by a or b, whether in cross-references or in the index, the first or second column of the page is intended: thus p. 294a means the first or left-hand column of page 294; p. 863b means the second or right-hand column of page 863.

I. ARTICLES
THE BIBLE AS A WHOLE

HOW TO STUDY THE BIBLE
THE BIBLE—A LIBRARY OF RELIGION
THE BIBLE AS LITERATURE
THE DIVINE ELEMENT IN THE BIBLE
THE CHRISTIAN APPROACH TO THE STUDY OF THE SCRIPTURES
THE USE OF THE BIBLE IN PREACHING
THE PLACE OF THE BIBLE IN RELIGIOUS EDUCATION
THE LAND OF PALESTINE
HISTORY OF THE HEBREW AND JEWISH PEOPLE
BIBLE MANNERS AND CUSTOMS
TIME, MONEY, WEIGHTS, AND MEASUREMENTS
ENGLISH TRANSLATIONS OF THE BIBLE

HOW TO STUDY THE BIBLE

BY PROFESSOR F. J. RAE

I. GENERAL

Motives to Bible Study. The motives which may induce anyone to study the Bible are of various kinds. You may wish to know the Bible as a great literature. After all, it is one of the two great literatures on which our civilization is founded. The other is the Greek—Greek philosophy, Greek drama, Greek poetry, Greek history. It is obvious that no one is educated in a real sense who is ignorant of either of these great literatures. And, of course, when one realizes the historical place of the Bible in human culture one will desire to read it for pleasure, for the uplift and the joy of beautiful and noble things. Job, the songs of Israel, Ruth, Hosea—these are wonderful books merely as the productions of the human spirit.

But there is another motive—just because the Bible is not merely literature. It is claimed to be, and is, one of the great religious books of the world. Indeed, it is the religious book of humanity, and therefore we may wish to study it for what it reveals of God and truth. Its books take on a different aspect in the light of this truth, and our motive will carry us further and demand a great deal more from us if we wish really to get into the heart of the Bible.

Necessity of Understanding What the Bible Is. It is obvious, then, that we must begin our study with some general idea of what the Bible is. It is nonsense to say we must go to it with no preconceived ideas. What intelligent person is there without any ideas about the Bible? What we must not do is to force upon the Bible any theories of its origin or value that foreclose any important issues. And, positively, what we must do is to begin with the truths about the Bible that are on the surface, that can be gathered from the most casual acquaintance with it.

For it is clear that the Bible contains the history and the literature of a people, a history and a literature that are wholly religious because they profess to reveal the nature and will of God for man. But note, it is primarily a history and a religion for the time contemporary with the writing of any given book of the Bible. Whatever you may think of the question of revelation, at any rate you must realize that the Bible embodies a religion. There may be something beyond that, but there is that.

Therefore every book in the Bible has a reference, first of all, to its own time. It has a religious value. Whether it has a revelation value is another question. But its religious value is first of all its value for its own time. The book of Job, e.g., is a drama in which the question of suffering is discussed. Now, that may have a reference to us, but at any rate it has a clear reference to the time when it was written, when this question of suffering had arisen and pressed for an answer. It was an answer for that period. In the same way Paul wrote his letters, not to form part of a "Bible" but simply and solely to deal with matters that had arisen in the churches in which he had a special interest. Whatever other value these letters have for us, they were primarily simply letters like our own, dealing with the problems of the churches to which they were written and giving Paul's message to them. We must grasp this fact firmly because it contains guidance of an essential kind for our method of study. Whatever the Bible has to say to us, it had something first of all to say to its own time, and its message to us can only come to us through its message to its own age. This does not mean that there are two truths in the Bible, one for that age and another for this, but that if there is any truth for us in the Bible, it is because the truth which was true for that time is true for all time. The truth about God, e.g., which a prophet gave to his own day for its own problems is an eternal truth, valid for our problems.

And this is the other thing that we find in the Bible, just this meaning for us to-day. The Bible professes to give a message for all time. Its religion is also a revelation. Its experiences are experiences of a God who is ready to do the same things for us as he did for Abraham, Jacob, David, and Paul. That is what the Bible says to us. And so we learn at least this much to begin with—that we must seek the truth in the Bible in its own environment. We must find what a book, or a paragraph, or an incident or a saying meant then and for the people who were to read it or who heard it. And only when we have found that can we begin to come at the significance of that book, or paragraph, or incident, or saying for us and our day and our problems and needs.

General Principles of Bible Study. The implications of these general statements, the guidance they give us about study, will be developed in the discussions below on O.T. and N.T. study. But before applying them in detail, we may gather some broad lessons of a very general kind.

1. One is that we must be honest with the Bible when we study it. We must try to find out what it means, and not what we may make it mean. Preachers are the greatest sinners in this matter. If a text can be twisted into a bizarre sense, it is sometimes taken as the theme of a "clever" discourse. The most amazing meanings are got out of harmless verses in the Psalms or Proverbs or Epistles, meanings that would have surprised David or Paul beyond measure. One of the worst sins against honest interpretation is the vice of "spiritualizing" scripture. By this method we can make anything of scripture, and we might as well be dealing with the Iliad or with Thucydides. We are not interpreting the Bible but imposing on it ideas which may or may not be true and useful but are certainly not where we claim to find them. If we are to study the Bible at all, we must find what is there, what the writer meant to say. We may then apply that truth, if we wish, all round, but let us not confuse our inferences with the original truth of the passage. This habit of spiritualizing has been employed specially in the interpretation of the parables of our Lord. Speakers and writers have discoursed on the spiritual significance of this or that detail in the parable. What do the two pence given by the good Samaritan to the innkeeper stand for? Is it, as some have claimed, for the two sacraments? What does the inn stand for? For the church? Nothing is more really injurious to the Bible than this kind of thing. A parable was spoken to enforce one truth and one truth only. And the details in it are just scenery or dressing meant to give reality and vividness to the tale with no meaning whatever beyond that. The truth in the parable of the good Samaritan is that our neighbor is the man who needs us. We may apply that to our own day and its social problems in any legitimate manner. But the parable has one truth only, and the two pence and the inn and the oil and wine and the ass are all part of the story and nothing else. (See art., Parables of Jesus, p. 914b.) This rule, that we must seek only the real meaning of any passage in the Bible, the historical and actual meaning, is vital to any study of it.

2. In this connection it may be well to say that an excellent method of reaching the meaning and message of the Bible is to read a book or section at a sitting. This is not done nearly often enough even by those whose duty it is to expound the Word. Almost any book in the Bible can be read through in an hour or two. And there are advantages in doing this. One is the pleasure that a piece of good literature gives. You cannot receive this by the piecemeal method of careful and measured study of a few verses or a chapter a day. That method has its own place. But the other is of extreme value. Take the book of Job for example. Never mind the details of exegesis for this time. Take it as a drama written to discuss the question of suffering, and read it through in the Revised Version, or in any good translation that does justice to its poetical form. You will then realize what a great book it is. You will grasp the argument, you will see the skillful delineation of character, you will receive the general impression of its message. And you will enjoy it as you never enjoyed the Bible before. Or take a quite different book, the memoirs of Nehemiah. What a wonderful piece of autobiography that is! There is a perfect picture of the condition of the returned exiles and the difficulties of their situation. And there is a naive self-delineation by a man who was a saint and a soldier and an administrator and a man. This is one way to study the Bible for pleasure and also at the same time to absorb its big messages, its broad principles, and its contributions to the solution of life's problems.

3. And this leads me to another broad generalization, that you ought to study the Bible in a proper edition. I refer not so much to the translation as to the form of the Bible. Let me give one or two simple examples of my meaning. A great deal of the O.T. is poetry, but you would never gather that from our "Authorized Version." Much of Isaiah is poetical in form, but it is printed as prose. Job is poetical in form, but it is printed as prose. Even the Psalms are printed as prose. The Revised Version corrects this, and therefore we should, for study, use this version. Again, our older version breaks up the Bible into chapters and verses. But there are no chapters and no verses in the original. There never were any in any version until the thirteenth century. One evil effect of this splitting up of the Bible is to give it an artificial and unreal appearance. It is not like any other book. No other book is divided up into verses. And neither is the Bible itself. It is only an artificial division of the translation that is so treated. No doubt the chapters and verses are useful now for reference, and they are retained in all translations in the margin for that purpose. But when we study the Bible, if we are confined to the English translation, it should be in a form which reproduces the original. And I would therefore strongly recommend the student to possess a modern translation like Moffatt's, or (in the N.T.) Weymouth's, Goodspeed's, The Twentieth Century N.T., Ballantine's Riverside N.T., or Montgomery's Centenary Translation of the N.T. Moffatt's O.T. has some grave faults. But it is literal and scholarly and takes you near the original. And there is one great advantage in using such a modern translation. It is often the best kind of commentary; indeed, that is its chief value. It gives you a translation of a word or passage which throws an entirely new light on what you are reading.

4. One thing more I would say before going into the matter in detail. This way of studying the Bible is very exacting. It will take a great deal of time and pains. But is it not worth it? If you study Shakespeare thoroughly, so as to get to know him, it means prolonged labor. And is it not worth while giving time and work to the greatest literature in the world, especially if that contains the secret of peace and happiness for yourself and others? You cannot know the Bible easily. You cannot possess its secret or learn its message or receive its gift without hard work. And therefore I make no apology for asking a great deal from those who would study the Bible seriously.

II. THE OLD TESTAMENT

Ascertaining the Background. For the study of the Bible the first and most important essential is a knowledge of the Background, and this is specially important for the O.T. The background of any passage or incident includes four things: (1) History, (2) Geography, (3) Religious Development, and (4) Context. What help do these give us for our study?

1. History. To understand any book of the Bible you must be able to place it in its historical setting. And you have to make clear to your mind a mental "map" of the periods into which the history in the O.T. is divided. You will find these described in the appropriate article in this book. (History of Hebrew People, pp. 60-72.) But they may be mentioned here for the sake of illustration. The first period (Gen. 1 to 11) is the Prehistoric, that of tradition and legend. The second is the Patriarchal (the fathers of the nation). The third is the Mosaic, when the nation was created at the Exodus, and received the truth that Jehovah was her God. The fourth is the Conquest of Canaan, Israel's heroic age. The fifth was the early kingdom, when, under David and Solomon, the nation was at its highest point of prosperity and came in contact with other peoples. The sixth was the Disruption of the Nation, and the beginning of the Northern Kingdom—the period of the great prophets. The seventh was the Exile. The eighth was the Restoration. Now, when you have set this scheme before your eyes see how it helps in our study. A few illustrations will suffice. The book of Proverbs is intelligible when you know it was the product (largely) of the fifth period, when a broader way of looking at life came into Israel from its wider contact with foreign peoples, a universal way of thinking instead of a Jewish. Again, you can understand Deborah's fierce song only if you set it in its place in a period of moral anarchy when the nation was already coming to some kind of unity. It is in this period, again, when the raw and immature people came in contact with the sensuous worship of the Canaanites, that idolatry, which was ever afterward Israel's peculiar weakness, began. Then, again, you can understand the whole history and nature of prophecy when you see how it began in the time of Samuel, its founder, for it began in a great revival movement which was also patriotic and national. Then you cannot read Isaiah or Jeremiah without seeing the political situation in the sixth period. A knowledge of even the broad facts of this period makes the whole message of the prophet intelligible and interesting. The same thing is true of Amos and Hosea. You find them at once alive when you see the social and religious condition of Israel in this same period, the extremes of riches and poverty, and the ritualistic and formal religiousness that passed for religion. And, finally, it is hopeless to try to understand Job or the second part of Isaiah or Ezekiel, or many of the psalms, without a clear vision of the Exile period, and the questions it raised. These are only pointers. But if I were advising anyone about Bible reading with special reference to the O.T., I should say with emphasis, "Begin by mapping out the periods, and place the books in their historical setting before you attempt to read them." (An excellent little book which will give you all you want is F. K. Sanders, O.T. History.)

2. Geography. The geographical background is not so essential, but it is an immense help. In the case of Israel more than in almost any other people the facts of geography determined the lines of history and even of religion. Why was it that most of the great battles in Israel's story were fought in the Plain of Esdraelon? Why was idolatry so deadly and persistent an evil in Israel's life? Why did Judah last so much longer than the Northern Kingdom? Why was Israel split up into twelve tribes? Why was it so difficult to make Israel a unity? What was there in their geographical environment that affected the character and message of Amos and John the Baptist? Why were the Jews so enduring a race? All these questions are answered in part by the geography of Palestine. And far more than these. When you have formed a picture of the land and bring this to the study of the Bible, you find it throwing light on all sorts of incidents and features of the text. It explains our Lord's parable of the two hearers in Mt. 7. It explains the incident of David and Goliath. It shows why there were so many caves in Palestine. It makes the parable of the good Samaritan a new story. And therefore I strongly advise the student of the Bible to spend some of his time in the study of some first-rate work on this subject. By far the best is Sir George Adam Smith's Historical Geography of the Holy Land. It is not too much to say that this book is more fascinating than a novel, and that, once you have read it, you will possess an outfit for the understanding of scripture which you can get nowhere else. The insight it imparts is a lifelong and precious possession.

3. Religious Development. One of the greatest services which criticism has rendered to the true understanding of the Scriptures has been its emphasis on the great truth of the progressiveness of revelation. The older idea of revelation was that it was something complete, given as a whole, with no progress, but all on the same level. It was as mature at the beginning as at the end. You might, e.g., find the Trinity in Genesis as likely as in 2 Corinthians. To-day, however, this conception is impossible. We see that revelation is a growth. It is a growth, not because there is anything imperfect in the Revealer, but because our human capacity grows. God can only reveal to one age what it is capable of taking in. And when we read the Bible we find that the truth God revealed, both about himself and about our duty, came by degrees, becoming always clearer and fuller and more mature. We can trace the stages, from primitive ideas about God (such as his repenting, walking, breathing, and the like), on through the conception of Jehovah as a national God, to the proclamation of monotheism by the great prophets, and especially the declaration in Jeremiah and Ezekiel that God has an interest in the individual, and, finally, to the revelation of God's Fatherhood in Christ. But the main fact for the student of the Bible is the progress in the revelation of God's love. The earlier thought of God in Israel was that of a severe, righteous, and even arbitrary God. It was only gradually the people were able to grasp anything higher. And it is this primitive conception of an arbitrary and harsh God that accounts for many incidents in the early history that used to cause perplexity to readers of the Bible. When we are told, e.g., that God ordered the extermination of the Canaanites—men, women and children; when we read that Uzzah was killed by God for putting out his hand to steady the ark; when Samuel hews Agag in pieces "before the Lord," we find it difficult to reconcile this conception of God with the teaching of our Lord about him. In the same way we cannot understand how the writers of some of the psalms (e.g., Psa. 109) can invoke such dreadful curses on their enemies, or why the prophetess of God, Deborah, should in her great song gloat over a horrible crime. But these difficulties are removed when we grasp the truth that revelation is a growth, that God could only reveal his truth by degrees "as they were able to bear it." This truth disposes of most of the difficulties that puzzle and disturb a reader of the Bible. In fact, the difficulties do not arise at all if you come to the Bible with this key. We realize, e.g., that God did not order the extermination of the Canaanites, but that Israel imagined this to be her duty and attributed it to God. We do not believe that God destroyed Uzzah for a perfectly innocent and natural action. That was the writer's interpretation because he knew no better. We must constantly distinguish in the Bible between fact and interpretation. Uzzah's death was a fact, the writer's view of its cause was an interpretation. And the interpretation was wrong because the writer lived at an imperfect stage of revelation. Take this key in your hand as you study your Bible, and you will find that it opens many doors. And, remember, this truth in no way lessens the authority of the Bible. It is not the God who is revealing himself that grows or changes, but the capacities of men to grasp what he is ready to impart. (See art., O.T. Conception of God, pp. 158-9.)

4. Context. The context of any passage or incident is part of its background, and may be dealt with here. The broader context is, of course, the circumstances in which a book was written or a song was sung or a message was spoken or an incident happened. Take an example of each. Deborah's song in Judg.

5 is illuminated when you see the historical situation behind it: the summoning of the tribes, the slackness or cowardice of some, the heroism and willingness of others, the scene of the battle in the plain of Esdraelon, the position of the river Kishon, the terrible storm that made victory easy for the tribes; and, finally, the rough and primitive moral condition of the time. Or take Psa. 121. It belongs to a little group of songs, 120 to 134, which were pilgrim songs, composed for those who were going up to the feasts at Jerusalem. How vivid Psa. 121 is when you imagine the pilgrims singing it as they came in sight of Jerusalem on its hill, with all that that moving sight meant in the history of the past. Or, again, take Isa. 30. Take your map and look for Assyria, and then for Egypt, and you will see that Palestine is on the road between them. Then realize that these two powers were struggling for mastery in the world, and you will see the problem for Judah at the time. Should she support Assyria or Egypt? That is the situation behind Isa. 30. There are endless examples of this. The broader context of a book or a passage can never be ignored if you wish to understand it.

But there is a narrower context which is just as important. A single example of this will suffice. You may read a passage from Job, and imagine that you are receiving truth from the Word of God. But, if you paid careful attention, you would find that the passage is from a speech by Bildad, one of Job's false friends, who is represented as expressing a traditional and exploded view of sufferings. It is this view that the book rejects, and Bildad's words are therefore not part of the Word of God at all, any more than Satan's at the temptation of Jesus. This narrower context is not so vital in the O.T. as it is in the N.T., but it has its importance, and it is often essential in a prophecy or psalm to examine in what connection the utterance is found.

The Help of Criticism. So much for the background which must be known to a real student of the Scriptures. A second point of importance is the light criticism throws on the Bible. It is sometimes imagined that criticism is hostile to the Bible. That is an absurd misconception. It would be as true to say that criticism is hostile to Shakespeare because it examines his plays, and dates them, and analyzes them. The idea that criticism is hostile is due to the fact that it upsets some of our preconceived notions. It asserts, e.g., that Proverbs is not by Solomon, that David wrote very few of the psalms, that the Song of Songs is not a religious writing, that Isaiah did not write chs. 40 to 66 of his book, that Ecclesiastes is a very late production, that Jonah is an allegory and also very late, that Moses did not write the Pentateuch. These are all conclusions of criticism, but there is nothing in them to alarm us or to affect our faith in the Bible. Criticism is in reality a helpful friend to the Bible student. (See art., O.T. and Criticism, pp. 129-133.) Above all, it helps in this—that it has placed the books of the Bible in their proper order, and in their proper setting. Let us take one example only, to show how much help comes to the student for his Bible reading from criticism. The critic takes up Isaiah. He sees a mention of Cyrus. But he knows that Cyrus was not born for more than a hundred years after Isaiah's time. He concludes, therefore, that this part of Isaiah was written after Cyrus was born, and could not be by Isaiah himself. Then he examines further and finds that the situation behind the passage is the situation of the late Exile. Further, he sees that in other passages in this half of Isaiah the question of suffering is raised, and a wonderful answer given to it (Isa. 53). He finds also that all this part of Isaiah differs from the first part in style and language. And he places Isa. 40-66 in the time of the Exile or later. That at once makes it intelligible and natural (see intro. to Isaiah).

What criticism has done for the reader of the Bible, then, is to place the books of the O.T. in their environment, and to restore for some the order in which they were written. And the advantages of this are two. First, it enables the student to see the Bible as a whole. In spite of its being a library, the Bible is one book. It is a unity. And you see that clearly when you read it as a whole. If I were writing for one who had never seen a Bible before, I should advise him to read the Bible, first of all, without any commentaries and without paying any heed to details. I should say something like this: Read the narrative parts of the Pentateuch (the first five books of the Bible); then Joshua and Judges, to see Israel in the making; then the historical books, Samuel and Kings. When you come to David read the Psalms along with the history, because David was at least the fountainhead of the sacred song of Israel. When you come to Solomon read Proverbs, because Solomon was the first of the wise men (see p. 454a) and the way of thinking about life which we find in Proverbs began with Solomon's age. Then, later, when you come to the eighth century read Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah, alongside the history, and you will value both the history and prophecy. Then when you come to the events leading up to the great Exile read Jeremiah. He will make everything clear. For the Exile read Ezekiel, Isaiah 40-55, Job, the Psalms. Then go on to the Return from the Exile, and read Ezra and Nehemiah, and with them the later prophets, Haggai, Zechariah, Isaiah 56-66, Malachi, and Joel. At the same time read the law portions of the Pentateuch, which received their final form either from Ezra or in his time. Finally, read Jonah, which is one of the greatest books in the O.T. for its splendid universalism; and Daniel, the latest book in the O.T., and the example of a kind of literature which sprung up and flourished in the period between the O.T. and N.T. (see art., Literature of Intertestamental Period, pp. 187-8; also art., Backgrounds, p. 843-7). This, then, is the first thing to do in order to understand the Bible; read it through in the order which a wise and sane criticism shows to be the chronological order. You will thus see the Bible as a whole and understand the lines on which its history ran.

But, secondly, another advantage of having the books arranged properly is that you see the real line of religious development in Israel. This makes a great difference in more ways than one. According to the older view, the religion of Israel was originally one of law, and obedience to law; prophecy came in afterward as an addition. According to the view which criticism implies, the foundation of Israel's religion was purely spiritual. It was a fellowship between God and his people. The Law was a much later thing, it was the arresting of the spiritual element. (See art., Religion of Israel, pp. 169f.; cf. p. 146.) The elaborate laws of the Pentateuch were the result of a process in which religion was ceasing to be the free gracious communion of the soul with God and becoming simply obedience to precepts. So that the gracious element of spiritual life was the fundamental and characteristic feature of Israel's religion. The Law was a descent to externalism. This is really in substance Paul's view (Gal. 3), and criticism confirms it. But that is not the only way in which the arrangement of the O.T. literature shows us the religious development. It also enables us to follow the stages of that development. We can see the simplicity of the primitive conception of God giving way to a broader conception under Moses, who gave Israel its national faith. We can see this struggling for the mastery through the succeeding ages (e.g., under Elijah). We can see it broadening out in the utterances of the great prophets into pure monotheism. We can see this being made a practical faith in the individualism of Jeremiah. These are among the advantages that come to us from a sane and healthy critical treatment of the O.T.

Methods of Study. Having thus, as it were, erected the scaffolding, let us now try to complete the building by filling it with some content.

1. For General Study. Take a notebook, and make your general scheme of the history in periods and then place the books of the O.T. in their proper environment. You have already achieved a priceless and perfectly essential knowledge of the Bible. Take each period in turn and read over all the books belonging to this period. You will thus gain a knowledge of the conditions of the people at each stage and of the divine revelation that came to each as well as the contribution which each writer made to his day and to the growth of religious experience. Then take the literature, book by book. Let us take as examples Isaiah and Job. You now know something of Isaiah's day. But you can learn a great deal more if you begin to study him carefully. Set down in your notebook the following points: Foreign Policy, Social Conditions, the Messiah, the prophet himself, and finally the great promises of God. Now read over the book for what you can gather on all these points. When you have done that, you will possess Isaiah, you will have learned his message, you will know about the world of his day, about what Israel was like at that time, about the prophet's own personality and religious history. You can check your conclusions by reading any standard work on Isaiah, like Sir George Adam Smith's (in the Expositor's Bible). But you have no need to be dependent on any one. Your own study will be of far more value than that of anyone else. Again, take Job, in a good translation (Moffatt or R.V. or anyone that prints it as it was written). Read it over without any help. You find it has three parts, a prose prologue, a prose epilogue and between these the drama in poetry. You find the drama is constructed as a debate in three rounds with Elihu intervening and the debate wound up by the Almighty. Well, having gained this general knowledge, and a fair acquaintance with the theme, you begin to study the book seriously. Set down what you understand each debater to say at each stage of the discussion, what contribution he makes to the general subject, and what in each case Job says in reply. Finally, set down what you gather that the Almighty says, and what you think the significance of this is. All this is quite general and apart from commentaries. But in this way you will find what the real meaning of the book is, and what its particular message is about the great question of suffering. This method is, as I said, entirely directed to gaining a broad insight into the purpose and bearing and contents of the books of the O.T.

2. Topical Study. There is another method which will amply repay the student of the Bible, supplementary and following on the previous one, and that is the topical. The simplest example is the book of Proverbs. This book, if you read it straight on, is "fine, confused feeding." But if you adopt the topical method, it at once gains in interest. Gather together all this wise book says about Education, the Issues of Sin, Wealth, the Tongue, Honesty, Friendship, Work and Idleness, Wine, the Fool, Woman. It is surprising how rich the book is in suggestive thoughts on all these (and other) topics. The advantage of this method is that you discover what the Wise Men of Israel taught about life in its various aspects in the early period of "Wisdom," before the clouds and disasters of the later age arrived.

But there is a wider application of this method which is well worth pursuing. Take a great subject like the "Idea of God," and follow it through the O.T. (see p. 158). Read the early literature to find out what the Patriarchs thought of God. Read the earlier portions of Exodus to find what Moses taught Israel about God. Read the development of this in the historical books, and then follow this idea through the prophets chronologically—the dawn of the great truth of monotheism, up to the wonderful teaching of Jeremiah on God's individual care. Or take another great reality of the O.T., "The Spirit of God." This is one of the most fascinating topics in the Bible. Do not carry back your N.T. conception, but gather together all that is said about the Spirit in the O.T., and you will be impressed with the magnificence of the conception of a living God, active in all the life of man and behind all his achievements. Or, again, take the conception of "Nature." Had the Hebrews any sense of the beauty of nature, at least in the modern way? Well, find out by setting down all that is said of it in the Psalms and prophets, in Genesis and Kings. Or, again, take the conception of "Divine Salvation," and its conditions, its meaning, its promises. God is everywhere a Saviour in the O.T. What is the salvation he offers? and the greater salvation he promises? Is it individual or only national? Was there any growth in the idea of it? Set it all down. Finally, take the idea of the "Messiah" (see p. 181). In what ways and to what extent do you find Christ in the O.T.? I do not suggest that the writers already knew of the historic Jesus Christ. But if you believe that God is behind all this process of history working toward a consummation (and I assume that your general study would lead you to that conclusion), he would naturally be preparing for the advent of his Son. How far do you find that? and in what ways? Set it down. What kind of hope of a Deliverer had the Hebrews? In the historical books, in Isaiah, in the Psalms, in Ezekiel, in Daniel? When you have set it down you will discover to your surprise one tremendous thing about the Bible, namely, that Christ is at the center of it, with one hand on the O.T. and the other on the N.T. And you will perceive how really and vitally Christ was in the O.T. from beginning to end. This subject is endless, but I have sufficiently suggested the method. (See H. Wheeler Robinson, Religious Ideas of the O.T.; Burney, The Gospel in the O.T.; also arts. on p. 175 and p. 177.)

3. Study of Special Books. But you will want after all this to study special books. You will want (either for yourself or for teaching) to go through a book verse by verse, or, indeed, to study a single verse. Well, to understand almost any verse in the Bible fully we need (1) its nearer context, what goes before and what follows; (2) the course of thought in which the context occurs; (3) the circumstances in which it was written; (4) the bigger context of history in which the book is to be placed; and very often, (5) the personality and history of the writer. That is why the detailed study is most wisely begun the other way. When you have satisfied yourself as to the circumstances in which a book was written, then you can read it over rapidly several times. Not once only, because each reading would give you something new. Then take it paragraph by paragraph (not chapter by chapter) without any commentary, and then verse by verse. The detailed reading needs a commentary to explain the meanings of the words used and the customs alluded to and any reference that a reader who is not an expert would not understand. There is hardly any book in the Bible that we can possess fully without the help of an expert in detail, just because the life of the East is so different from ours. There are, indeed, many words and phrases which are best explained by scripture itself, i.e., by the usage of these words in other connections. And here it is necessary to have a good concordance. Cruden is rather out of date. He has been surpassed by Young, and Young's Analytical Concordance or Strong's Exhaustive Concord- ance should be at the student's elbow. Take such a word as "righteousness," e.g., in the O.T. We might, on general principles, interpret it to mean "uprightness." But in the O.T. the word has a far richer and a more genial meaning, as the passages in which it occurs soon show. The examination of the immediate context, along with a study of parallel examples of the same word or phrase, will usually determine the meaning for us. But often a good commentary, like the present one, will shed a flood of light on a word or a verse by revealing facts which we could not by our own study have discovered. Only, two warnings may be given here as to the use of books: As to commentaries, remember they are invaluable if rightly used. But if you use them to save you trouble and independent study, they become a hindrance. Your best study is what you do yourself, and its treasures are what you discover for yourself. Use a commentary after you have done your own work, and to settle a vexed question, and to solve difficulties. But do not seek for ready-made knowledge too easily. And as to the concordance, there is a special danger. No concordance gives the date at which the passages it cites were written. And you must remember in using it that revelation was a growth, and that a word written early in the history may have a different signification from what it would have later. The Bible is not all on the same level either of inspiration or truth, and this has to be remembered. (See art., The Divine Element in the Bible, p. 26.) And in using words or passages to determine certain truths we must recognize their source and authorship. A sentiment uttered by a noninspired person or uttered at an early stage of revelation may not be an authority for our knowledge of God or his will. Use your concordance then, by all means, but use it with judgment.

III. THE NEW TESTAMENT

A great deal of what has been written above about the study of the O.T. applies in general terms to the N.T. But it has in some ways a different application, and therefore some particular guidance may be given in several directions.

The Background. As in the O.T., so here, a knowledge of the background is an indispensable condition to adequate Bible study.

1. Historical Conditions. Anyone coming to the N.T. directly from a reading of the O.T. might naturally expect to find the Jewish people very much what they were when he left them in the time of Ezra. But that turns out to be a mistaken impression. If four hundred years of American or English history, dating from to-day backward, were a complete blank, we could not in the least understand the America or England of to-day. And four hundred years elapsed between Ezra and Christ. So that we need to learn something of what occurred during that interval in order to understand the situation into which Christ was born. Consult the article on Backgrounds (pp. 839-52), and you will find three events which throw a flood of light on the Gospels: (1) One is the dominance of the Law. Jewish religion was radically changed after Ezra's time. It was largely a religion of obedience to law (see intro. to the books of Ezra-Nehemiah). And this Law had two sides, the ceremonial and the moral. The priest regulated the former, and was therefore the powerful, ruling influence henceforth. The scribe, or lawyer, directed the latter, and, because he interpreted the meaning and application of the Law, on its moral side, to conduct, he became the teacher of the people. The scribes built up a great edifice of regulations based on the Law until these became an intolerable burden. And it was this edifice Jesus swept away, when he came with a religion of the spirit and of liberty. The priest and the scribe, then, were the two powers in the life of the people during this period. (2) The second event was the attempt of the Greek kings, successors of Alexander the Great, who ruled Palestine during part of this period, to force Greek culture on the Jews. Greek culture was called Hellenism, and included art, idolatry, philosophy, and the worship of beauty. The attempt to force this culture on the Jews split the people into two camps. Some were willing to adopt these worldly customs. They were the aristocrats, the priestly section. The other refused it. This was the "pious" section, strict and faithful to the religion of their fathers. This event led to the famous Maccabean rebellion, and in the end to the formation of two parties who ultimately became the Sadducees and the Pharisees. The Sadducees were aristocratic, priestly, worldly, and latitudinarian. The Pharisees were the pious, strict, faithful, patriotic party. At its beginning, therefore, this Pharisaic party was orthodox and intensely spiritual, but, like many other parties that have originated in a spiritual movement, by the time of Christ it had degenerated and its religion had become largely one of form. (3) The third event was the appearance of the Apocalyptic Literature. This kind of literature always appears in a time of darkness and despair, when no hope of salvation is to be found in human agencies, and deliverance is to be seen only in a special divine intervention of a cataclysmic nature which will destroy the enemies of God and establish his kingdom securely on the earth. And so during this period a great literature of hope appeared with its vision of the other world, and its proclamation of a great divine deliverance through a Messiah or "anointed" instrument. (See art., Literature of Inter-testamental Period, p. 187; cf. introduction to Daniel.) This hope of a Messiah who was to be a national hero and set the people free from the yoke of Rome was very strong when Jesus appeared. Now, these three events explain the situation as we find it in the Gospels, and need to be carefully studied. The priesthood and its influence, the scribes with the Pharisees, the intense nationalistic, Messianic hope, the expectation of a sudden, violent end to things as they were, the burden of the legal traditions, all are explained in this way.

2. Political Conditions. But we need to understand also how the world of Jesus and of Paul was governed in order to read the Gospels, and Acts and the Epistles intelligently. Rome governed her empire in three ways: (1) Through native princes (as Britain governs some Indian provinces) who paid tribute to Rome and taxed their domain themselves. They enjoyed a large measure of freedom and local self-government. Galilee was governed in this way under the Herods. (2) Directly by Roman governors. This was done in the case of "difficult" provinces, where the people were apt to get out of hand. Judæa was one of these. The Jews in Judæa were narrow, fanatical, and rebellious. And so Rome governed Judæa directly, and among the Roman governors were Pilate, Felix, and Festus. Even in these provinces there was a good deal of freedom and the Jews had a series of courts, of which the chief was the Sanhedrin at Jerusalem. But Rome did not allow subject races to put anyone to death. Capital punishment was reserved to the Roman governor. That is why the Sanhedrin, though it condemned Jesus, could not execute him. He had to be tried and condemned by Pilate. (3) The third method was by settlements of ex-service men called "colonies," settled throughout the empire, and given a large amount of self-government. They were little bits of Rome through the world.

But the main thing to realize is the principle on which Rome governed. It was that of toleration. Every creed was protected in the empire. Religious questions were rarely interfered with by Roman governors. This explains the fact that Paul was everywhere protected by Roman governors against the Jews when they realized that the question was one of religion (cf. the scene before Gallio, Acts 18:12-17). It also explains why the Jews when they brought Jesus before Pilate did not accuse him of blasphemy (the charge on which they had condemned him) but had to trump up a political charge, namely, treason. These are examples of the way in which the political background throws light on the Gospel and apostolic narratives.

3. Religious Conditions. I have pointed out the main features of the religious situation—Judaism as a religion of law, the materialistic nature of its religious hopes, the parties into which its history had split up the Jewish Church (Sadducees and priests, scribes and Pharisees). But it must be remembered that the piety of the Jews had not altogether degenerated. There was still a heaven of real spiritual life and hope. There was, as always, a remnant. We see this in the Gospels in people like John the Baptist's parents, in Simeon and Anna, in Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea, and in the first disciples.

But, apart from Jewish religion, we ought to keep in mind so-called pagan religion, for we often meet it in the N.T. (1) There was the old polytheism prevalent in rural districts and still a vital faith. We find it in Paul's visit to Lystra (Acts 14:8-18). (2) This simple belief, however, was no longer held by the educated. In its place many cultivated men tried to sustain their souls on philosophy. The Stoics and the Epicureans were the principal philosophic sects. And these we meet on Paul's visit to Athens (Acts 17:16f.). (3) But in a time like that, a time of religious decline, with the old religion gone and no new one come, superstition is always rife. The world of Paul's day was full of it—spiritualism, fortune-telling, necromancy. Rich men had their private astrologers, and poor men had recourse to magicians. We meet this often in the N.T., e.g., Simon Magus, the girl "medium" in Philippi, the sorcerer Elymas in Cyprus. All these forms of pagan religion Paul had to meet. (4) A fourth we hardly meet except in Revelation, the worship of the emperor. This was the official religion. The emperor was regarded as the embodiment of authority and was rendered divine honors. This is the superstition that is spoken of so strongly in Revelation (see intro. to that book). It became the instrument of persecution against the Christians later. But with that we have nothing to do here.

4. Geography. The help of geography here is as great as in the case of the O.T. Let me take one or two examples to show how the map illuminates the study of the N.T. Take a map of the Roman world, such as is supplied in this Commentary. Look at it. Now lay your finger on the places Paul evangelized. Antioch, Ephesus, Philippi, Corinth, Athens, Rome—these are the “strategic points” of the ancient world, i.e., the places from which whole districts could be influenced, key-places. Paul had the strategic genius, the kind of genius a great general has. You can see that he laid hold for Christ of just the places from which the world could be won. Again take the map of Palestine and its surroundings. In your study of the life of Jesus you find he retired from time to time out of Palestine proper in order to find quiet for the training of his apostles. Look where he went, to Phœnicia in the north, beyond the lake to the east, to Decapolis, a Greek region with a predominant Gentile population. Then study the larger map of the lake and see the region of Christ’s ministry, how Capernaum, its center, was a kind of focus of life and business, how predominant the fishing industry was, how busy a place the lakeside was at that time and how full of life. Then look at Judea, so high up on its plateau, with a climate different from Galilee. You understand its isolation, the narrow fanaticism of its people, and you understand why Jesus was crucified there and not in Galilee. These are only indications of the ways in which a study of the land opens up and explains the N.T. at a hundred points. Never study the Bible, O.T. or N.T., without a map at your hand.

The Study of the Gospels. When we come to the N.T. itself, we naturally wish to get a clear view of the ministry of our Lord. We can do this largely for ourselves. But we need some help at certain points. We need, e.g., to know something of the way in which the Gospels were written. It will be useful to read the article on this subject (p. 867). Here the matter is referred to for its guidance about study. One help we shall receive will be confidence in the trustworthiness of the gospel narrative. If Mark was written from the reminiscences of Peter, we have Peter’s authority behind it. If Matthew and Luke were written with Mark before them and from other sources, we are pretty sure much of the supplementary material is as old as Mark. John is more an interpretation than a record and is much later. The best way to study the life of Jesus, then, is to take Mark as the basis, and go by it (as is done, e.g., in the art. in this Commentary on The Life of Jesus, p. 891). Go over it repeatedly until you master its outlines. You will then see the salient, outstanding points, the crucial landmarks, and all the minor incidents will group themselves round these. Do not trouble to be too chronological. Some recent writers (Rawlinson on Mark, and Middleton Murry) deny that a chronological scheme of the ministry can be made. But you will find that this is wrong. Your independent study will show you that the big points are fixed and clear, and certain incidents lead up to these, and others lead away from them. So there is a general chronology, but do not worry about putting in every incident into a framework. These detailed frameworks are generally artificial and useless. In a great many cases it does not matter where and when an incident took place. But it will be a safe proceeding to take Mark’s order as a basis, and fit in the events and discourses from the other Gospels in the big sector of the ministry where you feel they belong. It will be useful to have a reliable Life of Christ to fall back on. One of the best of the smaller books is Professor Stalker’s. When you have the general run of the ministry clear in your mind, and the geography of it also, you can then begin the study of each phase. Take the early years of Jesus, and consider what you can discover of the influences that molded his thoughts—the education of a Jewish boy; the piety of such a home as his; how far he was affected by the Apocalyptic hope of his day; what the incident of his being found in the Temple, and his remark to his mother at twelve years of age, implied as to his thought of himself; the influence of Nazareth and what could be seen from there. A book like Sir William Ramsay’s The Education of Christ throws a flood of light on all this. Then go on to the Baptism where he received his chief impulse for his ministry. What happened there? Why did he go to be baptized? His relation to the Baptist? The significance of the Divine Voice? And a great deal more. Then the temptation, the most critical point in all his ministry. Everything came out of it. What came out of it? What did he reject at that time? What was the real temptation and how often did this recur later? Then the Galilean period with all its fascinating topics—the calling of disciples, the wonderful works, the parables, the friendship with outcasts, the periodical retirements. Then the crisis at Cæsarea Philippi, a great watershed. Then the later period of increasing gloom, going to Jerusalem. Then the last dark period culminating in the Passion. Finally the blaze of light at the Resurrection. In the present Commentary you will find all the help you need, but go to the Gospels for yourselves first, and study them first and always. You will get far more knowledge of Christ that way than merely by reading what other men say of him. Take a notebook, and, after reading the Gospel record over and over, put down your own thoughts on each stage; and then, when you go over it in detail, have your thoughts on each incident. Afterward read what the experts have to say and correct your own conclusions where they are clearly wrong. But see with your own eyes first and always.

The Study of the Epistles. The letters of Paul are the most important and may be taken as typical for study. The first thing to do is to get a clear view of Paul's life and work. This is found in Acts, but not in Acts alone, for there is a great deal of valuable information in the letters, especially in Galatians, and 1 and 2 Corinthians. The best way to study the apostolic period, it seems to me, is to take the book of Acts as a basis and (with a good map) to scheme it out. Then read at each point the letter that was addressed to each church. After the first missionary journey read the Galatian letter. After the story of what happened at Philippi read the Philippian letter, and so on. That is the best way for a first reading, because the letter is illuminated by the conditions in the church, and it also illuminates these. But on a second reading it is well to try to place the letter at the point of time when it was written because the letters reveal a great deal of the writer's life at the time. If Philippians was written during the Roman imprisonment, we have a picture of Paul the prisoner and of his thoughts and experiences in the Roman period. When you have read the Acts and letters in these two ways you will have learned all there is to know of Paul's outward life and of his inner experience. You will need some help at certain points. There is, e.g., a great deal of information available as to the conditions prevailing in the Roman Empire, as to the places Paul visited, and as to some difficult problems which arise as you study Acts and the letters side by side. You will find this help in the appropriate articles (see art., Life and Work of Paul, p. 931; also the discussions on pp. 1169 and 1207). And if you need more, you can find it in Stalker's Life of Paul, or in Foakes-Jackson's admirable Life of St. Paul, or in T. R. Glover's Paul of Tarsus.

Topical Study. All that has been said refers to the historical study of the N.T. But there is another, and very profitable way of studying it, and that is according to subjects. You will soon find, to your surprise, that there is no "system" in the N.T. The Lord Jesus had none. Paul had none. Paul was not a theologian, and there is no such thing as "Paulinism" in the letters. (What is meant by this is that Paul did not have a ready-made and complete system of thought which he sought to propagate through his letters.) But both Christ and Paul had a great message, and this message is embodied in great thoughts or ideas. These are a wonderfully fruitful subject of study. Take, e.g., the Lord's message about God, or his idea of man, or his thought of "salvation," or his teaching about the cross, or the kingdom of God, or love. Take the Gospels, and write down as you come to them his leading thoughts. Give each a page, and enter under the title all the passages where the word or idea appears. And then consider all he says about it. That will give you a series of fascinating lessons or sermons. And it will reveal much of the mind of the Lord. Do the same with Paul. Go over the letters and note, e.g., the characteristics of Paul himself, his prayerfulness, his intense sympathy, his capacity for friendship, his natural courtesy, his power of anger, his chivalry, and so on. You will learn in this way more about Paul than any book can tell you. Then take his ruling ideas. What is it to be "in Christ"? What does Paul teach on faith? on justification? on the atonement? on Christ's risen life? on the Law? on baptism? on the Spirit? on the flesh? on woman? on the future life? on the Godhead of Christ? Again, I say, you will probably learn more about Paul's message and his characteristic thoughts by such independent studies than by reading many books about Paul. Arrange the letters in the order in which they were written (see the art. on p. 879), and carefully trace what the apostle says on each point through the letters. You will see, for one thing, whether his thought developed at all, whether it altered in emphasis or content. On the Second Coming of Christ, e.g., you will probably find a gradual change. But you will find another thing—how as time went on different topics filled the apostle's mind. He began to lay stress on different things, partly because he found different conditions prevailing and partly because he was growing and living, and different things interested him. At any rate, this topical study is endless and endlessly interesting and revealing. Remember that the body of literature you have to study is very small. The whole of the letters contain not much more than forty thousand words, about four times as much as this article. So the study is not too vast. But it is the study of a part of the master book of the world and is well worth a little trouble.

Particular Passages. All that has been said bears on the study of any particular "text." You cannot understand a saying of Paul's unless you grasp the argument in which it occurs. But you cannot grasp this unless you know the meaning and drift of the whole letter. And for this you must know the circumstances in which it was written, and something of the conditions and the state of mind in which the writer penned it. All this is not so necessary in the Gospels, though even there it is often helpful. But it is absolutely essential in the case of the letters. And that is why the general study of background and conditions on which so much stress has been laid is so important. The whole of the general study throws light always and lavishly on the most insignificant of incidents and sayings. When Paul writes to the Philippians, "Our citizenship is in heaven" (3²⁰ R.V.), or, as Moffatt brilliantly renders it, "We are a colony of heaven," the words start out with a perfectly lovely meaning when you recall that Philippi was a Roman "colony," a settlement of Roman citizens among an alien race, one of the forms of Roman government (see p. 1238). We, in this world, are a "colony" of heaven (cf. Heb. 13¹⁴). That is an example of how the background illuminates a Scripture passage. And it is only one out of hundreds. So that detailed study must be done always with a view to the larger study, which alone makes the Bible intelligible, and which makes it the most fascinating and wonderful book in the world.

Literature: F. J. Rae, How to Teach the O.T. and How to Teach the N.T.; McFadyen, The Approach to the N.T.; Laura H. Wild, A Literary Guide to the Bible; W. N. Clark, Sixty Years With the Bible; Sanders, Outlines for the Study of Biblical History and Literature; Barclay and Eiselen, The Worker and His Bible. See also "Literature" cited on pp. 18, 25, 31, 38 and 44.

THE BIBLE—A LIBRARY OF RELIGION

BY PRESIDENT F. C. EISELEN

The Bible a Collection of Books. The word "Bible," derived from the Greek, is the plural form biblia of a singular noun biblion, which has the meaning "little book"; biblia, therefore, is literally "little books." In Latin, which took the word over from the Greek, it came to be regarded as a singular noun, having the same form, meaning "book." As a singular it was early adopted into the language of the Western church, and as such it is used even now in modern European languages: the Bible—the Book. This use of the noun as a singular is responsible for much misapprehension, because the Bible can never be rightly appreciated unless it is borne in mind that it is not so much one book as a library consisting of many books, written by different authors at different times, in different places, from different points of view, and reflecting different stages of religious, moral, social, and political development. Altogether there are sixty-six separate writings in the collection as found in modern English translations.

There are two great divisions in the Bible used by Christians, called respectively the "Old Testament" and the "New Testament," the former containing thirty-nine books, the latter twenty-seven. The designation "Testament" is somewhat misleading; a more accurate rendering would be "Covenant." Indeed, some of the early church Fathers speak of "the divine Scriptures, the so-called Old and New Covenants." The O.T. includes books reflecting the religious life and experience of the Hebrews which originated during the period when the national covenant between Jehovah and the people of Israel, believed to have been mediated through Moses, was held to be in force. Similarly the N.T. contains books reflecting the early Christian movement, interpreted as marking the establishment of a new and universal covenant between God and men through Jesus Christ.

Contents of English Old Testament. The thirty-nine books of the O.T. are named below, arranged in a fourfold grouping, which, with some modifications, has been recognized for many centuries—since the Greek translation known as the Septuagint was made, before the opening of the Christian era.

I. Law: Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy—5 books.

II. History: Joshua, Judges, Ruth, First and Second Samuel, First and Second Kings, First and Second Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther—12 books.

III. Poetry: Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs—5 books.

IV. Prophecy:

(1) The Major Prophets: Isaiah, Jeremiah, Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel—5 books. (2) The Minor Prophets: Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi—12 books (total 17).

Contents of the English New Testament.

The twenty-seven books of the N.T. may be arranged in three groups:

I. Historical: The four Gospels—Matthew, Mark, Luke, John; the Acts—5 books.

II. Epistles or Doctrinal: Romans, First and Second Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, First and Second Thessalonians, First and Second Timothy, Titus, Philemon, Hebrews, James, First and Second Peter, First, Second and Third John, Jude—21 books.

III. Apocalyptic: Revelation.

A Religious Library. The Bible contains sublime specimens of history, law, poetry, oratory—indeed, of almost every kind of literature known outside of the Bible. But it is well to keep in mind that the books in the Bible were not written or collected primarily as specimens of these various forms of literature but to record and interpret divine revelations. In describing the significance of the O.T. period the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews says, among other things, that God spake "in divers manners" (Heb. 1). Though these words were spoken originally of the O.T. period, they are equally true of the period which gave rise to the individual N.T. books and the N.T. collection as a whole, as also of the whole course of human history.

Manifold Divine Revelations. God reveals himself, and always has revealed himself, in nature:

The heavens declare the glory of God;
And the firmament sheweth his handiwork;
Day unto day uttereth speech,
And night unto night sheweth knowledge
(Psa. 19:1,2).

God reveals himself in the events of history, be it the history of individuals or of nations. Sometimes the voice may be almost inaudible; at other times it sounds like the roar of thunder; but always, recognized or unrecognized, God is working out his eternal purpose, slowly it may be because of man's stubbornness, but nevertheless steadily, because in the end the divine goodness cannot fail. Again, to many devout persons God speaks very distinctly through the outward acts of worship. To thousands of earnest seekers after God these forms and ceremonies are means of blessing and grace through which the divine comes into contact with the mind and conscience. Experience, moreover, shows that God, in his attempt to reach the human soul, may dispense with all external means; he may and does reveal himself by working directly in and upon the mind and spirit of the individual. Once more, God selects certain persons especially well qualified to hear his voice. These he commissions to declare him and his will to the people. The belief in this method of revelation is the philosophic basis for the offices of the modern preacher and religious teacher. In a real sense the revelation of God in and through Jesus belongs here, for in him, as he lives his life among men, God manifests himself more fully than ever before or since.

These are at least some of the ways in which God reveals himself to-day, and these are some of the ways in which God made himself known during the O.T. and N.T. periods; then, as now, he revealed himself in nature, in the events of history, in the ritual, by direct impressions; and at times he selected persons to whom he might make himself known in all these various ways, persons who had sufficient spiritual insight to appreciate and interpret these divine manifestations, and ability to transmit the discovered truth to others. Then, in the fullness of time, he made himself known in unique and supreme fashion through Jesus the Christ (Gal. 44 Eph. 110).

Different Types of Old Testament Literature. The Bible contains records and interpretations of these manifold divine revelations. It is only natural, however, that when attempts were made to record or interpret these manifestations of God, different kinds of literature had to be used in order to express most intelligently and forcefully the truth or truths the author sought to impress upon his readers. In other words, the various types of literature are not the result of arbitrary selection; they are the natural outgrowth of the manifold character of divine revelation. In the O.T. five kinds of literature may be distinguished:

the prophetic, the wisdom, the devotional, the legal or priestly, and the historical. In their production four classes of religious workers, who observed, interpreted, and mediated the divine revelations, were active, namely, the prophets, the wise men, the priests (Jer. 18¹⁸), and the sweet singers of Israel, the psalmists. In the N.T. the first five books may be regarded as in a general sense historical, while practically all the others resemble in general character and purpose the prophetic, and in one instance the apocalyptic, literature.

Prophetic Literature of the Old Testament. Prophetic literature owes its origin to prophetic activity. The prophets towered above their contemporaries in purity of character, strength of intellect, sincerity of purpose, intimacy of communion with God, and ensuing depth of spiritual insight. As a result of these intellectual, moral, and spiritual qualifications, they were able to apprehend and appreciate truth hidden from the eyes and minds of those who did not live in the same intimate fellowship with their God. Their deep insight into the character of God enabled them to appreciate the divine ideals of righteousness, and they sought, with flaming enthusiasm, to impress upon their less enlightened contemporaries the truth burning in their own hearts. In carrying out this purpose they became patient and painstaking teachers of religious truth, bold and fearless preachers of right living, sane and courageous reformers of social abuses, idealistic and tactful statesmen, seeking to establish a world order in harmony with the eternal purpose of God. No records have been preserved of the utterances of the earliest prophets; but when, with the general advance in culture, reading and writing became more general, the prophets, anxious to reach a wider circle and to preserve their messages for more responsive ears, began to put their messages in writing; and to this new development we owe the sublime specimens of prophetic literature in the O.T.

Wisdom Literature of the Old Testament. The ancient prophet with his direct appeal to the human conscience resembles the modern preacher. The ancient wise man, who, like the ancient prophet or the modern preacher, had as his chief objective the interpretation of the divine will to his contemporaries, resembles, in the methods used, the modern religious teacher. While his ultimate aim was to influence life and conduct, he addressed himself primarily to the common sense of the hearer through counsel and argument, instead of presenting his appeal as directly inspired by Jehovah, hoping that the effects of this appeal would show themselves in transformed conduct. Nothing escaped the observation of these wise men; and from beginning to end they sought to teach the important truth that religion and the daily life are inseparable. The book of Proverbs is a collection of such wise sayings coming from various periods of Hebrew and Jewish history. From giving simple practical precepts, the wise men advanced to speculation in the attempt to assist their contemporaries in the solution of some of the intellectual problems which presented obstacles to vital religious faith. The books of Job and Ecclesiastes bear witness that the problems the wise men sought to solve were no mean problems.

Devotional Literature of the Old Testament.

In a sense the entire O.T. is devotional. It is the outgrowth of a spirit of intense devotion to Jehovah, and many portions of it have helped in all ages to nurture the devotional spirit and attitude of its readers. In this connection, however, the term is used of those poetic compositions, found in many parts of the book, which are the expressions of the religious experience and emotions of the authors inspired and fostered by intimate fellowship with Jehovah. The book of Psalms is the chief representative of this literature. It has been suggestively characterized by Johannes Arndt in these words: "What the heart is in man that is the psalter in the Bible." The Psalms contain in the form of sacred lyrics the outpourings of devout souls—prophets, priests, wise men, kings, and peasants—who came into the very presence of God, held communion with him, and were privileged to hear the sweet sound of his voice. No other literary compositions lift the devout reader into such an atmosphere of religious thought and emotion. And because these lyrics reflect personal experiences, they may be used even to-day to express the joy, sorrow, hope, fear, anticipation, and similar emotions of persons who live on a plane that may be higher than that on which the original authors moved.

Legal Literature of the Old Testament.

The legal literature of the O.T. differs from the other in that it does not form separate books, but is embodied in other writings, principally the books of Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. All the representatives of Jehovah—prophets, priests, and wise men—were thought competent to make known the Law of Jehovah, i.e., his will and purpose. However, the O.T. makes it clear that at a comparatively early period the giving of the Law, or the determination of the will and purpose of Jehovah, came to be looked upon as the peculiar duty of the priests.

Indeed, during the earliest period this seems to have been their chief duty. Subsequently, and during the greater part of the national life of Israel, their principal responsibility was the care of the sanctuary and the performance of the ceremonial rites. But even then they continued to administer the "Law of Jehovah," consisting not only of ceremonial regulations but also of moral and judicial precepts and directions. For generations these laws were transmitted orally or were only partially committed to writing; but when changed circumstances made it desirable to codify the whole legal system and put it in writing, the priests were most active in meeting the need. Thus, while it cannot be doubted that other representatives of Jehovah helped to formulate laws, the legal literature embodied in the O.T. reached its final form under priestly direction and influence.

Historical Literature of the Old Testament.

The historical literature of the O.T. gives interpretations of the movements of God in the history of Israel and of the nations with which the authors were familiar. It owes its origin in part to prophetic, in part to priestly activity. As has been pointed out, the prophet was a representative of Jehovah, whose business it was to make known the divine will to his own day and generation. Sometimes he looked into the future, and by doing so sought to give emphasis to a truth he was trying to express concerning the present. At other times he found inspiration in the past. Frequently the people failed to understand the real significance of events in their own history and thus missed the religious truths they might otherwise have drawn from them. If these lessons were not to be lost, some one must serve as an interpreter; and who would be better qualified than the prophet to furnish the right interpretation? Sometimes he embodied these interpretations in his discourses; but the demand for a religious interpretation of the entire course of events made the prophet in a sense a historian, not for the purpose simply of recording events but of interpreting them at the same time on the basis of his faith in Jehovah. To these prophet-historians we owe a large part of the historical literature.

But not all O.T. history comes from the prophets. As already indicated, the legal and ceremonial literature may be traced to priestly activity. Now, in connection with the recording of the laws, customs, institutions, and ceremonial requirements, the origin of these laws and institutions became a matter of importance. This interest and the demand arising from it led the priests also to become historians; and to these priestly writers we are indebted for not a small part of O.T. history.

Types of New Testament Literature. The types of literature in the N.T. are similar to those in the O.T. All its writings center around Jesus the Christ, and in one way or another they all seek to interpret the supreme revelation of God through him. Jesus was a historical Person. His life, activity, and teaching were matters of history. The Gospels, whose primary purpose is to record and interpret the life and activity of Jesus, are in the nature of historical, or possibly better, biographical sketches. The work of establishing the kingdom of God begun by Jesus was continued by his disciples and assumed organized form through the establishment of numerous churches. The progress of these events, especially in Syria, Asia Minor, Greece, and Italy, is recorded in another historical book, the Acts of the Apostles.

Every new movement gives rise to problems and perplexities. Christianity was no exception. Very soon troublesome questions began to disturb the newly organized churches. Individuals failed to grasp the true significance of the new teaching; corruption and schisms threatened to disrupt the believers. In these extremities the leaders in the new faith were appealed to for guidance and inspiration. Since they could not visit all the places from which requests for counsel came, they frequently sent their advice in the form of letters, which has given rise to the extensive epistolary literature in the N.T. This sets forth the doctrines of the new movement, seeks to assist in the proper administration of local churches, and gives counsel in the matter of personal and official conduct on the part of church leaders. In its general aims, if not in form and details, this literature resembles the prophetic books of the O.T.

The closing book, Revelation, is the only one of its kind in the N.T. It has its counterparts in the O.T. in the book of Daniel, portions of Isaiah, Ezekiel, and Zechariah, and less extensive sections elsewhere. It belongs to what is known commonly as apocalyptic literature, developed on the basis of the prophetic hope concerning the future (see p. 189). Like the prophet, the apocalyptic writer seeks to interpret God, his will, his purpose, and the nature and laws of his kingdom. But there is this fundamental difference (among others) between the two: "Prophecy still believes that this world is God's world, and that in this world his truth and justice will yet be justified. Hence the prophet addresses himself chiefly to the present and its concerns, and when he addresses himself to the future his prophecies spring naturally from the present, and the future which he predicts is regarded as in organic connection with it. The apocalyptic writer, on the other hand, almost wholly despairs of the present; his main interests are supramundane." As a result the apocalyptic literature dwells more especially upon the triumph of the kingdom of God in the coming age; hence the name "Apocalyptic," i.e., the literature that "makes known what is hidden" from the eyes of common men. The book of Revelation is the outgrowth of the early Christian persecutions, and its objective is the encouragement of the distressed and suffering Christians by the assurance of the ultimate triumph of the kingdom of God.

Literature: Eiselen, The Christian View of the O.T.; Willett, Our Bible; Kent, The Origin and Permanent Value of the O.T.; Peake, The Bible: Its Origin, Its Significance, Its Abiding Worth.

THE BIBLE AS LITERATURE

BY PROFESSOR LINDSAY B. LONGACRE

Interpretation and Literary Form. Among the many reasons for regarding the Bible as "different from other books" is the quite obvious fact that it looks different. One opens it at random and finds a formal arrangement of chapters and verses not found in other books, and this difference in form easily suggests a difference in fact. The consequence has been that the chapters, which developed out of sections suitable for public reading, have become more important than the complete books; while the verse divisions, instead of being solely a practical expedient for ready reference—which they are—have come to be regarded as part and parcel of the inspired Scripture itself—which they most certainly are not. The original writers knew nothing of chapters and verses, and not until one is set free from the temptation to regard the Bible as a collection of these arbitrary fragments is he prepared to see it and to read it as it really is.

Imagine, e.g., Tennyson's "Idyls of the King" printed as prose, divided up into "verses," with the verse divisions often breaking the original lines as well as the original stanzas, then imagine these "verses" to be grouped into "chapters" that paid no regard to the original sections of Tennyson's poems. Finally, place this curious document in the hands of an earnest reader that he may read it for the good of his soul, but tell him nothing about Tennyson, or the occasion of the poems, or even that they are poems. Yet something similar to this has happened to the Bible. In spite of its luxuriant literary variety, distinctions even between prose and poetry, to say nothing of finer distinctions within these fields, are hopelessly obscured by the familiar custom of printing everything as though it were solid prose. This is to some extent corrected in the Revised Version by the use of paragraphs for prose and the use of lines for some of the poetry. But even this improvement is carried through with such reserve that the Bible is still left far behind any modern book in the use of printing devices appropriate to form and sense. And there are many who look askance even at the Revised Version, preferring the familiar, though in this respect misleading, Authorized Version. The fact that this is done in all good conscience does not defend the reader from the erroneous conclusions he so easily draws as to the meaning of what he reads.

Language and Literature. When reference is made to the Bible as literature, attention is directed to the medium through which the writers of the Bible convey their thoughts to others. That medium is language; not painting, or music, or mathematics, but speech. The art of speech, first oral, then written, is one of the most wonderful achievements of the human spirit, and some would freely call it the most wonderful of all. It is the chief means by which the ideas and inspirations, the hopes and fears, the plans and purposes, the discoveries and attainments, of one person may be passed on to others; not only to contemporaries, but to those who live long afterward in later and distant generations. After thousands of years of use and elaboration this marvelous instrument, language, is now seen to have well-defined forms which, in turn, are recognized as carrying with them their own definite laws of use and interpretation.

There are at least two reasons why the literary aspects of the biblical writings have been overlooked. The first of these is the fact that the Bible is, above all else, a religious book, and that it is studied almost exclusively for religious purposes. Indeed, it is sometimes felt that the religious values of the Bible are so predominant that to turn aside from them to a consideration of its historical or literary aspects is to turn away from its true purpose and to ignore its true character. The other reason is the fact that so many people pay no attention to any language, not even their own. If they can carry on a conversation in a way that does not invite any embarrassing criticism, ridicule, or misunderstanding, they are content as far as the language itself is concerned. Ignorant of the history of language, they are uninterested in its inherent power and insensitive to its intrinsic beauty. Both the literary and non-literary students of the Bible, however, are at one in their desire to discover what the Bible means. The difference between them is that the former try to take account of the laws of language in their bearing upon interpretation. Language is a wonderful instrument but, like all instruments, its use must be understood and to some extent mastered before one can be sure that it will not wound the hand that holds it. It is part of the divine order that human speech should play a large part in the communication of the divine will; and it is therefore not optional but essential that any reverent search for the meaning of the Scriptures be based upon the principles according to which speech serves its universal purposes. The literary study of the Bible, then, may be described as a study of the characteristic forms and methods by means of which the Bible messages are expressed in language.

Literary Differences. A convenient illustration of literary differences may be found in Judges 4 and 5. These two chapters give two accounts of the same event, namely, a battle between the Hebrews and the Canaanites. One of these accounts is in prose and the other in poetry. Here two literary methods stand side by side demanding a recognition of their contrasts in form and spirit if either is to be correctly interpreted. As soon as the distinction between the literary methods is recognized one is aware of the straightforward literal narrative method of the prose, and of the imaginative far-flung passion of the poetry. The former is a record of facts; the latter is an expression of feeling. One is barren of all figures of speech; the other is brimming over with them. If the facts of the narrative be taken as figures of speech, and the figures of speech in the poem be taken as literal facts, confusion at once results and interpretation becomes impossible. The question is not whether one account be nearer the truth than the other; but, rather, how did the event impress the two writers, and what (literary) means did these writers use to convey the truth they saw? Both passages were evidently written after the victory had become a fact, and were written in the glow of that victory. The prose account deals with the fact and the poem with the glow.

Similarly, when Jotham tells a fable or Samson propounds a riddle, it is clear that these are to be taken, not as scientific statements of abstract truth but as fable and riddle respectively. Unless such well-defined literary forms be recognized they cannot be understood. Those to whom the rich field of literature is an undesired or undiscovered country may well feel impatient or scornful of this sort of study; and their feeling would be in a measure justified were the study designed to exploit the Bible as a textbook of literature and nothing else. But the vital factor in the case is the bearing of literary form upon interpretation. Until one knows, for instance, whether the passage he is dealing with is a bit of daring poetical imagery or a statement of scientific fact his interpretation will be, to say the least, precarious. Whether a particular passage is literal or figurative is thus seen to be primarily and fundamentally a literary question. Other factors are involved, of course, but the bearing of these cannot be taken adequately into account until the literary form and character of the passage be clearly established. If for any reason this be impossible, the passage will then necessarily remain to that extent obscure; for neither scholarship nor piety can reliably interpret a passage whose literary character remains ambiguous or unknown.

Types of Literature. A further justification of the literary approach to the biblical writings appears in the fact that they were written, circulated, copied, and preserved as literature before they were regarded, and finally isolated, as Scripture. The making of the Bible was by no means the same thing as the first writing of the different books of which it is now composed. The winnowing and selecting of these particular books and booklets from the much larger body of writings existing at that time was a process that could operate only after these writings had established themselves as literature. They had proved themselves worth preserving by actually being preserved. The writing of the books, in the first place, was one process, while their selection and exaltation into a sacred canon was a very different and much later process. (See arts., Formation of O.T., pp. 91-8; Formation of N.T., pp. 853-9.)

It is not to be supposed that for the biblical author the literary product was an end in itself. It sprang from his desire to share with his fellows his feelings of joy or sorrow, to impart to them his knowledge, or to influence their conduct by praise or blame. To him the modern idea of writing a best seller would have been inconceivable. These writings are great literature because they are greatly felt and greatly uttered. And had it not been for their survival as writings, that is, as literature, they would have disappeared before they could have been gathered into the later collection now known as the Bible. To approach them as works of literature is simply to retrace the divine order according to which they first appeared.

In recent years there has been much study in this field. The biblical material has been examined and classified so that one no longer need lack information on this aspect of the sacred writings. While the various outlines and analyses differ in arrangement and in detail, they all agree in their acceptance of the literary principle of approach. The aim of the outline that follows is not to give a mechanically complete classification of all the biblical material, distributing every chapter and verse into appropriate departments. Even if this were desirable, it would involve much duplication, for a great many passages represent in themselves several different types of literature, and they would then have to be repeated under each type. It has seemed better to indicate the more obvious types, distinguishing them on the basis of their spirit, aim, and content, as well as on that of external form.

1. Pre-Biblical Fragments and Quotations. The mention of the "Book of Jashar" (Josh. 10:13 2 Sam. 1:18), and the "Book of the Wars of Jehovah" (Num. 21:14), as sources for the quotations taken from them, shows clearly that at some time previous to the writing of the present biblical books, collections of songs and sayings were current among the Hebrews. (See art., The Poetic and Wisdom Literature, p. 155b.) Even if these two collections had been the only ones, they are sufficient to show that there existed a body of literary material of much greater extent than a casual reading of the Bible might at first indicate. This fact is confirmed by the presence of many other quotations, the sources of which are not named, but which were evidently known and treasured by those responsible for the biblical books in their present form. They are almost without exception in poetical form, but beyond this similarity they vary greatly in extent and character. Some are mere fragments, e.g., Gen. 42:3f. 925-27 Num. 21:14, 15, 17, 18. Others are full-fledged poems, evidently quoted in their entirety, as Deut. 33:2f. Judg. 5:2f. 2 Sam. 1:19-27. All, however, are early songs or sayings of a popular character, some personal, some national. Well known in the days of the biblical writers, they seem to have been incorporated in the biblical books in order to illustrate and to brighten the narratives in which they now appear. They certainly do this; and the Bible reader needs only to observe their personal, or patriotic, pre-biblical character.

2. Prose Narrative. The term serves to indicate one of the most conspicuous and characteristic types of the biblical writings. It is so vivid, so concise, and so direct that it is easily taken for an immediate transcript of conversations and events reported on the spot. In this light one is inclined to accept them unreservedly as history, in the sense in which that word is commonly used. Further reading, however, reveals a character in these narratives quite different from that of modern scientific history, and much closer to what might be called, in a strictly literary sense, tale or story.

Story and history are two literary forms distinguished on the basis of their method and purpose. Story and history, in this literary sense, may deal with the same subject, and both may be equally true to fact. But the story will be told in a way that will appeal to the emotions and the imagination, personal and unimportant details will be included, the experiences and fates of individuals will be placed in the foreground, and the whole passage will be designed to arouse an emotional response in the hearer. History, on the contrary, will disregard personal items and individual experiences except where these are vital to the main theme, and will deal with more general material in a large way designed to provide an impersonal record. The story arouses interest while the history supplies information. The story-teller has his eye on his audience while the historian has his eye on the fact he reports. There is not in the Bible any large amount of strictly historical writing in this sense. Much historical material is there but it is presented for other than historical purposes. For instance, the books of Kings might be thought of as historical books. Yet, while they contain much historical material, they offer themselves as an interpretation rather than as a record, and point out the moral of the history rather than an uncolored view of the events; hence, in the Jewish canon the books are designated, not as historical, but as prophetic writings. The writers state explicitly that if one should desire a complete record, he may turn to the sources named for the purpose. An illustration on a miniature scale of history and story, as these occur in the Bible, may be seen in Judg. 14-7, in which vv. 4 and 5 illustrate the general and unemotional method of reporting an event as it might be done by a historian, while vv. 6 and 7, which obviously deal with the same events, pursue the individual and emotional method of enlisting the hearer's response characteristic of the story-teller.

Stories will naturally differ in subject and purpose. Some will preserve ancient traditions that explain names of persons and places, curious customs, and striking objects. These can usually be identified by the way they close with an explanatory statement, as, for instance, "therefore the name of the city (or person) was called —," or "therefore the children of Israel eat not of the sinew which shrank." Others, telling about famous men and their exploits, will tempt one to regard them as biographies until it is seen that they too are intended much more to arouse enthusiasm for their heroes than to offer an accurate record of their respective careers. The difference between story and biography is closely parallel to the difference between story and history. Story, biography, and history, however, all have in common that rich, free-flowing, imaginative, pictorial, yet concise quality that has made the biblical narratives, wherever the Bible is known, conspicuous for their simplicity, their beauty, and their power. (See art., Historical and Legal Literature, p. 148.)

3. Drama and Dramatic Prose. When applied to the book of Job, which is the outstanding example of formal drama in the Bible, the use of the term needs no explanation. But the recognition of the dramatic form as a literary method has such a vital bearing on the interpretation of much of the Bible that unless the student recognizes it and understands its significance he may easily be misled in his study. By the term "dramatic" is meant a literary method which, instead of describing persons and events to a reader who was not there, presents them as though the reader were hearing and seeing them for himself. The writer of the opening verses of the book of Judges, e.g., looking back upon Israel's conquest of Canaan, might have written: "The tribes of Judah and Simeon were the first to advance into the new and hostile territory. They did this believing it to be the divine will." Instead of this, he dramatizes the event, letting the reader view the action and hear the speakers for himself. The children of Israel, Judah, and Simeon are personified, and then portrayed as individuals inquiring of Jehovah and consulting with each other. The two (personified) individuals then go out on their campaign, exactly as they would had the word "exeunt" stood at the end of a scene in a drama. When a poet wishes to portray the overthrow and humiliation of some detested tyrant, he can dramatize the whole situation by imagining the descent of the oppressor to the abode of the dead and even supply the exact words with which the newcomer is greeted by the shades already there (Isa. 14⁹, 10, 15-17). In the very nature of the case these words must be the poet's own. He could not have overheard a conversation that was still unspoken.

This dramatic method is in evidence from Genesis to Revelation. It is employed in the Bible far more extensively than in the works of European and Western writers. It is used for the simplest matter of fact and for the sublimest flights of prophetic imagery. If the prose narrative described (in paragraph 2) above is the typical literary form characteristic of much of the Bible, this dramatic method of portrayal is the typical literary means by which these biblical writers achieve some of their profoundest and most impressive results. It is to be emphasized, however, that this is a form or method of presenting what a writer wishes to say, and the form is not to be identified or confused with the message itself. The latter lies back of the words and is the idea the writer desires to convey; it is his meaning. This may be expressed in a great variety of literary forms, and the particular form chosen must be recognized as but the verbal clothing of the thought. It is just here that this dramatic method is so often misleading to a Western reader. He is accustomed to accept printed statements as though they were always to be received as literal matters of fact. In the Bible he meets a dramatic method which necessarily presents its message with an appearance of unqualified directness, and he leaps to the conclusion that what he is reading is a verbatim report of an actual occurrence. But in the nature of the case the writer himself does not appear. He stands aside and lets the story tell itself. His persons (or personifications) with their words and deeds are presented so naturally that at first it is not realized that these personifications, actions, and conversations are the work of the writer. A moment's reflection, however, shows that the sayings and speeches which seem to come so easily from the persons (or personifications) are the words of the writer rather than any literal reproduction of what actually was said. This is obviously the case in the brief passage in Judg. 11-3 referred to above, where the speakers, Israel, Judah, and Simeon, are personifications, and the words they are represented as speaking are the writer's own. What is not so obvious is that this must also apply to the words attributed to Jehovah. Just as the words of Israel represent the writer's thought of Israel's purpose, so the words of Jehovah represent the writer's thought of Jehovah's purpose. This is demanded and established by the dramatic form in which the writer has chosen to say what he has to say.

This dramatic method, then, is (or should be) a constant reminder to the reader of the Bible that when he meets words placed in the mouth of personified nations; of the sea (Job 28¹⁴); of a tyrant (Isa. 14¹³); of a "voice" (Isa. 40³⁻⁶); or even of Jehovah, he should consider carefully whether they are to be regarded as words actually and audibly spoken or whether they are not the author's words dramatically imagined. In either case, but especially the latter, they represent the idea the author wishes to convey. They are part of his way of showing what he believed to be the thoughts and purposes, the moods and motives, of the characters he portrays; and they are to be recognized as such under penalty of utterly misunderstanding his thought and purpose. For him this dramatic narrative is just as much his own as if he had set it all out in simple straightforward narrative style.

4. Poems. If one knows only the current Authorized Version, it would hardly occur to him that the Bible contained any poetry at all. It has so long been the custom everywhere else to print poetry in lines that where this arrangement does not appear the passage is assumed to be in prose. Since the year 1753, however, when Robert Lowth, Bishop of London, published his lectures on The Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews, the highly poetical character of the Bible has been increasingly recognized and studied.

The difference between the strictly prose view of the Bible and the more accurate prose-and-poetry view may be seen by comparing an ordinary copy of the Authorized Version with the same version as printed in the Paragraph Bible, or else with a modern translation like Moffatt's. In one case the whole Bible seems to consist of a series of brief prose propositions (verses), while in the other it is seen to consist of a rich variety of prose and poetry arranged in sections corresponding to sense and subject. Even then the Bible poetry lacks the accent, measure, and rime usually associated with poetry today. One reason for this is the extreme difficulty of carrying over these features from one language to another in any translation. The other is that these elements are largely lacking in biblical poetry. The biblical form corresponds more nearly to a combination (if such a thing could be) of blank verse and the modern so-called free verse. The lines are not rigidly limited in the number of their syllables, and rime is rare. The poetical character is determined partly by the vivid imaginative language and ideas, and partly by the regularity with which the successive sentences or parts of sentences fall into natural lines of approximately the same length. While these characteristics give to biblical poetry great freedom and flexibility of both form and expression, they also permit a translation that can keep closely to the sense of the original, while preserving a very close approximation to its exact form. Several varieties of biblical poetry may be distinguished but they all spring from the principles just mentioned.

It might seem that while these characteristics appear in the Hebrew poetry of the O.T., the case would be different in the Greek of the N.T. One recalls the classic Greek poetry with its exact systems of lines and quantities and he might expect to find the poetical passages in the N.T. conforming to the classic style. This, however, is not the case. For while the language of the N.T. is Greek, the thought, feeling, and literary methods are all Hebrew in spirit and form.

The book of Psalms is, of course, the supreme treasure house of biblical poems, but Job, Proverbs (cf. 7 below), Songs, and Lamentations are all in poetry. Outside these poetical books there are single poems of great beauty and importance. Some have been referred to under paragraph 1. Others are: Deut. 32¹⁻⁴³ 1 Sam. 21¹⁰ 2 Sam. 23¹⁻⁷ Isa. 38¹⁰⁻²⁰ Jonah 22⁹ Hab. 32¹⁹ Lk. 146⁵⁵, 68-79, 229-32. These poems were not composed by the writers of the books in which they now stand, and are not offered as such. Their beauty and frequency tempt one to speculate upon the wealth of poetry the biblical writers must have had to choose from; and, in view of the place the Hebrew nation holds in the history of religion, tempt one further to speculate on the relation that exists between religion and poetry. These poems are all complete in themselves. The poetical passages which constitute large sections of prophetic and apostolic visions and apocalypses are not included. Their content and purpose place them, rather, under paragraph 6 below. As a matter of fact, the biblical writers, especially in their more exalted passages, step easily from prose to poetry, and the biblical language is friendly to such transitions—so friendly, in fact, that it is sometimes difficult to draw the line and to say, "Here the prose ends and the poetry begins." But no such question arises in connection with the poems referred to in this division. They are real poems, and, as in the case of the dramatic type of biblical literature, the reader must permit the literary form to guide him in his understanding of what he reads.

The poet must be allowed to say things in his own way, and often he deals with feelings and aspirations that "break through language and escape." Like Jacob, he wrestles with an angel. He must be read with spiritual sympathy and co-operation. His single words can neither be pressed into etymological niceties nor his separate statements be taken as theological formulæ. The biblical poet is a spiritual pioneer venturing into spiritual territory that he is the first to discover. He is a creative spirit building structures of fervent feeling and passionate prayer that ever after become the refuge, the Holy City, of those whose souls cry out "for God, for the living God." To interpret his words in any other way than as the exalted poetry that they are is to ignore the methods of that Divine Spirit who chooses, above all others, poets through whom to beckon men onward and upward. Where poems occur in the Bible, therefore, they should be read, not as theology, but as the free outpouring of an inspired soul who, under God, thus voices the joys and sorrows, the triumphs and defeats, of those who would otherwise remain inarticulate. More than in any other type of biblical literature, the poems not only speak to men but for men. As someone has said, "Poetry is the emotion of life made audible," and when this emotion, as in the Bible, is primarily religious, it is easy to understand why the poems in which it comes to utterance should be appropriated by all sorts and conditions of men throughout the ages as the perfect expression of their own deepest feelings and noblest aspirations. (See art., Poetic and Wisdom Literature, p. 154.)

5. Exhortation and Direct Appeal. In view of the general acceptance of the Bible as a book of religious guidance it is surprising that this type of literature does not appear in larger measure than is actually the case. One might expect that the Bible would be predominantly a book of explicit advice, warning, or correction; yet this type of literature while sufficiently abundant by no means exceeds in extent the types already noted. Where it occurs it is recognized by its aim, content, and method. It aims to stir the will rather than to inform the mind. It is often dramatic, often poetical, and always direct and urgent. It consists characteristically of rebuke, correction, warning; but these are only contributory to the main purpose of effecting in the hearers a change of action and attitude. The appeals are not easy generalities nor are they intended to develop what might be called an abstract piety. They deal with conditions of the speaker's own time, and are addressed to people, many of whom would know the speaker personally. They are, in fact, to be thought of in most cases as speeches, and much less frequently as documents. They are, in this sense, orations, but they belong to a very definite type of oratory. Oratory in the sense of "making a speech" is the last thing these men would have attempted. They were impassioned pleaders; and if they used the form of public address, it was because they had something they felt the public must hear.

Naturally, the books of the prophets are full of this type of appeal. It is one of the outstanding characteristics of the prophet, and he is always more a speaker than a writer. The Gospels are almost throughout of this type, especially the words of Jesus. The Sermon on the Mount, the Beatitudes, the parables, and many other words, whatever literary form they may assume, are above all else the strong, direct language of exhortation and appeal. In the use of this method Jesus takes his place with the prophets, and the Gospels themselves indicate that this was the place given him by the people of his own day. (See art., Prophetic Literature, p. 151). The hortatory sections found near the close of so many of the N.T. Epistles are of this same urgent immediate spirit even if, in the necessities of the case, they had to be written instead of spoken; and they are to be regarded as belonging to this same literary type.

6. Visions and Apocalypses. This type of literature is probably the most remote of all the biblical types from the various forms of literature generally familiar to Western readers. Here drama, poetry, and exhortation are combined to set forth ideas so novel, so strange, and apparently so unrelated to life, as life is thought of to-day, that these passages are either passed over as unintelligible or, at the other extreme, are treated as divine enigmas whose solution reveals a panorama of world history, a key to the meaning of current events, and a sure prediction of things to come. According to 1 Sam. 9⁹ the prophet is a spiritual descendant of the seer, the one who sees; and what he sees when he looks into the future, or when he looks deeply into the meaning of the events of his own day, is appropriately termed a vision. In the case of the earlier prophets the visions came spontaneously and were comparatively simple in form and content (cf. Amos 7-9; Isa. 6). But with the later prophets the visions become more and more elaborate. In many cases they are so highly developed that it seems more reasonable to suppose that they are waking visions; the prophet adopting this special literary form as the one most suitable for messages of a special kind.

From these it is but a short step to the apocalypse. The word "apocalypse" (literally, "revelation," "uncovering") is applied to those passages which relate in the form of visions what the seer had seen when he believed himself to be witnessing a sort of panoramic, descriptive explanation of present and future events. These visions have for their background the courts of heaven, and the seer feels himself to be immediately in the Divine Presence. Indeed, a description of the celestial setting usually constitutes a part of the apocalypse. In view of what was said above in paragraph 3 it is easy to recognize in these apocalypses not photographs of reality but attempted portrayals of facts and forces which the seer hardly knows how to describe. He is dealing with a realm which is "not only unseen by man but is in its nature invisible" (Porter, Messages of the Apocalyptists, p. 40).

Here, again, form and meaning must be distinguished. The language is evidently figurative and symbolic, and this kind of language is highly attractive to many. But whatever literary form the writer adopts or however numerous and startling the pictures he paints, it must be remembered, (1) that the worth of a message depends upon the faith it reflects and the duty it enforces; and (2) that the faith and the duty are those (a) of the age in which the seer himself lived, and (b) of the situations which he and his fellow believers had then and there to face. While the book of Daniel in the O.T. and Revelation in the N.T. are the most conspicuous works of this type, briefer apocalypses appear in nearly all the books of the O.T. prophets, while in the N.T., apocalyptic passages occur in the Gospels and in some of the letters as well as in Revelation. In them all, the two principles just mentioned offer the basis of interpretation; and while other principles are involved, these are sufficient for the first approach to this striking type of biblical literature. (See art., Literature of Intertestamental Period, p. 187; also art., Backgrounds, p. 843.)

There remain a few types which do not call for any extended description yet which are sufficiently characteristic to deserve separate classification.

7. Didactic Literature. As the word implies, this material is dominated by the desire to counsel and instruct. Representative examples are the book of Proverbs; some of the psalms, such as 1, 32, 50, 78, 105, 119; and, in the N.T., many passages in the letters, and the whole letter of James.

8. Letters. Although a few examples of this type appear in the O.T., they are chiefly in the N.T. They vary in size and content from the brief, intimate, and personal note to Philemon, to the elaborate argumentative document "to the Romans." Nearly all, however, are letters in the commonly accepted sense of the term, only a few of the Pastoral Epistles approaching the form of pamphlets intended for an indefinite public.

9. Legal Literature. Down to the present day the orthodox Jews regard the laws of the O.T. as far and away the most important part of all their Scripture. Christian teaching has moved away from the Jewish system, yet the laws which occupy so large a part of the Pentateuch lie at the foundation of the Judaism into which Jesus was born, and constitute a highly important and characteristic type of O.T. literature. (See art., Historical and Legal Literature, p. 145.)

10. Statistical Summaries. These too are found chiefly in the O.T. and are represented in the summaries of the reigns of kings (cf. 1 Sam. 14:47-52 2 Sam. 8). But here belong also the numerous genealogies occurring at intervals from Genesis to 2 Chronicles, and even in the opening chapters of Matthew and Luke.

It is not to be supposed that all these types of biblical literature exist so independently and characteristically that all the material can be mechanically classified and pigeon-holed. This would not be possible under any scheme of classification. The various forms grow naturally out of the writer's aim and method. In order to express himself intelligibly he had to take language as he found it, saying what he had to say in the literary forms determined (1) by the habits of thought and expression native to himself and his people, and (2) by the results he desired to achieve. In order to discover his purpose and to recover his message, it is necessary to retrace the path his words have traveled, working back through the language and its various forms to the ideas and purposes which, though we might state them in very different fashion, the ancient writer could state only in those forms which were as native to him as his food, his clothes, and his habits of life.

The vital messages of the past, insofar as they have come down through the medium of language, are recoverable only in the degree to which they can be discerned within the literary forms in which they were delivered. And unless these forms be recognized for what they are, both in themselves and in their function, the reader is in constant and imminent danger of mistaking form for substance.

Literature: Bewer, Literature of the O.T.; Fowler, History of the Literature of Ancient Israel; Genung, Guidebook to the Biblical Literature; Moffatt, The Bible, a New Translation; Moulton, Modern Reader's Bible; Muilenburg, Specimens of Biblical Literature; Wild, Literary Guide to the Bible.

THE DIVINE ELEMENT IN THE BIBLE

BY PROFESSOR WILBUR F. TILLET

The Approach to the Question. In pointing out some of the reasons why the great body of Christian believers have long regarded the Bible as a sacred book, possessed of a divine element, it is the writer's purpose to indicate and emphasize those considerations which may be expected to appeal most strongly to intelligent and devout minds in the day in which we now live. The pendulum of human thought and faith is not static but is in perpetual motion, and in the fact that it swings, swings to and from extremes, lies the secret of progress in seeking and finding truth. The history of religious and philosophical thought is a study in mental reactions. If one generation, in its study of the reasons for believing the Christian religion to be divine, states and stresses to the point of exaggeration what have been called the "external arguments" among the evidences of Christianity, it is sure to be followed by a generation that will seek and find most satisfaction in what are called the "internal evidences." We seem now to be living in such a time as this. We should, therefore, pursue that method in our study of the divine element in the Bible which seems to make for our day and generation the best approach to the subject and the strongest appeal to devout Bible students who, while reading the Bible reverently, interpret it rationally. Only as we do this can the Bible continue to hold its place.

A Book both Human and Divine. The Christian religion can be best understood and interpreted by considering its relation to three things: first, a Person, Christ; second, an organized institution, the church; and third, a book, the Bible. It is not uncommon to refer to and characterize Christ as a divine-human Person, the church as a divine-human institution, and the Bible as a divine-human book. It is important that we have a true conception of the sense and degree in which each of these three things is divine and in what sense human, and how they are related to each other. Misconceptions here lead not only to misinterpretations but to erroneous and hurtful views as to that which we may call divine in the realm of literature.

To see in the Bible nothing more than a collection of ordinary human contributions to religious literature would be, in the judgment of those who know it best and prize it most, to fail to see in it that which is its highest and noblest characteristic, namely, a message of God to the human soul—a message of highest moral and spiritual value not to the people of past ages only but to all generations of men in all ages. To read this book, on the other hand, as if it were, because of its divine inspiration, placed and poised above all human limitations and imperfections, as if it were divinely dictated and there were something so magical and divine in the manner of its writing as to make it improper to subject it to the canons of literary criticism—this would be not only to depreciate its value as literature, but would result in embarrassing the reader with literary and moral difficulties which, though altogether inexplicable on this theory, would disappear at once if its genuinely human element and character should be recognized as no less real than the divine. To read it as something combining in a unique way the human and divine, as a book in one aspect thoroughly human and in another aspect divine, as a book in which God is speaking to men in and through men, is to increase its value as human literature without in any way discrediting its significance as a divine message and as a book of unequaled moral and spiritual value to the human race for all time.

The Sphere of Trustworthiness. The church, although it is a divine-human institution, is now and always has been subject to errors and imperfections, both intellectual and moral, such as belong in varying degrees to all things human. This is at least the Protestant view of the church. The claim of Roman Catholics, however, is that the church (i.e., their church) is so guided and dominated by the divine Spirit as to make it inerrant and infallible. But Protestants, in affirming the errancy and fallibility of the church both as to its teachings and its practice, do not thereby give up the claim that it is, in some true and genuine sense, a divine institution through which God now works and has always worked for the salvation of the world. The faultlessness and infallibility which Roman Catholics claim for the church, Protestants claim only for Christ, the Head of the church. Christ was truly inerrant and faultless, but freedom from error cannot be claimed for his church.

Shall we say, now, that the Bible is inerrant, made inerrant by virtue of its divine inspiration, or that, being a product of the church, it is, like the church, subject to human limitations that may involve errors? If the latter be the case, we may carry the analogy still further and say that as the church, although it be subject to error both intellectual and moral, is nevertheless a divine institution and agency through which God works, so the Bible, a product of the church, even if it should be found to contain errors and imperfections such as are characteristic of all things human, may nevertheless be a divinely inspired book, a book abounding in moral and spiritual truth in and through which God reveals his mind and will to men. To say that Christians get their God and their church from their Bible is a statement full of confusion and error. On the contrary, God and the church come first. It is from God and the church that we get our Bible; and only by recognizing this fact are we prepared to understand and interpret it correctly.

To say that we believe in the Bible because we believe in God, rather than in God because we believe in the Bible, is to state a self-evident truth. God comes first, then the Bible later. God was believed in before there was any Bible at all. God makes the Bible to be what it is, gives it all its moral and spiritual value. Unless God had existed in the faith and experience of men before there was any Bible, there would have been no Bible. In like manner we believe in the N.T. because we believe in Christ. Christ comes first, the N.T. later. Christ existed and was believed in, and had thousands of followers, long before there was any N.T. The Christian church existed for a long time before there was any N.T. The N.T. did not make the church; it is more nearly correct to say that the church made the N.T. (see art., Formation of the N.T., p. 858b; art., The N.T. and Christian Doctrine, pp. 946-8).

Nevertheless, while it is true that faith in God, both logically and chronologically, precedes faith in the Bible, it is also true that the Bible, because of the high and true conception of God and the many testimonies to God which it contains, is an aid and guide to our faith in and knowledge of God so invaluable as to warrant the claim that it is practically indispensable to the religious education and spiritual illumination of the world. It is indispensable, not only for correcting misconceptions but for clarifying, confirming, re-enforcing, and preserving the faith of those whose conceptions are true. To serve this purpose it must be a trustworthy book; but for a book to be a trustworthy and altogether safe and helpful guidebook in the realm of religion does not require that it shall be inerrant in all matters. In matters of science, for example, the biblical records simply reflect the views that prevailed at the time the records were made. To claim that its statements involving matters of science, chronology, archæology, and the like, are to be received as infallible and authoritative, is to subject the Bible to criticism and discredit that would be unjust. The purpose of the Bible is to furnish information and guidance, not in those realms of human research and knowledge, but in matters of religious, moral, and spiritual truth. (See the articles on the O.T. in relation to archæology, science, etc., pp. 114-133.)

The Claim of Verbal Inspiration. No other word applied by Christian theologians to the Bible is so suggestive of a divine element in it as the word "inspiration." This term does not mean exactly the same thing to all who use it. But whatever variations may be found in the use of the term, we may say that to all who use it intelligently it means that quality which the Bible, taken in its entirety, possesses by virtue of which it is a safe and trustworthy book of information concerning God, and man's relation to God's will so far as it has been revealed or may be known. How the biblical writers were inspired and how the Bible came to possess that high moral and spiritual value that has led to its being designated as an inspired book, may be and is a point about which there are more or less serious differences of opinion; but the fact that it does, when rightly interpreted, possess the highest moral and spiritual value as a trustworthy book about God and divine things is a point upon which all believers in the Scriptures are practically agreed.

From this point of agreement between those who hold different views of biblical inspiration in the Bible we may calmly consider the character and merits of the two views. Those who hold the view commonly designated as plenary and verbal inspiration claim that the biblical writers were divinely secured against any and all mistakes by virtue of their divine inspiration, and affirm, further, that that which constitutes the Bible a divine book is the fact that the Holy Spirit so dominated and guided the minds and pens of those who wrote as to make their writings free from mistakes of any and all kinds, whether it be mistakes of history or chronology or botany or biology or astronomy, or mistakes as to moral and spiritual truth pertaining to God and man, in time or eternity. According to this view of biblical inspiration, whatever the Bible says must be true because it is God's own Word; what it says is what God says.

This traditional method of setting forth the divine element in the Bible is still acceptable to many Bible students and makes to them the strongest appeal in the way of furnishing a divine credential. But an increasing number of modern-minded Christian believers and Bible students find a different approach to the divine-human book more satisfying and a different statement of the divine element in it more intelligible and convincing.

The Real Evidence of Inspiration. The Bible begins with God, continues with God, and ends with God in a sense and to an extent that is true of no other book in the literature of the world. To affirm that the Divine Presence is immanent in the sacred Scriptures does not mean, however, that the divine is not also here and there transcendently manifest in different portions of the Bible. From the earliest beginnings of a literature among the people whose thoughts of God and relations to God are recorded in the O.T., to the revelations of God made in and through Christ, as these are found, e.g., in the writings of John, the last of the inspired writers, there is a long but ever ascending pathway trodden by devout seekers after God. The one thing that characterizes these pilgrims always and everywhere is their consciousness of God, a consciousness of him that reveals sometimes their conformity and sometimes their disconformity to his will. This characteristic of the biblical literature would, in itself alone, call for and fully justify our recognition of a divine element in the Bible. The divine element in the Bible means this, but it means much more.

To most of those who in our day study and reverence the Bible, the divinest credential which these sacred writings furnish is found in their contents, the moral and spiritual truths of which need no miraculous attestations to make them carry the message of God to the souls of men. E.g., the twenty-third, forty-sixth, ninety-first, and one hundred and third psalms, the forty-second and fifty-third chapters of Isaiah, the Sermon on the Mount, the thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians, and hundreds of other chapters of like worth and meaning, are self-evidencing as to their divine inspiration. The dogma of verbal inspiration and biblical inerrancy and the "external arguments" drawn from miracles and predictive prophecy once occupied the foreground in apologetics. If these appeals were effective in making a former generation hear and heed the voice of God in the Scriptures, they served a good purpose, but their real value did not consist in any abnormal and preternatural and spectacular revelation or exhibition which they furnished of God's power, but in their causing men to hear and heed the word of God that bade them give up their sins, lead righteous lives, and love and serve their fellow men. This moral and spiritual truth in the Bible that makes it speak to the head and heart and conscience with the voice of God—that is the element in it which men of to-day recognize as divine, whether they heed it or not; and we can but feel that this always has been the divinest thing in the Word of God, whether that Word was spoken or written, and whether it was accompanied by miraculous attestations or not.

Interpreting the Whole through Christ.

In order to discover this high moral and spiritual quality in these different types of literature, it is not essential that we have accurate knowledge concerning their date and authorship. It is not easy to account for the presence in these ancient documents of so much that is to this day morally edifying and inspiring, and deny the presence there of what we call, and properly so, the divine in the literature.

If, now, in the O.T. Scriptures there is recognizable an element worthy to be designated as divine, for a much stronger reason can we claim that a divine element is present and discernible in the N.T. In the matter of revealing the divine, the N.T. is, in comparison with the O.T., as the sunlight is to moonlight, as the daylight whose spiritual brightness comes from Christ is to the dim but increasing light of the O.T. dawn. The O.T., being a progressive revelation—or, rather, being the faithful record of a people whose progressive religious experience moved ever forward from lower to higher and truer conceptions of God—must needs be read and interpreted not only with religious sympathy but with wise discernment and discrimination, or its naive simplicity and frank fidelity to facts will be improperly regarded as a divine approving of whatever is recorded concerning the beliefs and deeds of the men and women who appear in the narrative—which is by no means always true. The biblical corrective of what is imperfect and erroneous in these early ethical ideals and beliefs and the completion of whatever in them is good and true are to be obtained from the N.T. Here it is that we find not only that which satisfies us but that which inspires us to be and do our best. When I read the N.T., especially the four Gospels, my head and my heart and my conscience, all alike, respond to its moral appeal, and I rise from each lesson read rebuked if I am doing that which I know to be wrong, but re-enforced and reassured if I am doing that which is right. I find myself at my best when I am in accord with its teachings. In the spiritual reaction that comes to me thus from the reading of this book, I find satisfying evidence that in it God is speaking to me.

In reading the N.T., especially the four Gospels, we are so filled with a sense of the very presence of God whose Fatherhood and loveliness Christ reveals to us—reveals, not merely by what he says, but by what he himself is and does—that we feel profoundly the truth of Christ's declaration that he that hath seen the Son hath seen the Father. He that sees Christ, not the physical but the ethical and spiritual Christ, sees what we Christians mean by the word "divine." There is no other definition of the divine that is so rational and convincing to the intellect and so satisfying to the heart as the sight and the sense of that transcendent ethical and spiritual personal reality in Christ that differentiates him from other men. And no man can read the N.T. with an open and discerning mind, being ever as he reads in the presence of Christ, without realizing that there is a something in this book not found in other books, something so hostile to and corrective of anything and everything that is wrong in thought, spirit, word, or deed; something so appealing and insistent and potent in behalf of virtue, holiness, brotherly love, and whatsoever else is Christlike and Godlike, that the book, however human it may be, is possessed of a quality that may well be designated as divine.

Man's Progressive Apprehension of God. Whatever theory of inspiration makes God most perfect and his revealed will most rational and morally self-consistent must be the true view. No view of inspiration, no matter how divine it may make the Bible to be, can be accepted as true if it should make God less than perfect in his words and works and ways. However different and conflicting may be the conceptions of God reflected in certain portions of the Pentateuch, the book of Judges and the imprecatory psalms, on the one hand, and in the four Gospels on the other, we must not think that God himself was anywise different, was any less holy and just, wise and loving, in ancient days than he was in the time of Christ, or than he, as interpreted to us by Christ, is to our faith now. The difference is not in God, but in the variant, conflicting and changing views of God reflected in the different periods of biblical history and literature. The view of God's nature and character that is absolutely correct—the conception of God as a Being who is always essentially and absolutely perfect—is that which we find in the teachings of Christ and the Apostles as recorded in the N.T.

No view of biblical inspiration can be true that is inconsistent with this fundamental fact of the Christian faith—the absolute perfection of God in all that he does and says and approves. Accepting the interpretation and revelation of God given in and through Christ as the true conception, we may say that there is in the O.T. Scriptures an increasing ethicizing of the idea of God (see pp. 161-3). It is unthinkable that Christ should attribute to God some of the things which he is represented in the earliest period of O.T. history as doing, or commanding, or approving. To write thus of the O.T. is not to discredit it, but simply to explain how, when it is rightly interpreted as a record of the changing and progressive conceptions of God entertained by the people, it is entirely reconcilable with the later, fuller, perfect, and final revelation of Christ preserved in the N.T. While Christ treated the O.T. reverently as the divinely inspired Word of God, he yet not only pronounced erroneous some of the things which were "said by them of old time," but corrected them. If among the things Christ said and did any one thing may be said to be of highest moral and spiritual value, we are perhaps justified in saying that it was his interpretation and revelation of God in such terms of Fatherhood and love as made the Divine Being lovable and brought him near to us. The divinest thing in the Bible, we repeat, is its testimony to the holiness and loveliness of God. Christ showed us—and as the ever-living Christ he continues to show men—God as the loving heavenly Father; and that, and that alone, sufficeth to satisfy the minds and hearts of men.

Meaning and Method of Revelation. In speaking of the Scriptures as a divine revelation of God, there is a possibility of conveying a false impression as to what is meant. The term "revelation" expresses an important truth if properly used, but it is capable of being interpreted in an utterly misleading manner—and it is to be feared that some people so misinterpret it. It must not be interpreted as meaning that God, having prepared a book of divine revelations in some preternatural manner, sent it to men accompanied by miraculous attestations and divine credentials, in order to invest it with divine authority, without which miraculous attestations it would be without authority. God's "revelations" are nothing more nor less than communications of truth in and to and through believing and holy men, men who came to know him personally and vitally in an experience that was at once genuine and normal, and no less divine because it was normal.

If divine revelations were received in a normal way, and were recorded by the recipients in a normal way, with no supernatural accompaniments, they would still be divine revelations. Instead of calling the Bible a divine revelation, it would be more accurate to think of it as a trustworthy record of revelations which God has made from time to time to devout and holy men in and through experiences, which were none the less real and divine if they were normal and natural, than if they were abnormal and supernatural. In this sense we might say that the Bible, instead of being itself God's primary and original revelation, is, rather, the result of revelation. It is God's revelations to men that have made the Bible to be what it is, not the Bible that made the revelations. The revelations came before the Bible came. Nevertheless, having made this true and important distinction, it is proper to add that a book which collects and preserves in a trustworthy record the revelations which God has made to and in and through patriarchs and prophets and poets and psalmists and wise men and apostles, from age to age, all culminating in his revelation to and in and through Christ, may well be designated in its entirety as a book of divine revelation.

All this goes to show that, unless the divineness of the revelation is found in and evidenced by its contents and is discerned in the character of the truth communicated, no supernatural accompaniments attending its communication to men could suffice to make it divine. It may be a matter of much interest to seek and to discover the manner in which the word of the Lord came to patriarchs and psalmists and prophets and apostles—whether in a normal and natural manner, i.e., under normal psychological conditions, or in an abnormal and supernatural manner—but it would be a great mistake to make the divineness of the word revealed depend on the miraculousness of the manner of its communication to men. To make the divineness of the Ten Commandments depend in any degree upon the miraculous accompaniments of their first promulgation to the children of Israel as described in the book of Exodus rather than upon the moral contents and spiritual value of the commandments themselves, would be to misplace utterly the real and true ground of faith in their divineness.

It may be that modern Christian thinkers make too little of the miraculous physical accompaniments which are described as attending many divine revelations that were given to elect and holy men from age to age in the course of Bible history. On the other hand, they certainly are not open to the charge of minimizing or obscuring that divine element in the Scriptures which is found in the moral and spiritual truth which they contain, and in the moral and spiritual influence which they have on the character and destiny of men and nations.

Confirmation in Experience. No definition which we may give to the Bible and no claim, however high, which we may make for it, can give it divine authority. Only divine truth can give the Bible divine authority. What we need to be concerned about is not so much authority for the truth as truth for authority. No dogmatic definition of biblical inspiration in terms of divine infallibility can invest the Bible with inerrancy, unless it be really inerrant. It is only as the Bible contains the truth—the truth about God and man, the truth as it is in Jesus—that it can claim for itself a divine element, imparting to it divine authority. Let us not, then, look for the “divine” in the Bible as if it were a subtle, magic, mystic, preternatural or supernatural something in the origination or composition of it, that removes it from the province of literary criticism and from amenability to all the tests of truth to which other books are subjected. There is, indeed, a divine quality in it that distinguishes it in the literature of the world, that makes it not merely primus inter pares among the world's books of religion; it is that, but it is much more. (See art., The Bible—a Library of Religion, pp. 15-18.) And that divine quality which raises it above all other books is its self-evidencing truth about the heavenly Father and the divine-human Christ and the Spirit that keeps alive in men the sense of God and the truth that makes men free—free from superstition as well as from sin. The book that has in it the most truth about God and man, about salvation from sin and the life eternal, will always be the “Holy Bible” to all who reverently read it, however much they may fail to heed it.

It is here, then, that our claim for a divine element in the Bible must find supreme justification and permanent ground of acceptance: Is the Bible revelation of God confirmed by our own personal experience with God? Do we find ourselves at our best morally when our lives are most in accord with what the God of the Bible commands and approves? We can but answer these questions in the affirmative; and in so doing we ratify and confirm the truth of our Bible as having that revelation concerning God which alone can satisfy the enlightened conscience of normal religious and reasonable men. The devotees of non-Christian religions, it is true, from the fetish-worshiper of Africa to the Arab who makes a fetish of his Koran, all find varying degrees of satisfaction in the symbols of their religion. But this fact cannot nullify or weaken the force of our conviction that intelligent and truth-seeking men in all countries and in all ages will ever find in the Scriptures of the Christian religion moral and spiritual truth not only unequaled anywhere else, but so satisfying to their heads and hearts, and so potent and efficient in meeting their moral and religious needs, that it is no exaggeration to say that, however genuinely human the Bible is, it is also possessed of a life-giving and inspiring quality which may be truly called divine. This is at once the purpose and the abiding proof of the divine inspiration which Paul claims for it, and on the reasonableness and truth of this claim we can let the question of its divine inspiration rest. "Every scripture inspired of God is also profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction which is in righteousness: that the man of God may be complete, furnished completely unto every good work" (2 Tim. 3¹⁶; 17).

Literature: Peake, The Bible: Its Origin, Its Significance and Its Abiding Worth; Kent, The Origin and Permanent Value of the O.T.; Moffatt, The Approach to the N.T.; Watson, God's Message to the Human Soul; The Use of the Bible in the Light of the New Knowledge; Clarke, Sixty Years with the Bible; The Use of the Scriptures in Theology; Aytoun, God in the O.T.; Fosdick, The Modern Use of the Bible; McConnell, Understanding the Scriptures; Gore, The Doctrine of the Infallible Book.

Writings by the author of this article: The Paths That Lead to God, chs. x, xi, and xii; Providence, Prayer, and Power, chs. ii and x.

THE CHRISTIAN APPROACH TO THE STUDY OF THE SCRIPTURES

BY BISHOP FRANCIS J. McCONNELL

The Historical Approach. The first requisite in the Christian's use of the Scriptures is an honest intent to find out what the Scriptures meant to the people who first read them. We have moved pretty well away from the notion that the biblical writers had in mind the long future in composing their books. If they had thus written for the after-ages, their own periods would not have understood them, and the writings would thus have failed of any immediate purpose. Set forth, however, to meet an urgent current need, the Scriptures can at least be made intelligible for all time. There must be, though, the resolute purpose to discover what the utterances meant for the day in which they appeared. Here is the Christian sanction for all manner of earnest scientific investigation of whatever sort—historical, archaeological, linguistic. To get a sound meaning for the readers of a later time we must first know the meaning intended for the first readers. It may well be that the Scripture writers wrote more profoundly than they knew, but we must start with their first meanings.

Perhaps it would be better to say that we must know, first of all, not so much what the first readers understood the Scriptures to mean as what the writers intended to say. In other words, we must ask as to the purpose of the various books. The school of biblical study associated with the name of Baur and his followers rendered lasting service in bringing out into the light the part played by "tendency" in the creation of certain N.T. documents. It is true that the Baur group were themselves so much under the influence of the Hegelian doctrine of thesis, antithesis, and synthesis that they allowed themselves unwarrantable liberties in dating and classifying N.T. material; but the fact that they had a wrong formula should not break the force of their having seized upon a true principle, namely, that the N.T. writers wrote on the basis of assumptions and presuppositions and out of theological tempers and in religious and social atmospheres. It is our duty to take account of all such factors, imponderable and elusive as they often are. There can be no doubt—though this applies especially to the O.T.—that passages having to do with Israel's history have been rewritten, or at least re-edited, more than once, from differing if not from opposing points of view; as, for example, in the treatment of the establishment of the monarchy by Samuel. Any reasonable interpretation of a Scripture passage must ask persistently as to what the author was trying to do. For practical, and especially for homiletic purposes, it is permissible for a reader of the Bible to resort to any use of Scripture he pleases, provided that he makes clear that the use is his own and not that warranted by the meaning of the text itself. The best course here is to tell what the passage means and then to avow frankly the purpose to use it without reference to that meaning. (See art., How to Study the Bible, pp. 5-8.)

Assumptions in Bible Study. Here a note of warning is necessary, due to the presence of assumption in our own thinking. Let us not forget that we never approach the study of the Scriptures, or of any other theme of human thought, utterly stripped of assumptions. Every student has some form of philosophy, a philosophy often all the more effective because its workings are not suspected or are not subjected to any close scrutiny. It requires only the slightest acquaintance with present-day biblical study to realize the extent to which the assumptions of the various schools determine the reading of the meanings of the documents. Schweitzer, in his Quest of the Historical Jesus, has told us of the course of interpretation as to N.T. miracles, particularly those recorded in the Gospels. At first students took such narratives as literal descriptions of fact. Then scholars of the Paulus type saw in them occurrences described as miraculous but which were, after all, capable of natural explanation. Next came those who saw the miracles as expressions of a myth-forming tendency. After Jesus had been done away with altogether by the seekers of myths, he was restored to the world of fact by the apocalyptic school. Now, here are four different sets of assumptions in N.T. investigation, with possibilities of all degrees of combination and interrelation;—and out of the assumptions the various types of thinkers can discover what the back-lying presupposition calls for. A determined believer in the miraculous once declared that if there had been no miracles in the Bible, we should have been compelled to put some there. The holder of a well-known type of scientific attitude toward natural law will cast miracle out of the Scriptures at whatever cost. The believers in the myth-forming factor in N.T. history have repeatedly hailed with rapture first one book about Jesus and then another which rules out Jesus as historic altogether. The adherents of the apocalyptic view have emptied much of the teaching of Jesus of its significance by their doctrine of an "interimsethik." All these schools are alike in their willingness practically to cut out of the gospel, if need be, any passage which cannot be fitted into the demands of their several theories.

Now, it would be folly to protest against the use of assumption. William James used to say that an investigator who approaches a field just "staring about" without any assumptions whatever is the "veriest duffer." We must have assumptions, and since we must, it seems clearly to be the part of intellectual honesty to admit that we hold assumptions—to recognize the assumptions—to make the most that is possible of them in some situations, and to be on our guard against them in others. Inasmuch as the fundamental battles over the Bible are in the end fought out on the basis of the assumptions, it is well for any biblical student to get his assumptions out into the fullest light. Coming back now to the point of view of the biblical writers, we find everywhere to-day the virtual admission that the Bible was written out of a religious purpose. It is a book of religion. It deals with views of the world and of man and of history, but always from the religious point of view. A good deal of unnecessary debate might have been spared if this primary aim of the biblical writers had been kept in full sight.

The Bible a Book of Religion. Still, this emphasis on the religious aim of the biblical writers is often set forth in a fashion that is not quite fair. We are asked to think of the biblical writers as so concerned about the religious aim that all other matters were indifferent to them. They have now and again been pictured as laboring somewhat after the manner of a present-day preacher—utilizing whatever material came to hand with a spiritual purpose. Just as a preacher to-day might use illustrations from current science or from history or biography, so the biblical writers took their material wherever they found it, thinking always of the main purpose of spiritual instruction. Thus we are told that this essential spiritual purpose gives us the key to the distinction between the permanent and the passing in the Scriptures. The oldtime writers would not have been disturbed, we are told, if they had discovered that their ideas of nature and history were mistaken, provided only that their central aim had been granted and their chief contention conceded.

The fundamental truth here no one can gainsay, but this way of putting it is open to question. The biblical writers took their ideas of the world and of history more seriously than this analogy between them and the modern preacher would imply. They were not searching merely for illustrations to be employed with an immediate, workaday practical intent. No book of religion, indeed, has ever come more directly out of life and has struck more definitely back into life than has the Bible, but it is more than a set of utterances for practical living. It is an attempt to construct, or to reconstruct, the thought of the world and of history with a religious aim, for the sake of the satisfaction of the religious nature. To be sure, such a religious view would be in the completest degree practical, but not practical as the interpretation I am discussing assumes. The biblical writers thought they had the truth in the first chapters of Genesis and in their narratives of the early history of Israel. We know to-day that the contribution which they made to the interpretation of the course of nature and of human history lies in the difference between their handling of materials common to them and, let us say, to peoples like the Babylonians, and the handling of the same material by those other peoples; but we can hardly understand the biblical authors if we do not think of them as taking the material on which they worked very seriously.

Moreover, the distinction between the religious aim in the use of materials and the materials themselves is not always so easy to apply as we often imagine. At the time when some parts of the Bible were written much more was conceived of as belonging to the sphere of religious duty than is usual with us to-day. We have to-day to look abroad to the Oriental peoples—like those of India—to get a hint as to the completeness with which religious significance entered into all phases of men's activity at the time the biblical writings began to take shape. It will not do merely to say that the Bible was written with a religious aim, for at the period when some at least of the Bible was written almost everything in that ancient world was done with a religious aim. The just condemnation of the peoples outside of Judaism in the old day—and of non-Christendom to-day for that matter—cannot be that such peoples have not been religious, or that they have not taken their religion seriously. Such peoples have carried religion into the last and least details of their daily lives. We have only to consider the extent to which the practice of human sacrifice has prevailed among so-called heathen peoples to realize that non-Christian peoples have taken their religion seriously. (See art., The Bible—a Library of Religion, p. 15.)

The Ethical Note in Biblical Religion. The statement then that the biblical writers work with a religious motive is not enough. We must consider the type of religion. Here we find at once that the religion of the scriptural writers moves from the start in the direction of the higher ethical insights. The difference between Judaism and Christianity on the one side, and the rest of the religions on the other side, is not so much in the sense of "rightness" as in the directions toward which that sense points. Religion in the Scriptures is increasingly conceived of as moving toward the moral ideal, thought of in such a way as to be stated in terms of the highest and best for human life. What this highest and best was depended more and more upon the direct insights of prophetically minded leaders, the insights in the end being accepted as part of the common thought. When Micah asked Israel if the Lord really required the first-born in sacrifice, he relied upon the direct question itself to prompt its own answer. The question presupposes enough moral insight on the part of the people to render the question intelligible and pertinent. The religious progress of Israel is a moral progress, the morality being conceived of as the realization of the highest and best in human life.

An even more distinctive feature of Hebrew religion was the inexorability with which the biblical writers made moral obligations which they pronounced binding upon men binding also upon God. We have here no need to consider the steps by which the biblical authors seized the moral nature of God, except to say that those authors no sooner thought of a moral principle as binding for man than they likewise conceived of it as inescapable for God. The challenge put upon the lips of Abraham: "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" (Gen. 18²⁵) is a characteristic and complete phrasing of the biblical attitude toward God. We seldom find traces in Scripture of the notion that God can do whatever he pleases—a peculiarity remarkable from the fact that Oriental gods, conceived after the likeness of Oriental despots, could do as they pleased. By the time the scriptural development has reached the period of the book of Job there is indeed a facing of questions in God's dealing with men which are insoluble. Job finds no direct answer to his questions whatsoever, but he stands upon his right to ask the questions and upon the obligation of God to deal with the questions himself, even though he will not give a direct answer. Job is satisfied when God himself replies to the challenge, even though the reply is a virtual refusal to give such an answer as Job sought. In Job's thought there might be innumerable reasons why God should decline to answer a man's question, but no reason at all why God should refuse to hearken to the question. The book of Job closes with confidence in God as accepting the moral obligations binding upon the Ruler of the universe.

The Prophetic and the Institutional Emphasis. There is, then, a double movement in the biblical revelation. The writers no sooner find a moral ideal which they conceive of as holding good for men than they make the same ideal hold good for God; and they no sooner get a deeper insight into the moral nature of God than they make the same insight hold good for the nature of man. We are all the time dealing with movement in terms of unfolding moral life. When, however, we are dealing with life, we have to do not with life in the abstract, but with actual human beings; and such human beings, united though they may be in fundamental spiritual aims, may show most diverse tendencies. For the purpose of this article we may look at two such tendencies—that which we may call the Prophetic, which seeks to follow the living insight into the spiritual ideal out to its implications; and the Institutional, which seeks to codify the moral gains of successive generations into actual statute. Each of these tendencies springs from deep sources in human nature, and each is entitled to consideration in our search for a true method by which to make the most of the biblical revelation.

The laws of Israel came from a variety of origins. They were in part the socially sanctioned ancient customs of a people, some of them selected out of the mass of primitive customs by the good moral sense of the Jewish community, some kept for what might be called their "survival value," such as those enjoining cleanliness and care in dealing with disease, some of indifferent moral significance, probably preserved because of traditions associated with them. Above all, there were the enactments which came out of the insights of prophets like Moses in the earlier and Amos in the later time. If our historical judgment in the consideration of ancient documents is not utterly deceived, Deuteronomy is a deliberate attempt to fasten down into institutional legal expression the teaching of some of the nobler prophets concerning man's true place and conduct in the world. (See intro. to Deuteronomy, and notes on Ex. 20–23 and 2 Kings 22, 23.)

Between the prophetic and the institutional

types of mind there is almost inevitable conflict. I say "almost" because somewhat of the conflict might be avoided if we were to pursue a plan like that suggested concerning assumptions in a paragraph above. If we could recognize and admit and discount our own prophetic or institutional tendency we might hasten the day when both tendencies will work together in the treatment of Scripture more harmoniously than ever in the past. Inevitably the prophetic mind lays stress on the ideal; inevitably the institutionalist puts the weight on the realistic. Temperamentally it is hard for the two types to sympathize with each other, though each at times works indisputably for religious progress. In a social plight such as Amos witnessed his word is the only one worth listening to. Before the need of saving anything spiritual out of the deluge of Babylonianism, in which the Israel of some three centuries later was weltering, the institutionalism of Ezekiel and even of Ezra was the path to salvation.

Of both the prophetic and the institutional types of temper it must be said that they were dealing with actual situations immediately confronting them. The institutionalist was not on the one hand looking backward or the prophet looking forward. Both were studying facts as they saw them, and trying to deal with the facts in the concrete. Both were very much men of their times, and spoke the language of their times. The picture of the prophet as a dreamy-eyed gazer on abstract truth is as much mistaken as that of the institutionalist as a defender of the days that were gone. Sometimes it was the prophet who looked backward; sometimes it was the realist who looked ahead. Sometimes the prophet proposed remedies utterly impossible. Sometimes the realist made the institution work only too well. (See intro. to Ezra-Nehemiah, pp. 454f.; also art., Prophetic Literature, pp. 150f.)

Jesus a Realist and an Idealist. The difference between the two types comes to its superlative climax in the career of Jesus. Jesus was both a realist and an idealist. He saw the needs of the times as they were. He saw that if the human and divine ideal of the law and the prophets had been held fast Israel would not have found herself in the clutches of an institutionalized system which had been built up around the letter to the death of the spirit. Against a conception of religion which had been institutionalized almost to death Jesus waged war. There is a good deal of misunderstanding as to the forces which actually brought Jesus to his death. He has been set before us as a teacher of rather abstract truth, misunderstood and persecuted, and finally killed because he was misunderstood. In fact, he was understood only too well. In the sense of not foreseeing the long consequences of their hostility to Jesus the institutionalists were indeed blind, but they were altogether open-eyed as to the immediate results of that hostility. They planned for and succeeded in keeping the Temple interests in their own hands. If they had not caught and killed Jesus just when they did a revolution—confined to the Temple itself but nevertheless potent there—might have swept them out of power and have put a group of prophetically minded leaders in their places. Those who to-day tell us that the concern of Jesus was merely for the individual soul forget that if individuals as such, rather than the vested religious interests of his time, had been the chief aim of Jesus, he might have gone on preaching for fifty years without serious disturbance. Even if he had been driven out of Galilee and Judæa, he could have devoted himself to an itinerant ministry to the Gentiles. Of course Jesus had to seek his results through individuals, but he aimed to purify institutionalism by holding before the people the prophetic ideal as over against an institutionalism which had become mechanical, political, and secular. In reflecting upon the career of Jesus we must not forget that the best of reasons, from the realistic point of view, could be given against following his prophetic idealism at the time. Few realists ever object to the ideal in itself. Their count is always against the untimeliness of the ideal. The realists, like Caiaphas, were confronted with what seemed the immediate duty of saving the institution of which they were a part. They would probably have admitted many of the evils of the institution, and would have admitted also the validity of the ideals of Jesus. Their objection was to putting those ideals into effect in a realistic situation which would not have stood the strain. These things are said because the conflict between the idealistic and the realistic goes on to-day and at all times. It may diminish the acuteness of the struggle itself to say that both idealistic and realistic points of view may be marked by complete sincerity, to recognize the importance of both attitudes for the full statement of truth, and to seek for all possible Christian charity on the part of differing tempers and temperaments toward one another.

Jesus the Fulfillment of Biblical Ideals. We see in Jesus the fulfillment of the ideals toward which all scriptural thought moves. The highest human ideals find embodiment in him and in him the same ideals are taught and seen as holding good for God. It would seem then that the adequate treatment of the theme of this article would be just to ask as to the attitude of Jesus toward the Scriptures of his time. This, indeed, would be a correct answer, provided we patiently set ourselves not so much to a swift, compendious statement, but tried to follow out the just implications of the answer. The summary statement is that Jesus sought in the Scriptures for the spirit that giveth life rather than for the letter that killeth. Now, this can be so put as to imply that Jesus had no place for the institutionalized religion of his time—and this would be far from the truth. Faulty as was the religion of the day of Jesus, that religion in its organized form served through the experience at the Temple to re-enforce in the boy Jesus a consciousness of his high destiny and largely shaped the mold of his thinking throughout his after career. The Temple itself was always a magnet which attracted his steps and his thought. His aim was not to overthrow the Temple worship, but to fill it with a new spirit. He saw in the Temple the outcome and expression of necessarily realistic tendencies arising out of the regular, official interpretation of the sacred books of the Jews; and his intention was not to destroy the institutionalism but to fulfill it. With that purpose he read the Law and the Prophets to seize their spirit and to discover their direction, and to follow that spirit and direction whithersoever they might lead. To love God with the whole heart and the neighbor as oneself was the purpose and goal of the scriptural movement. Wherever institutionalism, in the form of church, or creed, or law, or book, forgot that main aim and sought to become an end in itself and not an instrument, he set it aside. Nothing is more truly indicative of the attitude of Jesus than the pronouncement that the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath.

Jesus as a Criterion of Biblical Revelation. Now, all this gives us a clue as to the way we are to use the example of Jesus in the study of the biblical revelation. The spirit of Jesus himself is always discernible in what he says and does. We know how he feels toward man and God. We see in him the revelation of God himself. We are to judge the revelations in the Bible by their varying measures of likeness to the spirit of Jesus. In the light of that spirit we are to discover our duty in the application of Christian truth to the problems of our own time.

Here again we have to be on our guard against the notion that Jesus was a teacher of abstract truth. Jesus spoke concretely and dealt with actual situations. Even in the fourth Gospel, where the utterances of Jesus are more general than in the Synoptics, they take their coloring from the detailed settings in which they are framed. We can hardly say that the words of Jesus can be packed into a formal system, except as the characteristic of their all-revealing one spirit bestows on them a genuine unity. Those who tell us that the method of Jesus was to announce a principle, and then leave the principle to work its own way to the overthrow of evil and the establishment of good, are not the soundest of interpreters. Jesus dealt with particular evils, especially those that had grown up around the Temple. In fighting those evils he did indeed act on principles and assumptions—and the principles and assumptions have implications and suggestions valid for us of to-day. When we have perceived the implications we have ourselves to put them into force in the concrete. They will not put themselves into effect.

As Jesus did not utter abstract truth on the one hand, neither did he promulgate formal rules on the other. He set forth a spirit and acted on assumptions everlastingly valid, but he issued no formulas good for all time. Every now and again some devout follower of Jesus declares that a sufficient guide to practice in all moral situations is to ask what Jesus would do. The measure of worth here lies in the fact that asking such a question is fitted to recall the mind of the questioner to the need of a thoroughgoing sincerity and the indispensability of a right spirit. Beyond this the question is of little avail. The determination to be loyal to the spirit of Jesus may conceivably lead to a bondage to the letter of Jesus which militates against the spirit.

For example, take the attempt to make the words of Jesus into a basis for economic procedure to-day. Modern economics might well set before itself the emphasis on human values which marked all the work of Jesus. Indeed, economics is being recast and rewritten from the point of view of human meanings. In so far as the teachings of Jesus may be the best of foundations for modern social study, but the moment we advance to detailed considerations as to how the human values are to be guarded, the only light we get from Jesus is to remember that if Jesus were in our place he would do whatever we ought to do—but what we ought to do is the rub. Modern economics turns around modern capitalism. Institutionalized capitalism as we have to deal with it did not exist in the age of Jesus. There were the haves and the have-nots, the greedy and those envious of the rich who had a chance to be greedy. Jesus spoke more often and more pointedly about the temptations of wealth than about any other temptations. All this has to be held steadily in view in our dealing with wealth, but it does not solve specific problems—such, for illustration, as the ethics of charging and receiving interest in present-day capitalistic enterprises. So with scores of other current social difficulties.

We have here a glimpse of Paul's wisdom in meeting the crises which repeatedly came upon him in the creation and care of the apostolic churches. Paul sought most earnestly to discover the spirit of Jesus as a guide in his dealing with his churches, and he sought that spirit by patient inquiry into the actual career of Jesus on earth. It soon became apparent, however, that Paul could not thus find detailed guidance. The problems that confronted him were altogether different from any that Jesus actually solved. To begin with, the total environment was different from that of Jesus, as being Gentile rather than Jewish. The few excursions that Jesus made into Gentile territory threw no light on the duty of an apostle working all his days among the Gentiles, and working too on a different task from that of training the Twelve. So that there may be a very practical phase of significance in the word of Paul that he was determined no longer to know Christ after the flesh. Perhaps it was highly providential that Paul knew so little of the historic Jesus. Perhaps if he had known more of the actual history he might have so tried to repeat details of Jesus' actual procedure as to have lost the Christ-spirit. As it was, the spirit of Christ meant more to Paul with the passing of every day. The meaning of Christ deepened with continued reflection—a reflection which itself kept Paul from any slavish imitation. Christ was not before Paul as a pattern to be imitated, but as a Person whose thought and spirit were to be breathed in as one breathes in a personal atmosphere. If we were to define inspiration at all, the definition would have to be in terms of personal influence and atmosphere—and influences and atmospheres defy definition.

The Gospel of Jesus and the Gospel About Jesus. This reference to Paul suggests to us a current debate which we may appropriately use for illustration. We have heard much of late concerning the "gospel of Jesus" and the "gospel about Jesus." Those who talk about the religion of Jesus seem to desire a strictly critical examination of the scriptural materials to determine the actual facts of the life of Jesus, to determine just what he did and said and thought and how he lived, with the purpose of finding light on practical religious problems of to-day. Such study often professes to seek for the spirit of Jesus, that men may be taught to reproduce that spirit in their lives. The aim seems sound as thus stated.

The stricter the scientific examination becomes, however, the more positively the student is likely to affirm that the ideas of Jesus were just theology after all, and then we have left what is called the spirit of Jesus. So it comes to pass that we behold moral phenomena like that of a great Hindu of to-day who avows that he seeks to live in the spirit of Jesus while nevertheless yielding to none in his own reverence for the sacred cow. Then a final step is taken by the more severely scientific—those who find the recorded facts about Jesus so meager that they dismiss him as historical altogether.

On the other side are those who declare that the essential is the gospel about Jesus. They tell us that from the beginning the believers in Jesus began to put larger and larger interpretations upon his life, insisting that in him we have the revelation of the divine, the manifestation of the spirit in which the universe itself is carried on. Hence the terms "virgin-born," "pre-existent," "Son of God," and the like. They point to the entire course of the history of the church as a warrant for putting on the character of Jesus the largest interpretation that the facts will warrant. What we need to know is not merely the significance of Christ for man but his significance for God as well. Or, rather, we are told, we cannot make the most of Christ for men unless we can make the most of him for God.

This aim too, as thus stated, seems sound. Nevertheless, those who so move in the direction of placing the largest interpretation upon Christ in their teaching about him may end as do the minutely specialized scientific—they may practically do away with the historic Christ altogether, or so ignore the historical facts as to reduce them to virtual insignificance. Then we are told that it is of no consequence how the Christ-idea of God arose in the course of human history; the idea is now here and we are to make the most of it for men and for humanity.

It is clear after a little reflection that we need both the gospel of Jesus and the gospel about Jesus. Either view taken by itself and pushed to extremes—and the religious temper tends to extremes—in the end is likely to do away with Jesus altogether. Here again we may profitably study the writings of Paul. Paul went further than any other Christian of his time—perhaps of all time—in putting upon the Christ-life the weightiest possible interpretation. Paul has an elaborately developed gospel about Christ. Nevertheless, it is evident that Paul always kept in mind the fundamental traits of Jesus as those had been described to him by the disciples. If we pick out of Paul's epistles passages like Phil. 25-11, which set out the self-sacrifice of the Divine Son of God, we find in them poetical or theological phrasings of the type of spirit which the historical Jesus is represented in the Gospels as manifesting. We might collect all the utterances of Paul about Jesus into a Pauline biography of Jesus and not find the Pauline statement out of harmony with the portraits given in the Gospels.

All of this leads to a word of summing up. In the study of the Scriptures we need the play and interplay of two types of activity. We need the most realistic search for the facts, and the most realistic handling of the facts of institutionalized religious utterance as embodied in the Scripture. On this basis of fact we need to erect the loftiest possible superstructure of idealistic interpretation—the ideals conceived of as pointing upward toward the highest and best in man and God.

Literature: W. N. Clarke, Sixty Years with the Bible; Eiselen, The Christian View of the O.T.; J. Morgan Jones, The N.T. in Modern Education; F. J. McConnell, Understanding the Scriptures; McFadyen, The Approach to the O.T.; Moffatt, The Approach to the N.T.; Thistleton Mark, The Appeal of the Bible Today. See also "Literature" under the articles, "The Bible a Library of Religion" and "The Divine Element in the Bible," in the present volume.

THE USE OF THE BIBLE IN PREACHING

BY THE REVEREND S. PARKES CADMAN

The Diversity of the Scriptures. The Bible is a select literature of divinely inspired human experiences. It has survived centuries of mutation because of its permanent spiritual values. It is the product of a revelatory process covering many ages and enriched by individuals of diversified temperaments and conditions. Among them were princes and peasants, statesmen and poets, artisans and shepherds, prophets and annalists from various walks of life and appearing in different periods of time. All the sixty-six books of this sacred library deal in the main with the ways of God toward man. They describe with vivid realism the supreme issue of man's thought and imagination; his vital contacts with his Creator, and his obligations to the redemptive purpose of Deity manifested in Christ Jesus. Hence the Bible is pre-eminently the book of religion, the most complete record extant of the progressive self-disclosure of God adapted to the advancing intelligence and morality of his offspring. Its communications were determined by man's recipient ability; his spiritual evolution is indicated by its ascensive truth and illumination. It has been the companion of every human fate, journeying with the race out of the miry clay of its beginnings forward to the Delectable Heights of the incarnation and its evangel. Consequently, some human lesions and limitations are found in Holy Scripture. Indeed, it is the more divine because of its humanness, and its entire content is justified by the purpose of grace unto salvation pervading the Book, and culminating in Jesus Christ.

Its literary forms embrace legends, myths, folklore, fables, and parables; lyrical poetry, drama, idyls and hymns; letters, memoirs, maxims, philosophical observations, predictions, apocalypses, and homilies. Their general viewpoint is practical rather than theoretical. The biblical writers were not purists subservient to grammatical and linguistic canons. They spoke of things as they saw them in the light of the eternal verities. The literalist who interprets their words according to the rigid rules of a static theory fails to recognize the differences between prose and poetry, history and romance; between the picture thinking of the East and the conceptive thinking of the West; between the exalted visions of mysticism and the logical analyses of rationalism. (See art., The Bible as Literature, p. 19.)

The Unity of the Scriptures. Notwithstanding the Bible's marked dissimilarities, however, it has an underlying unity which demands that what is essential shall be distinguished from what is incidental. Its ancient formulations of truth and righteousness are applicable to our own generation and its problems. Things new and old in these treasuries of God are at the disposal of their wise stewards. The Book portrays a historic unveiling of the divine mind through human experiences which are reproducible in believers of every subsequent age. Their consciousness of the pardoning presence and peace of the Everlasting Father confirms the witness of the Bible to these certitudes of the soul.

A Progressive Revelation. The progressive nature of the biblical revelation is seen in the O.T. conception of God. (See art., The O.T. Conception of God, p. 158.) A similar development is seen within the more limited compass of the N.T., which covered a very brief period of time as compared with the centuries covered by the O.T. The testimony to Christ as Lord because Redeemer of the world is outspoken and unanimous from Matthew to the Apocalypse. Nevertheless, an ever-increasing evaluation and exaltation of our blessed Lord is discernible throughout the literature of the apostolic church. The law of development which Cardinal Newman set forth in his Essay on Christian Doctrine operated during the near interval after our Lord's resurrection. The enriched experience of early believers, the expansion of their religion throughout the Græco-Roman Empire, and its contact with the pagan culture which was still formidable though decadent, induced the N.T. church to interpret the person and mission of Christ with ever-widening fullness. True, it is the same Jesus of faith and fealty "who wrought with human hands the creed of creeds." But how much more fundamental is the apprehension of Romans than Thessalonians, of Ephesians than Corinthians, of Colossians than Galatians, of Hebrews than the Epistle of James, of the Gospel of John than the synoptic Gospels. As our appreciation of Israel's monotheism is heightened by the knowledge of the chaos preceding its declaration, so is our reverence for Christ intensified when we survey the ascensive confessions of his first disciples, as given in the chronological order of the N.T.

A Manual of Religious Devotion. The Bible is the unequalled manual of religious devotion. Other sacred literatures have their inspirational moods and nearly all chronicle some spiritual experiences which men will not willingly let die. But none compares with this Book of Books for its pledges of communion with God, its mystical loveliness, its precepts of righteousness, its programs for the spiritual life of the individual, the community, and the nation. Nor is it content merely to post those programs. The means for their fulfillment in godliness of deed and conversation are set out in detail. Legalism, sacramentarianism, and simple trust are in turn related to the divine prerogatives of forgiveness and restoration. Man and his immortal destiny are here so variously emphasized that the things of the Spirit become paramount for him. The Book's unsurpassed and lasting value is established by its devotional features alone.

The Need of Rational Interpretation. Life's pressing problems receive no uniform solutions in Holy Writ. Nor do its earlier answers to man's most insurgent questions always anticipate the perfect revelation of Christ. He is the light of all Scripture. Its contents should, therefore, be judged by his teachings, and wherein they fall below the level of those teachings they are either preparatory or negligible. Those who insist that the truth of the atonement is found in the Levitical ritual, or that the Pauline ideal of universal redemption is contained in Hebrew prophecy, or that the depth and intensity of the life which is hid with Christ in God have been plumbed by the Psalms, do violence to the essential meanings of the Book. Such inversions arise out of an excessive introspection blind to variant conditions, changing conceptions, progressive methods of religious thinking, and to the supremacy of Christ's message to mankind. The fact that they are intended to promote esteem for the Bible as a whole does not annul the mischief of these forced interpretations when they are made to do duty in the place of scientific exegesis. Yet it speaks with persuasive authority on all matters pertaining to man's highest welfare. And what it has to say is couched in terms of sympathy and insight as well as firmness and finality.

The Basis of Successful Preaching. For these reasons the Bible is the basis of successful preaching. It magnifies Christ as the vital source of that knowledge of God in which stands our eternal life and freedom. It directly relates the Christian minister of every age with his Lord. It assures him that his spiritual genealogy does not derive from Homer, Dante, Shakespeare, Milton, Goethe, or any other literary celebrities, but from the prophets of the O.T. and the apostles and confessors of the N.T. His chief business, then, is to explore the vast hinterlands of Holy Scripture, and make himself familiar with its fertile fields in order that he may bring their healing produce to his fellow believers. Every resource of ancient and modern learning should be drawn upon to expound its characteristic truths. Nor can he ignore the verification of these truths in his own experience. What he has felt in his soul's intercourse with the Book and its Author predicates his effective utterance in the pulpit. The internal conflicts and external obstacles which evoked the tremendous climaxes of the men of the Bible must be envisaged by him. Their confidence concerning God, assurance of things unseen, visions of everlasting righteousness, insistence upon human rectitude, and endurance of persecution were not the achievements of groundlings conformed to the fashion of this world. They were the gains of God-intoxicated spirits won in defiance of earthly custom and rule. We who follow with unequal steps should not the less but the more keep in sight these paladins of the Almighty.

Open-Mindedness and Biblical Preaching. Open-mindedness is a requisite for biblical preaching. It is sanctioned by our Lord's query addressed to one who was supposed to be well versed in the Scriptures, "How readest thou?" (Lk. 10²⁶.) This man had read to little purpose so far as the marrow of the Word was concerned or he could not have failed to apply the inclusive truth of love to God and service to man. Many of his contemporaries were equally at fault because of their rage for current orthodoxy. Had the Pharisees understood the story of David, they would have refrained from criticism of the disciples who plucked the ears of corn on the Sabbath Day (Mt. 12¹). Had the Sadducees meditated intelligently upon the words, "I am the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob," they might have correctly interpreted the doctrine of the future life (Mt. 22^{23f.}). Had the religious leaders of Jerusalem read historically this prophecy, "The stone which the builders rejected, the same was made the head of the corner," they might have viewed the Messianic claims of Jesus in a different light (Mk. 12^{10f.}). To be sure, these official coteries studied the O.T., but their mental reservations and prejudices disqualified them for its explanation. Its transcendencies were obscured for them by their willful limitations. The Scriptures' majestic verities were in their right hand, yet they did not know it. When interrogated they became irrelevant or dogmatic, stressing trivialities, "straining out the gnat and swallowing the camel," while the issues of justice and goodness were overlooked (Mt. 23:23f.).

The Example of Our Lord. Our Lord quoted the O.T. with the freedom of perfect knowledge actuated by profound reverence. He showed fealty to the spirit rather than the letter of its prophets and psalmists. His censure fell upon those professionals who either could not or would not differentiate between the substance and the form of its contents. Their bewildering notions about its relative values obscured its redemptive righteousness. Paul, likewise, and other authors of apostolic literature, felt the same freedom toward the O.T., and none of them more so than the unknown writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews. The comprehensiveness of this Epistle exemplifies an organic method which every preacher can well afford to practice.

Again, our Lord quoted the text of the O.T. with reference to the context. His favorite phrase, "Again, it is written," signified his habit of comparing Scripture with Scripture and correcting when necessary by the comparison (Mt. 4:1f.). He repudiated by inference the resort to the Bible as an arsenal of proof texts, to be seized without regard to their surroundings or moral and religious value, and used in confirmation of creedal statements, or as weapons for theological warfare. Some belated preachers are still addicted to this abuse of Holy Writ, with the result that numerous vagaries have obtained seeming support from the Bible. Indeed, there is scarcely a theological error, an ethical perversion, or an ecclesiastical misdemeanor for which the intellectual vice of quoting "proof texts" is not in part responsible. It is rooted in a theory of verbal inspiration which the Bible nowhere claims for itself. Literalists sound the alarm that the Scriptures are jeopardized by the scholarship which has elucidated their teachings afresh, and placed their light upon a golden candlestick of devout and constructive learning. What has really happened is that certain dogmatic presuppositions about the Bible have suffered a shock which shows them to be without foundation.

The Question of Authority. It is here pertinent to discuss the Bible's relation to religious authority. Roman Catholicism regards Christianity as a dogmatic and devotional system, promulgated by the church as the custodian of apostolic grace and tradition. Protestantism also reckons with the historic continuity of the faith and with what that continuity involves. But it insists upon the Christian's privileges to submit the greatest experiences of the past to his vital experience of the present, in accordance with the witness of the indwelling Spirit of Truth and Holiness, and the requirements of advancing knowledge. The exercise of this privilege, which belongs to the individual priesthood of the believer, has frequently exposed Protestantism to the perils of subjectivism. But it has also maintained that freedom of the spirit which is the inheritance of the sons of God and an essential part of the good in everything. A reliable safeguard for the preacher against the fancies of unregulated interpretation is the consensus fidelium—the collective judgment of Christian fellowship. It has not always functioned, because it was overridden by some expositors who were supposedly complete in themselves. Nevertheless, extravagances and obsessions cannot hide the truth that religious liberty guarantees research and welcomes verification without the handicap of ex cathedra pronouncements.

How, then, should the preacher view the authority of the Bible? Does it not inhere in the appeal which the Book makes because it adequately reckons with all the facts involved in the case? It imposes its mandates not as official edicts but as self-evident verities and practical suggestions, illuminated by God's gradual self-disclosure perfected in Christ. At any rate, this was the test applied by the third Council of Carthage in 397 A.D., which had to decide what Christian writings of apostolic origin should have biblical authority. In brief, the intrinsic values of these writings were the determinant of their admission, the same condition which had dominated the Jewish Synod of Jamnia, about 90 A.D., in establishing the canon of the O.T. (See art., Christian Approach to the Bible, p. 36.)

The principle of the believer's responsibility for biblical interpretation by spiritual discernment was never withdrawn from the church. It was advocated by the first Protestant reformers, neglected by the majority of their successors, conserved by an enlightened few, and revived in the early Victorian age in the interests of the historical methods of interpretation. We well understand that our Christian culture does not depend on an indiscriminate allegiance to what has been handed down. Yet tradition ought to be recognized so long as personal experience and the results of sound learning are conjoined with it. (See art., N.T. and Christian Doctrine, pp. 948-9.)

The Use of Scholarship. In thus using the Bible, the preacher should be characterized by honesty, accuracy, clarity of mind, and charity of spirit. Much weakness in preaching arises from the separation of intellectual ability from spiritual insight, of scientific appraisal from evangelistic appreciation, of the qualities of scholarship from a fervent zeal. It is not to be expected that the average preoccupied pastor shall become a first-rate biblical scholar, but he must know and incorporate into his sermons the best results of biblical scholarship. They forewarn him against the pitfalls of literalism, relieve him of countless embarrassments due to the contrasts between the earlier and later Scriptures, and conduct him to the bracing religious climate of their altitudes. (See art., N.T. and Criticism, p. 885.)

The well-poised minister will not be unduly disturbed by the contradictions and inconsistencies of Holy Writ, many of which enhance its charm and intensify the impression of its indestructible unity. Human limitations account for the former; the divine initiative behind them accounts for the latter qualities. The cranny through which the Eternal Will poured its radiance was narrow enough, as all must admit, in view of the oceanic extent of that Will. But the wonders of grace that followed its transmission justify the human element in the Book. It magnifies the protracted forbearance of God and shows that his delight is with the children of men.

The critical examination of the Bible is secondary for the minister's use until he passes beyond its stages to a candid estimate of the Book's religious values. Then what he has recruited beforehand becomes a formidable array. Imagination, which is to the pulpit what the eyes are to the body, flourishes in sound exegesis and falters on its opposite. Eaglelike pinions for the sermon's flights are obtained from what the preacher knows by verification and experience. Behind the onward thrust of his discourse is the barrage of organized knowledge. Ahead of it are the heights triumphantly scaled by a rational faith. Instead of sheltering in the vulnerable trenches of literalism the instructed advocate of Christianity seeks a profounder consciousness of the realities which his reasoned beliefs assure. He wastes no energies on a forced reconciliation between the Song of Songs and the Epistle to the Ephesians, or between the cosmogonies of Genesis and those of modern science. His audience is brought without irritating delays into the presence of the Eternal. The prophets and apostles who spoke for God as well as from him are introduced, and what they have to say is corroborated by the response it evokes.

Biblical Preaching Secures Diversity of Themes. In an age when the gulf between knowledge and ignorance of the Bible is widening, its real character and aims should be the themes of a teaching ministry. The stream of sorrow which is always falling darkly through the shadows of the world; the perplexities, woes and sins of men; the satiety which robs them of zest for existence, alike admonish the servant of the Most High that he must begin and end with the Book. The very splendor of our material civilization threatens its spiritual underpinning. Its inward resistance is not equal to the outward pressure it is called upon to sustain. This widespread condition cannot be remedied by dissertations upon literary, ethical, and social themes offered independently of the divine Word. It is as true now as when Macaulay said it nearly a century ago, that in passing from a people which knows and loves the Bible to one that does neither we pass from a higher to a lower stage of civilization. The practical application of its melioristic passages constitutes the life blood of individuals and commonwealths.

The concentration here advised is not liable to monotony. Every condition of human life and temperament is amply provided for in Scripture. The informed mind, the disciplined imagination, and the religious impulse of the pastor enable him to choose from its harmonious truth whatever feeds his flock. He escapes the snare of sameness so long as he cultivates the many-sidedness of the Book. Textual sermons persist, not because they are a homiletical convention, but by reason of the background and the spiritual suggestiveness a well-chosen text affords. The manifold aspects of truth in a single biblical passage open up much profitable moralizing and enrich the hearer's religious experience. The text binds the preacher to its author, to the God who inspired it, and to the countless souls it has blessed. The gifts of faith, hope, and love are ours in these memorable transcripts from prophetic hearts which beat again in earnest preaching.

Types of Biblical Preaching. Preaching may be expository, doctrinal, historical, biographical, pastoral, ethical, and evangelistic, and all may be given a biblical basis.

Expository preaching applies the message of words, phrases, chapters, and even books to present necessities. The poetic sense, practical sagacity, thirst for spiritualities and knowledge of literature of the expository preacher are so many servants of his purpose. He finds openings for his talents in the lyrics of the Psalter, Isaiah's theophanies, Jeremiah's deep insights, Ezekiel's visions; in the ethical de-liverances of the lesser prophets; in the parables of the Master, the dialectics of Paul, and the mysticism of John.

Doctrinal preaching packs Christian truth in concise formulas. Its neglect in recent days is chargeable with much loose thinking and vaporous speech. The ordered presentation of positive beliefs is the best antidote known to men for the numerous current fallacies, not to say caricatures, relative to religion. One does not have to remark that this kind of preaching has no necessary connection with controversial mannerisms or negative assertions. It makes an intelligent use of philosophy, science, and comparative religions to illustrate the superior virtues of Christianity, and does justice to those mighty spirits of other days who by means of doctrinal preaching successfully defended Christianity against the onslaughts of its antagonists.

Historical preaching reviews our racial developments in the light of Heaven's guidance, and expatiates upon the interventions of that Power, not ourselves, which makes for righteousness. It warrants the assertion that a redeeming Providence presides over the rise and fall of civilizations. Beyond them all is the fair City of God, beloved and longed for, the goal of seers and saints from the time of the prophets to the present hour.

Biographical preaching analyzes the traits of human nature so strikingly depicted in the portrait galleries of the Bible. Here are the wise man and the fool, the patriot and the traitor, the saint and the sinner, the philanthropist and the cynic, the generous and the selfish man. All were of like passions with us. Some were molded by supernal influences for good, others yielded to their baser selves. A study of psychology and the reading of general biography forfend the preacher of this school against intellectual sophistries and keep him in touch with his fellow men. He calls their attention to "the great cloud of witnesses" who watch their progress heavenward, and also to those backsliders who having made shipwreck of faith are beacon lights of warning. The spiritual achievements of biblical characters and of those who emulated their example are fertile sources of his edification of believers.

Pastoral preaching exalts the privileges of fellowship. But it does not spend so much time coddling the saints that it has none left to catch sinners, nor does it cater to pharisaical complacency any more than to worldly corruption. It invigorates faith, rebukes lukewarmness, chides waywardness, and chastises hypocrisy or defiant wickedness. It feeds the flock of God and labors for those compacts of peace with justice which extend his fold. Its emphasis is laid upon the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, to be realized by conformity to Christ as Saviour and Lord.

Ethical preaching is eager about the conduct which is religion's convincing side for the world. The study of sociology and of comparative ethics helps the preacher to expound the great utterances of the Prophets, Gospels and Epistles on this important issue. Such preaching is inseparably related to the individual, the family, the nation, and mankind. Industry, politics, recreation, and kindred social pursuits are within its jurisdiction. The theme is susceptible to flabby sentimentalism, to platitudes, to inaccurate generalization and to the perversions of casuistry. But no type of preaching is more profitable provided it is equipped with lucid thinking and courageous faith.

Evangelistic preaching lays an urgent demand on the conscience and heart of its hearers for unconditional surrender to Christ. It presents life's alternatives and the penances and the praises of the "new creation" in him. Satisfaction of the human quest for God, deliverance from the burden and guilt of sin, and consciousness of the divine indwelling are essentials of the evangelical message. It has had a glorious history for the past twenty centuries during which the church repeatedly returned to it after seasons of scepticism and sterility. Its vision of sin's vileness and consequences and its passionate urgency for an immediate response to the appeal of the Cross were never more needed than now.

The Preacher and His Scripture Lesson. The public reading of the Bible should not be undertaken without a previous rehearsal of the selected lesson. One of the purposes of this reading is that it shall make divine worship far more effective and reverent than it is.

Read the Bible; do not mutilate it by a false manner of mouthing its predictions, exhortations, and advices. Young preachers may well consult the lectionaries of the Anglican and Lutheran Churches. A Book of Old Testament Readings, by Professor Robert W. Rogers, selections made by a master in the Scriptures, should also be kept on hand. These volumes may largely dictate our selection of the lessons for the day.

The Secret of the Great Preachers. The pulpit princes who have molded the destinies of nations were preachers of the Bible. Their conviction of its supremacy and truth induced in them the ministry worthy of their embassy. Think of Chrysostom, Augustine, the three Gregories, Francis of Assisi, Savonarola, Wyclif, Wesley, Edwards, Whitefield, of Chalmers, Robertson of Brighton, Cardinal Newman, Bishop Simpson, Liddon, Beecher and Brooks; of Behrends, Maclaren, Whyte, Watkinson, Bishop Galloway, Horne and Jowett; of many others, some of whom are fallen asleep, while others remain with us. They made the Bible the source of their authoritative preaching. From it they traversed the realms of history, literature, art, science, philosophy, but never to find a substitute for the Book. And they always came back to it laden with material for its illustration. They teach us that every method of preaching is legitimate which focuses attention upon the Bible in the light of Christ's life and teaching. By its aid they looked into his face and knew that he, and he alone, was and is the Word of the Living God, the Way, the Truth, the Life, and that in his will is man's eternal peace.

Literature: Gilbert, Interpretation of the Bible; Moulton, The Literary Study of the Bible; Malden, Problems of the New Testament Today; Peake (Editor), The People and the Book; Coffin, What to Preach; McConnell, Understanding the Scriptures; Cadman, Ambassadors of God; Fosdick, The Modern Use of the Bible.

THE PLACE OF THE BIBLE IN RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

By DR. HENRY H. MEYER

The history of civilization reveals a gradual substitution of record for memory, i.e., of written scroll and printed book for oral tradition. Writing first made possible the permanent preservation and distant communication of experience. Later, the invention of printing made possible a wider distribution of multiplied records of the same experience. In morals and religion, as in other realms of human experience, progress is due largely to the preservation and communication from generation to generation of measurably dependable records of past experience. Such records constitute a permanent and indispensable part of the subject matter of religious education.

Religious Instruction Among the Hebrews. The early Christian records of the N.T., and the earlier Hebrew Scriptures as well, were produced from a sense of obligation to pass on to others the religious knowledge gained by the writers as a matter of personal insight and experience. The various writings of both the O.T. and the N.T. were produced in response to the need for religious inspiration and guidance. These books of the Bible for the most part were written for purposes of religious instruction. This was true, e.g., of the Torah or Law preserved in part in the Pentateuch. Concerning this Law, the children of Israel were exhorted:

"And these words, which I command thee this day, shall be upon thy heart: and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be for frontlets between thine eyes. And thou shalt write them upon the door-posts of thy house, and upon thy gates" (Deut. 6⁶⁻⁹).

The same is true of the writings of the earlier seers and wise men of Israel, who sought diligently to draw within the circle of their influence the youth who most needed instruction.

"Hear, my sons, the instruction of a father,
And attend to know understanding:
For I give you good doctrine;
Forsake ye not my law.

For I was a son unto my father,
Tender and only beloved in the sight of my mother.

And he taught me, and said unto me:

Let thine heart retain my words;

Keep my commandments, and live:

Get wisdom, get understanding;

Forget it not, neither decline from the words of my mouth:

Forsake her not, and she shall preserve thee;
Love her, and she will keep thee.

Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom:

Yea, with all thou hast gotten get understanding.

Exalt her, and she shall promote thee:

She will bring thee to honor, when thou dost embrace her.

She will give to thine head a chaplet of grace:
A crown of beauty shall she deliver to thee"
(Prov. 41-9).

At the same time these ancient teachers of Israel reminded the parents of the importance and advantage of religious instruction:

"Bring up a child in the way he should go,
And even when he is old he will not depart from it."

The stirring messages of the great prophets, Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Jeremiah, gave expression to religious insight and experience of their own, and appealed in the name of Jehovah for righteousness, justice, mercy, and obedience to the voice and the law of Jehovah.

As a matter of fact, however, the books of the O.T. actually represent only the sifted treasures of a larger Jewish teaching literature, parts of which did not survive the successive periods of religious persecution and decline, such as those which followed the final downfall of the Hebrew kingdom.

Dependence of Christianity on the Written Record. Isolated fragments of literary treasures of the first Christian centuries, in addition to the writings of the N.T., have been discovered in ancient rubbish heaps and scattered libraries in Bible lands. Such were the early Christian Psalter, discovered in 1909 by Professor Rendel Harris; the "Didache," or "Teachings of the Twelve Apostles," the "Apostolie Constitutions" preserved in the archives of the Church of the Holy Sepulcher at Jerusalem, and the "Pædagogus" of Clement of Alexandria, dating from the close of the second century, none of which was included in the canon of the N.T. itself.

Christianity, as "the Jesus way" of thinking and living, has been perpetuated and reinterpreted again and again during two thousand years, because there existed dependable records of the life, experience, and teachings of Jesus. As an organized fellowship of believers, with its creeds, rituals, ministry, and diversified forms of administration, Christianity has developed because to the original record of the work and words of Jesus each succeeding generation has given its own interpretation in the light of its own religious experience.

Jesus himself left no written account of his life or his teachings. His immediate followers, however, strove diligently to produce and preserve a record of both. They sought, moreover, to communicate to others, in writing, their own experiences in relation to Christ. In these earliest apostolic writings, the Gospels and the Epistles, there is already a marked element of interpretation as well as of record. The N.T. writings, therefore, constitute the beginning, or, as it were, the first installment of the teaching literature of historical Christianity. In this teaching literature of Christianity, now grown to almost immeasurable proportions, are preserved both its original message and the progressive interpretation of that message.

There is an interesting passage in Paul's second letter to Timothy (316), which suggests that the great apostle, while doubtless conscious of the promptings of the Holy Spirit in writing as he did to Timothy and others, was not unaware of the literary activities of his contemporaries, and that he believed that the Spirit of God was a silent partner in the production of many of these first Christian records, Gospels, hymn books, sermons, and letters. After reminding Timothy that the sacred writings of the O.T. which he has known from his youth were indeed intended to make him wise unto salvation, the apostle declares in fact that not only these sacred O.T. writings, but "every scripture inspired of God," i.e., every writing with the production of which the Divine Spirit has anything to do, "is also profitable for teaching" and for "instruction in righteousness," as well as for "reproof and correction," the negative factors in the same teaching process (2 Tim. 315-17). It is as though Paul would say, "The writings of the Hebrew wise men, lawgivers, and prophets are still our textbooks of religion, but even now there is in preparation a new teaching literature for the better and more perfect instruction in the Christian way."

Jesus himself emphasized the teaching value of his precepts and life example in his final exhortation to his disciples that they "teach all nations the things that he," by word and example, "had commanded them" (Mt. 28²⁰). During the centuries since the completion of the N.T., the Bible has been translated into practically all of the languages and dialects of the world. It has been distributed to the ends of the earth, in the interest of a world-wide program of Christian education, and with the definite purpose that it should serve as the textbook par excellence of the Christian way of life.

But to this first authentic collection of Christian writings there were added, during the centuries, the writings of the early Christian Fathers, of the mediæval saints, the leaders of the Reformation and subsequent periods of church history, all of which, like the writings of the O.T. and the N.T., were intended primarily for purposes of religious teaching. This is true also of the formulated creeds of the church, the decrees of the church councils, and, in particular, of the homilies, breviaries, and catechisms that appeared in great numbers during the centuries following the Reformation. During recent years, especially, the multiplication of textbooks and periodical literature for use in religious instruction has been one of the outstanding developments in the work of the Christian Church. Until recently, however, all of this teaching material has been based more or less directly on the Bible itself, and was intended to interpret and apply the teachings of the Bible to daily life.

The Varying Emphases in the History of Christian Education. In actual teaching content, Christian education in the beginning, i.e., in the period immediately following the death of Jesus, was Christ-centered. Since that earliest period of vivid, inspiring, mouth-to-mouth tradition regarding the actual precepts and example of Jesus, Christian education has been consecutively church-centered, book-centered, creed-centered, and conduct-centered. During more recent years, under the influence of a rapidly developing educational psychology, it has become pupil-centered, or better still, experience-centered. In each of these successive historic emphases in Christian education there have been elements of truth and value. None has excluded entirely the others.

(1) In the Early Church: Conduct and Faith. The religious instruction of the early catechumens had a twofold emphasis, conduct and faith in Christ. Inquirers (audientes) were instructed regarding the two ways: the way of life and the way of death. The way of life was the way of virtue, honesty, temperance, chastity, industry and service. It was the Jesus way. Christ himself was the great instructor (Paedagogus). He was the point of reference, the touchstone, the standard of measurement for faith as he was for conduct. Hence, faith in him as the great teacher and revealer of the Father, as example and Saviour, was the second essential to discipleship. Audientes gave evidence of their sincerity by becoming genuflectentes (knee-benders), believers in and worshipers of the Christ. After that they were instructed in the particular tenets and practices of the new way, the Christian mysteries, until their understanding and proficiency as learners of the Christian way entitled them to consideration as competentes, candidates in waiting under final instruction for admission to the Christian fraternity. Once within the close-drawn circle, the educative process was continued through the fellowship of the sacrament of the Common Meal, the coming together for worship and mutual testimony and exhortation, the reading of letters to and from individuals and churches, and later, of the first fragmentary Gospel records of the words and works of Jesus. The entire instruction, however, centered in Christ. His way of living, his example, his teaching, the meaning and value of his life, his suffering and his final triumph—these were the subject matter and the goal of Christian teaching. It was a glorious, heroic period of initial enthusiasm and daring, with persecution and martyrdom for many. It was a fellowship of the mystic sign and secret meeting place. Life and teachings were Christ-centered.

(2) In the Mediæval Period: Obedience to the Church. Then, suddenly, the church emerged from the catacombs triumphant, powerful, mightier than the state that had tried to crush it. Its organization was strengthened—its administration centralized. Rules and interpretation of the church superseded the simple example of the Jesus way of life. Christ was subordinated to an earthly vicegerent. The organized church assumed absolute control over body and soul, over conduct and thinking of the people. Education became education by and for the church. Military service and other non-Christian practices that once were anathema were sanctioned by the church now in league with the empire and the self-appointed final interpreter and arbiter of the Christian tradition and faith. The light of the Word was hid under a bushel. Tapers burned or dimly smoldered like pagan incense under the domes of great cathedrals. All through the Middle Ages the church commanded obedience to itself as the authoritative divine agent in human affairs. Yet there was effective teaching by and for the organization. It was the teaching of the confessional and of the altar, of ritual and ceremony, pilgrimage and pageantry, feasts and festivals. Christian education during the Middle Ages was church-centered. In the Roman Catholic Church and to a lesser extent in the Protestant Episcopal Church, education has retained this church-centered emphasis to the present day.

(3) In Protestantism: The Bible and Dogma. The Protestant Reformation substituted for the authority of the church the authority of the printed book, the rediscovered unchained Bible, the divinely inspired Word of God. Sermons and Bible expositions were substituted for the mass and for the rich ceremonial of the altar. Catechetical instruction based on the Bible as interpreted by the Reformation leaders took the place of the secret confessional. Popular education became the watchword. The free elementary school was born. Textbooks of religious education multiplied. The Bible itself was made accessible to the people in the vernacular. Christian education was book-centered, and, in the spirit if not in universal practice, Bible-centered.

But with the Reformation and its catechism came emphasis upon the doctrinal differences of major and minor Protestant groups. The Reformation, born in protest, gave rise to denominationalism, with its rivalry of interpretations of the printed Word, and with its diversity of administrations. The Christian school became a denominational institution. Christian education was centered in creeds and doctrines and so remained, for the most part, until the discovery of the greater importance of the child and the subsequent triumph of the psychological movement in education, and until the equally important change to the scientific and historical method of Bible study and interpretation.

With the advance in scientific knowledge, including this better understanding of the nature and contents of the Bible and a better psychological insight into child nature and the laws of human development, a marked change has come, both in the subject matter and the method of religious education. This change has affected vitally both the place and the use of the Bible, if not its importance, in the teaching work of the church. Fundamental to a right estimate of the importance and place of the Bible in modern religious education, therefore, is an understanding of the learning process and of the teaching objectives in terms of Christian character as these are conceived in the best theory and practice of to-day.

The Learning Process and the Character of the Bible. We have a new understanding of the learning process, and a new understanding of the character of the Bible. The problem is to relate these together.

(1) Aims of Modern Religious Education. Modern education, regarded as a purposeful activity of organized society, has as its objectives the interpretation, control, and enrichment of human experience. It seeks among other things to transmit to each succeeding generation the accumulated social, intellectual, and spiritual (moral and religious) heritage of the race. More particularly, it seeks the physical, mental, and moral development of persons through their intelligently directed participation with other persons in the progressive mastery and improvement of their common social and spiritual heritage by the discovery of new truth and the progressive reconstruction of human society. It results in the acquisition of the symbols and techniques of civilization, languages, arts, and sciences, and is reflected in improved attitudes, powers of appreciation and skills in actual individual and group living. Man learns to do by doing. He learns to live by living. Learning begins in life situations that stimulate interest and call forth responses. It results from purposeful activities carried through to successful outcomes in the solving of problems and the completion of individual and group enterprises. What formal education seeks to do, and the only thing which it really can do, is to facilitate and expedite the process of learning by controlling and manipulating the environment in which that process takes place, and by doing this in such a way that interesting and worthwhile problems and enterprises will emerge naturally and in a sequence advantageous to the uninterrupted growth and development of the learner.

(2) Pupil-Centered and Society-Centered. In harmony with this conception of the learning process, Christian religious education undertakes to stimulate and guide the developing religious experience of the individual and group with a view to a progressive realization of the Christian way of life in human society. Like all education, it is pupil-centered and society-centered. Its contents and its methods, the subject matter, the materials and forms of activity which it employs are determined at every stage of the process by the religious status, i.e., the stage of religious development, and by the consequent immediate religious needs of the persons and the community of persons to whom it ministers. In religious education, therefore, the determining factor is not the subject matter of instruction but, rather, the nature and need of the pupil. In relation to the Bible the pertinent question is not how to get successive portions of its contents, considered as subject matter, over into the knowledge equipment of the pupil. (Cf., however, the art., How to Study the Bible, pp. 8-10.) It is, rather, the question of where the human religious experiences reflected in this or that portion of the Bible fit into the growing knowledge and experience of the pupil. So stated, the problem of the religious educator becomes one of the selective and graded use of biblical materials in his total program of nurture and training.

(3) The Modern View of the Bible. But the selection and use of biblical materials for purposes of religious education raises the further problem of a correct understanding of the character and contents of the Bible regarded as the most important and, for Christian education, indispensable source book of religious experience and progress. (See art., The Bible—a Library of Religion, p. 15.) Present-day practice in religious education takes into account the historical origins, literary forms, and gradual growth of the Scriptures. The Bible is not a book of magic or of science but a collection of divine-human records of divine-human experience, written in terms of the thought and the forms of expression of the people of their own day. It reflects man's faltering but successful search for God and his gradual and often imperfect solution of the problems of individual and group conduct in the light of his discovery of God. The Bible is composed of many separate documents by many different authors, written many centuries apart, in widely separated places. Some of these documents have come down to us substantially in their original form. Others, like the total collection itself, are the composite product of various writers, skillfully woven together by successive editors, with a view to meeting immediate and changing needs for moral and religious guidance. The writings of the O.T. and N.T. are, therefore, necessarily of decidedly unequal value as aids to Christian experience to-day, and they retain their highest values only as the problems that their educational use presents are recognized and frankly faced in the light of the fuller knowledge of the character and purposes of God revealed in Christ, and in the light also of the known laws of character development in the individual.

The religious-political traditions and history of the Hebrews as set forth in the writings of the O.T. extend over many centuries from Abraham to the time of Christ. Rearranged in accordance with the chronological order of their production, these writings reveal successive periods of social progress, with successively higher levels of moral and religious understanding. The conception which the Hebrews had of God and their ideals of worship, of law and of right moral conduct were different at different periods of their history. When considered chronologically they reflect clearly the successive stages of their social and religious development. (See art., Religion of Israel, pp. 165f.; cf. p. 159b.)

Compared with the highest religious conceptions and ideals of the O.T., those of the N.T. based on and including the teachings and life example of Jesus furnish the culmination of all religious inspiration and guidance to be found in the combined writings of the two Testaments. For Christian life and conduct, therefore, the N.T. is more important than the O.T. Of the N.T. writings, in turn, the synoptic Gospels which record the words and works of Jesus would seem to be more important than the writings that give the interpretations which Peter and John and James and Paul and others placed on what Jesus said and did. Christian education undertakes the cultivation of intelligent Christian attitudes and conduct in individuals and groups. The inclusion of any given passage of the Bible in the curriculum of Christian education can be justified only as it can be shown that the moral and religious experience which the passage reflects is adapted to promote growth toward mature Christian character, and further, that it is especially adapted to promote such growth at a specific period of the religious development of the individual. (Cf. Myers, The O.T. in the Sunday School, p. 45.) There must be, in other words, reason for selecting the passage for the religious instruction of some particular age group or grade in the church school. Further, it must be shown that the particular passage in question presents this phase of experience in educationally usable and advantageous form. Used in this way the portrayals of religious experience and the record of spiritual insight and growth contained in the Bible may be made to enrich the life experiences of the pupil through definite mental activity, i.e., through intellectual contemplation of classic examples of typical human experiences such as the problems and projects of the pupil's immediate environment do not provide.

The Graded Use of Biblical Materials in Modern Religious Education. What are known as "graded" lessons conform to the sound principle that the lesson material must be adapted to the needs and capacities of the pupil.

(1) Extensive Use of Bible Material in Modern

Graded Lessons. Far from lessening the amount of biblical material used effectively in the religious training of youth, the rigorous restriction and adaptation of this material in accordance with recognized educational principles of selection and gradation makes possible the more profitable use of a wider range and a greater total amount of biblical material, while allowing place in the total curriculum for that rich variety of other materials demanded for the full and symmetrical development of Christian character. Just as the pre-eminence of Jesus as a teacher has not been lessened by the subjection of his precepts and example to the test of modern pedagogical principles, so the importance of the Bible as the one indispensable source book of Christian religious instruction has not suffered from the practice of testing the teaching values of all biblical materials by the same rigorous demands of psychological insight and pedagogical procedure. This is brought out clearly by a comparison of the use of the Bible in the International Graded Lessons which constitute the standard curriculum for modern church schools in America, with its more limited haphazard use in the older system of the Uniform Lessons. In the fifty-four years from the beginning of the Uniform Lessons in 1872 to the close of the cycle ending with 1925, less than forty per cent of the material contained in the Bible was assigned for study. In other words, sixty per cent of the Bible was not used. In the International Graded Lessons covering the work of the Primary, Junior, Intermediate and Senior grades, on the contrary, sixty-two per cent of the Bible is assigned for study and less than thirty-eight per cent is left unused as lesson material. Graded lessons teach more of the Bible than uniform lessons because graded lessons undertake to teach to children in the various grades only those portions of the Bible which they can understand and which are best suited to further their moral and religious development. Freed from the limitations of the principle of uniformity and not compelled to seek biblical passages that may serve as lesson material for young and old at the same time, the graded curriculum can effectively use more difficult passages of the Bible as well as its simpler portions, and can use these in such fashion as most helpfully to meet the moral and religious needs and promote the moral and religious growth of various age groups and classes in the church school.

(2) Adapting the Material to the Pupil. One of the results of this selective and graded use of Bible materials in the modern church school has been the compilation of various lists of biblical materials for use with various age groups. Examples of such compilations used extensively in the preparation of curricula of religious instruction, progressive Bible readers and other religious literature for children, are the "Basic List of Biblical Material" for primary grades (ages 6, 7, 8) and for junior grades (ages 9, 10, 11), prepared by the British Lessons Council in co-operation with the International Sunday School Lesson Committee of the United States and Canada.

Although in the nature of the case there can be no absolute agreement with regard to the teaching values of any given narrative or portion of the Bible for any particular age group, it is reasonable to expect that the two basic lists of biblical material just mentioned will, to a large extent, furnish the actual biblical material used in English-speaking countries in the religious training of children under thirteen years of age. The lists were originally released for use in the Church-school cycle of the Departmental (British) and Group-Graded (American) Lessons for 1929-31. In the explanatory statement accompanying the printed lists it is pointed out that "each of these bodies, and any other bodies who may use these lists, should be left free to omit or to add material, so that the selection of each may be as nearly adapted as possible to meet the needs of its own constituency and its own situation; . . . no extra-biblical material is suggested in these lists, because, in this material especially, adaptation to local conditions is essential, and there cannot be the same measure of common use as of the biblical."

The Group-Graded Lessons, for which these lists furnish the basic material, are prepared in accordance with the following statements of aim: "The Primary age-group includes children of the ages 6, 7, and 8, or who are in the public-school grades 1, 2, and 3. The Primary Group Lessons aim: 1. To help Primary children to think of God as the heavenly Father, and of all the world as dependent upon his love and care; and to lead them to express their love and gratitude to him in simple acts of worship and in deeds of good will and helpfulness to others. 2. To help them to know what God wants them to do, and to understand the happiness of right conduct and the hurtfulness of wrong. 3. To acquaint them with Jesus as the Son of God and the Friend and Helper of all God's children. The Junior age-group includes children of the ages 9, 10, 11, or who are in the public-school grades 4, 5, and 6. The Junior Group Lessons aim: 1. To bring these children into their heritage of Christian ideals and habits of life, and to help them meet their own problems and opportunities in the light of these ideals and in ways that lead to the establishment of these habits. 2. To train them to read and use the Bible for themselves, and help them to begin to appreciate its value as an inspiration and guide for daily living. 3. To present Jesus Christ and his teaching to them so concretely that he will command their allegiance and enlist their loyal service."

The gradual revision of the basic lists of biblical material in the light of their progressive use, as well as deviation from them in actual practice, is assumed by those responsible for their preparation. The arrangement of the materials is according to the order of their appearance in the Bible, not according to their use, which is determined by the sequence of teaching aims and project activities in the individual denominational or other courses of study.

In more closely graded curricula provision is made for the use of a larger amount and a wider range of biblical materials together with materials from nature study, home and community interests and needs, world friendship and service projects. With young people and adults, and to a lesser extent with older boys and girls, use is made of connected portions of the Bible based on the interests of the pupils and on the value both of the human experience reflected in the biblical record to the developing religious life of the pupils and of the value to them of an understanding of the historical and literary sources of the Christian faith. With older pupils the study of the Bible itself becomes a project enterprise as the student consciously seeks to acquaint himself with the historical origins of Christianity. In all of these graded curricula of religious education large place is given to the connected study of the biblical records of human religious experience with their portrayal of struggle and growth toward a fuller knowledge and experience of the truth as it is in Jesus Christ.

(3) Week-day Religious Education. While the books used in this phase of religious education draw freely upon general literature, biography, nature, and life, they never for a moment forget that their basic purpose is to teach religion, and their subject-matter is therefore of necessity rich in biblical material. The stories, the history, the narratives and precepts of the Bible are constantly and freely used in deepening the spiritual values and in emphasizing the application of Christian ideals to daily living.

The Assured Permanence of the Bible in Religious Education. The miracle of the preservation of these ancient Jewish-Christian records is accounted for by their intrinsic interest and value to men of each succeeding age in their search for God and in their efforts to regulate personal and group conduct in accordance with their deepest insight into truth and right. It is, moreover, this same continuing helpfulness that makes these records, rightly understood and used, indispensable in the work of religious education even to-day. Wherever Christian character is highly developed in an individual or group, there it will be found that selected portions of the Bible, especially the life and teachings of Jesus, have exercised a determining influence in the religious development of the individual or group, either preceptually as subject matter of instruction, or vicariously through the exemplary Christian life of parents and teachers. As a source book and record of religious experience the Bible will always have a place in religious education commensurate with its influence in the development of Christian character in the individual and the progressive transformation of human society. Nor can we conceive of the extension of Christianity apart from the extension of a knowledge of the literary source materials of the Christian faith. The place and use of these materials in the program of religious education will be in harmony with an increasingly accurate understanding of their exact character and contents and with an understanding also of the learning process and the laws of character development in the individual.

Literature: Betts, New Program of Religious Education; Laufer, The Bible: Story and Content; Fiske, Jesus' Ideals of Living; Kent, Great Teachers of Judaism and Christianity; A. J. W. Myers, The O.T. in the Sunday School; Knudson, Religious Teaching of the O.T.; Lotz, Current Week-day Religious Education. See also titles under "Literature" appended to such other general articles in this Commentary as "How to Study the Bible," "The Bible a Library of Religion," and "The Christian Approach to the Scriptures."

THE LAND OF PALESTINE

BY PROFESSOR EDWIN E. VOIGT

Name. The most common O.T. designation for the Holy Land is the land of Canaan. Literally the word canaan means "lowland;" and in the beginning the Canaanites were the inhabitants of the lowlands. In time they became masters of the hill country also, and then the entire land became known as the land of the Canaanites. In the O.T. this is commonly taken to refer to the territory west of the Jordan River (cf. Gen. 11³¹ 12⁵ Ex. 64 163⁵ Lev. 14³⁴ Num. 34² Judg. 3¹¹, etc.). Sometimes, however, the designation—land of Canaan—seems to have been applied only to the southern part of the land (Gen. 13¹, 12), and on occasion to the northern part (Judg. 42, 7, 23¹, 51⁹). Once the territory east of the Jordan is included in the term (Gen. 50¹¹), and in one instance the land of Canaan is equated with the land of the Philistines (Zeph. 25). It is perhaps through the Philistines, who invaded the land of Canaan and subsequently settled on one of the important trade routes of the ancient world, that modern parlance knows this land as Palestine, which name is almost identical with one of the early Greek transliterations of Philistia. Herodotus (2¹⁰⁴, 78⁹), as far as we know, was the first to apply this term to all of Canaan. Josephus (Antiquities, bk. i, ch. 6) and the Latin historians followed the same custom, and thus by the beginning of the Christian era the older term had fallen into disuse, and Western Europe adopted "Palestine" as the name for the home land of the Hebrew people.

Location and Extent. Geographically, Palestine is located in the southwestern corner of the continent of Asia, and its shores are washed by the waters of the southeastern corner of the Mediterranean Sea. Historically, of course, its size varied with the political fortunes of its people, but the average northerly and southerly extent of its territory was perhaps about one hundred and fifty miles. From the Mediterranean it extended inland to the desert, an average distance of less than seventy-five miles. Thus Palestine occupied a small stretch of land approximately one hundred and fifty miles long and fifty miles wide, the widest part being at the southern end, tapering toward the north; at no time did it include more than ten thousand square miles.

However small and insignificant in size

Palestine may have been, it was nevertheless very strategically located. In the Oriental world, before Europe developed, the great centers of civilization were in the Nile basin and in the Tigris-Euphrates Valley, and Palestine lay on the only feasible overland route between these centers. For east of it lay the uncrossable Arabian Desert, and trade and commerce between East and West followed the Mediterranean coast. Also, with the development of Phœnician shipping in the Mediterranean the spices of Arabia were a commodity much in demand. One of the caravan routes to the sea from the interior of Arabia crossed northern Palestine. Consequently, this little land, hardly bigger than a large American county, was on or, indeed, was one of the crossroads of the ancient world.

The political importance of this strip of land was early recognized, for by the middle of the second millennium B.C. the Egyptian emperors had taken steps to fortify it against invasion, both from the east and from the north. The uncivilized Bedouin, called Habiru in the Tel-el-Amarna letters, were pushing into the land from the eastern desert; therefore a line of fortifications extending north and south was erected in strategic places in the inland to protect the flanks of the trade routes. Further, since the route between the East and the West had to pass through this narrow place, in time of war the nation that had possession of this bottle-neck, as it were, had a distinct military advantage. As a result, fenced cities were placed across Palestine for protection against an aggressor coming down or up the coast. The military significance of this location was largely responsible for much of the woe that befell the inhabitants of the land during the centuries, for East and West periodically came into armed conflict, and this narrow pass between the East and the West was repeatedly overrun and devastated, because it was impossible for the Palestinians in such a time to maintain neutrality. Thus we see that Israel occupied a location which, far from being in a remote corner, was actually in the center of the ancient world. The expression coined by Sir George Adam Smith (Historical Geography of the Holy Land, p. 6) that "Palestine was the bridge of Asia," admirably expresses the strategic importance of its location.

Geology. The geological history of Palestine is exceedingly interesting. Underlying the country is a bed of granite. Above this bed, coming from the Cretaceous Age, are several strata of limestone, sandstone, and chalk. The lowest of these is a beautiful white limestone, the choicest of building material, and therefore called meliche, that is royal stone. It is fairly soft for quarrying, but when exposed to the atmosphere becomes very hard and durable. It is thought that Solomon built his Temple from this type of stone, and at the present time under the northeast corner of Jerusalem is an extensive cave, called "Solomon's Quarries," where such stone was quarried in ancient times. Above the meliche are two further strata of limestone: mize Jehudi, the Arabs call the lower layer, and mize Ahmar, the upper. The Jehudi is a gray limestone, streaked with flint, and very difficult to quarry. It is, however, because of its accessibility, more commonly used for building than the meliche. The Ahmar is a rose-colored limestone, not as hard as the Jehudi, and perhaps the most common stone used for building in modern Palestine. West of Jerusalem in the ancient Valley of Rephaim is a very fine quarry of Ahmar. Above these are various strata of sandstone, covered by softer layers of limestone of dolomitic and nummulitic character. Above all these are traces of marl, but the action of nature has for the most part corroded these upper chalky strata and washed them down the valleys.

What thus seems to be a very simple geologic structure, was in later periods infinitely complicated by a series of cosmic cataclysms, whereby these strata were tilted, broken apart, and generally jumbled together. It is very likely that in the Pliocene age a great break, extending north and south, occurred in the earth's crust. This break can first be detected in northern Syria, where it formed the valley in which the Orontes River flows. It extends southward through the eastern part of Palestine, forming the Jordan valley, and still farther to the south, probably forming the Wadi Arabah, the Gulf of Akaba, and even some of the "finger" lakes of east-central Africa.

During the Pleistocene or Glacial Age the glaciers came as far south as the Lebanon Mountains of Syria. To the south of the glacier there was very heavy rainfall, causing the deep water-courses in the highlands of western Palestine. In this age there seem to have been alternate periods of rain and drought, and in the second dry period, which corresponds to the Paleolithic period of human culture, the first traces of man are found in Palestine.

Later still, in the Mesolithic period, the last geologic cataclysm took place, forming the Dead Sea. This cataclysm seems not to have been in the nature of a volcanic eruption. Rather, the earth subsided, and thus formed that rift, which is more than a half mile below sea level, and in the bottom of which the lowest salt sea lies.

However, during the process of time volcanic action did play a part in the formation of the contour of present Palestine. Especially is this true in the northeastern part, where innumerable extinct volcanoes are scattered all through the district east of the Sea of Galilee. Their impress on the terrain of this section may be seen in the extensive lava fields, in the diorite and other volcanic rocks that help to make up the mountains east of the Sea of Galilee, and farther inland in the decomposed lava and volcanic ash from which the plains derive a large part of their fertility. Consequently, during many centuries Palestine lay within the range of an active volcanic region and experienced the usual eruptions, upheavals, and earthquakes that go with such a region, and that were nature's processes in bringing about the character of its present surface.

Geographical Divisions. In the physical features of Palestine one finds about all the variety that the earth has to offer. On the west is a coastal plain which varies in width from a few yards to fifteen miles, made up of swamps, rolling sand dunes, and rich, fertile soil. Back of this plain is a rugged mountain range, never over thirty miles wide, sloping sharply both to east and west, and attaining a maximum altitude of thirty-five hundred feet. On the east it descends into the Jordan Valley, which lies considerably below sea level, and which takes its name from the river that meanders southward over its floor. The greatest width of the Jordan Valley is less than fifteen miles, and on its east it is fringed by a highland plateau, somewhat higher than the western highlands and now generally known as Trans-Jordania, which extends back into the hinterland until it is lost in the Arabian Desert. Thus, within the space of a few miles one can visit fertile valleys, wild mountain gorges, depressions that are below sea level, or sandy steppes. (See end of Commentary for maps.)

1. The Coastal Plains. Partly because of location, and partly for historical reasons, the Coastal Plain of Palestine may be divided into three subdivisions neighbor of biblical Palestine was Phœnicia, and the Plain of Tyre was joined on the south by the Plain of Acre, which received its name from its principal city and seaport, known as Acco in ancient times. The northern width of the plain is about three miles; it gradually widens toward the south until it is about ten miles wide. Its southern base is formed by Mount Carmel, which completely separates it from the rest of the Coastal Plain. Along the seashore are a fringe of sand hills, and back of them is more or less swampy land. The whole plain rises very little above sea level, and wherever possible it is extensively cultivated. In Bible times it must have been of considerable importance, for it is dotted with "tells," the ruins of ancient cities. Some of them show signs of having been heavily fortified with huge walls for protection against foreign aggression. Two rivers flow across the plain into the Mediterranean Sea. The first is the Belis, which flows past the city of Acre, and on the banks of which, so Pliny narrates, the Phœnicians first learned to make glass. Along the southern base of the plain flows the Kishon. Although it is the larger of the two, it is little more than a brook during most of the year; yet at times it becomes a raging river, as on that memorable occasion when the chariots of Sisera, the Canaanite, became embogged in the mire, and the hosts of Israel, led by Deborah and Barak, gained a long-remembered victory (Judg. 4, 5).

(1) The Plain of Acre. The northwest

(2) The Plain of Sharon. Mount Carmel forms the northern apex of a narrow coast plain, extending southward forty or fifty miles, which was known in the O.T. as the Plain of Sharon. Its northern width is less than a mile, but it gradually extends away from the seacoast until it reaches a maximum width of less than fifteen miles. The northern part of Sharon is perhaps the most fertile tract in Palestine. In the springtime while the growing grain is still green it is indeed a beautiful garden, and everywhere wild flowers blossom profusely; one of these, the Rose of Sharon, was an O.T. byword for beauty and comeliness. In ancient times the city of Dor, on the sea in the northern part of the plain, was its most important city. At a later time, about five miles south of the site of Dor, Herod the Great built a new seaport, created a beautiful harbor along the unbroken shoreline, the ruins of which are still in situ, and under the procurators it became the main seaport and capital of Palestine. This was Cæsarea, and it was here that Paul languished in prison for two years (Acts 24²⁷).

(3) The Plain of Philistia. Continuing the Plain of Sharon, and beginning approximately with the region back of modern Jaffa, is the Philistine plain. As it continues toward the south it becomes somewhat wider, and eventually merges into the desert which separates Palestine from Egypt. The southern border of the Plain of Philistia is traditionally a water-course, dry most of the year, called the River of Egypt (Num. 34⁵), and now known as Wadi el-Arish. Near its mouth on the north side is the site of ancient Raphia, made famous as the historic place where East and West met in more than one memorable contest of arms. The Philistine plain is a rolling expanse, and though much more sandy than Sharon it is extensively cultivated. Its name comes from the Philistine people, who settled there perhaps in the beginning of the twelfth century B.C. and fortified five strongholds (Askelon, Ashdod, Ekron, Gath, and Gaza). The princes of these five cities formed a confederacy, and in the O.T. are frequently referred to as the "Five Princes of the Philistines" (1 Sam. 6¹⁶, 18).

(4) The Shephelah. Just to the east of Philistia is a region made up of low, rounded hills not over a few hundred feet high. Properly, these hills are not a part of the Central Highlands, but are a fringe of foothills on the border of Philistia, and were first properly identified by Sir George Adam Smith as the region which the O.T. refers to as the Shephelah.

2. The Western Highlands. North of the Shephelah the Coastal Plains gradually slope upward until they come to an abrupt line of hills which form the western border of the mountain range that runs the length of Palestine. This range is in reality the southern continuation of the Lebanon Mountains of Syria, and is the backbone and watershed of the land of Canaan. It has several natural divisions.

(1) The Highlands of Galilee. The southern portion of the Lebanons loses much of its ruggedness to form a region with rounded contours and promiscuous hillocks among which nestle many small picturesque valleys. This is Galilee, a word which literally means "circuit," or "district," and in the O.T. is generally designated as the District of Naphtali. The highest portion of Galilee is in the north, where one mountain rises to an altitude of nearly four thousand feet. Southward the altitude appreciably drops, leaving many open spaces which are carefully cultivated. Thus the country is open, not easily or naturally fortified, accessible from all sides, and consequently in its history the harbor of many kinds of peoples. It is, therefore, well named,

"Galilee of the Nations" (Isa. 91; cf. mg.). Not until N.T. times does it figure largely in Bible history.

(2) The Plains of Esdraelon and Jezreel. The plains of Esdraelon and Jezreel lie just to the south of Galilee and cause it to be completely cut off from the rest of the Western Highlands to the south. The Plain of Esdraelon slopes toward the northwest to the Mediterranean, and lies on both sides of the upper part of the Kishon. It is not much more than fifteen miles long, and never more than eight wide, and is separated in its lower end from the Plain of Acre by the narrows formed by the close approach of the southwest cliffs of the Galilaean hills to Mount Carmel. From an agricultural point of view this plain has always been important, for it is of sufficient extent and fertility to be the granary for the entire region.

On the east of the divide is the Plain of Jezreel. It is the eastern continuation of Esdraelon, although it is considerably narrower. In the history of the Northern Kingdom this plain has many historic associations, and from it comes the famous proverb, "His driving is like the driving of Jehu the son of Nimshi" (2 Kings 9²⁰).

In ancient times these two plains formed, and even at present constitute the most used pass across Palestine. The route from Egypt to Damascus followed the seacoast to Carmel, and then across to the eastern highlands by the way of Esdraelon and Jezreel. At the eastern end of Jezreel, to protect the trade route and to defend the interior from the marauding nomads of the desert, stood a mighty fortress, Beth-Shean (Roman, Scythopolis) which served Palestine in this capacity for over four millenniums. Some of its ancient glories are being revealed by the excavations now in progress.

(3) Mount Carmel. On the southwest edge of the Plain of Esdraelon Mount Carmel, or the Carmel range, rises abruptly to a height of one to two thousand feet, and extends toward the southeast until it joins the highlands of Samaria. The western end of Carmel juts clear into the Mediterranean, and is so steep and rugged that it is altogether impassable. Consequently, the passes over Mount Carmel extended between the Plains of Sharon and Esdraelon rather than between Sharon and Acre. The water-courses, or wadis in Arabic, flow from Carmel down into the Kishon. The first is near the lower end of the Plain of Esdraelon, and is the pass that was most commonly used across the range in travel up and down the coast. At the north end of this pass stands the very important fortified city Megiddo on an almost inaccessible cliff; during the centuries it has acted as a sentinel over the pass. Farther inland another wadi cuts through the mountain to form another pass, which was, however, not used to the extent of the first. It also was protected at its northern end by a fenced city, which in the ancient records was called Ta'anach. Just at the point where the Carmel range joins the Central Highland, there is a little open space, which is really a continuation of Esdraelon, but which is known as the Plain of Dothan. It is only a few square miles in extent, and lies quietly among the mountains that rise steeply from its sides. In certain times of the year this is probably the most beautiful little haven in all Palestine. It is frequently mentioned in the O.T., and is important as the north opening of the third and most inland pass over Carmel, the most commonly used pass of the trade route between Egypt and Damascus.

(4) The Mountainous Region of Samaria. In pre-exilic times this region was commonly designated as Ephraim, or Mount Ephraim (Josh. 17¹⁵ 207 Judg. 29 45 Hos. 5³ Isa. 7², etc.). After the restoration the Jews fell into the habit of calling the entire region "Samaria," after the name of its principal city and center of culture. In general, the contour of Samaria is exceedingly broken and deeply cut with steep V-shaped water-courses, or wadis, which are dry for the most part, but which during the rains frequently become raging torrents. The contrast between this region and Galilee is very marked. There are few open places in Samaria larger than a very few acres in extent. The agriculture and horticulture are carried on under great handicaps on the terraced hillsides and in the small open plots that occur here and there among the hills. On account of this broken character these highlands are not easily accessible and the approach to the interior has traditionally been along several of the deepest wadis that extend into the heart of the mountain district. The northern approach from the east is up a deep gorge, which is now called Wadi Far'ah, and it enters the highlands to the northeast of the city of Samaria. Several miles south of this is an opening from the west, at the present time called Wadi Deir Balaat, which comes up into the region of ancient Shiloh. Undoubtedly, the Philistines came up this pass to fight against Israel at the time when the sons of Eli lost their lives and the ark of the Lord was captured (1 Sam. 4¹⁻¹¹). About five miles to the south is another pass on the eastern slope. The lower portion of this cut is the Wadi Qelt, and its northern tributary, the Wadi es-Sweinut. This is usually taken to be the Valley of Achor (Josh. 7²⁴ Hos. 2¹⁵). This would then be the pass which Joshua and the Israelites ascended in the conquest of Canaan. The old fortress Ai is on the upper edge of the wadi, and farther inland lie Bethel, Ramah, and other notable places connected with the conquest of the land. The Wadi Qelt has also a southern tributary, known as the Wadi Ruwabi, in which are the remains of an old Roman road, and in which must have been the ancient descent from Jerusalem to Jericho. The modern road to Jericho is a few miles to the south. The district of Samaria reaches its highest point a little to the north of Bethel, where the peak, Baal Hazor, attains an altitude of more than thirty-three hundred feet. The second highest point is just to the north of Shechem, Mount Ebal, which is over three thousand feet high.

(5) The Highlands of Judæa. The mountain districts south of Esdraelon and Jezreel are without natural break, and consequently it never has been certain just at what point lay the boundary between Samaria and Judæa. From the O.T. it is clear that it was not far north of Jerusalem. On the eastern slope possibly it was along the Wadis Ruwabi and Qelt. On the opposite side of the watershed, it is commonly taken to be the Valley of Aijalon (cf. Kent, Biblical Geography and History, p. 40). This valley, sometimes broadening out sufficiently to make fine and productive tracts, rises in the region of Gibeon, descends past Beth-Horon, and breaks through the highlands northeast of Jaffa. It is the scene of the famous battle between Joshua and the five Canaanite kings narrated in Josh. 10, and a southern branch of this valley was used as the pass from Jerusalem to Joppa. About ten miles south is another natural opening on the western slope, the Valley of Sorek. The upper portion of this wadi is a narrow, wild, and precipitous gorge, but its lower portions become wider and are utilized for agriculture. On its south edge Beth-Shemesh stood; so the kine drew the ark of covenant up this valley (1 Sam. 6¹²). On the opposite side of the valley is the site of Zorah, the home of Samson's parents (Judg. 13²). Delilah is said to have lived in the Valley of Sorek (Judg. 16⁴), and it is altogether a likely place for the scene of Samson's exploits against the Philistines. At the present time this is the pass used as the railway approach to Jerusalem. On the opposite side of the divide two wadis, known in the Bible as the Brook Kidron and the Valley of the Son of Hinnom, lie to the east and west of Jerusalem, and unite just south of the city to form the Valley of Jehoshaphat which descends south-eastward into the Dead Sea. Five miles south of Jerusalem, to the west of Bethlehem, is another pass to the Philistine plain, the O.T. Vale of Elah. The Philistines used this ascent in one of their campaigns against Saul, and tradition designates it as the locality where David vanquished Goliath (1 Sam. 17²). Finally, about ten miles farther south is another pass on the western slope, now called Wadi el-Afrang. It cuts into the highlands to the west of Hebron, and is very likely the Valley of Zephathah, where Asa came into conflict with an invading Ethiopian army (2 Chr. 14¹⁰). Traditionally, this is the valley which Philip descended after he baptized the eunuch (Acts 9²⁶⁻⁴⁰). Thus, as in Samaria, Judæa is mostly a highland country of rocks and crags. It has no real valleys, but only little open pockets and flat places. These and the terraced hillsides are, of course, carefully cultivated. It is a picturesque country, even though not especially fertile. In the northern part the altitude of Judæa is about twenty-five hundred feet, and the general slope is upward as far as the region of Hebron, where Judæa reaches its highest point, a little over three thousand feet above sea level.

(6) The Negeb. South of Hebron the highlands slope downward, the contour is not so rugged, the wadis are not so deep, and the hills round off and gradually merge into the desert south of Palestine. This region, sparsely settled, little cultivated, and largely the home of Bedouin, is called in the O.T. the Negeb, that is, the dry region.

3. The Jordan Valley. At a varying distance of forty to fifty miles inland from the Mediterranean Sea is a deep fault in the earth's crust, extending in a northerly and southerly direction, and known as the Jordan Valley, or the Ghôr, in modern parlance. Generally, references to this gorge are made, not to the chasm as a whole, but to its several natural divisions.

(1) The Upper Jordan. In the extreme northern part of Palestine, under the shadows of famous Mount Hermon, and in the region of modern Baniyas (very likely the N.T. Cæsarea Philippi) are a group of springs which drain into a papyrus swamp. This swamp in turn is drained into a little lake four or five miles long and two or three miles wide. This is Lake Huleh, which in the Bible is referred to as the Waters of Merom (Josh. 11^{5, 7}). Lake Huleh is seven feet above sea level, and lies in the valley which is little wider than the lake. South of Huleh the valley becomes narrower and descends rapidly, so that in a distance of less than fifteen miles the Jordan River, which flows from the lake, makes a descent of nearly seven hundred feet. For that reason the river is named the Jordan, that is, "the descender."

(2) At a point where the Jordan is six hundred and eighty-two feet below sea level it flows into the Sea of Galilee, called the Sea of Chinnereth in the O.T. and sometimes in the N.T., and the Sea of Tiberias in the N.T. and Talmud. The Sea of Galilee is pear-shaped, pointing to the south, and is about twelve miles long and eight wide at the widest place. It is closely hemmed in by mountains on both the east and west sides, which rise from its very shore to a height of a thousand or fifteen hundred feet. The water is fresh. Set among the hills, the lake, with its deep-blue color, makes a scene of rare beauty.

(3) The Jordan River. From the southwest end of the Sea of Galilee the Jordan River proper starts its downward course through a valley which varies from six hundred to one thousand feet below sea level, and which having a width of five to twelve miles is flanked on either side by steep cliffs. The descent is not so rapid through this part of the Jordan Valley, and the river meanders back and forth across the bottom of the valley, so that in an actual distance of about sixty-five miles the length of the river is over two hundred miles. In this distance it descends six hundred and ten feet, sometimes sluggishly, and sometimes over sharp rapids. In the course of time the Jordan and its tributaries have inundated its flood plain with a very rich alluvial soil, which has always been under cultivation.

(4) The Dead Sea. Almost directly east of Jerusalem, down in the bottom of the Jordan Valley, the Jordan empties into the Dead Sea. The Dead Sea is also known as the Salt Sea (Gen. 14³), as the Sea of the Wilderness (Deut. 31⁷), as the Eastern Sea (Ezek. 47¹⁸), and among modern Arabs as the Bahr Lût (Sea of Lot). It is twelve hundred and ninety-two feet below sea level, and forms the end of the chain of lakes and rivers that flow southward through the Jordan Valley; in the process of time it has received millions of tons of mineral-laden water, the water of which evaporated, leaving the mineral behind. Consequently, the Dead Sea has the highest specific gravity (varying from 1.021 to 1.256) of any body of water on earth, and contains about twenty-five per cent of minerals in solution, one half of which is sodium chloride. The water is very bitter to the taste and irritating to the skin, due to the chloride of magnesium; and it is very oily to the touch, due to the chloride of calcium. Normal life, therefore, does not exist in it, and only a very few low-grade species of animal life can be found on its salt soaked shores. As to size, the Dead Sea is nearly fifty miles in length, and at the widest place measures about ten miles. Its deepest point is near the northeast corner, where the full depth has never been ascertained, but is over twelve hundred and fifty feet. About two thirds of the length of the sea from its north shore a promontory thrusts out from the east shore and reaches more than half way across. The Arabs call it el-Lisan, "the Tongue." To the south of el-Lisan the water is comparatively shallow, and reaches a depth of less than fifty feet. The elder dwellers of the region tell that fifty or seventy-five years ago it was possible to ford from el-Lisan to the western shore, but in recent years that has been abandoned with the slight rise in water level. With the exception of el-Lisan and the opposite side, the sea has practically no shore on the east and west sides, and the mountains rise precipitously from its very edge. Thus, this body of water is really a pocket of the Jordan Valley, deeper than the rest of the valley, which has been filled with water, flooding the valley from edge to edge.

(5) The Wadi Arabah. As a matter of fact, the Jordan Valley continues south beyond the Dead Sea, although it no longer bears the same name, but is called Wadi Arabah. It is about the same width as the valley farther north, and finally beyond the desert makes a junction with the Gulf of Akaba. Its northern part, next to the Dead Sea, shows signs of once having been covered by an extensive oil flow, which killed the trees, and then preserved their stumps in the asphalt for centuries. Although there are very few inhabitants in this region at the present time, it has indications of once existent civilizations. The most picturesque survival is the ruin of Petra, whose remains from the Roman period are to be seen in the wonderful cuttings in the multicolored strata of the cliffs on the east side of the Ghôr.

4. Trans-Jordania. Palestine proper has always stopped at the Jordan Valley. Even in ancient times the occupation of the territory east of the Jordan by the Israelitish and Jewish monarchies was ever more or less partial. This was largely due to the fact that the eastern table-land merges into the desert, and has been populated by a semi-nomadic people, who, although having more or less definite tribal districts, still could vanish into the desert, and over whom therefore it was hard to establish authority. So also to-day, the English mandate over Palestine extends only to the Jordan, and in Trans-Jordania the British Commonwealth of Nations has only an "adviser." This region is traditionally subdivided into four districts.

(1) The Jaulan. The territory to the north and east of the Sea of Galilee is at present known as the Jaulan. Its southern border is the ancient River Yarmuk, which cuts a deep gorge in the eastern highland and flows into the Jordan just south of the Sea of Galilee. The Jaulan is a volcanic region with many extinct craters especially in its western part. In the west wadis cut through its extensive lava beds. To the east the features are more even, and the volcanic loam becomes good for agriculture. Its altitude is slightly above that of Galilee.

(2) The Hauran. The Jaulan slopes upward toward the east, and southeastern Jaulan becomes the Hauran, which is a high, well-watered plateau, having an excellent volcanic loam for soil. It is the granary of Syria. The eastern border of the Hauran ends in the Druze Mountains, which is the present home of the Druzes, with whom the French mandate of Syria has had so much difficulty in recent times. These two divisions of Trans-Jordania, the Jaulan and the Hauran, probably correspond to O.T. Bashan, which was famous for its oaks (Isa. 21³ Ezek. 27⁶ Zech. 11²), its pastures (Mic. 7¹⁴), and its well-fed cattle and herds (Deut. 32¹⁴ Amos 4¹ Psa. 22¹²). Such allusions to this ancient territory fit it well even to-day.

(3) Gilead. South of the Yarmuk, and extending as far as the Wadi Heshban east of the north end of the Dead Sea, is Gilead. This region is not volcanic as the Jaulan, and has a rock formation much like that of the highlands of Samaria. It is not as extensively cultivated as the districts to the north, but its rolling plateaus yield very well to a rude order of cultivation, such as is carried on by the semi-sedentary population, which depends for livelihood as much upon the grazing lands as on agriculture. One deep wadi cuts through the south central part of Gilead, the River Jabbok. It drains the central and southern part of Gilead, and extends in a large inland curve around to the south. Within this curve is the outstanding mountain of Gilead, Jebel Osha, which is over thirty-five hundred feet high, and is venerated as the burial place of the prophet Hosea. The vegetation of southern Gilead becomes more scarce, and the region takes on more of the brownish deadness of the Dead Sea district.

(4) The Hills of Moab. South of the Wadi

Heshban and extending the full length on the east of the Dead Sea lies the territory that was ancient Moab. Moab, like Gilead, is a large rolling plateau with fine stretches of soil. However, its appearance is arid, for there is insufficient moisture to procure the full benefit of the soil. Several deep wadis cut precipitous gorges in this plateau. The Wadi Zerka Ma'in enters the Dead Sea near the northern border of Moab. Near its mouth a fine hot spring bubbles out of the rock and flows into the sea. The ancient name for this spring was Callirhoë, and, according to tradition, Herod the Great came here to seek relief during his last illness. About ten miles south is the Wadi el-Mojib, the biblical Arnon River. For the most of the year it is a little stream one can leap across, but in the course of time it has cut a canyon into the hills that in the interior is over three thousand feet deep. At its point of entrance into the Dead Sea it is only a few hundred yards wide, with perfectly perpendicular sides, and in the beautiful strata of rock makes the most picturesque gorge in Palestine. Back of el-Lisan a third deep wadi descends into the Dead Sea. It is now called the Wadi el-Kerak, and possibly gets its name by corruption from ancient Kir Moab (Isa. 15¹), the ruins of which lie up in the hills on the edge of its canyon. The general altitude of Moab is somewhat more than that of Judæa, the maximum peaks towering up about four thousand feet above sea level, and five thousand feet above the Dead Sea. South of el-Kerak the plateau of Moab becomes more rugged, and passes into the wild and jagged crags of Mount Seir southeast of the Dead Sea, the mountain fastness of ancient Edom.

Climate and Rainfall. Palestine, being within 31 and 33 north latitude, has a semi-tropical climate. This location corresponds with that of the southern end of California and northern Lower California. It is still within the zone of the westerly winds, and therein is the saving feature of Palestinian climate, for the winds, coming in from the Mediterranean, bring moisture in the winter and cooling breezes in the summer. In the winter the temperature rarely falls below freezing; in the summer the hottest days frequently have a temperature of over 100° F. The atmosphere is clear, however, and the radiation rapid; so that in the hills, especially, as soon as the sun goes down, the temperature falls rapidly and the evening and night become cool, and frequently chilly. But when the wind comes from the east or southeast, Palestine suffers, for this wind comes from the desert (the Arabs call it the sirocco), and is totally devoid of water moisture; whatever green vegetation is left in the hills seems to dry up in a day.

The Jordan Valley is considerably hotter than the hill country, for it lies back of the hills and is cut off from the Mediterranean breezes. Consequently, the heat of the valley becomes terrific, and the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea to a large degree become steaming caldrons. It is estimated that close to six million tons of water pour into the Dead Sea daily, and yet the level of the sea from year to year remains constant. Accordingly, the evaporation is equal to the inflow, and in summer days one can see the vapor rising in clouds.

During the winter Palestine has its rainy season. Commencing with September the heat of the summer lessens perceptibly, and by the end of the month the first light rains commence to fall. They increase in quantity, until by December the rainy season is in full swing. The heaviest rains fall in December, January, and February. The winds come over and through the western hills, which cool and condense the moisture-laden air, and heavy rains follow, often for a week or ten days at a stretch. Everything then becomes damp and clammy, and although the temperature is above freezing, yet the stone houses, mostly unheated save by oil burners, become so damp and cold that a traveler chills through and through. Occasionally it is cold enough for snow, and sometimes a storm becomes a fierce blizzard, blowing huge snow banks about the nooks and crannies of the hills and towns. However, within a few days after the end of the storm the snow has all melted and disappeared.

By March the rains become lighter, more days of sunshine appear, and everything becomes warmer. Little rain falls after the last of April. The rains in March and April are known as the "latter rains" (Amos 47), and though they never bring more than a few inches of moisture, they are extremely important to agriculture. The total rainfall averages between twenty and twenty-four inches, and falls during the five winter months. In modern times, as well as earlier, the rainfall frequently is less, and then days of famine ensue (cf. Gen. 42; 1 Kings 17).

Occupations. Palestine has no mineral wealth. A rude kind of salt industry has always been carried on in the Dead Sea region, and is the most extensive effort in mineral industry. Some prospects of oil exist in the South, but no successful drillings have yet been made.

Agriculture has always been one of the most staple industries of the land. The largest difficulty to overcome has been the uncertainty of sufficient moisture. Some irrigation has been practiced from ancient times, but in the hills there is no reservoir to tap. The ruins of many ancient cisterns are scattered about, so that it is likely that some effort was made in Bible times to provide for irrigation of a sort in this way. The fertility of Palestine is great enough for fine agriculture, and in recent years barren hill-tops have been transformed, with water supply and care, into veritable gardens. Every available spot is cultivated, the hillsides are terraced, and in a favorable year yield a fair return. The small grains are the most common product—wheat, barley, rye, sesame, etc., are extensively grown at present as they were in Bible times. Recently, the cultivation of all the varieties of modern vegetables has been successfully introduced.

Fruit-growing also has been a staple occupation of Palestine. In the valleys and on the terraced hillsides the fig, grape, sycamore, fruit palm, and olive have been grown since antiquity. In modern times other fruits have been introduced, as the orange, lemon, lime, apricot, and various varieties of nuts, etc., and are now extensively cultivated in parts of the Coastal Plains and the Jordan Valley. The oranges of Jaffa are known throughout Europe.

Herding, finally, must be mentioned. Even though a Palestinian has a little plot of ground, in which he and his family carefully nurture the trees, vines, or grain, yet he also has his herd of sheep and goats, which one of the younger members of the family herds on the uncultivated hills and along the roadways. These herds are very important, for from them the owners get their milk (both sweet and sour are used) and cheese, and out of the wool they have always made their own clothes. Cattle raising never was important in western Palestine.

Literature: G. A. Smith, Historical Geography of the Holy Land; Kent, Biblical Geography and History; Barton, Description of the Geography of Palestine; K. Baedeker, Palestine and Syria; Thomson, The Land and the Book; Ed. Robinson, Researches; Later Researches; Price, The Monuments and the O.T.; Rena L. Crosby, Geography of Bible Lands; Palestine Exploration Fund, Maps of Western Palestine; Kent and Madsen, Topographical and Historical Maps and Chronological Chart for Bible Students (used in this Commentary).

HISTORY OF THE HEBREW AND JEWISH PEOPLE

BY PROFESSOR THEODORE H. ROBINSON

Pre-Hebrew History of Palestine. "Thy birth and thy nativity is of the land of the Canaanite; the Amorite was thy father, and thy mother was an Hittite." So runs Ezekiel's judgment (Ezek. 16³) on the racial pedigree of Israel, and his testimony is supported by practically all that we know of the origins of the people. Palestine has throughout its history been a battleground of nations, and not a few of the invaders have settled down on the soil, mingling their blood with that of their predecessors, and producing one of the most mixed of the world's races. To those primitive neolithic tribes to whom the Hebrews gave the general name of Rephaim ("Ghosts"; Gen. 14⁵ Deut. 31^{1, 13}), there succeeded in turn the Semitic stratum known as the Amorites (Gen. 14⁷; cf. 15²¹), the Hittites (Gen. 23³), the Hebrews and the Philistines (Judg. 31¹), each playing its part and leaving its mark on the resultant nation.

In the earliest times Palestine was a savage "no man's land," lying between the two great centers of early civilization in Mesopotamia and Egypt. The country must have been gradually settled by immigrants from the wilderness, for at the beginning of the second millennium B.C. it was a populous country, with a developed agricultural and city life in its more habitable portions. At this period it seems that Mesopotamian influence was dominant, and made itself felt in the traditions and legends of the people. The fifteenth century B.C. is marked by the great Egyptian conquest of Thothmes III, and the land remained nominally subject to the African power till the coming of the Philistines and the establishment of the Israelite monarchy. But the authority of Egypt was intermittent, save at such points as Beth-Shean (in the Valley of Jezreel), where, as at other fortified posts, archæological research shows that Egyptian occupation was practically continuous. With the decay of the eighteenth dynasty under Amenhotep III and Ikhnaton (about 1400–1358 B.C.), Palestine fell largely under the control of the rising empire of the Hittites, a non-Semitic people of Asia Minor, whose outposts were to be found in Judæan territory as far back as the beginning of the second millennium B.C., if we may trust the historicity of the narrative in Gen. 23. The revival of Egypt under the early kings of the nineteenth dynasty re-established her dominion, at least as far as the Lebanon, but by the beginning of the eleventh century the impulse had waned, and Egypt was once more fighting for her own existence. The last remains of the old Ægean civilization, expelled from Asia Minor and from Crete by the invading barbarians later called the Greeks, tried to find fresh homes to the south, and though they failed to conquer Egypt, yet their march by land settled them on the southern coasts of Palestine, where they formed the confederacy known to history as that of the Philistines (Amos 9⁷). During the eleventh century they spread inland, and destroyed the last relics of Egyptian occupation in the fertile plains—Beth-Shean, for instance, was occupied by them—and they were prevented from establishing a new empire in Palestine only by the rise of a native power which, for the first time in history, succeeded in uniting the whole country under an independent government.

Hebrew Origins. In view of the varied fortunes of the country and of the mingling of different races, it is curious to observe that the early traditions of the people who established that government are not those of any of the nations and empires we have mentioned, but are derived from a group of invaders from the wilderness whose immigrations have not been definitely dated (Gen. 12^{f.}, Josh. 24). These were the Hebrews, and though their contribution to the actual blood of the people may have been small, in all else they proved to be the dominant influence. When studying, therefore, the history of Israel, it is with the story and traditions of these newcomers that we have to deal, interpreting as best we may records which are universally admitted to be centuries younger than the events to which they refer (see art., Pentateuch, p. 138). Let us see what the traditions preserved in the book of Genesis have to tell us.

Round the inner or desert rim of the fertile crescent there have ranged throughout the historic period groups of wandering tribes, partly hunting and robber clans, partly given to pastoral occupations and forming, in ancient times, the group known to us as Aramæans (Gen. 24¹⁰ mg.). While the settled life of agriculture and commerce, of the farm and of the city, is impossible to such a social order, people tend to group themselves in the neighborhood of some center of the more complicated civilization, with which they certainly have commercial relations, and possibly form also some loose political association. They can live, it is true, on the produce of their flocks and by hunting, but they often (as in Arabia to-day) keep in touch with the city life and secure the products of the field and of the factory by bartering their own property. The official history of the Hebrews begins with such a tribe domiciled in the neighborhood of Ur, in the far south of Mesopotamia. About the end of the third millennium B.C., a group of them moved northward, under the leadership of a chief named Terah (Gen. 11³¹). This migration may have been due to some political convulsion in southern Mesopotamia, which affected the status of Ur and its commercial position. It was perhaps the shifting of the center of power from the Mesopotamian cities to the Elamite tribes which made Ur an undesirable district, and this would place the first movement somewhere between 2300 and 2000 B.C. Be that as it may, the migration took place, and the wandering people halted for a time in the neighborhood of Haran, in the north of the fertile crescent. It is worth noting (whatever be the exact significance of the fact) that both Ur and Haran were early centers of the worship of the ancient Semitic Moon-god, Sin, whose name probably meets us again in Sinai.

Portions of the tribes still continued to move westward and southward. Some, finding arable land in the country between the Euphrates valley and the more fertile western hill country, settled down, founding cities of which the best known is Damascus. Another group, led by Abram, a "son" (the word "son" is often used simply in the sense of a descendant) of Terah, continued their slow march till they entered Palestine proper, then a country of isolated city states (Gen. 12^{5, 6}). For some generations the wanderings continued, sometimes to the west of the Jordan and sometimes to the east, and ranging from the region of Damascus (or even further east) to the borders of Egypt. Once we have an account of direct contact between Egypt and these pastoral nomads (Gen. 12¹⁰⁻²⁰) and several of the narratives describe the dealings of the Hebrew patriarchs with the settled inhabitants of Canaan (Gen. 20, 23, 26, 34, 38), while the stories of Jacob bring the ancestors of Israel into touch with both the Aramæans to the northwest and the Edomites to the south (Gen. 28-33).

The Hebrews in Egypt; the Exodus. The Joseph stories (Gen. 37f.) form a transition to the next stage, and explain how the early Hebrews came under Egyptian domination. There are suggestions, even in the book of Genesis, of tribes which never passed south of Canaan; Judah in ch. 38 seems to be domiciled permanently in the land. But it is clear that some, at least, found their way into Goshen, the northeastern borderland of Egypt, and were there reduced to serfdom by the Egyptians (Gen. 46²⁸ 47¹⁻¹²). The date of these events is uncertain, though it seems probable that the entry into Egypt took place during the period known as the Hyksos empire (roughly eighteenth and seventeenth centuries B.C.), when a Semitic wave of invasion had overrun the country. There are, indeed, scholars who believe that the Hyksos were practically the Israelites, and that the story of the Exodus is the account of their expulsion given from their own point of view. This, however, is a conjecture which has little to support it, though, naturally, there is no direct evidence against it.

It is with the departure from Egypt (Ex. 12) that the history of Israel proper begins. The date is a matter of uncertainty, and opinions vary between the early sixteenth century and the middle of the thirteenth. If the statement in Ex. 1¹¹ be accepted as historically accurate, the Pharaoh of the oppression must have been Rameses II, and the Pharaoh of the Exodus his son Merneptah. The difficulty in accepting this date lies in the mention of Israel in an inscription of the latter king. The people are included in a list of Palestinian tribes defeated and destroyed by the Egyptian king, and the language of the inscription makes it clear that Israel was already settled in southern Palestine. It is, therefore, not impossible, though improbable, that the mention of Pithom and Raamses in Ex. 1¹¹ is due to an erroneous insertion in the original text, and that the Exodus itself is to be dated much earlier—possibly two hundred years before the time of Merneptah. Other details too must be left unsettled. We do not know the proportion of the later Israel that participated in the Exodus. As we have seen, there is reason to doubt whether Judah ever was in Egypt, and there is direct evidence that the tribe of Asher was domiciled in northern Palestine at an early date. We cannot be certain about the census figures supplied to us in Exodus (see comments there); the transmission of numbers is notoriously precarious, and a total of about two million people all told seems impossible, whether we consider the movements of the Israelites, the Exodus itself, or the water supply at the oases where they encamped after leaving Egypt. (For a brief discussion of the date of the Exodus see Eiselen, The Christian View of the O.T., pp. 128, 129 and references there.)

The Person and Work of Moses. Certain facts, however, are beyond dispute. The enormous influence that events connected with the Exodus had on the later thought of the people makes doubt as to its historicity impossible. The first of these is the personality of Moses himself. He bears an Egyptian name, found as one element in the names of several of the kings of the eighteenth dynasty. Hebrew tradition stated that, though an Israelite by birth (Ex. 22), he had been brought up at the Egyptian court (Ex. 23-10), and had then spent many years in exile among the nomad tribe of Midian (Ex. 215-25) with whom later Israel believed itself to be akin. Here he had an experience of direct divine revelation (Ex. 3-7), and returned to Egypt to bring his people out, to celebrate a festival to the God who had appeared to him. The departure was heralded by a series of calamities which befell the Egyptians (Ex. 8-12), and the actual flight was attended by a disaster which overtook an armed force sent in pursuit of the fugitives, numbers of them being drowned in an effort to follow the Israelites in their passage across the Red Sea—probably the northern end of the Gulf of Suez (Ex. 1421-31). This event made a profound impression on Israel, and men looked back on it throughout the whole of the people's history as the first and greatest manifestation of the national God's power.

The escape from Egypt, however, was but a preliminary to the great work of Moses. To him fell the task of binding together into a single political unit the various tribes, who, it seems, had hitherto maintained a real independence, though they had recognized a kinship of blood. The only force that could have achieved this (as Mohammed found nearly two thousand years later) was that of a new religion, and it was a new religion that Moses had to offer his people. What the earlier cults had been we do not know, but we may guess that each tribe had maintained its own worship and its own tribal deity—possibly its eponymous ancestor. In Midian, Moses had met a God whose name, at least, was previously unknown to any of the tribes, and it was to the mountain sacred to this God, known as Jehovah (a more accurate form of the name is probably Yahweh), that he led the people (Ex. 191, 2). The site is variously placed at Sinai, apparently not far from Kadesh Barnea, between Egypt and Palestine, and at Horeb, which, it is conjectured, lay to the northeast of the Gulf of Akabah. (The tradition which places the scene at Jebel Musa in the Sinai peninsula cannot be traced further back than the sixth century A.D.). The traditions of northern Israel seem to have favored the latter locality, those of southern Israel the former. But, whatever be the exact position, and whatever may have been the earlier religious situation, the main historical fact stands out: by a solemn covenant Israel and Jehovah adopted one another. He became their God, and they became his people (Ex. 193-6).

It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of this event. In the ancient world religion and politics could not be separated from one another. The god was a member of the tribe which worshipped him, and was always held to be its real leader, whether in peace or in war. This was true of all the peoples among whom Israel moved, but in this instance there was the special feature that the union of God and people was not a natural or inevitable association. On the contrary, it was the result of a deliberate act of choice on the part of Jehovah, who could thus dictate his own terms, and of an equally deliberate acceptance on the part of Israel, who thus bound herself to observe those terms. Other tribes too were connected with their deities by ties of local habitation; though Jehovah might have his proper home in the place where Israel had first met him, he could yet go with them, and take up his residence wherever they should make their home. Above all, this covenant relation with their God gave the Israelite tribes a sense of unity among themselves, and served to distinguish them from all others whom they met. Their acceptance of him was at once a domestic bond and an external barrier, consecrating them to one another, as well as to the object of their worship. The whole of the later history of Israel, political as well as religious, is based on the fundamental act of union achieved by Moses. (See also art., Religion of Israel, p. 166.)

Conquest of Canaan. The new people did not immediately take possession of the land which was to be theirs. An attempt was made to conquer the country from the south, but it failed, and the nomad life was continued for a period which the biblical narratives set at roughly forty years. (These wanderings are described in the book of Numbers.) It seems that Israel wandered over the arid pasture lands to the south of Palestine for the greater part of this time, and then moved eastward, making their definite attack across the Jordan. The country to the east of Jordan was first conquered, and was occupied by those elements in Israel whose wealth in cattle induced them to continue the pastoral life (Num. 32). The remainder pressed across the Jordan, and began to establish themselves on the west of the river (Josh. 1-3).

Light has been thrown on the Israelite invasions of Palestine by the discovery of the Tel-el-Amarna tablets, containing parts of the correspondence which passed between the Egyptian governors and vassal princes of Palestine, and the courts of Amenhotep III and his son Ikhnaton (Amenhotep IV). In addition to other troubles, loyal representatives of the Egyptian power are worried by inroads from desert tribes, who are usually called by a name written in ideographic characters whose phonetic equivalent would be ŠA-GAZ, but in the correspondence coming from Jerusalem are designated Khbiru. Such attacks must have taken place whenever the power holding Palestine was weak (we hear of them again in the story of early Israel), but the latter name has led a number of scholars to identify these invaders with the Hebrews. If this opinion is correct—and it appears to be gaining ground—then we have an interesting picture of the conquest from the Palestinian point of view. In the literature of Israel we have two presentations. One describes the conquest as complete, and comparatively sudden, being carried through under the leadership of a single commander, Joshua. The whole is accomplished in less than seven years after the first entry into the country, and the land is then formally divided among the twelve tribes, the Canaanites being exterminated (Josh. 4-10). The other account—earlier and intrinsically more probable—thinks of the conquest as a long, slow process, occupying generations, and sometimes leaving the settled Israelites in subordination to their predecessors (Judg. 1 and scattered passages in Joshua). In support of this presentation of the facts, we learn that Shechem did not pass into Israelite control till the time of Abimelech, that Jerusalem was first captured by David, and that Gezer was not occupied by Israel before the age of Solomon. The actual conquest, then, must be held to have lasted through the period covered by the books of Joshua and Judges. (See further, Eiselen, The Prophetic Books of the O.T., vol. i, pp. 29-34.)

In attempting to overthrow and dispossess the Amorites and Canaanites, Israel was attacking a people on a higher level of civilization, with greater resources in material and in military art. The result was that the first settlements made by the invaders were located in the hills, and in the poorer parts of the land. Jericho fell at the first assault (Josh. 6; the fact of its destruction at this period is attested by archæology as well as by the biblical record), but for some generations the invaders made good their footing only in three districts. In the south they held Hebron and the surrounding country, and it is interesting to note that the heroes of the early days do not strictly belong to Israel at all but to the tribe known as Kenites, who seem to have been loosely attached to Judah. In the center there were settlements about Bethel, the Bethhorons, and northward in the hills of Ephraim and Manasseh, while to the far north a group of tribes found a home among the southern spurs of the Lebanon range and about the Lake of Huleh. The fortresses of Gezer and Jerusalem served as a barrier between the southern and the central settlements, while the latter were cut off from their brethren in the north by the great chain of strong cities that ran across the plain of Esdraelon from Megiddo to Beth-Shean.

A vivid picture of Israel during this period is drawn for us in the book of Judges. The Israelite settlements have little organization, though local leaders rise from time to time at the call of patriotism and of religion to relieve their immediate neighbors from the stress of their enemies. Only once is a serious attempt made to found a royal dynasty, and that is when the sons of Gideon seek to exercise authority over Shechem (Judg. 9). Abimelech, after destroying his half-brothers, achieves a local and temporary conquest; he is himself of mixed blood, and his story suggests that the ultimate unification of the land was achieved more by gradual intermingling with the older population than by their extermination.

Apart from Abimelech, Israelite forces only once face a Canaanite enemy, Sisera of Harosheth (Judg. 4, 5). His name has an Egyptian sound, and he may have owed nominal allegiance to the court of Thebes. The other adversaries are all invaders from without, and the Israelite heroes were fighting the battle of the Canaanites as much as that of their own people. This was especially true of the last and most serious struggle of the age, that in which the whole country was threatened by the invading Philistines (Judg. 13¹ 1 Sam. 4, 13, etc.). The tribe that lay nearest to their settlements on the coast, Dan, after a heroic resistance of which we get glimpses in the story of Samson, was compelled to migrate and find a fresh home in the far north (Judg. 17, 18), and the newcomers pressed further inland. So successful were they that there was at least the possibility that they would establish themselves firmly over the whole country, and that the power expelled from the north and west would rise again on Palestinian soil. (For the biblical accounts of this early period see the books of Joshua and Judges, and consult the commentaries on these books in this volume, especially the introductions.)

The United Monarchy. The failure of the Philistines to build up a new empire was due to the formation of a unified state in Palestine under Hebrew leadership. External pressure compelled the whole country to unite under the centralized government of Saul, whose election is in one narrative represented as an act of defection from Jehovah, in another (generally recognized as the earlier) as of divine appointment to save Israel from her enemies. (See further, Eiselen, The Prophetic Books of the O.T., vol. i, pp. 68f.) The king himself belonged to that class of inspired ecstasies known as Nebhtim, or "prophets" (1 Sam. 10⁹⁻¹³), men who from time to time passed under the control of their God, and spoke and acted as his spirit impelled them. His first exploit, performed under the influence of the ecstasy, was the rescue of the east-Jordan city of Jabesh from an army of Ammonites (1 Sam. 11¹⁻¹¹), but the great struggles of his life were those in which he met the Philistines. Saul united all Israel, probably including many of the Canaanites, against the invader from the west, and for a time succeeded in checking their advance.

The difficulties of his position in the long run proved too great for Saul. He had the foreign enemies of his people to fight, there were signs of disaffection within his own people, and his temperament was unsuited to the work which lay before him. The division in Israel which drove the young David into exile had its roots in Saul's own jealousy of a greater warrior than himself (1 Sam. 18¹⁰⁻¹⁶), while that very ecstatic power which roused and inspired him in his earlier days, enabling him to do great and startling feats, unfitted him for the drudgery of organization and the slow toil of consolidating what he and his had won.

The real unity of the land begins with David. The romantic story of his early days (1 Sam. 16f.) is familiar to every one, and it is clear that he had exceptional opportunities. He had connections even with the Philistines, and it is possible that under the narrative which we actually have before us there lies a division among these enemies of Israel. Certainly, to the end of his days David enjoyed the friendship of Philistines, and from them drew his private bodyguard (2 Sam. 8¹⁸; "Pelethites" here is regarded as meaning Philistines). The catastrophe of Mount Gilboa confined the house of Saul mainly to the east of Jordan, and the death of Ishbosheth left David without a rival in his own land. The capture of Jerusalem, which seems to have had Philistine affinities, marks the point at which the Israelite monarchy was really established, and David showed political genius by making it his capital (2 Sam. 56-12). It was not only a symbol of his prowess, but it was neutral ground between the two great divisions of Israel, the north and the south. David himself had that personal charm which distinguished Saul in his early days, and commanded the devoted enthusiasm of his people. At the same time he had those more solid qualities for lack of which his predecessor had failed, and was thus able to build up a great kingdom. His wars resulted in almost uniform success; he strengthened the frontiers of his realm on every side, and though he does not seem to have attempted a conquest of the Philistine cities, he kept them well within their own limits. His realm was carefully and thoroughly organized both for peace and for war, and even the domestic rebellion which he suffered in his later years (2 Sam. 15f.) failed to end his power. There were, it is true, dark passages in his life, but his sins were those of a strong elemental nature, and his moral character must be judged against the background of his age. Estimated on any fair standard, David stands out as one of the greatest and one of the noblest among the heroes of the ancient world. (See in the present volume the commentary on 1 and 2 Samuel, and cf. Kings and Chronicles.)

David's real greatness is best seen when we compare the kingdom of Saul—even at its best—with that of Solomon (1 Kings 3-11). His splendor has become proverbial; under him Israel reached its greatest wealth and its widest extent. Yet only one acquisition is ascribed to his reign, the city of Gezer, which was captured by an Egyptian king and given to Solomon as part of the dowry of the Egyptian princess whom he married. The king in question is not named, but was probably one of the last kings of the twenty-first dynasty, perhaps Siamon. It is to the time of Solomon that most of the great buildings of Jerusalem and of other cities were attributed. Nevertheless, his reign marked a serious decline. His magnificence was costly and his rule was oppressive. His commercial gains—and Solomon was a great trader—were inadequate for his expenditures, and the burdens laid upon his people, both in unpaid services and in taxation, were ruinous to the agricultural population. The spirit of revolt was more than once in evidence, and one of the rebels, Jeroboam by name, took refuge in Egypt. Here, it seems, a revolution had taken place, and a Lybian dynasty (the twenty-second) was now on the throne. Jeroboam was welcomed and maintained, and though Solomon himself was too strong to be attacked with impunity, Egypt was ready to take advantage of any weakness of his successors.

Division of the Kingdom. The opportunity came on the death of Solomon. In political theory, as in other respects, the dominant influence in Israel was the traditional outlook of the Aramæan invaders rather than that of the settled communities among whom they made their new home, and they carried into their view of the organized state a democratic feeling which was unique, so far as we know, in the ancient East. We have from time to time indications of a "covenant" made at a king's accession, an agreement to which there were three parties, the sovereign, the people, and the national God. It is not impossible that every new monarch (Jehoiakim may have been an exception, but he was imposed on Judah by a foreign power) had to grant this "charter" as a condition of his acceptance by the people, and that, if they so wished, they could demand a modification of its terms. Certainly, such a right was exercised on the death of Solomon, and his son, Rehoboam, was faced with a popular claim for milder terms than those given in the past, and on his refusal to grant them lost almost all his dominions (1 Kings 12). The rebels sent for Jeroboam and made him king over northern Israel; possibly the royal body-guard was sufficient to overawe Jerusalem and the country south of the city. Attempts were made to recover the allegiance of the rebels by force of arms, and, apparently, met with temporary success. But Jeroboam could rely on the support of Egypt, and any gains that Rehoboam may have made were more than neutralized by an invasion of Sheshonk, the first king of the twenty-second dynasty. He ravaged the country as far north as Samaria, and laid Rehoboam under tribute, which could be paid only by surrendering the treasures of the royal house and of the Temple (1 Kings 14²⁵⁻²⁸). The Chronicler's statement (2 Chr. 12⁹) that he captured Jerusalem itself is not borne out by the record in Kings, or by Sheshonk's own account of the expedition, and we may assume that, like Sennacherib two hundred years later, Sheshonk found that he could get all he wanted without the risk and loss involved in a serious siege of Jerusalem. Jeroboam was able to consolidate his kingdom, and probably found the organization of David still available for his own purposes. The most important of his changes was the establishment of the ancient sanctuaries of Dan and Bethel as the official centers of worship, to counteract the influence of Jerusalem, where the most sacred of all Israelite religious emblems, the ark, had been deposited by David (1 Kings 12²⁶⁻³³).

Throughout the next century the weakness of the great powers of Egypt and Mesopotamia left Palestine comparatively free from foreign interference. The records that have come down to us are scanty, and deal mainly with internal affairs. In the Northern Kingdom there were repeated changes of dynasty, with a corresponding political weakness, only relieved with the accession of Omri, one of the most powerful of the Israelite kings. In the south the people remained faithful to the house of David, and the country was poorer and weaker than the sister monarchy. There was jealousy between the two, occasionally breaking out into open war, in which the advantage normally lay with the north, and we have to think of the south as being at best a subordinate ally in times of peace. Twice only is a foreign enemy mentioned; Asa of Judah calls in the king of Damascus to help him against Baasha of Israel, and at the time when Omri succeeds to the throne the Israelite armies are besieging the Philistine city of Gibbethon. We gather also from a note referring to a later time that Edom was nominally subject to Judah (1 Kings 14-16).

From Omri to Jeroboam II. It is with the accession of Omri that there are positive movements in the history of the two kingdoms. The new dynasty looks out beyond its own narrow borders, and both to the northwest and to the southeast advance is made. A royal marriage cements a peaceful alliance with Phœnicia, and Moab is reduced to a subordinate position. At the same time there is practically continuous desultory warfare between Israel and Damascus, and with the greater pretensions of the Hebrew monarchy this becomes more serious. Though the records claim occasional victories for Ahab, son of Omri, and for his successors, it is clear that the balance of advantage lay with the Syrians until nearly the middle of the eighth century.

Curiously enough, the most striking event in the political history of Israel during the ninth century has not been included in the biblical records as they have come down to us, though it cannot to-day pass without mention, if only because it illustrates at once the strength of Israel and the yet greater superiority of Damascus. It was in 853 B.C., that Palestine once more became an object of importance to one of the great world powers, and from that date onward, her history is largely conditioned by that of Egypt and Mesopotamia. The southern power, it is true, still maintained that policy of isolation which alone was possible to a weak dynasty like the twenty-second, but Assyria was entering on that career of western conquest which ceased only with the final overthrow of her empire and the destruction of her capital.

We learn from the records of Shalmaneser III that in 853 B.C. he marched westward, but was met at Karkar by a combined force under Benhadad of Damascus. The troops at his disposal included contingents from many of the western states, and, next to that of Damascus itself, the most important is that of Ahab. The Assyrian claims a great victory, but he took no cities and returned to his own country—a step which, for an Assyrian king, was tantamount to a confession of defeat. As against this successful action must be set the revolt of Moab, which was attacked, but not reconquered, by Ahab's son, Jehoram. A description of the revolt, given by Mesha, king of Moab, is still extant, and it seems probable that for a time the territory east of the Jordan was practically divided between Damascus and Moab. (See notes on 2 Kings 3.)

After the death of Ahab internal politics had an important effect on the course of events. The alliance with Tyre, wise as it may have seemed to Omri and his son, gave double offense to that conservative element in Israel which clung to the old Hebrew tradition and still tried to maintain the religious and constitutional theories of the Aramæan invaders. Jezebel, the imported queen, brought with her the worship of the Tyrian god Melkart ("Baal") and thus challenged the sole supremacy of Jehovah. She also brought with her the normal theory of Oriental monarchy, which saw in kingship an absolute despotism, and in the king a ruler whose will might be neither disobeyed nor disputed. The opposition found its first champion in Elijah, who stood at once for the purity of the worship of Jehovah and for the liberty of the subject as against the new pretensions of the crown. He himself was content with attacking the evil as a foreign excrement on the social and religious life of Israel, but his attitude was carried still further by the prophets who succeeded him, as well as by such conservative groups as the Rechabites. These men were not lacking in patriotism, as so many of the stories dealing with Elisha show, but they believed that the best interests of their country would be served by maintaining the old worship and the ancient ways. When, at length, it became clear that the house of Omri was and ever would be definitely against them, they found a leader in a certain Jehu, who overthrew the reigning dynasty with horrible and indiscriminate slaughter, and established himself on the throne. His first step seems to have been to break with the Syrians, and Shalmaneser's next invasion of the west found Damascus alone prepared to resist him, while Jehu paid tribute, probably as the price of Assyrian support (841 B.C.; see further for this entire period commentary on 1 Kings 17-2 Kings 10).

These events in the north were not without their repercussions on the southern kingdom. Jehoshaphat had been in close alliance with Ahab, probably as a subordinate, and his son Jehoram had married Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab. At the moment when the revolt of Jehu took place Ahaziah, son of Jehoram, was paying a complimentary visit to Jehoram of Israel, and shared his fate. Athaliah immediately tried to secure the throne for herself, and put to death all members of the royal family of Judah whom she could find. One, the infant Joash, escaped, saved by the devotion of his aunt and by the care of the priest Jehoiada. Six years later the latter organized a revolution in Jerusalem, slew Athaliah, and placed the child Joash on the throne (2 Kings 11, 12), thus restoring the dynasty of David, which retained its position for another two centuries and a half (835-585 B.C.).

The death of Shalmaneser III left Assyria comparatively weak, and the Palestinian states fell into the old border warfare again. Details of the history of both kingdoms (apart from the names of the kings) are hardly to be obtained from any source, but we hear of the oppression of northern Israel by Hazael of Damascus, and of the subjugation of Edom by Amaziah of Judah, son of Joash. There is also a reference to war between north and south in the latter reign, probably representing an attempt by Amaziah to assert his independence. Our knowledge becomes fuller only with the reign of the great-grandson of Jehu, Jeroboam II, who was on the throne in or about 760 B.C. (2 Kings 14:23-27). Damascus, possibly owing to Assyrian pressure, was unable to maintain her conquests to the east of Jordan, and Jeroboam succeeded in recovering the captured territory, including the two cities of Lo-debar and Karnaim. The Hebrew historian claims him as a great deliverer who re-established the frontiers ascribed to Solomon, and it is clear that the territory over which he ruled far exceeded that of his immediate predecessors. His reign certainly marks the high-water mark of Israelite prosperity, and in the large cities wealth and luxury reached a point which they had never before attained. Commerce and a regular financial system tended to the growth of a moneyed class, and the great cities were adorned with the palatial buildings of the merchant princes of Israel. They had separate residences for summer and winter, their walls were paneled with ebony and ivory, they used the costliest fabrics for their couches, enjoyed the finest of perfumed unguents, ate the most extravagant of foods and drank rich wine without sparing, while in music, if not in other arts, they claimed to be second to none.

(For a clear picture of religious, moral and social conditions in Israel at this time see the books of Amos and Hosea; for conditions in Judah, Isaiah and Micah.)

But a clearer eye could see that all this magnificence, wealth and luxury was but superficial, and that underneath the brilliant surface lay a rotting mass of hopeless misery and corruption. During the century which preceded the appearance of the prophet Amos at Bethel a fatal change had passed over the social and economic order of Israel, both in the north and (so far as the agricultural districts and the commercial cities were concerned) in the south. In the ninth century Palestine had been a land of small peasant farmers. Many of the holdings were very small; a type is presented to us by Naboth, whose farm would serve Ahab as a garden (1 Kings 21). The men bred by such a system have their faults; they are often slow, unimaginative, conservative; but all experience goes to show that they are vigorous and sturdy, and will resist to the death any form of oppression, whether from without or from within. Such were the men of Marathon, the men who laid the foundations of Roman greatness, and the men who at Karkar checked the advance of the Assyrian Empire. But in the eighth century all was changed. The peasant proprietor had almost disappeared, and his place had been taken by the capitalist who either let the land to a tenant farmer—at an oppressive rental—or worked it by slave labor. Lurid pictures of the prevailing conditions are drawn for us by the eighth century prophets, especially by Amos and Micah, while neither Hosea nor Isaiah is blind to the facts and their attendant dangers. Such conditions, as history, ethics and religion combine to teach, are wholly disastrous. The oppressed classes may not be finally crushed; they may retain something of the true human spirit, and this in the end will lead to such an internal explosion as wrecked France in the eighteenth century and has had such fearful effects in Russia in our own day. On the other hand the spiritual reduction of the people generally may be complete, and this can produce nothing but a national emasculation which leaves the country an easy prey to the first serious invader. It was so that Israel fell in the end, and it was so that the old Roman world, with its massed slave population, yielded to the hardier barbarians from the north.

The Overthrow of Israel. The death of Jeroboam II revealed the true position of northern Israel (2 Kings 15). His son and successor was assassinated after a short reign, but the murderer's career was cut short a month later by Menahem. Assyria was once more stirring, and in 738 B.C. Menahem, perhaps to secure his newly won throne, perhaps in despair of effective resistance, paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser III. His son, Pekahiah, was overthrown by a party acting in the interests of national independence, headed by Pekah, and he, in alliance with Rezon, king of Damascus, attempted to revive the old league which had successfully resisted Shalmaneser III a century earlier. But times had changed, and when the allies tried to force Ahaz of Judah into their confederacy, or, failing that, to substitute an Aramaean prince for him, they were not strong enough to coerce their southern neighbor, and he appealed for help to Assyria (cf. Isa. 71-9). This step was probably unnecessary; Tiglath-pileser was not the man to overlook such a challenge as that of the allies, and in 732 B.C. Damascus was captured and Pekah replaced by Hoshea, who was permitted to hold his crown as a vassal of the Assyrian court (2 Kings 16).

Judah also was now subservient to Tiglath-pileser. We have the record of a new altar, whose pattern was sent by Ahaz from Damascus, where he had gone to render homage to his overlord (2 Kings 16¹⁰⁻¹⁶). Though no foreign worship is mentioned, we may suspect that, in accordance with Assyrian policy, some form of state cult accompanied the new piece of machinery, and that, in one way or another, Ahaz was compelled to recognize the official religion of Nineveh. The charge of human sacrifice is brought against him by biblical writers, and this also may be due to Assyrian influence, though the parallel instance in the story of Moab suggests that a more probable occasion was the attack on Judah made by Pekah and Rezon. But whatever be the reason, there is no ground on which the fact may be doubted, and it is clear that during the lifetime of Tiglath-pileser the whole of Palestine was practically an Assyrian province.

That great empire, however, was held together by the personality of its monarchs, and the accession of Shalmaneser V in 727 B.C. was the signal for widespread revolt. Egypt, though in great political confusion, still felt the possible danger of Assyria, and Hoshea fell under the influence of a certain So, who has not been certainly identified; probably he was either Shabaka, not yet at the height of his power, or some other local dynast of the Delta. The inevitable result was a new Assyrian invasion. The dates are somewhat confusing, and there seem to have been errors in the transmission of the biblical figures. The best explanation of the records, taking into account both the Hebrew and the Assyrian chronologies, is probably one which allows Hoshea to be captured and destroyed before the siege of Samaria began. That undertaking lasted three years, and was not complete when Shalmaneser died in 722 B.C., the city actually falling to Sargon in 721. We have no details from any source of the dispositions made by Sargon in the Northern Kingdom, but we may conjecture that at least a large part of northern Israel was committed to the king of Judah. The uncertainty of our dating makes it impossible to decide without reservation whether or not Ahaz had been succeeded by Hezekiah, though in the opinion of the present writer it is more likely that the former king died in 725 (see 2 Kings 17).

From Hezekiah to Josiah. As far as we know Palestine remained duly submissive, and therefore in comparative peace, throughout the reign of Sargon. But the Assyrian invasion of Philistia in 711 (cf. Isa. 20¹) alarmed Egypt, now gradually emerging from a long confusion under Shabaka. The death of Sargon in 705 was the signal for almost universal revolt against Assyria, and Sennacherib, the new king, had to fight for nearly every province in the empire. In the west Padi, king of Ekron, was the only ruler who remained faithful to Assyria, and he was dethroned by his own subjects and imprisoned in Jerusalem. Hezekiah carried through a religious reform, endeavoring to sweep away all cults which seemed at all to conflict with the sole worship of the national God, Jehovah. While there is no reason to doubt his sincerity or his devotion to the cause of his God, it is not improbable that his action had a political aspect, and was interpreted by his own age, at home and abroad, as a gesture of defiance to Assyria.

Sennacherib found time to embark on a western campaign first in 701 B.C. The whole of Palestine was terribly ravaged, and in the territories of Judah alone the Assyrian king claims to have destroyed forty-six fortified cities and innumerable villages, while he claimed 200,150 as captives. But he failed to take Jerusalem and the biblical record ascribes the safety of the city itself to a disaster which overtook his army. It may well be that during his operations against the Egyptians, whom he utterly defeated at Eltekeh, his forces were attacked by bubonic plague. But though he failed to capture Jerusalem, Sennacherib inflicted an enormous fine on Hezekiah, and imposed a heavy tribute, besides reducing the dominions of Judah to very small limits (2 Kings 18, 19; also intro. to Isaiah in the present volume).

Sennacherib's invasion of 701 was the last appearance of a hostile Assyrian army in Judah. Manasseh, who followed Hezekiah, is strongly condemned for cruelty and apostasy, and this may well be due to his faithfulness to his Assyrian suzerain (2 Kings 21). The Chronicler speaks of his being carried captive to Babylon (2 Chr. 33¹¹); but there is no mention of this in Kings, and the Assyrian records, very full for this period, contain no reference to an attack on Judah. Probably there underlies this story a reminiscence of a visit Manasseh paid to Phœnicia, where, in company with all the kings of the west, he did homage to Esarhaddon. Till the decay of the Assyrian Empire between the years 639 and 612 B.C. Judah enjoyed comparative peace from foreign invasion.

Manasseh was succeeded in 641 by his son Amon, who was assassinated after a reign of two years. The boy Josiah, who followed his father, was still too young to take any active part in politics, and in 626 an event occurred which helped to change the face of the east. Wild hordes from the north broke through the political barriers established by the Assyrians, and made their way into the fertile crescent. The western stream of these people, known to Greek historians as Scythians or Cimmerians, followed the coast, and marauding bands devastated Judah. Reflections of the sufferings of the land are to be seen in the prophecies of Zephaniah and in various oracles of Jeremiah. The invaders were not of a type to establish a firm empire, but they struck a blow at Assyria from which she never recovered, and it must have been widely realized that her power over the west was at an end.

It was, perhaps, under the influence of this feeling that Josiah in 621 undertook a religious reform. As we have seen in speaking of Hezekiah, it is impossible to separate religion and politics in the ancient world, and there is no reason to doubt Josiah's sincerity. The repair of the Temple, which had suffered from neglect during the king's long minority, brought to light a book of the Law, commonly identified with the whole or a part of Deuteronomy (the identification has been questioned in recent years; some scholars, including Oesterreicher and Welch, placing the book earlier, others, such as Kennett and Hölcher, dating it later; see the commentary on Deuteronomy in the present volume, and cf. the notes on 2 Kings 22, 23). Under the influence of this discovery, the worship of Jerusalem itself was first purified, and a mass of strange and debasing cults was swept away. An attack was then made on the local sanctuaries throughout Judah and as far north as Bethel. These were probably the seats of ancient Canaanite cults which had been adapted by Israel to the worship of Jehovah, though in their ritual they probably retained much of the traditional ceremonial.

But now all worship of Jehovah was to be concentrated in Jerusalem, and sacrifice was to be valid only when offered at the great altar on Mount Zion.

While it is impossible to exaggerate the religious effects of this step, its immediate political importance was comparatively slight. Assyria was dying, and could not avenge any insult which might be read into Josiah's action. Babylon had finally achieved her independence of Nineveh under a new Chaldean dynasty, and in alliance with the Medes and Scythians was beginning her final assault on Assyria. Nineveh fell in 612 B.C., and one of the most vivid pieces of descriptive poetry in all literature is the prophet Nahum's exultant ode over the sack of the city. Strangely enough, the only help she received came from Egypt, where the twenty-sixth dynasty had succeeded in uniting the country. Necho, the second king of this line, may have felt that the great danger would now come from Babylon, not from Nineveh, and that Assyria might be useful, if her existence could be preserved, as a buffer state. He made repeated expeditions eastward, which did not cease even with the fall of Nineveh. Finding reason to believe (possibly as a result of the religious changes made thirteen years earlier) that Judah was hostile, he summoned Josiah to Megiddo on one of his marches, and there put him to death. (The Chronicler records a battle, but this is hardly consistent with the narrative in Kings, and may be due to a tradition of a skirmish in which Josiah's attendants were involved.) He could not stay to settle the affairs of Judah, and popular choice elevated Josiah's second son, Jehoahaz, to the throne. Three months later, probably on his return to Egypt, Necho marched on Jerusalem, deposed Jehoahaz, who may be suspected of having maintained his father's policy, and set his elder brother, Jehoiakim, on the throne (2 Kings 23³¹⁻³⁵).

Fall of Judah. For three years Egyptian influence was dominant in Judah, and it is possible that the condition of the country is reflected in the prophecies of Habakkuk (see the commentary on that book). But in 605 B.C. Necho was finally defeated at Carchemish, on the Euphrates; the victorious general, Nebuchadrezzar, succeeded to the throne a few months later, and the ultimate conquest of Palestine by the Chaldeans became certain. Nevertheless, for eight years Jehoiakim held his position, and proved himself to be one of the most oppressive kings who ever sat on the throne of David. His father had been essentially a sovereign of that democratic type which appealed so strongly to Israel, and had concerned himself first and foremost with sound administration and impartial justice. Jehoiakim's aim was to be another Solomon, and he adorned Jerusalem with magnificent buildings, erected at the cost of his people and by forced labor. But he was a strong character, and men crossed his will at their peril. He is the only king of whom it is recorded that he put to death an authorized prophet of Jehovah; even men suspected of high treason like Amos and, later, Jeremiah, were held to be sacrosanct if they were possessed by the Divine Spirit. It is a vivid picture of Jehoiakim that is drawn for us by the contemporary prophets (especially Jeremiah).

We have no details of the policy he followed. It seems not unlikely that Nebuchadrezzar left the west alone for a time, and Judah may have continued to be under Egyptian influence. But, as Jeremiah had foreseen, the battle of Carchemish had changed the course of history; it was the last time that an Egyptian king ever made a bid for world supremacy. Sooner or later Babylon would be mistress of the west, and the blow fell on Judah in 597. Before the actual capture of Jerusalem, Jehoiakim died, to be succeeded by his young son Jehoiachin, whose short reign ended three months later with his unconditional surrender to the besieging Chaldeans. He was carried to Babylon, and remained in captivity till the death of Nebuchadrezzar. With him went the flower of the Jewish nobility, and many others of the type that formed the best element in the country. (See 2 Kings 24.) We may conjecture that the exiles included not only Ezekiel but also the unnamed author of Psa. 42, 43.

For once Nebuchadrezzar had made a political blunder. The new nobility, the men who necessarily took the place of the deportees, were shallow, unsound, haughty, and capricious; men in whom obstinacy took the place of firmness and thoughtless jingoism the place of true patriotism. Another error was the choice of a successor to Jehoiachin, on whose throne Nebuchadrezzar placed a third son of Josiah, Zedekiah. Even from the Babylonian point of view it was necessary that a state so dangerously exposed to Egyptian influence should be controlled by a strong ruler, who could exhibit firmness as well as loyalty. Zedekiah was not a positively bad man, and in happier circumstances might have enjoyed a long and prosperous reign. But if he was no Jehoiakim he was equally no Josiah, and his character and temperament rendered him quite incapable of meeting the conditions with which he was faced. Early in his reign his loyalty seems to have been tested by a conspiracy in which Phœnicia and other western states shared. As far as we know matters never came to an open revolt, perhaps because Zedekiah held aloof. But it seems to have been necessary for him to send a special embassy to Babylon, and it has been conjectured that its purpose was to protest and prove his fidelity. At length in 588 B.C. Egyptian intrigues prevailed, if not with Zedekiah, at least with the turbulent nobility into whose hands he had fallen, and Judah revolted. In January, 587, a Chaldean army appeared under the walls of Jerusalem; the garrison was weakened by desertion and by famine, and, at last, in July, 586, the walls were pierced and the city taken. For the moment Zedekiah escaped, but, deserted by his guards, he was captured and taken to northern Syria, where Nebuchadnezzar had made his headquarters. A small detachment of the Chaldean army had been all that was necessary for the reduction of Jerusalem. Zedekiah's sons were killed before his eyes, he was blinded, and taken away into captivity. If Nebuchadnezzar's action seems cruel when judged by modern standards, it must be remembered that the victim had been guilty of the grossest ingratitude, and that the position he had tried to betray was one of the important frontier posts which kept Egypt from encroaching on the Babylonian Empire. (See 2 Kings 25; cf. Jer. 37-42.)

Jerusalem was laid in ruins, and a second deportation took place, leaving only the peasantry in the land. An attempt was made to establish some form of government under Gedaliah, a member of one of the few noble houses to be left in Judah in 597. Honorable, fearless, and chivalrous, he seemed the right man to restore the fallen fortunes of the land. But his very good qualities proved his ruin. The jealousy of Ammon sent Ishmael, a member of the house of David, to assassinate the unsuspecting governor, and the crime was carried out with indiscriminating cruelty. Ishmael himself fled, and the leadership devolved on a certain Johanan, who could think of no other course than to escape to Egypt, in fear of a fresh Chaldean invasion. With him went the last semblance of a real Hebrew state. (For a fuller discussion of Hebrew history in the eighth and seventh centuries B.C., see the present writer's Decline and Fall of the Hebrew Kingdoms.)

The Restoration. The old tradition, brought first into Palestine by the invading Hebrews a thousand years earlier, still lived on (and, like all living things, grew) in Babylon. The Jews seem to have formed a separate set of communities, and to have kept alive their national life and religion. Some of the noblest of the utterances of Israelite prophets and poets come to us from Mesopotamia, and the people still looked to their old home in Jerusalem, and still longed for an opportunity of reconstructing their national life in the old land. Their attitude toward their conquerors underwent a change. Jeremiah and Ezekiel are, if anything, pro-Babylonian, but the great mass of anonymous prophecy (e.g., Isa. 40-55), which comes from the reign of Nabuna'id, is bitterly hostile to the government, and looks forward with exultation to the approaching destruction of the city. Possibly the religious policy of the last king of Babylon had involved persecution of the Jews.

Once more the political face of the east underwent a change. Babylon fell, and Persia took her place. One of the first acts of Cyrus was to permit the Jews to return to their own land, and an expedition was made by a small group of exiles under Sheshbazzar in 538 B.C. (Ezra 1, 2). But the glowing hopes of the exiles were far from being realized. Other tribes had pressed into the land, and while the restored Jews were able to occupy Jerusalem, there was little of the old territory which they could call their own. After the confusion following the death of Cambyses in 522 B.C. and the assumption of power by Darius in 520, a scion of the house of David, Zerubbabel by name, was appointed governor of Palestine. Under his rule the Temple was rebuilt, and it is possible that he tried to win by force an independent position for himself and his people. Though we have no direct information on the subject, it is clear that the attempt, if it ever was made, proved a complete failure, and Judæa remained a small district under the satrap of the country "beyond the River," though with a subordinate governor of its own (cf. Haggai, Zech. 1-8 Ezra 3-6).

Except for such information as we can glean from prophetic writings of the period (among which "Malachi" is the best known) we are completely in the dark as to the history of Judæa for many years after the rebuilding of the Temple. It is not till Nehemiah is appointed governor that fresh light falls upon Palestine. The date of his governorship is uncertain. It is often placed in 445-4 B.C., but the king who appointed him is simply called Artaxerxes, and may equally well have been the first or the second of that name. If the second be right, then the coming of Nehemiah to Jerusalem will have taken place in 398, not in 445-4. The Aramaic papyri, recently discovered near Assouan, the relics of a Jewish military colony established there before the days of Cambyses, contain references which favor a later rather than an earlier period. But, whatever be his exact date, Nehemiah and his ecclesiastical colleague, Ezra, mark the real beginning of the new life of Judæa (cf. Ezra 7-10; Nehemiah). It is sometimes said that Judah went into exile a nation and returned a church, but this was not the immediate effect of the restoration, and becomes true in practice only with the establishment of the full Law by Ezra as the code governing Jewish life. Henceforward, to the genuine Israelite, political freedom and power were not an end in themselves; they were a means to the enjoyment of their peculiar faith and worship. If that could be secured there was no cause for unrest among the people. (See further the intro. to commentary on Ezra-Nehemiah in the present volume, p. 454.)

The Maccabean Struggles. The generations that followed Ezra and Nehemiah have left little or nothing behind them. From Josephus we hear of trouble with Persia in the days of Artaxerxes III, and it is possible that the Samaritan schism took place about 333. The conquests of Alexander made little change in the status of Judæa, but with the division of his empire the conditions which preceded the Babylonian conquest were repeated, and Palestine became once more a buffer state between an Asiatic power on the one hand and Egypt on the other. Egypt, under the Ptolemies, retained possession of the country (though at times insecurely) throughout the third century, but in 198 Jerusalem passed definitely into the hands of the Seleucid kings of Syria. Now began a desperate struggle between the two influences of the new Hellenism and the old Hebraism. Gradually the former sapped the strength of the people, and the story of the high priests of the first half of the second century is painful reading. To this period, perhaps, we owe some of the Psalms which draw so strong a contrast between the suffering righteous and the successful wicked. Judaism, as a faith, was in danger of being strangled by the culture of Greece, as it was mediated by the Syrian court and people.

There seems every reason to believe that the steady infiltration of foreign ideas would, in the long run, have undermined the resistance of the true Israelite spirit but for the precipitate action of Antiochus IV, known to his contemporaries by the name of Epiphanes. The method of "peaceful penetration" was too slow for this man, who was an enthusiast and a fanatic, determined to impose the culture of Greece on all his dominions in the spirit of the Oriental tyrant. In the Jews alone he found a people who, from his point of view, were too stubborn and narrow-minded to accept his principles. Rightly seeing that their resistance had a religious basis, he determined to force all Jewry into compliance. He entered Jerusalem, took possession of the Temple, and offered heathen sacrifices on the altar of Jehovah. Further, those practices which were characteristic of Judaism—circumcision and Sabbath observance—were made capital offenses, and it was decreed that the mere possession of a copy of the Law should be punished with death. (The struggles are described in First Maccabees; the book of Daniel reflects the Maccabean struggles. Cf. p. 192b.)

Such measures were bound to challenge resistance from the more conservative and more deeply religious elements in the people. Commissioners were sent through the whole country to enforce the policy of the Syrian king, and the first outbreak took place at the village of Modin. Here the commissioner was killed in the open city by one of its elders, Mattathias by name, and he and his sons, together with numbers of sympathizers from other parts of the country, took refuge in the hills. Under the leadership of Judas, one of Mattathias' sons, they carried on a guerilla warfare for a time, and finally met and defeated in pitched battles the forces that were sent against them. Jerusalem was recaptured (though the citadel was held for many years longer by a Syrian garrison), and the Temple was purified. The defiled altar was removed and a new one built, whereon the normal sacrifices were offered till the final destruction of the Temple by the troops of Titus in 70 A.D. Though Judæa was nominally still a province of Syria, practical independence was maintained till Pompey, in 63 B.C., invaded the country, and brought it under Roman domination.

The Jews Under Roman Control. For over a century Judæa remained virtually in Roman hands, but no portion of the empire gave the government more trouble. Originally included in the province of Syria, it was disturbed by such unrest that an Idumæan, Antipater by name, whose cleverness had enabled him to secure a large measure of power in the country, was appointed procurator, and his son, Herod, king. Though the rule of the latter was hated by the Jews, he succeeded in maintaining his position till his death in 4 B.C. His son Archelaus proved unfit for the task laid upon him, and was deposed in 6 A.D., Judæa being henceforward governed by Roman officials. No district needed more careful and sympathetic handling, and by some terrible irony none had such cruel, unscrupulous, and incompetent governors. Revolts were frequent, and the end came in 70 A.D., when the armies of Titus captured the city and destroyed the Temple. The cessation of sacrifice practically ended the history of Israel as a people.

Religion and History. It is a long way from Abraham to the destruction of the Temple, yet through the whole two thousand years there runs a single thread—the religion of Israel. It was that, far more than even a sense of kinship, which gave strength to Israel's blood and continuity to her history. All historic religions have grown with the passage of time till their vitality has become exhausted and they have started on the path that leads to decay and death. But no other of the faiths of the ancient world can be traced with such accuracy as the religion of Israel. We can see how, at each stage in the political history of the nation, it manifested appropriate peculiarities, and how, whether because of them or in spite of them, it moved steadily forward. There is little enough in common between the creed and religious practice of the wandering Aramæan and those of the Pharisee or of the Zealot, but the movement from the one to the other is continuous and unbroken. Each stage, each new feature, springs out of a historic situation and must be seen against a historic background. Unless we can form some picture of the story of the Hebrew people as shown to us in the O.T., it is impossible for us to appreciate the progress of that divine revelation which, out of the darkness, shone with ever-increasing brightness, till it reached its perfect day in Jesus.

Literature: Kent, Biblical Geography and History; Kent, The History of the Hebrew People, 2 vols.; The History of the Jewish People; Riggs, The History of the Jewish People; Ottley, A Short History of the Hebrew People; Foakes-Jackson, The Biblical History of the Hebrews; H. P. Smith, O.T. History.

BIBLE MANNERS AND CUSTOMS

BY PROFESSOR LESLIE E. FULLER

The Immovable East. For decades following the birth of modern interest in Bible lands emphasis was placed on exploration and geographical survey, for the purpose of identifying biblical sites and assisting the modern traveler in his journeys, and on excavation, for the purpose of determining from archæological remains the character of ancient Hebrew life and civilization. Little attention was given to dwellers in Bible lands—their mode of living, social and religious customs, legends and folklore, methods and processes of thinking.

In more recent years the value of a knowledge of present-day life and customs in the East as an aid to Bible interpretation has come to be appreciated. As a result modern travelers, excavators and explorers, trained residents and other observers, with insight and discrimination, all co-operate to make available for study the rich treasures of present-day Oriental life; and the investigation and evaluation of manners and customs in Bible lands is now one of the most fascinating studies of the Bible interpreter.

The reason for this widespread interest is to be found in the recognition of the primitive character of the Oriental's ways of thinking, expressing, and living. He has not changed to any perceptible degree since biblical times. Bible lands are a part of the immovable East. Economic conditions are such that the Oriental has escaped many of the evils of congestion so common in the West; he is content to remain in the open stretches of his deserts, or prefers the tranquil existence of his small villages. The inhabitant of the Near East has always expressed himself in realistic fashion, remaining close to life and its everyday occurrences: his language is realistic and devoid of abstract and philosophical terms. How we have been attracted by his touches of local color and his realistic pictures of human experience! Note, for instance, the contrast between Jesus and Paul. Paul is more Western than Eastern in his approach; his writings contain little local color; on the other hand, the parables of Jesus, couched in few words, breathe the outdoor life of Palestine. The old Semitic idiom with all its vividness and realism is apparent throughout the Gospels, though there this characteristic has come down to us in Greek form. This nearness of the gospel stories to the common and everyday life of Palestine constitutes one of the reasons why these narratives have continued to touch the hearts of men throughout the centuries. (See art., Parables of Jesus, p. 916b.)

The manners and customs of Bible lands may be studied under two heads: (1) the life of the nomads or desert dwellers, and (2) the life of the peasants or village and city dwellers. The first study would cover a wide range of travel and observation, noting the physical features of desert lands, tribal organization, characteristic social customs, food, methods of warfare, mental traits, and religious concepts. Under the second head attention should be given to the physical and economic features of Palestine, types of semi-nomadic and village life, and the customs of the peasantry. Throughout the study emphasis should be placed on daily life, types of dwelling, domestic and family life, community administration, education, legends and folk tales, religious beliefs, religious festivals and pilgrimages. The space allotted to this article is far too limited to permit covering this entire field or showing in any complete way the value of all these studies for biblical interpretation. Hence, the purpose of the article is simply to give a short summary of some of the more fundamental and basic features of life, especially desert life, in Bible lands.

Physical and Economic Features. The physical and economic features of Palestine have exerted a powerful influence upon the thought and life of its peoples. Always a buffer state, or a bridge head between warring nations on either side, it was and still remains the battleground of the Near East. The constant threat of war, pillage, and invasion was a vital part of the background of the Hebrew prophets with their messages of fire and earnestness. The fact that it was a land of little fertility, with a scanty supply of water, has left its impress on the life of the people and on the pages of the Bible. The Bible is an Oriental book, bearing all the earmarks of being written on the edge of the desert, containing graphic pictures of famine, thirst, the blasting of vegetation by the east wind and the deadliness of sandy desert wastes (cf. the reference in the last book of the Bible to the future state as a condition in which there will be no suffering from thirst). Again, Palestine always has been a land with a very small surplus of food, too small either to invite trade or to feed a large population; indeed its inhabitants were constantly threatened with starvation. Most of the peasantry lived from hand to mouth and in times of excessive famine and drought they moved away or died for lack of food. The presence of the poor as one of the necessary constituents of society was considered inevitable (Mt. 26¹¹).

Organization. The social and political organization always has been and still is essentially democratic. Among the desert folks, social organization assumes the form of a patriarchal clan, in which descent is reckoned through the father. There is good evidence, however, that originally the form may have been matriarchal, with kinship reckoned through the mother (cf. Gen. 22⁴). The democracy of desert folks is noteworthy. A chieftain rules not by the right of inheritance, but by personal capacity and courage as the first among equals. All initiated men and boys constitute the governing body of the clan. The change from the nomadic type of life to the semi-nomadic or peasant type caused some changes, but much of the desert democracy was carried over. The village community of Palestine is nothing more than a patriarchal clan within the more compact organization of village life. The ruling body of the village is made up of the "elders." In a small village every male beyond a certain age has a voice in the government of the community; but as the village grows larger the governing power passes into the hands of a small group, such as the wealthy land owners, the military leaders or the priests. In the days of Jesus, when a much more complex social and political life had developed, much of the governing power resided in the synagogue, an institution that retained much of the old Semitic democracy.

Sacrifice. Sacrifice is one of the most universal practices in Bible lands (cf. Gen. 41-8). In the desert there is no private slaughter of an animal; such an act always assumes a sacrificial significance, and, therefore, is carried on according to a certain ritual. Through this primitive ritual of consecration, the sacrifice is turned over to the deity and thus is made holy. The blood of the animal is usually poured on the threshold; the flesh of the sacrificial animal is eaten by the worshipers presenting the offering as a communal meal, based on the idea of appropriating, through the eating of the flesh, the life and character of the sacrificial animal; and since all the members of the tribe, including the animals, were held to be in kinship with the tribal deity, such appropriation would imply sharing the life and character of the deity itself.

Taboo. Closely related to sacrifice is the idea of holiness or taboo. The district about a shrine, an oasis in the midst of the desert, a tree, a bush, or even an animal may be considered holy, that is, it may be thought to possess certain unusual qualities, which are traced to divine manipulation or possession (cf. Ex. 35). An animal that strays within a holy area becomes the property of the shrine. Trees growing within a sacred area must not be cut down; if unwittingly such tree is cut down, and later it is discovered that it belongs to holy ground, all tools used and clothes worn by the workmen must be left within the district, so that they are forever withdrawn from profane use. When interpreted in the light of present-day practices, further illustrated by the comparative study of religions, some of the practices recorded in the O.T. are more easily understood. For instance, taking into consideration the blood kinship of clan and deity, human sacrifice assumes a new meaning; for it meant the use of the clan blood as the most valuable offering (Mic. 67). The prohibition of swine's flesh is best explained on the assumption that a pig was the sacred or taboo animal of a neighboring people, so that the use of its flesh or blood would involve participation in the life and character of the god of that people.

Covenants. Another widespread practice or custom is seen in the making of covenants, such as the blood covenant, the bread covenant, and the salt covenant. The oldest of these is the blood covenant, which, like animal sacrifice, is based on the idea of blood kinship of god and clan, and of individual members of the clan. Hence any contract or covenant between members of the tribe, or individuals to be taken into the tribe, is ratified through the mingling of the blood of the individuals concerned or of the individual and of an animal belonging to and thus representing the tribe. The place of ratification is the threshold of the tent or house, which is regarded as an altar; later the ratification takes place in or near a shrine.

The covenant of bread or salt ratified through eating together carries with it some of the same ideas, for bread and salt are "live" substances like blood. The moment a person shares in a meal covenant of bread or salt with another person the two become kinsmen, for a time at least, and are in duty bound to protect one another; even enemies, when they have partaken of bread or salt together must protect one another. When interpreted from the standpoint of these practices many O.T. passages assume a much deeper meaning. When, for instance, the prophet promises the establishment of a new covenant (Jer. 31³¹⁻³⁴) it means that God will enter again into the closest relationship of kinship with his people. The covenant relations, once established, opened the way to the disclosure of the most intimate and personal thoughts and emotions. The moment Jesus established the covenant relation with the woman at the well of Samaria, intimate problems of personal concern could be and were discussed.

Blood Revenge. Blood revenge has retained to the present much of its primitive significance. The custom is clearly an outgrowth of the idea of the blood kinship of the tribe. Any injury inflicted on a member of the tribe affects the entire tribe; in a real sense it is a tribal injury, and all members of the tribe are under obligation to avenge the injury. In actual practice, however, only the nearest of kin, on the male side, are expected to become the avengers. If the immediate male relatives are not living, those next in line to the fifth generation are under direct obligation. The law of blood revenge demands reparation, according to the lex talionis—a boy for a boy, a man for a man, the son of a chieftain for the son of a chieftain, an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth (cf. Ex. 21²³⁻²⁵). In case of murder done wittingly or unwittingly the slayer may flee to the nearest shrine, or altar, thus seeking the protection of the deity. (Sometimes, to escape blood revenge, the slayer flees to another tribe, thus relinquishing his tribal allegiance and becoming a proselyte to the new tribe.) The slayer has the right of asylum for a period of three days, the purpose being to give him a chance to prove his innocence (cf. Josh. 20). In some cases the slayer may escape the death penalty by the payment of a stipulated sum known as blood money. Frequently, in attempting to avenge a murder too much blood is spilled; then an effort is made to square accounts again, and thus a feud is started which sometimes lasts long after the original cause is forgotten. Tribal feuds are more frequently settled by the payment of blood money than are personal feuds.

The custom of blood revenge throws much light on the incident of the murder of Abel by Cain, and Cain's subsequent banishment (Gen. 4⁹⁻¹⁵). Cain becomes a wanderer on the face of the earth with no tribal protector—the most terrible situation in the desert. Finally, when he cries to Jehovah for protection or the rights of kinsmanship, Jehovah promises to become his protector. The partial breakdown of the desert custom and its rigid application are seen in the stories of David's relations with Abner and Joab. Abner kills a brother of Joab; according to custom Joab was the first in line to avenge his death; later, when Abner went to Hebron he was under the protection of David and David was bound, according to the law of hospitality, to protect him. In spite of these implied rights of the visitor Joab sought an opportunity to meet Abner, and when he met him killed him (2 Sam. 3³⁰). According to the desert law David, in turn, was bound to kill Joab, which he did not do. David did not have the courage to slay the military leader who was so essential to his success; but when he was about to die he charged Solomon to kill Joab. One of the first acts of Solomon was to kill Joab and thus clear the house of David from guilt (2 Sam. 2, 3; 1 Kings 2^{28f.}).

Hospitality. The law of hospitality plays an important rôle in Bible lands. The law is an outgrowth of the economic conditions of the desert. No one travels in a desert country for pleasure. A man may endure desert travel for one of two reasons: either as a fugitive or an outcast from his tribe, or in the performance of a religious vow, or a pilgrimage to some distant shrine. Hence the entertainment of strangers or travelers becomes a sacred duty, for no one knows what the errand of the traveler may be and, thus, how soon the extreme rigors of the desert might force a pious pilgrim to break his vow. And even if the stranger should prove a fugitive, he might be innocent of the crime charged. Of course, the law of hospitality could be abused, for the moment a person touched a tent rope, the occupants of the tent were duty bound to furnish food and protection, even though the traveler might turn out to be an enemy. There are numerous instances on record in which food was gladly and freely given with much personal discomfort to the host. There are also records of instances in which an enemy asked for entertainment, was given food and protection for the night, and on the following day was given the fastest animal in the encampment in order to make good his escape.

The usual limit for entertainment is three days. In some places, especially along caravan routes, the matter of entertainment becomes an unbearable burden; and yet the law of hospitality is scrupulously observed. The case of C. M. Doughty is a good illustration of the extent to which travelers may depend upon this desert law. For two years he traveled through the desert regions of northern Arabia, depending wholly upon the rights and privileges assured him by the law of hospitality. Only once or twice was he in real danger of his life.

In the transition from the nomadic to the peasant mode of living the law of hospitality was sometimes disregarded, which is quite in line with the fact frequently observed that the change from one stage of civilization to another tends to weaken the social and religious sanctions of the former. Jael's killing of Sisera (Judg. 5²⁶) is wholly unjustified by the standards of the desert. The same breakdown in the law is seen in Judg. 19 and 2 Sam. 37^f. There are many fine examples of dependence on the law of hospitality in the N.T. Jesus' commission to his disciples to go without scrip, bread, or money is typical of the East. Again, when Jesus commands the disciples to go into the village and prepare for the Last Supper, they are commanded to follow a man bearing a pitcher of water and to demand of the servant's master the use of the guest room and the rights of hospitality (cf. for additional examples of the influence of the law of hospitality Mk. 6⁸ 14^{13f}. Lk. 11^{5f}. 197^f.).

Marriage Customs. The marriage customs of the East constitute another basis of suggestive comparisons with biblical material. Marriage is a commercial contract. The betrothal, usually arranged between the families concerned, is as binding as marriage itself. A betrothed couple are designated as husband and wife, and are so treated before the law (Deut. 21^{10f}.). Most of the marriages occur in the spring, at the close of the barley harvest, or in the fall, at the close of the grape harvest. The village usually sets aside a week for marriage festivities, the period being known as King's Week. The week is devoted to games, athletic contests, and feasting. The bridal couples are enthroned on the threshing floor and crowned king and queen for a day; they receive a name of some king or queen well known in history, such as Solomon and Sheba. The marriage ceremony proper comes at the close of the King's Week. One of the most significant parts of the final ceremony is the sword dance—accompanied by fencing—which in some parts of Palestine is danced by the bridegroom and in some parts by the bride. The primary motive of the sword dance is to exhibit the physical prowess or endurance of the bridegroom or the bride. There are several examples of the sword songs in the Song of Solomon (4^{1f}. 5^{10f}. 7^{10f}.).

Burial Customs. These throw a flood of new light on many sections of the Bible. Death is considered as a break in the usual run of events, a very inauspicious happening, which must be accompanied by expressions of deep concern. The accompaniments are excessive weeping, wailing, and physical tortures, such as tearing of the hair, cutting of the flesh and beating of the breast (Jer. 16^{5f}. Ezek. 24^{15f}. cf. Deut. 14¹). The origin of these acts of physical torture can be traced back to a very early period, where they were used with magical significance. The women do most of the wailing, the men rend their clothes and weep. Tear bottles were used in Bible times (Psa. 56⁸). The spirit is supposed to hover over the grave for three days after burial. In the story of the raising of Lazarus it is stated that he was raised on the fourth day, which added to the wonder.

Religion. The religious practices and conceptions of the peoples of Bible lands have received much attention, and their value for biblical interpretation cannot be overemphasized. For present purposes it may be sufficient to mention some of the results of researches in the field of the primitive conceptions of God. The present desert dwellers are nominally Mohammedan, but many of the conceptions of deity, easily discoverable in Mohammedan disguise, are to-day practically what they were in the days of the patriarchs. These conceptions are not the result of reflection or speculation, but the direct outgrowth of daily life and experiences. The deity is thought to manifest himself in wells and fountains, trees, rocks, caves and mountains. God is anthropomorphically conceived; he moves frequently on a level with human beings. Again he is conceived as the prime mover in well-known cosmic events: If it rains, God causes it; if there is a drought, he is responsible for it. If a city is destroyed, the deity is the cause of its destruction. Good and evil, prosperity and misfortune, all come from God. Finally, God is conceived as acting not always in a moral and consistent manner; he is a God of moods and subject to sudden changes of mind. Some of these primitive conceptions appear in the earlier records of the O.T. The recognition of these primitive elements only sets into clearer light the loftier conceptions set forth by the prophets which have given to the religious message of the O.T. its permanent value and significance. (See art., Religion of Israel, p. 165; art., O.T. Conception of God, p. 158.)

Literature: Trumbull, Studies in Oriental Social Life; Mackie, Bible Manners and Customs; Tristram, Eastern Customs in Bible Lands; Baldensperger, The Immovable East; Rihbany, The Syrian Christ; Mrs. Goodrich Freer, Arab in Tent and Town; Doughty, Travels in Arabian Deserts.

TIME, MONEY, WEIGHTS AND MEASUREMENTS

BY PROFESSOR CHARLES F. SITTERLY

Two facts must be kept in mind in studying the customs and usages of the Hebrews in respect of time, money, weights, and measurements: (1) The national life of the Hebrews was relatively late in its development, following by hundreds of years that of Egypt and Babylonia. (2) Their location between and dependence alternately upon those two great ancient civilizations made them the direct heirs of systems already perfected and widely practiced. It is not strange, therefore, that in these respects, as in its literary form, the O.T. reflects oriental practices and customs. The N.T., on the other hand, reveals the influence of Greek and Roman standards; in other words, it reflects the life and customs of occidental peoples.

Time. The word "hour" does not occur in the O.T., except in the Aramaic section of Daniel, but the division of the night into three watches, the beginning, middle, and last (also called the morning watch), and of the day into morning, noonday, and evening, as well as the marks on the sundial of Ahaz (Isa. 38⁸), shows a tendency to subdivide the period of daylight and darkness.

The term "day," used to designate the period of twenty-four hours from sunset to sunset, after the Egyptian style, or the twelve hours of daylight, longer or shorter according to the season, after the Babylonian style, is found in all levels of Hebrew literature, while its indefinite or poetic use as of a set time or period, and its apocalyptic use as "the day of the Lord" are very frequent.

The interval "between the two evenings" (Ex. 12⁶ 30⁸ Num. 9³ R.V., mg.) refers to the time between sunset and darkness, also called "the cool of the day" (Gen. 3⁸) in contrast with "the heat of the day" or high noon (Gen. 18¹).

The word "week" is not much used either in the O.T. or N.T., though the idea is common enough and the marking of the Sabbath or seventh day as peculiarly sacred was observed long before the Mosaic law—the Fourth Commandment enjoining its due remembrance—was formulated. The secular days of the week throughout the Bible are indicated by ordinals, though the sixth day came to be called in later Judaism, because of its relation to the Sabbath, the day of preparation (Lk. 23⁵⁴).

Observance of the moon's phases marked the month from early times, and both numerals and names are used to designate them. Traces of Canaanite survivals are found in the descriptive names "Abib," month of earing; "Ziv," month of flowering; "Ethnanim," month of perennial streams; and "Bul," possibly the month of early rains. Following the Exile, and partly due to it, a new list of proper names was adopted, and priestly influence seized the opportunity to accept the Eastern method of beginning the year with the spring to emphasize the ritual priority of Passover, making the first month of the former or civil year the seventh of the new or sacred year as follows:

1. Nisan. Mid-March to mid-April; coincident with Abib, 7th month of the civil year.
2. Iyyar. April to May; coincident with Ziv, 8th month.
3. Sivan. May to June; found only in Esth. 8⁹.
4. Tammuz. June to July; so called in later times.
5. Ab. July to August; so called in later times.
6. Elul. August to September; found only in Neh. 6¹⁵.
7. Tishri. September to October; so called in later times;=Ethnanim, 1st month of the civil year.
8. Marchesvan. October to November; so called in later times;=Bul, 2d month.
9. Chislew. November to December; found only in Neh. 1¹ and Zech. 7¹.
10. Tebeth. December to January; found only in Esth. 2¹⁶.
11. Shebat. January to February; found only in Zech. 17.
12. Adar. February to March. The intercalary month was Second Adar.

It seems probable that the year of patriarchal times was lunar, but as it was found that the seasons receded and the intercalary month had to be added about every third year (or 7 in 19) the solar system was adopted. The naming of the months indicates this; first the giving of names descriptive of the seasons, and second the assignment to certain months of the harvest feasts according to priestly ritual. Thus again Babylonian influence, which began the year with the vernal equinox, confirmed the change of priority from the Feast of Trumpets or New Year's in the autumn to that of Passover in the spring.

The elaborate system of sabbatical years every seventh year, culminating in the year of Jubilee every fiftieth year, though logical and finally legal, exerted no widespread influence on common culture either in O.T. or N.T. times.

Money. Lying directly on the travel route between the Nile and the Euphrates valleys, Palestine adopted the trade systems of the enlightened nations occupying these regions from early biblical times. The method of mere barter even among nomad chieftains was passing at least by the time of Abraham. His transactions with Abimelech, in Genesis 20 and 21, mingle barter with the exchange of currency, and by the time he buys the Cave of Machpelah "current money of the merchant" to the extent of four hundred silver shekels is weighed out to Ephron (Gen. 23¹⁶). Rings or bracelets, after the Egyptian manner, and wedges or ingots or "pieces of money," after the Babylonian, both in gold and silver, antedated true coins of the mint, but they appear to have been variously stamped, as with lambs, lions, and so forth, and cut into convenient forms and weights, so that by the use of balances satisfactory exchange could be effected (Gen. 24²² 42³⁵ Josh. 7²¹ 24³² 1 Sam. 9⁸ Job 42¹¹).

According to Herodotus coinage was invented in Lydia as early as the seventh century B.C. From there it was introduced into the East by Cyrus and further developed by Darius, whose gold darics corresponded to the drachmas of the Greeks. A silver daric, thought to have come from the same mint, may be referred to in Neh. 5¹⁵. Meanwhile the Phœnician cities Aradus, Sidon, and Tyre had been allowed to coin silver and bronze, though not gold, and these coins were circulated in Jerusalem as early as the Restoration under Nehemiah (Neh. 13^{15, 16}).

A new Greek standard of coinage called the Attic was introduced into Syria by Alexander and had a wide but brief vogue. The Ptolemies followed for a century and controlled the coinage of Palestine as far as Ptolemais. Their system was nearer to that of the earlier Phœnicians. Again the Seleucids reverted to the Attic usage and made a great effort, with varying success, to Hellenize the Jews in all things. At last came the Maccabean revolt, which involved from the first the question of tribute, until finally Simon succeeded for a brief period in gaining the right to coin both in silver and bronze. Of his silver half-shekel there seem to be true examples for four years and at least one whole shekel of the fifth year. Some experts declare that these so-called coins of Simon really belong to another Simon of the time of the rebellion of 66-70 A.D., but this view is less probable.

The privilege of coinage at least in bronze or copper was tenaciously held by the Jews through the many changes of government, down to the end of the Herodian house under Agrippa II. Again, when Bar Kochba led the Jews in their final revolt against Rome, he made an attempt to mark their independence by re-stamping the imperial silver and bronze coins with Hebrew symbols and inscriptions.

The Hebrews have always been keen in money transactions and from the days of Jacob have prospered in trade. Solomon acquired as well as dispersed vast wealth, and talents of gold became common, while silver was spoken of as plentiful as stones in Jerusalem (1 Kings 10²⁷). The heavy gold talent stood at the head of the biblical coins. Solomon's revenue is given as six hundred and sixty-six such talents (1 Kings 10¹⁴). A gold talent was equivalent to at least thirty thousand dollars. Next came the gold mina, worth about five hundred dollars, then the gold shekel, about ten dollars.

The heavy silver talent was worth about two thousand dollars, the silver mina, about thirty-three dollars, and the silver shekel, sixty-six or sixty-seven cents. Besides the "heavy" there was a "light"-weight standard of half value, and there was also a "royal," i.e., slightly higher, scale employed in payments to the king's treasury, but in the O.T. the common and heavy norm is usually meant. Then there were a Babylonian or Persian talent, mina, and shekel, both heavy and light, on a scale of three to two as against the Jewish or Phœnician coinage which the Bible commonly employs. The shekel, either of silver or gold, was the unit of value, the mina being referred to only rarely and after the Exile, and the talent almost as rarely either before or after.

This common, so-called Phœnician, silver shekel became the "shekel of the Sanctuary" so often referred to in later priestly legislation (Lev. 27^{3, 25}). In N.T. times the Roman system prevailed in civil affairs, while the Jewish or Phœnician still persisted in sacred affairs. The talent of Mt. 18²⁴ stood at twelve hundred dollars. The pound, equivalent to one sixtieth part of a talent, was worth about twenty dollars (Lk. 19^{13f.}). The new Roman gold aureus, equal to five dollars, ruled the Imperial system, and the denarius, about twenty cents, in silver, was its unit. It may be considered as the laborer's daily wage (Mt. 20²) and was probably the coin with Caesar's superscription which was handed to Jesus (Mt.

22¹⁹, 20). The "tribute money" of Mt. 17²⁴ was of course the half-shekel of the Temple.

Of the copper coins there were the farthing, or assarion (Mt. 10²⁹), equal to about one and one eighth cents, the utmost farthing, or kodrantes (Mt. 5²⁶), about three tenths of a cent, and the mile, or lepton (Mk. 12⁴²), one half the latter, which was the smallest coin of all.

Weights. As money weights and those of merchandise were at first identical, caution must be used in exegesis. The merchandise weights were of stone or bronze and carried in a bag (Deut. 25¹³ A.V. mg.; Mic. 6¹¹). The shekel was the unit, and as in the case of money there were the heavy, which was double the light weight, and the earlier or Babylonian and later or Phœnician scale. Later still Græco-Roman influence was felt. The chief weights, based on inscribed stones which have been found, are as follows:

1 shekel (light) = 126 gr. Troy or 0.36 oz. avoirdupois.

1 shekel (heavy) = 252 gr. Troy or 0.72 avoirdupois.

1 mina (light) = 7580 gr. Troy or 1 1-12 lbs. avoirdupois.

1 mina (heavy) = 15160 gr. Troy or 2 1-6 avoirdupois.

1 talent (light) = 454800 gr. Troy or 65 avoirdupois.

1 talent (heavy) = 909600 gr. Troy or 130 avoirdupois.

The Gerah or $\frac{1}{20}$ of a shekel and the Bekah or $\frac{1}{2}$ shekel, as well as a $\frac{1}{3}$ and $\frac{1}{4}$ shekel, are referred to. The only weight pounds referred to in the N.T. are of the Roman system (Jn. 12³ and 19³⁹).

Measurements. 1. Of Length and Area. Like the Egyptians, the Hebrews took the forearm for their first standard. The fingers (Jer. 52²¹) up to four made a handbreadth or palm (1 Kings 7²⁶), three handbreadths a span (Ex. 28¹⁶), two spans a cubit (Deut. 3¹¹), the entire forearm or "cubit of a man" being the ordinary working cubit. The so-called royal cubit of seven handbreadths was employed in both Solomon's and Ezekiel's Temple measurements (2 Chr. 3³, Ezek. 40⁵). Possibly the shorter cubit was commercial and the longer for building purposes. There was also the reed or rod, which equaled six large cubits (Ezek. 40³, 5 42¹⁶).

As the Babylonian displaced or modified the early system it is impossible to determine exactly the above table in our terms, but we accept the following scale of equivalents:

The finger equal to about $\frac{3}{4}$ inches.

The handbreadth to about 3 inches.

The span to about 9 inches.

The common cubit equal to about 18 inches.

The longer cubit equal to about 20 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches.

The reed equal to about 10 feet.

The yoke (1 Sam. 14¹⁴) doubtless meant to cover as much land as a team of oxen could plow in a day.

In the N.T. the mile (Mt. 5⁴¹) was equal to about 4,854 feet; the sabbath day's journey (Acts 1¹²) equal to 2,000 cubits or about 3,600 feet; the furlong (Lk. 24¹³) about 606 feet; and the fathom (Acts 27²⁸) about 6 feet.

2. Of Liquid Measure. Although the more truly scientific Babylonian sexagesimal system has largely displaced the Egyptian or decimal, yet the two are mingled in O.T. usage, and in measurements of capacity are less accurately employed.

The log (Lev. 14¹⁰) contained about 1 pint.

The kab (2 Kings 6²⁵) contained about 2 quarts.

The hin (Ex. 29⁴⁰) contained about 6 quarts.

The bath (1 Kings 7²⁶) contained about 9 gallons.

The cor (Ezek. 45¹⁴) contained about 90 gallons.

In the N.T. bath is referred to in Lk. 16⁶ (R.V., mg.), and firkin (Jn. 2⁶) has approximately the same capacity.

3. Of Dry Measure. The unit, as in liquid measure, is the log, and the kab is also used in both tables.

The log (Lev. 14¹⁰) contained about 1 pint.

The kab (2 Kings 6²⁵) contained about 2 quarts.

The omer (Ex. 16³⁶) contained about 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ pints.

The seah (Gen. 18⁶, tr. measure) about 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ pecks.

The ephah (Ex. 16³⁶) contained about 1 bushel, 4 quarts.

The letek (Hos. 3², mg.) contained about 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ bushels.

The homer (Isa. 5¹⁰, R.V.) contained about 11 bushels.

In the N.T. bushel (Mt. 5¹⁵) represents the O.T. seah of about 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ pecks, and measure (Rev. 6⁶) about 2 pints.

Literature: Articles on "Weights and Measures" in the following Bible Dictionaries: Hastings' (five volume and one volume); Temple; Standard; International Standard.

ENGLISH TRANSLATIONS OF THE BIBLE

By PROFESSOR LAURA H. WILD

Determining Factors. The history of the English Bible is more than the history of the text; it is, indeed, a romance. One may recite translations, dates, and revisions, and get no adequate idea of its importance. It is the history of the repeated emergence of a foreign literature to supreme influence in the English tongue, for behind all versions lies the original, with its inherent beauty and vitality. However men have erred in doctrines imputed to it, in ecclesiastical structures built upon it, in the kind of book they have taken it to be, they have not erred in calling it holy, in attributing to it rare, surviving qualities, an influence more than human.

The Latin Bible came first to England. Afterward a translation of this translation made biblical truth clear, and a shift occurred in the attitude of the whole Western world toward authority, the Bible playing a most important part. From a subordinate place it rose to highest prominence. Man was to be guided not by church dictum but by Scripture; therefore the common man must have it in common language. Thus it filled a unique place for generations, but fear finally overlaid reverence and distorted its truth, blind authority becoming a shackle. It took another era to discard mechanical interpretations, and again release its living power. It weathered this third intellectual change when the scientific method of attaining knowledge altered the whole platform of regard. Reason then mounted the throne and it looked for a time as if the authority of the Bible was gone with church authority. But although dethroned from its high place of arbitrary control it is still acknowledged as a guide to man's reason when taken in the light of modern historical interpretation. Conscience is once more thrown back on the Bible, seeing there the progress of great transforming ideas of God and brotherhood.

Another salient fact is apparent in the history of the English Bible. Its vitality is inseparable from the vitality of its translators, the highest personal qualities helping to produce it. Somehow its quickening power brought forth courage undaunted, zeal unflagging, and an apprehension of meaning which resulted in the clearest, simplest, most pungent and pithy expressions known in English literature. Never could this have been attained without the strain of the difficult. Persecution of heretics has been the test in each era. Opposition has repeatedly arisen against the effort to tear away the artificial and introduce the heart of man to the heart of the book. Wyclif was persecuted because Latin was exchanged for English. Tyndale was martyred because of his translation from Hebrew and Greek. The Authorized Version was considered too sacred to alter when scholars gave us the Revised Version. Modern scholars are criticized for seeking to bring the meaning of an ancient book close home to everyday people in words they speak themselves.

During this period have occurred the Renaissance, the Reformation, the discovery of printing, and the reign of science, and the Bible has figured largely in them all. It has had more influence in molding the English language and literature than it has had upon any other tongue or literature. By Elizabeth's time, says J. R. Green, England had become "the people of a book, and that book was the Bible. . . . The English Version remains the noblest example of the English tongue . . . the standard of our language."

Wyclif and His Lollard Bible. The significance of Wyclif's Bible appears when we transfer ourselves to fourteenth-century England. There was wealth and display at court and among lords and prelates, but ignorant peasants faced wretched living conditions and deadening isolation, spelling laziness and vice. In Oxford "the dirt was sublime," with piggeries in the streets, the stream running through the town thick with rubbish and offal, its waters used for making bread and ale, while dead animals lay unburied. No wonder the Black Death scourged England. Among students drinking and riots prevailed and sexual vice was the dominant sin of both laity and clergy. Priests were often as ignorant as their parishioners. The rich were known to bribe the courts annually to stop embarrassing inquiries. Gross amusements corrupted court life. The land was rent by political quarrels with France and Rome.

Wyclif the Man. In such a setting we find Wyclif, "the flower of Oxford scholarship." Of blameless character, his greatness lies in his ability to understand his time and to inspire others to carry out his ideas. Although primarily a scholar he sympathized with the peasantry, for as parish priest he knew their needs and the corruption of the priesthood as well. Deft in unraveling England's knotty problems of state, he became indignant at Rome's intrigues to shackle her liberty, to bleed her for money, and to smother free speech. Sham he hated and dared lay bare, in his undaunted loyalty to truth seizing upon errors most needing exposure. In the violent language customary for his age, the Pope was to him "a more horrible idol than a painted log"; the bishops he called "dumb hounds"; and ignorant vicars were "full damnable before God." A keen intellect, intense feeling for the right, and fearless courage made him a formidable foe. He has been called "the Morning Star of the Reformation."

At first much attracted by the Franciscans who came to England originally with their founder's simple life and spiritual principles, he afterward became disgusted with their selfish, materialistic policy. A common saying was "This is a friar and therefore a liar." But he had been influenced sufficiently by them to adopt a simple dress of russet brown with bare feet. His "Lollards," or itinerant preachers, traveled thus over England with only a staff, somewhat as Franciscans had wandered over Italy spreading the gospel of their leader.

The Story of His Work. John Wyclif was born about 1320 in the north of England, whence Chaucer made the Devil appear. For years an Oxford scholar and teacher, he began his main work at about the age of fifty in the village rectory of Lutterworth in Leicestershire, where his sympathy for the people crystallized. At the University his ideas had been regarded as decidedly new and not altogether welcome, yet he could have stayed there had he been willing to compromise. In loyalty to his country he threw away the protection of highest government officials, striking straight at the heart of the impotence of England. To lead a godly life was what the clergy, the court, the scholar and the peasant alike needed for salvation. "Back to Christ" was his slogan as well as ours.

But how could a man get there except through the Bible? And how could he get at the Bible when by Pope, priest and friar it was closed to him? Setting himself to write and talk against papal authority and in favor of the authority of the Bible, against superstition and for the enlightenment of the masses, Wyclif became a dangerous man, for he said that worship depended on neither priest nor ceremony; that "each man that shall be damned shall be damned by his own guilt and each man that is saved shall be saved by his own merit." He frowned upon the "Pardoner" with his indulgences, the wealth and selfishness of monasteries, the whole materialism of his age. Since society, politics, and religion were all closely interwoven he could not say such things without becoming a revolutionist. Persecution was in the air. He himself escaped such tortures as awaited his illustrious followers, John Hus of Bohemia and William Tyndale his countryman, although in his last days he was summoned to Rome, being, however, unable to go, and he frequently referred to the possibility of death for his views. He was buried at Lutterworth, but later his bones were dug up, burned and thrown into the river "to the damnation and destruction of his memory."

It was in his very latest years (1380-84) that he accomplished his most famous work, a vernacular Bible, inspiring devout preachers to carry it to the people. But the Wycliffite Bible was not his translation alone. His disciple, Nicolas de Hereford, chancellor of Hereford Cathedral, was responsible for the larger part of the O.T. and John Purvey for most of the N.T., Wyclif doubtless laying the foundation for the N.T. in translations and paraphrases in his commentaries and sermons. The whole work was finished and thoroughly revised by Purvey. The Black Friars Synod of 1382 condemned Nicolas as well as Wyclif for heresy, and later the Pope sentenced him to life imprisonment at Rome. He was released, returning to England only to hide because of orders for rearrest. Captured and "grievously tormented" he recanted under the torture.

Wyclif's closest friendship was with Purvey, "a noted doctor," an Oxford student when Wyclif's fame there was at its zenith. Accompanying him to Lutterworth, he "drank deep of Wyclif's most secret teaching." He was a careful scholar, and his principles for translation hold to-day. His task was no easy one, but finally a simple, vivid, readable text was produced. Some of the words and phrases, absorbed in later translations, have entered into the body of our language.

The Result of His Work. Thus the Bible, which had been a sealed book to ordinary people, became common possession. To some this was shocking. They said, "The jewel of the clergy has become the toy of the laity." Moreover, Latin, so long associated with the Holy Word that it was considered by many a holy language, was displaced by a tongue as harsh as "the grunting of pigs or the roaring of lions." The Wycliffite Bible appeared in manuscript, printing being unknown until a century later. Of the copies painstakingly made one hundred and seventy are known to-day, one hundred and forty of them being Purvey's final version. Some were made on vellum, richly illuminated; the majority were cheaper, smaller, more perishable copies for the common people. In 1731 the N.T. was printed, and in 1850 the whole Wycliffite Bible—a fitting tribute to the great translator and his friends.

The forty years following Purvey's translation were busy ones for scribes. By 1395 Parliament, alarmed at its popularity, attempted to obliterate it. In 1396 a squire had to swear neither to read nor to own it. By 1401 English Bibles were ordered burned. By 1407 to possess a copy without a license was the first step to persecution. In 1415 we read, "It is forbidden under pain of cursing that no man should have or draw any text of holy scripture into English without license of the bishop." But Wyclif's "Poor Preachers" had aroused an appetite not easily suppressed and had lighted a fire that sent some to the stake.

Wyclif died of a paralytic stroke before the storm of persecution broke in its fury. Purvey was arrested and finally recanted, "grievously tormented and punished" in a "foul, dishonest prison." But the Bible had come into the possession of the English-speaking people to be theirs in a peculiarly intimate way. For while the Wycliffite Bible was a translation from an imperfect Latin translation with no Greek and Hebrew at hand, it was made by men vigorous, graphic and colloquial in expression, in the formative period of English speech when the sonorous qualities of the Latin had not been forgotten. It was the one book read, quoted and talked about.

Tyndale's Translation. A century and a half later Tyndale enters the lists. The stage is set for a hero and a tragedy. The situation was quite different from that which confronted Wyclif. The New Learning was quickening all Europe, classical studies were becoming popular, the new humanities were broadening men's interests, the Reformation was clarifying morals and motives. England was still rugged and rural, but this sudden stimulus caused brainy men to emerge from the yeoman's plow and the butcher's business to take the highest posts in the land. It was an age of ready wit and racy speech, subtle argument and intrigue, caustic and bitter retort, harsh and cruel punishment. The church had reasserted itself since the Lollard disturbances, the Wycliffite Bible was almost forgotten, conditions were corrupt, and the clergy ignorant as before. Yet national consciousness was arising; hence foreign influences were opposed. The Roman Catholic Church had its iron grip on Cardinal Wolsey and Sir Thomas More, flattering King Henry as "Defender of the Faith." An old law forbade private persons to translate the Bible; to study it in the original was frowned upon. Wolsey, alarmed at the spread of German ideas, required all Lutheran works to be surrendered.

Tyndale the Man. Tyndale came between the old era and the new. At first he became a heretic because he embraced the new scholarship, desiring to share its best with even the plowboy. Fleeing to Europe to pursue his project, in constant danger of being hunted down, his work interrupted repeatedly and bonfires made of his books, he lived to see the tables turned, his English Bible recommended and freely read, his persecutors themselves prisoners of the Tower, while England's king reigned supreme without papal dictation. But his life was a battle. His integrity and consecration were no match for the wiles of Henry's court. Yet we might not have had our Bible in its consummate English but for such a struggle, for Tyndale the scholar reflected Tyndale the man.

None surpassed Tyndale in argument. His humor was keen, his sarcasm cutting, but his sincerity was absolute and his affections real. He was plain, grave, quiet in appearance, spare in form, poor in purse, but rich in intellectual and moral power. He had an insatiable appetite for languages and an enviable fund of historical knowledge, even his enemy, More, calling him "full prettily learned," a learning guided by common sense. He handled words with unusual facility, having a long memory and a large vocabulary, with a sense of fitness and a mental precision. He Saxonized his English, modifying prevalent Latin forms and French elegancies. A good Greek scholar, and for his day efficient in Hebrew, he endeavored to understand the genius of those languages and to a remarkable degree caught the Hebrew idiom and rhythm. A simple, dignified, melodious style resulted. His scholar's instinct opposed fanciful allegorical interpretations of Scripture. He believed, like Wyclif, that to read the Bible in one's native tongue was the remedy for England's ills. Never did he indulge in the delights of scholarship for their own sake, but always with the purpose of helping England.

The Story of His Work. William Tyndale was born about 1484 in Gloucestershire, an agricultural community. Attending Oxford when very young, he gained a reputation as studious, upright, and much in earnest. The Bible became his standard of conduct, freeing him from subservience to other authority. Colet's lectures on Paul were then thrilling Oxford, brushing away centuries of scholastic rubbish. At Cambridge, he heard the learned Erasmus on the Greek Testament. Thence returning to his native county as chaplain or tutor to a manor-house, he came close to the common people. Reasoning with the ignorant clergy by straight appeals to Scripture, as Erasmus had taught, he was led to make his famous declaration to a learned man: "If God spare my life, ere many years I will cause a boy that driveth the plough-share know more of the Scripture than thou doest." Erasmus, with exceptional broadmindedness, had approved of vernacular translations, saying that he "would wish even all women to read the Gospel and the Epistles of Paul." Colet had translated the Lord's Prayer into English. The printing press had arrived. But tools for translation were rare and expensive; grammars and lexicons were scarce; and there was no Greek text except that of Erasmus. (See art., Transmission of N.T., pp. 860-1.)

From Gloucestershire Tyndale went to London, hoping to interest the scholarly Bishop Tunstall in publishing his N.T. translation, already begun. But Tunstall refused, and Tyndale determined to push his enterprise on foreign shores with the help of the wealthy Monmouth. Merchants were often more progressive than the clergy. Traveling freely, they felt the vital currents sweeping the world along, and many of them heroically supported progressive leaders. Such a friend did Tyndale find in Monmouth, afterward put in the Tower for his loyalty, and such was Philip the Magnanimous of Marburg.

In 1524, Tyndale sailed for Hamburg never to return. Probably visiting Luther at Wittenberg, he soon settled in Cologne, a place famous for printers and with facilities for shipping books to London. Here he got three thousand copies in press when suddenly the work was stopped, Tyndale disappearing with what sheets he could save. At Worms, a city sanctioning the Reformation, he succeeded in printing six thousand copies, which were smuggled into England and Scotland and distributed secretly. Henry and Wolsey, however, were warned. Tunstall insisted on some drastic measure and the king ordered the books burned. The spectacle was staged at Paul's Cross, London. The cardinal was there in all his pomp, surrounded by his prelates. After Tunstall had denounced these "naughtily translated" books as containing "pestiferous and pernicious poison," noted heretics were required to cast them into the flames. Such publicity caused increased sales, merchants investing in the books for profit. Unauthorized editions were issued and the government spent large sums in vain to destroy them. An old Chronicler wrote that the Bishop thought "he had God by the toe, when indeed he had, as after he thought, the Devil by the fist." At any rate, Providence favored the Bibles until rigorous searching sent scores of people to prison.

In 1527 Tyndale went to Marburg, and under the protection of the Landgrave, who had founded the first university of the Reformation, enjoyed a period of undisturbed study. Here he engaged in translating the Hebrew O.T., and completed the Pentateuch with pertinent and pungent marginal remarks. When the Treaty of Cambray was signed between England and Germany, More and Tunstall were watchdogs, seeing to it that heretical books printed in one country were forbidden in the other. In January, 1530, the Pentateuch appeared. In May it was burned in London. In 1531 several of Tyndale's best friends were persecuted or burned. Tyndale completed the historical books as far as Chronicles, adding Jonah, but his O.T. remained unfinished.

When Wolsey fell, Thomas Cromwell directed agents to persuade Tyndale to return to England under guise of protection, then orders came to apprehend him. Tyndale got out of the way, but his disciple, Fryth, was taken. Now the Inquisition was in energetic action, yet Tyndale lived two years in Antwerp reprinting the O.T. and revising the N.T. This second edition has been called his noblest monument. Every word was carefully reconsidered and where possible improved. Annoyed that one George Joye had officiously undertaken revision, Tyndale in self-defense made a third revision but was arrested before its publication. Therefore it was printed imperfectly.

In England Henry had abolished papal authority. Persecution now relaxing, people dared read the Bible in their own tongue. Prominent persecutors were in the Tower, and it looked as if Tyndale might end his life in scholarly quiet. But the enemies of Protestantism in England could wreak vengeance on a countryman outside. Tyndale was finding a home in Antwerp's residence for English merchants when an agent lured him out to dinner, where officers were ready to carry him to the Vilvorde prison. There during sixteen months he was allowed some freedom. A letter begs for "a candle in the evening, for it is weary work to sit alone in the dark," and another for his Hebrew books. The trial dragged on, Cromwell's efforts at interference failed, and the judges were in a dilemma because pardon meant offending the church and death meant offending Henry. But the death verdict prevailed. Tyndale was martyred October 6, 1536, more mercifully treated than some, being strangled before burning. Just before his death he cried, "Lord, open the king of England's eyes." Eight years before he said, "If they shall burn me, they shall do none other thing than I look for."

The Result of His Work. Tyndale has been called "the true hero of the English Reformation." His life was a testimony to the power of the Bible. He had access to the best means of study of his day, doubtless having before him the Vulgate and other Latin translations, Luther's German Bible, and Hebrew and Greek texts. Probably he did not see any of the manuscripts which were the basis of the texts, but now we know that the Hebrew texts were fairly good, that the Greek were not the earliest and contained many errors, and that the Latin versions were quite corrupt.

Such was the work of Tyndale, not again to be approached, so far as the Bible is concerned, in scholarly daring and influential achievement. It was the molding of a living medium to express a vital force. From Tyndale's efforts came a book which was to permeate the life of English-speaking people not only with religious truth but with beautiful, majestic and forceful diction. "After nearly four centuries and all the action and reaction of time," says J. H. Gardiner, "it is still true that the type of prose style which no good writer can forget, and about which all varieties of prose style center, is the style of the first man who ever made printed English speak to the whole nation."

Between 1535 and 1611. The right to a vernacular Bible was indubitably established in the next seventy-five years, five English versions appearing. Mainly revisions, all were based on Tyndale's translation except the Douai version. None of the scholars undertaking the task equaled Tyndale in intellect or linguistic talent, but Miles Coverdale with his literary gifts permanently influenced our Bible.

Coverdale. Born in 1488, Coverdale studied at Cambridge. He became known for his persuasive preaching and modern sympathies. In 1534 Convocation asked for royal approval of a translation. The astute Cromwell, realizing that Henry would soon welcome such a popular appeal as an authorized English version would make, had started his friend Coverdale, now abroad, on such an edition. This appeared in England before Tyndale's death. A lover of books, versed in Latin and German, but not in Hebrew or Greek, Coverdale was an editor rather than a translator, depending upon Tyndale's version and Latin and German texts. He sensed the need of his time, for this was the first complete English Bible. It left unchanged words cherished by ecclesiastics, omitted controversial notes, placed the apocryphal books apart, and contained wood cuts. This Coverdale Bible became immediately popular, two editions appearing in 1537. In 1538 the N.T. was revised and reprinted with the Latin in a parallel column. Without Tyndale's convictions, Coverdale had more delicate feeling for melody and felicitous phrasing, many of his changes being preserved in the King James Version and his translation of the Psalms in the Psalter of the Prayer Book.

Matthew's Bible. Matthew's Bible appeared next, dedicated to King Henry and Queen Jane. "I like it better than any other translation made," wrote Cranmer, asking Cromwell to secure the king's license "that the same may be sold and read of every person." This version was actually Tyndale's work intrusted in prison to John Rogers, plus Coverdale's translation of the parts lacking. It got its name from publisher or patron, as Tyndale's signature would be unacceptable, and received royal sanction within a year of Tyndale's martyrdom and within ten years of the spectacular burning of his Testaments.

The Great Bible. Uneasy at the popularity of this Bible, with its obvious dependence upon Tyndale, Cromwell conceived of a de luxe edition of Coverdale's (mostly a revision of Tyndale's as we know), sending him to France where such a book could be printed. Confiscated, and some of it sold as waste paper, its sheets were recovered and sent secretly to England. It had a notable frontispiece, a Holbein engraving of King Henry handing the Bible to his subordinates. Because of its size and elegance it was called the Great Bible, and two years saw at least seven imprintings. Cranmer's elaborate preface to the second edition occasioned the name Cranmer's Bible. The fourth edition bore the sanction of Bishop Tunstall, Tyndale's persistent persecutor. A copy was ordered placed in each church, that "parishioners may most commodiously resort to the same and rede yt," but excited public discussion called forth an edict forbidding "any open reasoning in your taverns or alehouses." This was the officially authorized version, not the King James.

The Geneva Bible. After twenty years came the Geneva Bible. Mary's persecutions made Calvin's home the refuge of exiled reformers. A group, including Coverdale for a short while, produced a truly Calvinistic English Bible, the expense being borne by the Geneva congregation. This was more scholarly than the Great Bible, though based upon its O.T. and Tyndale's N.T. edited by Whittingham, Calvin's brother-in-law. This book, presented to Elizabeth at her coronation, went through sixty editions in her reign, one hundred and forty by 1644. Smaller than usual in size, using Roman rather than black-faced type, with text broken into chapters and verses after Stephen's Greek Testament, containing an introduction by Calvin, notes Calvinistic in tone, graphic pictures and the innovation of maps, this became the household book of England and Scotland.

The Bishop's Bible. The Bishop's Bible appeared in 1568. Archbishop Parker thought too many unsanctioned versions existed and directed a committee of scholars, including nine bishops, in a new revision. Through lack of consultation the style was uneven and it had no especial merit, although the N.T. possessed commendable points. Its use of verse divisions confirmed an unfortunate custom. Prescribed for churches, it soon superseded the Great Bible, holding sway forty years.

The Douai Bible. Alarmed at the inroads of the vernacular Bible, the Roman Church in self-defense authorized a translation by Catholics. The Douai version appeared in 1609 in such awkward English and literal Latinisms that it has never been read with any satisfaction by clergy or people. It was begun and finished at Douai, Flanders, where English priests were educated. The N.T., issued in 1582 at Rheims, was called the Rhemish N.T. Roman Catholics for some years have acknowledged their need of a better translation, which is now in the making.

The King James and the Revised Versions Compared. The King James is usually known as the Authorized Version (A.V.). It is the basis of both the English Revised (R.V.) and the American Standard Versions (A.S.V.).

Occasion for King James Version. In 1604, the year after his coronation, James I called a conference to examine into "things pretended to be amiss in the church." Because of "the most corrupted translation" in the Prayer Book, James, himself an earnest Bible student, became interested in a proposal for retranslation. Confusion in the use of versions had arisen and additional sources and better knowledge of Greek and Hebrew were now available. Accordingly fifty-four noted scholars, representing all phases of belief, were appointed to make the best version possible. Working in sections, using the Bishop's Bible as a foundation, and consulting all possible texts, they collaborated harmoniously and skillfully. In 1611 the masterpiece appeared, called "the noblest and most beautiful book in the world." Everywhere one meets comments like these: "A monumental work," "A book which, if everything else in our language should perish, would alone suffice to show the whole extent of its beauty and power." By the middle of the century it had displaced the Bishop's Bible in churches and the Geneva Bible in homes, and for two hundred and fifty years held undisputed sway in English-speaking countries. Even to-day it is the best seller, notwithstanding more recent versions and the popularity of other reading.

Secret of its Excellence. What is the secret? A few of Wyclif's phrases are here, Tyndale is largely responsible for it, Coverdale put his delicate touch on it, the sturdy tone of the Geneva text and the Latinisms of the Rhemish Testament modified certain sentences. Behind it were the world's profoundest religious truths, uttered by the Hebrews, in concrete, vivid, figurative expression. All was cast into a crucible heated hot with religious fervor, with the zest of a new intellectual awakening, a new freedom of the individual, a new national loyalty. Out of it came this book, so simple, direct, and suggestive in language, so beautiful and resonant in rhythm, so majestic and inspiring in tone that as literature many claim that it surpasses the original. No one influence has been so great in the life of English-speaking people, religiously, morally, socially, politically, as has this version. It still holds its own in many homes and pulpits. Why was there any attempt to displace it?

Reasons for the Revised Version. By the middle of the nineteenth century a great intellectual change was taking place. Science and historical research had brought to light a new world of learning, all study falling under the spell of the scientific method. Evolution was quickening imagination, fascinating finds in archaeology were luring men to reconstruct the background of ancient literatures, and the centuries of development necessary to produce our Bible were clearly appearing in outline. Biblical studies were leaping ahead in scholarly skill and in available materials, old conceptions of a static world and an infallible book were giving way. In other words "biblical criticism" had come, and scholars felt it time for a new translation. The Revision Committee, gathered together in 1870, was guided by four considerations: the possession of several early uncial or capital-letter Greek manuscripts from the fourth and fifth centuries as opposed to the minuscules and cursives of the tenth to the sixteenth centuries known in 1611; the refinement of Hebrew and Greek scholarship and discoveries like that of the principles of Hebrew poetry; the light thrown upon obscure passages by historical studies; and changes in the English language itself. (See art., Transmission of the N.T., p. 861.)

About seventy-five Greek and Hebrew scholars from England and America assumed the task. In 1881 the N.T. was published, in 1885 the O.T., and in 1901 an American edition embodying readings deemed preferable by the American members of the committee. Schools and colleges seized upon it as a textbook. Ministers of the advanced type used it in the pulpit, commentaries and lesson-helps incorporated it. Protest came from the theologically conservative, who regarded the King James Version as sacred, and from people of literary taste for displacing a beautiful classic by a rough revision. Both protests still hold, the former decreasingly, the latter increasingly.

Merits of the Revision. What are its merits? Scarcely any manuscript finds have been so thrilling as those of Tischendorf in 1840-44. He discovered or made available three of the four earliest manuscripts (see pp. 861-3). The fourth, sent to James by the patriarch of Constantinople when he heard of the king's interest in the Bible, did not reach England in time for use in the 1611 version. With so many sources available, the art of collation was developed and the discriminating sense of historian and linguist brought to bear on the probable original. Mistakes which had crept into the manuscripts were recognized and new shades of meaning in old words revealed. Many passages, aside from the Psalter, were printed in poetical form, the text was presented in paragraphs rather than verses, and extraneous material was omitted. The resulting version is accurate rather than beautiful, yet not truly accurate, for much improvement has since been made in pushing these principles of study further. It is a translation per se, not a book of literary excellence.

The Latest Vernacular Versions. Recently there has been a renewed outburst of scholarly industry in translating the Bible, especially the N.T.—fresh translations, not more revisions. Their popularity seems to indicate a new era for the vernacular Bible.

Reasons for New Translations. The reasons lie again in the age, an age of freedom, of demand for the real and for scientific scholarship. Fifty years have shown such enormous progress in biblical studies that advanced students discard much of the old. The whole foundation of judgment has shifted as the former basis of "a closed canon" and "an infallible rule" has crumbled. This critical age has handled roughly some sacred traditions. Passion for truth has outrun loyalties of sentiment. The air is electric with new interests. It is no longer a world of one book, and books that appeal are modern. The Bible seems as archaic as an ancestor's portrait in ruff and wig, for the English of 1611 is not the English of to-day and the version of 1885 is not colloquial. Biblical phrases rich in content to our fathers have become meaningless to this generation. Expository sermons are displaced by current events and public Scripture reading has become trite. The fruit of familiarity minus understanding is boredom, the fruit of no reading at all is disregard; moreover, the shift is not yet popularly made from a Bible every word considered sacred, to a Bible held as a guiding star because showing the development of religious thought. Thus active personal regard for it is ceasing in many homes and schools, and so extensive is the ignorance that a nation-wide movement for religious education has been inaugurated. Also the popular mind is suddenly being stretched in two directions, to compass an international world where nations remote in miles have become political and commercial neighbors, and to compass in understanding ancient historic cultures. The latter has lagged while the former has progressed, and biblical students whose specialty is old civilizations have been searching for means to break the spell of indifference to the Bible. Awakened to the importance of its message in helping to solve the problems of our day, even as were Wyclif and Tyndale for theirs, they want the people once more to become familiar with its literature.

Such scholars as Weymouth, Moffatt, and Goodspeed have undertaken the hard task of once more bridging a chasm between the Bible and the people. The N.T. has received most attention. Only Moffatt's and The O.T.: An American Translation, contain the O.T. However, commentators have been publishing translations of O.T. sections which no student should miss. (Cf. G. A. Smith's Jeremiah; also Deut. 32, 33, in this Commentary.) A list compiled in 1925 (see J. V. Madison, Journal of Bib. Lit., vol. xlv, 1925, iii, iv) enumerates one hundred and sixty-one N.T. translations since Tyndale; twenty-nine since 1900, when The Twentieth Century N.T. appeared, the majority American. These vary in excellence as well as in faults. Not all will live, but great praise is due some.

Estimation of the New Translations. In estimating these one must consider the difference between an accurate translation and a book of literature. Making a translation is a science, making literature is an art to be bound as little by too much learning as by too much convention. It is the height of skill to translate well and also write well. Tyndale was such a consummate genius and the Authorized Version is the fruit of the rarely gifted Elizabethan period. Criticisms of recent versions, highly commendatory as well as adverse, fall into these two categories. The N.T. was undoubtedly intended for common folk, yet that this need not preclude a book of literature springing from the pen of a common man, John Bunyan is witness. The gains of new translations are clear, plain language, striking home to the modern mind, and, in the form of the book, printed like other books. Yet Latin derivatives increase and vivid figures diminish, although Latin words are the language of abstractions which the Hebrews did not possess. They reveled instead in picturesque symbols. Excellent as these translations are as commentaries, exactness sometimes fails; and notwithstanding attempts to present poetry as such the original cadences often seem lost. Neither must we forget that literary masterpieces are found in the O.T., our finest writers and orators having whetted their style on the eloquence, poetry, and subtle satire of the prophets. However, criticism is easier than construction, and these scholars might well quote Tyndale: "If any man find faults either with the translation or aught beside (which is easier for many to do than so well to have translated it themselves of their own pregnant wits), to the same it shall be lawful to translate it themselves."

Ours is not an era of creative English but, rather, of learning to master the tools of research. Like that of Wyclif, it is an age awakening to a new world. Like that of Tyndale, it is a period of reforming philosophies and rediscovering values. It took great individuals to blaze the trail then. Groups followed in harmonious collaboration, the work of individuals being absorbed into a national classic. The cycle seems to be returning. Individuals are leading in something unique. Perhaps in due time their work, cast into a newly heated crucible, may produce once more a version of plain, pithy, suggestive words, with poetic symbolism and musical phrases, and another genius may appear to match the Hebrew idiom to the English and create a classic. Perhaps the flaming spirit of God's word will again break through the hard crust of convention in translation, and give us the radiant vision Erasmus had when he said that the N.T. pages "will give you Christ himself . . . in an intimacy so close that he would be less visible to you if he stood before your eyes."

Literature: Trevelyan, England in the Age of Wyclif; Poole, Wyclif and Movements for Reform; Demars, William Tyndale; Cooper, The Life and Work of William Tyndale; Gardiner, The Bible as English Literature; Goodspeed, The Making of the English N.T.; Hoare, The Evolution of the English Bible; Kenyon, Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts; Price, The Ancestry of our English Bible; Westcott, History of the English Bible.

II. ARTICLES

THE OLD TESTAMENT

THE FORMATION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT
THE TRANSMISSION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT
THE CHRONOLOGY OF THE OLD TESTAMENT
THE OLD TESTAMENT IN THE LIGHT OF ARCHÆOLOGY
THE OLD TESTAMENT AND SCIENCE
THE OLD TESTAMENT AND CRITICISM
THE PENTATEUCH—ITS ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT
THE LEGAL AND HISTORICAL LITERATURE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT
THE PROPHETIC LITERATURE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT
THE POETIC AND WISDOM LITERATURE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT
THE OLD TESTAMENT CONCEPTION OF GOD
THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL
ISRAEL'S MESSIANIC HOPE
THE LITERATURE OF THE INTERTESTAMENTAL PERIOD
THE RELIGIOUS DEVELOPMENT OF THE INTERTESTAMENTAL PERIOD

THE FORMATION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

By GODFREY ROLLES DRIVER

MAGDALEN COLLEGE, OXFORD

General Contents. It is customary to speak of both the O.T. and the N.T. as "canonical." The application of the term "canon" to the Scriptures is not found before the fourth century A.D., and it is of strictly Christian origin. Nevertheless, the word may be and is conveniently used also with reference to those Hebrew Scriptures which Christians call the "Old Testament" (cf. 2 Cor. 3¹⁴, where vetus testamentum is used by Jerome). The Hebrew Bible is divided into three parts; the "Law" (Hebrew Tôrâh), the "Prophets" Nēbhî'im, and the "Writings" (Kethubhîm), for the last of which Christian writers have substituted the Greek title Hagiographa, "Sacred Writings." Each group, with unimportant exceptions, consisted of the same books throughout its history, but the order within each varied considerably from time to time; it remained almost invariable only in the "Law," whose five books were always arranged as they still are in modern Bibles, unless it is conceded that the manuscripts of the list drawn up by the Christian bishop Melito (cir. 170 A.D.) point to an arrangement in which Numbers preceded Leviticus. The reason for the variations is obvious: each book was till comparatively recent times written on a separate roll, so that the question of the order in which the books should stand did not arise; but the obvious historical sequence of the books of the Pentateuch insured a chronological order from the first time on which each separate group, or the whole of the O.T., was copied on the same scroll, probably in or soon after the first century A.D. Similarly, there is never any variation in the arrangement of the historical books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings.

Early Traditions. The formation of the Hebrew canon is an obscure subject, for no historical account of it exists, and the allusions found in the Apocrypha (2 Macc. 21³⁻¹⁵ and 2 Esdras 14¹⁹⁻⁴⁸) are purely legendary. Hardly more reliable are the stories which connect the men of the Great Synagogue with the work of forming the O.T. canon (Elias Levita), since this appears to be nothing but a fictitious assembly based on that at which Ezra promulgated the Law (Neh. 8-10), for which there is no evidence earlier than the Mishnah, namely, about the end of the second century A.D. All that can be said in support of the tradition is that much of the work must have been carried out by successive generations of scribes at Jerusalem. There is, indeed, no external notice touching the formation of the canon till several centuries after its close. Yet there probably underlies the story of Ezra's association with the work as outlined in the 2 Esdras passage already referred to, this much truth, that he was connected with the preservation and promulgation of the Law. Fond imagination has transformed this into an official establishment of the text of the Hebrew Scriptures as an authoritative canon of Scripture.

Principle Underlying Canonization. It may now be asked what is meant by the formation of the canon. It has, for example, been suggested that the canon contains merely those remnants of ancient literature which, having survived the accidents of time, came to be regarded by later ages as a collection of sacred writings; this is made improbable by the lateness of some of the books—e.g., Daniel (cir. 165 B.C.)—which have found a place in the canon. Nor is it merely an anthology of Hebrew literature; for such a conception, while accounting for the omission of certain known works—e.g., the "Book of the Wars of Jehovah" (Num. 21¹⁴) and the "Book of Jashar" (Josh. 10¹³ 2 Sam. 1¹⁸; cf. also 1 Kings 8⁵³, LXX)—from the final collection, overlooks the religious purpose which appears clearly to have been the principle governing the selection. From a number of early sources comes the suggestion that the reason for setting the books apart is to be found in the fact that those responsible for the decision believed that they could hear the divine voice in the messages contained in the books. This recognition presupposes a people not only so far developed as to be conscious that the revelation of the divine will through human literature was possible, but also ready to accept such a revelation as authoritative (Ryle).

Composition and Compilation. Before the selection implied in the existence of a canon could be made two processes were necessary: in the first place, the composition of the original documents and, secondly, as numerous passages show, the compilation of the various books of the O.T. out of material selected from these documents. Oral tradition preceded written books. Thus there appear to be references to national songs so preserved (e.g., Num. 21²⁷) before they were written down in such books as those whose titles have already been cited. These collections must have been in circulation for a long while before they were committed to writing, perhaps as early as the ninth century B.C. The motive assigned as the reason for which they were to be written down is definitely religious (Deut. 31¹⁹), and this same purpose, it may be inferred, underlay every step taken by the Hebrews to insure the preservation of their ancient Scriptures. Again, the compilers of the books of Kings continually refer to the extra-canonical sources from which they drew their material, such as the "Book of the Acts of Solomon" (1 Kings 11⁴¹), the "Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel," and the "Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah." The Chronicler also makes mention of the "History of Nathan" (1 Chr. 29²⁹ and 2 Chr. 9²⁹) and the "Book of Jehu" (20³⁴), in addition to allusions to canonical books which are preserved in the Bible; he quotes too the "Commentary of the Prophet Iddo" (2 Chr. 13²²) and the "Commentary of the Book of Kings" (24²⁷). Other compilers, like those who put together the Pentateuch in its present form, hardly ever or never cite their authorities; none the less, modern criticism has made it abundantly clear that most of the books of the O.T. owe their actual form to compilers of varying skill. Both the composition and the compilation, therefore, of a work preceded its admission to the canon.

Preliminary Stages in Canonization. In the period before the reforms of Josiah (cir. 640-608 B.C.) there was one thing which was invested with a semi-canonical sanctity: this was the Decalogue, which was preserved on the two Tables of Stone in the ark within the Holy of Holies (1 Kings 8⁹; cf. 2 Kings 11¹² 2 Chr. 23¹¹). These laws composed, indeed, the charter of the constitution, but they are not to be confused with a canon of Scripture.

The first case in which a book appears to exert canonical authority is afforded by the discovery of the "Book of the Law" in the Temple in 621 B.C. in the reign of Josiah (2 Kings 22³⁻²⁰; cf. 2 Chr. 34⁸⁻²⁸). This is acknowledged to contain the words of Jehovah, and its authority is unhesitatingly accepted. Yet it is clear that it did not contain the whole of the Law, nor does the fact that it was called the "Book of the Covenant" (2 Kings 23^{2, 21}; cf. 2 Chr. 34³⁰) make it necessary to identify it with the Sinaitic legislation (Ex. 20-23; cf. 24⁷); for a number of reasons combine to show that it designates rather a part, possibly the bulk, of Deuteronomy or else a collection of Deuteronomic laws. The book of Deuteronomy is primarily not legal, but hortatory; in the effect which its discovery had on the minds of the king and of the nation may be recognized a forecast of the authority and the sanctity which books acknowledged to be canonical were afterward to receive.

Canonization of the Law. The fact that the first works to become authoritative were laws prepares us to find that the first part of the O.T. to receive canonical recognition was the Law (namely, the first five books, commonly called the "Pentateuch"). This is confirmed by the testimony of Jeremiah, who makes evident allusion to a written law (Jer. 8⁸); yet he does not introduce his quotations with any set phrase indicating that he is citing a sacred book, as the compiler of the books of Kings does (e.g., 1 Kings 2³ 2 Kings 14⁶). But the Deuteronomic collection is still the only canonical book; for both these authors refer to it alone and both closely imitate its style. It must, however, be borne in mind that it did not occupy the position held by the canonical scriptures at a later period; for, in the first place, the prophets were still living and exercised a greater influence than any written law could do; and, secondly, the Deuteronomic Law alone was insufficient to constitute a national Scripture. Its history as well as its laws rested on the great works of the "Jehovist" and of the "Elohists," which appear to have been combined into one composite narrative before the beginning of the seventh century B.C. (See discussion in art., Pentateuch, p. 138.) The miseries of the Exile and the hopelessness of the future prospect must have driven the pious few to look back to the past glories of their race; and the veneration felt for the ancient records may well have given rise to a demand to bring them into connection with this Book of the Law. It is, therefore, a very plausible conjecture that, when the prologue and epilogue had been added to provide it with an historical setting, the scribe who edited the Jehovist-Elohists version of the book of Joshua in the spirit of the Deuteronomist attached that work to it, while about the same time a redaction of the whole narratives of the Jehovist and the Elohist was prefixed to it. Thus the so-called Hexateuch was formed in the early period of the Exile; but it is improbable that Joshua was separated from the Law prior to the close of the age of Nehemiah (a somewhat different view is expressed in the art., Pentateuch, pp. 142-4).

During the same period, other groups of laws were probably being gathered together; for, while Jeremiah does not, Ezekiel does show acquaintance with the Law of Holiness. But it is not probable that the Priestly Code as a whole was finally put together till after the return from the Captivity, since Zechariah nowhere appeals to it and Haggai speaks of the priests as if they still gave their decisions on their own authority. While, therefore, various groups of priestly laws were being brought together during the Exile, not, indeed, for public use but for the convenience of the priests, their codification in the Priestly Code must be put after 536 B.C.

Nearly a century later it was to the Deuteronomic law that Ezra appealed in support of his action against mixed marriages (Ezra 103; cf. Neh. 13¹⁻³); and other points emphasize the influence of Deuteronomy on Ezra and Nehemiah. The priestly law can hardly have been hitherto handed down otherwise than by word of mouth and in parts, for it is stated that both priests and people were ignorant how to celebrate the Feast of Tabernacles until they had been instructed by Ezra (Neh. 8¹³⁻¹⁸). The Priestly Code cannot, in fact, have been fully known at least to many of the priests and most of the people, before 444 B.C. That Ezra then publicly revealed it is the true inference from the accounts of what then happened and from the biblical descriptions of him (Ezra 7⁶, 11, 14). But these descriptions give no support to the theory which was based on them, that Ezra was inspired to dictate all the twenty-four books of the Hebrew canon which had been destroyed at the fall of Jerusalem (2 Esdras 14³⁸⁻⁴⁸). Beyond this it is impossible to go, for we have not sufficient facts on which to base any endeavor to ascribe this work of compilation to any single man. The process is more likely to have been gradual than otherwise; one school or generation of scribes, in all likelihood, compiled the Priestly Code and another combined it with the rest of what now comprises the Pentateuch, while on the trustworthy authority of the almost contemporary Chronicler it was Ezra who promulgated the "Book of the Law" in Jerusalem (Neh. 8-10); but there is no evidence to show whether the Law then revealed was only the Priestly Code (Wildeboer) or the whole Pentateuch (Ryle). In any case, it was the age of Ezra or the immediately following age which saw the full recognition of the first part of the Hebrew canon, namely, of the "Law."

Yet the Priestly Code of Ezra was not so extensive then as it afterwards became; for various practices, which are now found in it but which appear not to have been made in Nehemiah's time, must have been added at a subsequent period. Inversely, certain recent regulations, though "written in the law"—namely, the traditional law of the priests—never found a place in the canonical "Law."

These facts are inconclusive; but from external evidence it may be inferred that a considerable time must have elapsed before the letter of the text was regarded as sacrosanct, since the Pentateuch translation of the LXX, made probably in the third century B.C., exhibits considerable divergencies from the Hebrew text in at least one long section (Ex. 35-40).

Finally, there are several facts that go to prove that the "Law" alone was the first Canonical Scripture: (1) It is named separately as a group distinct from the "Prophets" and other "Writings" in the first mention of the threefold canon (Prologue of Eccclus.); (2) it is treated with exceptional reverence by the post-exilic writers of the O.T. (e.g., Mal. 4⁴) as well as by the later Jews (e.g., Eccclus. 24²³⁻²⁹ 1 Macc. 15⁷); (3) it is the part of the O.T. which was first and best translated into Greek; (4) in the beginning it alone was read systematically in the services of the synagogue; it was some time before lessons were taken also from the "Prophets"; (5) it was long used as a general title for the whole of the Hebrew Scriptures; (6) finally, it alone was recognized as canonical by the Samaritans; none of those scriptures which became canonical after the Schism (cir. 423 B.C.) was so accepted by them. This event, therefore, fixes the terminus ad quem for the closing of the first part of the Hebrew canon.

Canonization of the Prophets. The law without prophecy, it has been said, was a body without a soul (Dillmann). The next stage, therefore, when the voice of prophecy was finally silent, was the formation of the prophetic canon. This group was divided by the Jews into two parts; of these the first, called the "Former Prophets," comprised the historical books from Joshua to Kings (except Ruth), and the second, called the "Latter Prophets," consisted of the three great Prophets, Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and the twelve Minor Prophets.

Joshua, which had probably been compiled during the early part of the Exile, was at first combined with the Pentateuch; but by the end of Nehemiah's age it seems to have been separated from it, either because its narrative contained neither distinctive religious nor legal teaching or because the "Law" seemed to reach a more fitting close with the death of Moses. To the same period too must be assigned the compilation of Judges; of this the middle portion shows signs of having been edited by a compiler of the Deuteronomic school, while the first and last sections of the book, which exhibit no Deuteronomic traces, were probably added to the main part (Judg. 26-16³¹) as a beginning and an end by a later hand. The whole book, therefore, must have been put together after the Deuteronomic age, namely, at some time during the Exile or later. To this general period also belongs the compilation of the books of Samuel, which show sporadic traces of Deuteronomic redaction. The books of Kings are the most markedly Deuteronomic of all the historical books and their compiler seems to have been, though not Jeremiah himself, yet a man like-minded with him and almost certainly a contemporary who lived and wrote under the same influences. They probably belong, then, to the last decade of the seventh century B.C., in which case a few additions must have afterward been made to them, since they carry the narrative down to 562 B.C. The reason why all these works were classed with the "Prophets" is clear: as Deuteronomy represented the law infused with the spirit of prophecy, so the historical books contained the record of Jehovah's dealings with his chosen people seen through the prophets' eyes, and were intended to teach the people great prophetic truth.

Hitherto, however, the sayings of the prophets were only transmitted orally (cf. Jer. 26^{17, 18}) or preserved in written form by their disciples (cf. Isa. 8¹⁶ 30⁸). Now, when a great age had come to an end and the gift of prophecy became ever rarer, the reverence for their teaching increased; while the records of them were through the ravages of time in danger of being altogether lost. Tradition claims that it was Nehemiah who gathered together the books concerning the kings and the prophets (2 Macc. 2¹³). Yet this does not mean that he drew up the Prophetic canon; it merely connects the preservation of some of the national records with him personally or with his generation. This is clear from the fact that, while there are clear allusions to the "Law" in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, references in them to the great events of later history are vague and general; nor is there in them any mention of any of its great characters.

The ministry of Isaiah lasted roughly from 740-700 B.C.; but the compilation of the book which bears his name cannot be put till long afterward in view of the lateness of the prophecies (cir. 450 B.C.) which now form the last eleven chapters of it. These could not have been ascribed to Isaiah or appended to his collected prophecies till sufficient time had elapsed for their authorship to have been completely forgotten—probably a full century rather than anything less; and this brings its compilation down to a date not earlier than 350 B.C. Jeremiah cannot have been put into its present form till after the compilation of Kings, from which certain passages have been incorporated into it; further, the great divergencies from the Hebrew text which the version of the LXX exhibits points to the currency of different texts, possibly of different collections, till after the composition of the Greek translation. The middle of the fourth century B.C., therefore, should be late enough for the three great Prophets. The Minor Prophets necessitate a somewhat later date. Malachi was composed about the middle of the fifth century B.C.; the extensive prophecies consisting of six chapters, attached to the end of Zechariah (cir. 330-300 B.C.), could not have been added while anyone who knew the author personally was still living; it may be, therefore, that, as in the case of the addition to the original Isaiah, a century must be allowed before the compilation of this book could have been completed. This brings the editing of the whole book of the Minor Prophets down to the middle of the third century B.C. It may be added that they seem to have been treated as a single work before they were incorporated in the canon; for they show traces of one and the same editorial hand in the various headings prefixed to several of the books and to distinct prophecies.

Although, however, the collection of the "Prophets" appears to have begun in the age of Nehemiah, the divergent texts exhibited by the LXX in Samuel and Jeremiah, to which attention has already been drawn, shows that none of them can have become strictly canonical for at least another century. In fact, the Greek translation must have been completed before their canonicity was recognized, at least in Egypt, although this may have happened somewhat earlier in Palestine. The terminus a quo, therefore, for recognition of the "Prophets" as canonical will be certainly after 300 B.C. and probably not long, if at all, before 250 B.C. The terminus ad quem can be easily fixed from external evidence: for (1) Jesus the son of Sirach (cir. 180 B.C.) clearly recognizes them, in the order in which they are now found in the Hebrew Bible, namely, Joshua (Ecclus. 46¹⁻⁶), Judges (46^{11, 12}), Samuel (46^{13-47¹¹}), Kings (47^{12-49³}), Isaiah (48²⁰⁻²⁵), Jeremiah (49^{6, 7}), Ezekiel (49^{8, 9}) and the Twelve Prophets (49¹⁰)—a citation which proves that the Minor Prophets were already known collectively as the "Twelve Prophets"; (2) the author of Daniel (cir. 165 B.C.), refers to a group of books which includes the words of Jeremiah (Dan. 9²), and which appears to designate the prophetic Scriptures; (3) the grandson of Jesus the son of Sirach (cir. 132 B.C.), three times mentions the "Prophets" as forming the second part of the threefold canon (Prologue of Ecclus.). Thus the Prophetic canon is found to have been fully recognized between 180 and 130

B.C. Its compilation, then, may safely be put in the last half of the third century B.C. (Ryle) or in the first half of the second century B.C. (Wildeboer). Thus the "Prophets" acquired canonical authority just in time to strengthen the national feeling and so to form a bulwark against the Hellenization efforts of Antiochus Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.) and the renegade Jews who seconded his efforts.

There is, finally, little, if any, evidence in support of the view that the Prophetic canon was not closed till the latter part of the first century B.C., because of the doubts then current about Ezekiel's place in the canon (Fürst); if that had been the case, it is strange that Daniel was not classed with the "Prophets" (Wildeboer). With their recognition came also without doubt the reading of extracts from them as lessons in the service of the synagogues; but there is no evidence that this custom actually arose during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes (Elias Levita). In the N.T. mention is made several times of reading from the "Prophets" as well as from the "Law" (e.g., Acts 13¹⁵, 27); but it looks as if there were no systematic arrangement of the lessons from the "Prophets" as there was of those from the "Law," since the reader seems to have himself selected any suitable passage (cf. Lk. 4¹⁶, 17). That the reading of lessons from them preceded and so was the reason for their canonization (Ryle) cannot be proved; for it is not known when these lessons were first introduced, while the first mention of them occurs in the N.T. What might have delayed their recognition was perhaps the opposition of the Sadducees, who were loth to add anything to the canon of the Law (Budde).

Canonization of the Writings. The third group in the Hebrew canon is that called the "Writings" which is separated from the preceding "Prophets" not so much by a difference in its contents (Oehler) as by a chronological distinction (Wildeboer). It comprises (1) the poetical books: Psalms, Proverbs, Job; (2) the five "Rolls" (Hebrew, Mēghillōth)—a late and artificial designation given to them because they alone of this group were employed in the worship of the synagogue (Wildeboer): Song of Songs (or Canticles), Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther; (3) the remaining books: Daniel, Ezra and Nehemiah (which form one book in the Hebrew Bible) and Chronicles. Of these, Ruth and Lamentations are reckoned with the "Prophets" in the Greek (as in the English) Bible, whence some have thought that they were originally so placed also in the Hebrew Bible and that they were transferred to their present position among the "Writings" by the mediæval Jewish doctors.

The Hebrew evidence, however, is uniformly against this view.

A tradition, enshrined in what is without doubt a spurious epistle, claimed that Judas Maccabæus gathered together the writings which had been scattered by reason of the Jewish war of independence (2 Macc. 2¹⁴); from this it may safely be inferred that the losses incurred in the religious revival inaugurated by the war led to a demand that steps should be taken to preserve the relics of the national literature and to gather it together into an authoritative edition. Apart from those works which have been so collected, much of what was afterward incorporated in the "Writings" must have been already held in high esteem at the time when the "Prophets" became canonical. But, apart from what was thus recognized, there must have been many works which, through not having been declared canonical, had been less carefully preserved. These must have been fairly numerous; for the author of Ecclesiastes, who lived probably toward the end of the third century B.C., already laments the many books that are made (Eccl. 12¹²). It would be natural to find many of the books in this group among the "Prophets." Some—e.g., Chronicles, Ezra and Nehemiah, Ruth or Esther—failed to be so classified because the lateness of their composition had prevented as yet their canonical recognition; others—e.g., the Psalter or Daniel—because they had not yet been compiled or even written; others again—e.g., Lamentations, Song of Songs, or Ecclesiastes—because of their subject matter. Yet all were works of a religious character, of which the date could be supposed to go back to the end of the prophetic period, namely, the time of Ezra, some as resting on earlier names, others as supposedly contemporary with the history which they record; but without doubt questions of taste as well as of doctrine must have been taken into account.

The importance of the Psalter for devotional and liturgical purposes makes it a plausible conjecture that it was the first work to be admitted to the canon of the "Writings"; and its position at the head of this group is an indication of this priority. The fact that several of the Psalms in it appear to belong certainly to the Maccabæan age proves that the final redaction cannot have been made before the Maccabæan revolt; yet it cannot have been recognized much later, since it is soon freely quoted (e.g., 1 Chr. 167-36) and cited as scriptural (e.g., 1 Macc. 7¹⁶, 17).

The date of the admission of the rest of the "Writings" is largely conjectural, owing to the lack of direct evidence. Job, which dates from the exilic or, even more probably, the post-exilic period, naturally obtained a place there through its fresh contribution to religious thought, while the fact that the Jews regarded it as an historical work increased their veneration for it. That it was not for this reason included in the "Prophets" may be due to the individual, rather than national, nature of its theme. The date of Ruth is uncertain; but it too, as a book dealing with the history of an individual family and not with that of the nation, obtained a place among the "Writings" rather than among the "Prophets," where it is found in the Greek Bible. The tradition that Jeremiah was the author of Lamentations caused this book to be attached to the book bearing his name, namely, among the "Prophets," in the Greek Bible; but its subject is in the highest degree unsuited to form the conclusion of a prophetic work, especially of one which closes with an historical narrative; further, if that had been its original position, the tradition that it was the work of Jeremiah would have been against removing it from the "Prophets" to the "Writings." Its poetical form, on the contrary, made it a suitable work for inclusion in the same group as the Psalter. Proverbs contains materials of diverse periods, some of considerable antiquity, others of a much later age; it appears to have reached its present form about the middle of the second century B.C. The variety and edifying nature of its contents, as well as its association with Solomon, may well have combined to win it a place in the canon soon after its final redaction. Lastly, Ezra and Nehemiah originally, it is generally held, was the concluding part of Chronicles. Its separation from that book is best explained by the following theory: Kings came to an end with the middle of the Exile, when the Babylonian monarch lifted up the head of the captive Jewish king about 560 B.C. (2 Kings 25^{27f.}); to complete the story of the restoration of the Jews that portion of the Chronicler's work which began with the story of the Persian king's kindness to the Jewish exiles in 536 B.C. (Ezra 1^{1f.}) was afterward selected for inclusion in the Scriptures. It could not be attached to Kings, since the Prophetic canon was closed; it was, therefore, inserted as a separate work in the "Writings." But, when once a part of the Chronicler's work had found acceptance, the claims of the rest of it could hardly have been resisted, especially as it provided much genealogical material not found elsewhere; consequently, it was admitted to the last place in the Hebrew canon. Thus Christ, in quoting from the first and last books of the Hebrew Scriptures (Mt. 23³⁵ Lk. 11⁵¹), refers not to the limits of time but to the limits of the canon. The date of the inclusion of Daniel can be closely defined. Jesus the son of Sirach makes no mention of Daniel in his famous list of Jewish heroes; but in a similar list, composed about a century later, there is an allusion to Daniel and the three children in the den of lions (1 Macc. 2^{59, 60}; cf. 15⁴). From the middle of the second century onward it seems to have been well known.

Lastly, there are certain books whose claims to canonicity were much disputed. The Song of Songs was early accepted with the other poetical books among the "Writings"; but no allusions to it are found in literature until it appears in a Christian list of the last half of second century A.D. Ecclesiastes too, which belongs to the third century B.C., was accepted, possibly owing to its connection with Solomon, before any objections to it were seriously felt. According to a Jewish story, it was quoted as scripture in the reign of Alexander Jannæus (105-79 B.C.). The greatest doubt was felt about Esther. In some quarters it was the most popular book in the "Writings" owing to its intense nationalism, especially in the early period when the memory of the persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes had not been entirely forgotten; in others it met in the course of time with such strong disapproval, possibly because of its insistence on a feast not prescribed in the "Law" or because of the absence of all mention of the Divine Name in it, that some Jews in the first century A.D. omitted it entirely from the list of sacred books. Mention is made of the day of Mordecai in a work of the first half of the first century B.C. (2 Macc. 15³⁶); but this does not prove that this book had then been admitted into the canon. Josephus is the first author who appears to recognize it as canonical; yet it was omitted by Melito (cir. 170 A.D.) from his list, presumably on the authority of his Jewish informant.

The external evidence for the third group of the canon as a whole is vague. The grandson of Jesus the son of Sirach (cir. 132 B.C.) refers to the "Law," the "Prophets" and the "other books of the fathers" (Prologue to Ecclus.); but the phrase is too indefinite to imply that a special collection known as the "Writings" had as yet been gathered together. Nor does it tell us how many of these books had already been translated into Greek; but there is some evidence to show that the Greek version of Esther was known by 178 B.C. and that of Chronicles by 150 B.C. It has, in fact, been argued with some reason that the versions of some of these books—e.g., of Daniel and Esther—in the LXX are so unequally and so badly executed that the Alexandrian Greeks can hardly have recognized their canonicity.

The Jewish philosopher, Philo, who died about 50 A.D., refers to the threefold grouping of the canon in speaking of laws and oracles uttered by the prophets and hymns and other works of a pious nature; but, although he introduces frequent quotations from the "Law" and the "Prophe^ts," he makes no use of Ezekiel, Daniel, Ecclesiastes, the Song of Songs, Esther, Ruth, Lamentations, or possibly of Chronicles. Citations are found in the N.T. from all the books of the O.T. except Obadiah, Nahum, Ezra and Nehemiah, Esther, the Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes. But the fact that there are prophets to whom neither Philo nor the writers of the N.T. refer is nothing more than an argumentum e silentio and singularly weak, for it is certain that the Prophetic canon was well established long before their time. Jesus, indeed, seems to imply at least the beginnings of the third group in his reference to the Law of Moses, the Prophets and the Psalms (Lk. 24⁴⁴); but it can by no means be decided from this whether the "Writings" as a whole were or were not at that time a distinct and recognized group of the canon. He also alludes clearly to Daniel (Mt. 24¹⁵); and Ezra and Nehemiah are covered by his reference, already mentioned, to Chronicles. The omission of any quotations in the N.T. from Esther, the Song of Songs, and Ecclesiastes may be due, not to their absence from the canon, but to the fact that they supplied no suitable matter for such a purpose.

The frequent references to the "Scriptures" or the "Holy Scriptures" and similar phrases in the N.T. convey the impression that the writers are thinking not of isolated works but of a sacred national collection; yet it can be argued on cogent grounds that the N.T. does not necessarily imply a fixed canon. That this collection was the twenty-four books of the canonical Scriptures admits of little doubt. An unknown writer of the last decade of the first century A.D. speaks, according to the best manuscripts, of "the ninety-four books" (2 Esdras 1445-47); by these he appears to mean the twenty-four published books of the canon and seventy others which are separated from them, as not yet to be published. Lastly, the Jewish historian Josephus, who was born in 37 or 38 A.D., speaks of the twenty-two books of the Scriptures: the five books of Moses containing the Law and the earliest traditions from the creation of the world till the death of the law-giver; thirteen books of the prophets who followed him till the death of Ahasuerus; and four documents comprising hymns and practical precepts. Thus, while recognizing the same canon, he does not follow the threefold division of it found in Hebrew tradition.

The five books of Moses are the Pentateuch; the thirteen Prophets are probably Joshua, Judges and Ruth, Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, Ezra and Nehemiah, Esther, Job, Daniel, Isaiah, Jeremiah and Lamentations, Ezekiel, the Twelve Prophets; the four volumes of hymns and precepts are probably Psalms, Song of Songs, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes. It seems preferable thus to count Ruth and Lamentations with Judges and Jeremiah respectively than to place them in the last group and omit altogether the Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes, on the grounds that they had not yet become canonical (Grätz); for such a theory is unsupported by subsequent lists.

It may be concluded, therefore, that the canon of the "Writings" had been determined by the time of Josephus. No attempt, however, to read them in the synagogue was made till a much later age, although they might have been used there for purposes of exposition. That twenty-four was regarded as the canonical number is shown by the use of the term the "Four and Twenty Books" (beside "the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings," the "Holy Writings," or even the "Writings" alone) by the later Jews as the usual designation of the O.T. Moreover, between the beginning of the first century B.C. and the end of the first century A.D. external wars and internal dissensions, both political and religious, make it unlikely that anything new was added to the canon, even though no formal act of ratification ever took place. It is, therefore, in the highest degree unlikely that any of the apocryphal books were ever included in the Hebrew Scriptures, so that the addition of the Epistle of Jeremiah and presumably of the Book of Baruch to it in Origen's canon can hardly be accepted as authoritative; even more improbable is the modern suggestion that Ecclesiasticus once found a place within the canon (Cheyne). Although, indeed, attempts may have been made to introduce 1 Maccabees and Ecclesiasticus into it, there seems to have been no real approach to success in either case; both were modern and both lacked the stamp of originality.

Final Ratification of the Canon. There remains, finally, the question whether the canon was ever formally ratified by the Jewish authorities. In answer to this it may at once be said that there is no scrap of evidence in support of the conjecture that its limits were finally fixed at an assembly in 66 A.D. (Grätz), and that nothing more substantial than a vague tradition underlies the theory that it was settled by the Pharisees soon after 70 A.D. (Wellhausen). Now, the polemic of the author of the Wisdom of Solomon, of which the date is still a matter of dispute, against the teaching of Ecclesiastes (Wisdom 21-22) contains the first hint that doubts were felt about certain books on the grounds of their contents. The Mishnâh, which had been current orally for some time before it was committed to writing at the end of the second century A.D., bears later witness to feelings of uncertainty about several books—notably Ezekiel, Jonah, Proverbs, Song of Songs and Esther; but the reasons concern neither the date nor the authorship of any given work, but rest for the most part on points of trivial importance in the interpretation of the text. There is some evidence that many of these points were discussed and settled in the schools at Jamnia (Hebrew Yabneh), a Jewish seat of learning near Jaffa. Here, it is recorded, there was held a council in 90 or 91 A.D., followed possibly by another in 118 A.D., at which a number of problems, principally of a practical nature, were discussed and settled. One or the other of these meetings, therefore, has been held to be the official occasion on which the Jewish authorities finally fixed the limits of the canon. The fact, however, is that the evidence for connecting the actual settling of the canon with either of these meetings is very slight. All that is definitely known, apparently, is that one Ben 'Azzai seems to state that the canonicity of the Song of Songs and of Ecclesiastes was decided by a Sanhedrin at Jamnia on the day on which Rabbân Gamaliel (a son of that doctor of the law named Gamaliel, at whose feet Paul was brought up) was deposed from the presidency. But, since problems of great practical importance are known to have been settled on the same day, it is difficult to see how there could then have been time for the discussion of vexed questions connected with the canon; further, although some of these difficulties were resolved at one or other of these meetings at Jamnia, others, especially those concerning Esther, Song of Songs, and Ecclesiastes, lingered on into the third century A.D. There is, therefore, reason seriously to doubt the view that the canon was finally settled at Jamnia.

The most that can be safely affirmed is that all the books eventually included in the canon had probably met with some sort of recognition, even if they had not already come to be regarded as canonical, by the end of the second century B.C.; consequently, the doubts about these works concern the revision of a canon already fixed rather than the admission to it of books about which there had been hitherto little more than a fairly general agreement. There are, indeed, no sure indications of the close of the canon at any time during the last century B.C. or the first century A.D. No portion of the O.T., therefore, it may be concluded, was ever formally canonized by any judicial or ecclesiastical authority; but the various books gradually made their way to universal acceptance in the synagogue, just as those of the N.T. came to be accepted in the church. In the disputes on the part of individuals or schools the process of canonization may be seen in operation. The formation of the canon was a work of unconscious selection, spread over a period of two or three centuries, not a deliberate act of judicial or ecclesiastical authority carried out on any single day. The intrinsic worth of the books so selected under divine guidance alone caused them to be recognized as authoritative Scriptures and needed no human agency to insure their veneration.

Literature: Briggs, General Introduction to the Study of Holy Scripture; Buhl, Canon and Text of the O.T.; Budde, Encyclopedia Biblica, article, "Canon of the O.T."; Green, General Introduction to the O.T.—The Canon; Ryle, The Canon of the O.T.; Woods, Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible, article, "Canon"; Wildeboer, Die Entstehung des alttestamentlichen Kanons.

THE TRANSMISSION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

BY PROFESSOR IRA M. PRICE

I. THE LANGUAGES

Hebrew and Aramaic. The O.T. is written for the most part in a language which we call "Hebrew," though the term is not used in the book itself. The ancient Hebrews are said to have spoken "the Jewish language" (2 Kings 18²⁶, 28). Isaiah designates it as "the language of Canaan" (Isa. 19¹⁸). In addition to the parts written in Hebrew, the O.T. contains smaller portions and fragments in another tongue, now named "Aramaic," formerly, "Chaldee." This for some centuries had been the language of northern Syria, western Mesopotamia, and southeastern Asia Minor, and was familiar to the educated and "traveled" officials in Isaiah's day, as seen from the narrative of the conference cited above. The portions of the O.T. written in Aramaic are Jer. 10¹¹ Dan. 24-728 Ezra 48-618 712-26; Aramaic words occur now and then throughout the O.T. (e.g., Gen. 31⁴⁷), and are sometimes explained by an accompanying Hebrew word.

Besides Hebrew and Aramaic the O.T. contains isolated words in other languages, such as Egyptian: abrech, probably, "bow the knee," and Zaphenath-paneah, "Revealer of secrets" (Gen. 41⁴³, 45); Amorite and Sidonian: Senir and Sirion, respectively (Deut. 39); Daniel gives the Greek names of several instruments of music, and Esther contains some Persian terms. Officers of other nationalities than Hebrew usually carry their native titles when mentioned in the O.T. Several Babylonian and Sumerian words have also been recognized in recent years.

Semitic Languages. Hebrew and Aramaic belong to the Semitic family of languages, which is broken up into the north, middle, and south divisions. In the north division we find Assyrian (and Babylonian), Aramaic and Syriac; in the middle zone, Hebrew and Phœnician; in the south, Arabic, Ethiopic, and Amharic. Closely related to the Hebrew are the kindred tongues of the Moabites, Ammonites and Edomites, as also those of the Phœnicians, Canaanites and Amorites.

Peculiarities of Hebrew. Since Hebrew is a Semitic language it possesses the characteristics of that group of languages. All these languages resemble each other in the possession of a trilateral stem of verbal roots, the general structure of the verb system, likeness in methods of noun formation, the use of few particles, the lack of compounds, and the general use of prefixes and suffixes, instead of independent pronouns as in the Indo-European languages.

Hebrew also has another rather interesting peculiarity, namely, the absence of tenses in the strict sense of that term. The Hebrews looked upon acts simply as finished or unfinished, complete or incomplete, without any regard to time. The speaker or writer in imagination transported himself into the past, present, or future whence he viewed the actions taking place as complete or incomplete; and it is not always easy for the modern interpreter to put himself in the place of the ancient writer.

The Writing of Hebrew. The primitive form of Hebrew writing is known only from a few inscriptions of varying length belonging chiefly to the period of the dual monarchies. Mesha, king of Moab, set up about 850 B.C. the so-called "Moabite Stone," to celebrate his relief from the oppression of Omri and Ahab. This well-known monument found in 1868 on Moabite soil is written in a script practically identical with that of the original O.T. "The Hebrew-Inscribed Tablet of Gezer" carries seven lines of inscription of a slightly later form than that of the Mesha stone.

The Siloam inscription found in the mouth of the aqueduct leading into the pool of Siloam dates probably from the time of Hezekiah and preserves for us a still later form of the script. Some seals and a large number of potsherds found at Samaria by the Harvard excavations preserve proper names and other words in the primitive script of the same period. Phœnician inscriptions, few in number, also help to establish the character of the Hebrew alphabet current in the centuries of the monarchies.

Some time after the adoption of the Penta-teuch by the Samaritan community, in the fourth or third century, B.C., appears gradually the change of the old Hebrew script into the square characters found in the MSS. and printed editions of the Hebrew Bible. The oldest inscription in square characters dates from 176 B.C., and was found in a cave near Heshbon.

The Hebrew language used by the O.T. writers had only twenty-two letters—all consonants; some of these can scarcely be represented by our English letters, or spoken by our vocal organs. In this respect again Hebrew is similar to Phœnician, to Moabite as it appears on the Mesha stone, and to ancient Arabic and Syriac. The pronunciation of such vowelless Hebrew words presented grave difficulties to the reader, since there are many words whose intended meaning could be radically changed by altering the vowels between consonants, without disturbing the latter in the least. Even in English we can appreciate the hazard in pronunciation involved in this system of writing; e.g., b(a)d, b(e)d, b(i)d, b(u)d, l(a)g, l(e)g, l(o)g, l(u)g. In the course of the ages the pronunciation of Hebrew began to slip away from the Jews; hence they took steps to hold it. Somewhere about the sixth or seventh century A.D., no one knows exactly when, the learned rabbis—the Massoretes—invented an ingenious and elaborate vowel system to preserve the traditional pronunciation of the Hebrew of the O.T. These vowel points were written not between but under, in, and over the hitherto vowelless consonants.

We now depend for our pronunciation of Hebrew on the Massoretic system of vowels, the transliterated Hebrew words in the Greek versions, and the names and words found in the cuneiform texts of Assyria and Babylonia. The Massoretic pointing naturally reflects the interpretation put upon the text by the inventors of the vowel system, which in some instances cannot be accepted as correct.

Changes in the Old Testament Languages. The Hebrew language occupied a place all its own in the history of Israel. While developed contiguous to other peoples and languages, it maintained a purity quite marvelous. Outside races, however, gradually edged their way into Israel's life, language, customs, and religion. The classical period of Hebrew writing, from the eighth to the fifth century B.C., gave way before the impact of the Aramaic sweep to the south. The later books of the O.T. are dotted with Aramaisms in vocabulary and syntax, revealing the weakness of the old defenses against the encroachments of foreign influences. These intrusions leave their precipitates in the Aramaic sections of Ezra and Daniel noted above, as well as in the general style of the post-exilic literature. The difference between the style of Kings and Chronicles is exactly the difference between the best type of literature of the classical period and the loose, less explicit style of the post-exilic era. When we think of the thousand years over which the languages of the O.T. stretched, we marvel at the comparatively few changes which appeared in that long period of time.

II. THE TEXT

Early Oral Transmission. The Hebrew O.T. contains many primitive stories, fragments of poetry, everyday proverbs, and naïve expressions, which were carried down through generations by word of mouth. It is not improbable that the substance of the earlier books was transmitted for some time in the same manner. True, documents have been found in Babylonia and Egypt dating from long centuries before Abraham migrated from Ur of the Chaldees; but no mention is made of any writing by the patriarchs or anyone else in the book of Genesis. Moses doubtless learned in Egypt how to write, and several definite statements are made in the Pentateuch regarding that ability; and writing is presupposed in the last four books of the Pentateuch.

On the other hand, when we look for samples of the oldest Hebrew or Canaanitish writing we do not get far beyond about 1,000 B.C. In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries B.C., the written language of Syria-Canaan was the cuneiform of Babylonia, as may be seen in the Tel-el-Amarna tablets, most of which represent letters from Syria and Palestine addressed to the kings of Egypt. Is it not reasonable to suppose that Babylonian was used probably because Canaan had no written language of its own at that date? If so, it may well be that Israel's earliest historical narratives, stories, legends, traditions, and scraps of poetry were transmitted orally down to about the year 1,000 B.C. Soon after that date, some of these materials, especially the poetry, groups of laws, and dramatic or tragic events, may have been put into writing; and these small beginnings mark the first steps in the composition of the O.T.

Earliest Writings Quoted. The writers of the books of the O.T. availed themselves of whatever sources were to be found. They used written documents at hand, oral transmissions found among their friends, personal experiences, anything their judgment approved. The first source book mentioned by an O.T. writer is "the book of the Wars of Jehovah," out of which the writer copied a snatch of poetry (Num. 21¹⁴); another early book quoted is "the book of Jashar," which the writer gives as his source for the poem describing the sun standing still (Josh. 10¹³); it is also given as the source of David's lament over Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. 1¹⁸).

In addition to these incidental books called by name, the writers of the earlier books of the O.T. employed some anonymous documents, two of them now named by scholars the "Judean" (J), assigned to the early period of the dual monarchy, and the Ephraimitic (E), placed in the early eighth century (for the meaning of these symbols see art., Pentateuch, p. 137a). These documents may be traced by their style, vocabulary, theme and purpose through the Pentateuch and Joshua and, according to some, also through Samuel and Kings. Next came the prophets of the Assyrian period, Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, and Micah, followed by the seventh-century prophets and Deuteronomy.

Writers of the Old Testament. Who wrote the books of the O.T.? There is an occasional reference to writing, to secretaries, and to scribes. The Song of Deborah speaks of "the staff of the scribe" (Judg. 5¹⁴, mg.). During the dual monarchy court officials, prophets, and kings are said to have recorded the events, decrees, and wisdom of their day. Samuel (1 Sam. 10²⁵), David (2 Sam. 11¹⁴), Nathan the prophet, Gad the seer (1 Chr. 29²⁹), and many others are said to have made records in writing. Immediately before, during, and after the Exile there were many who were able not only to record events, but also to compile history, arrange prophecies, and to select songs and psalms for the use of their own day and of succeeding generations.

The Hazards of Destruction. Every document written on papyrus or skin was always in danger of being lost or destroyed. To preserve it and to increase its usefulness it was laboriously copied by hand, time and time again. For convenience in handling the sheets were made into rolls. The ravages of war always endangered such perishable materials. There were a few events which threatened the very life of the precious Hebrew rolls. The first was the destruction of Jerusalem and its temple by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 B.C., although Ezekiel may have taken with him to Babylon, in 597 B.C., some parts of the O.T. When Antiochus Epiphanes (167 B.C.) issued a decree that all copies of the law should be destroyed (1 Macc. 15^{6, 57}), his order did not include Babylonia, where Ezekiel and Ezra had been active during earlier centuries as teachers of their people, and where copies of O.T. books must have been extant, but many Palestinian copies undoubtedly disappeared forever during this crisis. (In Egypt also there must have been copies which served as the basis of the LXX translation.) The destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, in 70 A.D., also endangered the life of the O.T., which by that time was practically as extensive as it is now—for the Babylonian Talmud says that Titus destroyed copies of the law. In these perils probably many copies of the O.T. as well as the sources from which some of the books were compiled perished. Of books or rolls mentioned or quoted in various parts of the O.T. twenty-four have not survived.

The Hazards of Corruption. The plain unpointed text (see below, section on "Oldest MSS.") of the earliest copies of the O.T. were written in the script of the Moabite Stone. On this stone and in the Siloam inscription the words are separated by a small dot. The same dot is found between words in the Samaritan Pentateuch. When the square characters (the characters found in the printed Hebrew Bibles) were adopted this dot seems to have fallen out. This has resulted in some cases in the contraction of two adjacent words into one; in others, in the division of consonants intended to form one word, so that they appear as two.

The multiplication of copies of books by the pen of man created the possibility of errors. (If this is not self-evident, try to make an exact copy of ten pages of any written or printed document, and see how many simple and aggravating errors you will make.) To add to the hazards of error we must remember that the MSS. had neither verse, chapter, nor clearly marked paragraph divisions. Even the psalms were not separated, as we learn from the disagreement in the numberings in the Hebrew Bible as compared with the LXX. Thus, the copyist had both a difficult and a precarious task before him.

Origin of Variations in the Text. Copyists appear to have made two kinds of errors—intentional and unintentional. Intentional changes may be attributed to a desire (1) to correct some manifest error in statement, or a slip of a preceding copyist; (2) to use a euphemistic word or phrase in place of a coarse or indelicate one found in the text, this latter being usually consigned to the margin; and (3) to bring a statement into harmony with the theological ideas of the copyist or his age.

But the largest number of variations may be classed as unintentional. Scholars have practically agreed on a reasonable classification of these and of the sources from which they have come as follows:

(1) Failure to see the true sense of a passage has led to incorrect division of groups of consonants; as in Psa. 73⁴, "For there are no pangs (mg.) in their death; but their strength is firm." By dividing the word translated "in their death," we may translate, "For they have no pangs; sound and firm is their strength"—a sense that suits both context and parallelism.

(2) Errors chargeable to the eye: (a) Repetitions: in Lev. 20¹⁰, omit the five words repeated; 1 Chr. 9³⁵⁻⁴⁴ has been repeated from 1 Chr. 8²⁹⁻³⁸. (b) Omissions: Prov. 10^{10b}, "He that rebuketh boldly is a peacemaker" (LXX). (c) Transposition of letters or words: 2 Chr. 3⁴ says the porch of the temple was one hundred twenty cubits high; the LXX reads twenty cubits, and the Hebrew by a simple transposition of two letters and two words may be made to read twenty cubits, which is doubtless correct. Many cases are found where the copyist took one letter for another; for instance, "Nebuchadrezzar," the only correct reading, often appears as "Nebuchadnezzar," due to the mistaking of a Hebrew n (נ) for an r (ר). The same kind of error is seen in "Hadarezzer," read for "Hadadezer," mistaking the Hebrew d (ד) for an r (ר).

(3) Errors chargeable to the ear: When a person read aloud to a copyist, the latter might easily write one Hebrew word for another of almost or exactly the same sound. A good example appears in Psa. 100³, where "and not we ourselves" (A.V.), should be read "and we are his" (R.V.).

(4) Errors of memory: A copyist might carry in his mind the thought rather than the exact words of what he was copying. He might in this case use a synonym or nearly such in place of the word found in the original. Jer. 27¹ contains "Jehoiakim," where the context (v. 3) requires "Zedekiah" (cf. mg.).

(5) Errors chargeable to carelessness or ignorance: This is a numerous class. In 1 Sam. 13¹ we find: "Saul was — years old when he began to reign"; some copyist neglected to write the number; 1 Sam. 12¹¹ reads "Bedan" where the Versions and the original in Judg. 4 has "Barak."

These classes of errors were copied from MS. to MS., together with new ones made by each succeeding scribe, until the whole text was finally put into printed copies in the fifteenth century. As a check on the continuous multiplication of errors the scribes counted the verses (even though they were not yet formally numbered), and even the letters in the different books, making note of the middle verse, the middle word, and the middle letter of each book. These numbers are found at the end of each book of our Hebrew Bible to-day. The middle verse of the Pentateuch is Lev. 8⁷; of Joshua it is 13²⁶. The middle verse of the Hebrew O.T. is Jer. 6⁷. When a scribe had finished his work his count must tally with the established numbers; if it failed in this, he was required either to correct his copy or to discard it. But even with such care errors crept in.

III. HEBREW MANUSCRIPTS AND PRINTED EDITIONS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

Oldest Manuscripts. Hebrew MSS. of the O.T. are comparatively modern. The oldest one dated is of the Prophets, now in Petrograd (= Leningrad), which bears a date equivalent to 916 A.D.; it consists of two hundred and twenty-five folios, each of two columns of twenty-one lines, and contains Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and The Twelve. Ginsburg located in the British Museum a MS. of the Pentateuch (Orient. No. 4445), which he is inclined to date "at least half a century earlier." This has one hundred and eighty-six folios, fifty-five of which were added in 1540 A.D. Every page carries three columns of twenty-one lines each, the Massorah magna occupying the space above and below the columns, and the Massorah parva the space on the side margins (see paragraph below on "Massorah").

The oldest MS. of the entire O.T. is one of the famous Firkowitsch collection, dated 1010 A.D., though the correctness of this date is doubted by some investigators. There are very few MSS. of the whole O.T.; though fragmentary MSS. are numerous—about 1700.

Resemblance of All Manuscripts. Why do all existing Hebrew MSS. so closely resemble each other? Scholars have concluded that long before the invention of the Massoretic system of vowels, Hebrew MSS. were reduced to one type; every subsequent copy being made to conform to that model. Divergent MSS. soon disappeared from usage or were deliberately destroyed. This standard text is called the text of the Sopherim, i.e., of the scribes. The fixing of the official text followed soon after the final decision regarding the contents of the O.T. canon (cf art., The Formation of the O.T. pp. 97-8), i.e., in the second century A.D. At about the same time even the text came to be regarded as sacred; hence greater care was exercised in the copying of it; which accounts for the presence of so few variants. Another protecting factor was the introduction of the vowel points, which by fixing permanently the pronunciation helped to stabilize the text itself.

The Massorah. The Massorah ("Tradition") consists of the notes written on the margins of codices by the Tiberian scribes (Tiberias became a center of Jewish learning after the fall of Jerusalem) during the centuries between the reduction of the texts to a single type and the date of the oldest known MSS. These notes take into account peculiar and abnormal words, letters, spelling, pronunciation, vocalization, with such mechanical notations as the number of letters, words, sentences in each document. They also noted supposed errors in reading, and on the margin put what they conceived to be the correct form. In short, the margin of all codices became a kind of running commentary on all items in the text that required special attention.

Printed Editions of the Hebrew Bible. The first complete edition of the Hebrew O.T. based on the Tiberian system of vowel points (the scholars in the Babylonian centers of Judaism used a different system) appeared at Soncino in 1488 A.D. It next appeared at Naples in 1491-93. The third edition—the Brescia Bible—was issued in 1494, the text later used by Luther. A fourth edition came out at Pesaro in 1511-17. These four editions appeared under Jewish authorship, and were based on a direct collation of MSS. which gave them a text-critical value. The chief rabbinic Bible issued in those early years of printing was edited by Jacob ben Chayyim, and published by Daniel Bomberg at Venice 1524-25 in four folio volumes. It represented the standard text of the Tiberian school and has become the "Textus Receptus" of the Hebrew Bible for modern times.

The first edition of the Hebrew Bible to be printed under Christian influence and authority is found in the so-called Complutensian Polyglot; which carries in parallel columns the Hebrew text, the LXX, the Vulgate, and the Aramaic paraphrase (or Targum of Onkelos) of the Pentateuch. It was edited by Cardinal Ximenes and printed at the University founded by him at Alcalá (Latin, Complutum), Spain, 1514-17 A.D. The critical value of this first polyglot is slight. Since then many new editions have been printed, some of them based on patient study and investigation; until the printed Bibles now in circulation furnish the best available reproduction of the Massoretic text. The Hebrew Bible to-day is divided into chapters and verses. The former are based on the Vulgate, in which they were introduced in the thirteenth century; the work is credited to several notable scholars, but none of the traditions can be verified. The first Hebrew text, published by itself, to insert chapter numbers appeared in 1573-74; though they are found in the Complutensian Polyglot published half a century earlier.

Collections of Variants. The immediate result of the printing of so many editions of the Hebrew Bible, based on the readings of many MSS., was uncertainty and confusion as to the true readings of the original text. The solution of this problem was found in collecting and comparing these variants, and culling from them what in the light of all the evidence might be accepted as the most probable reading. Passing over earlier efforts of this kind, mention should be made of the first great collector and publisher of these variants, namely, Kennicott, an Englishman, who collected and published, in 1776-80, in two folio volumes the variant readings of 694 MSS. and of a great number of editions. A little later De Rossi, professor at Parma, Italy, collected the variants of 732 MSS. and 310 editions, of which Kennicott had seen only 80. In 1784-88 he published four volumes in quarto, and in 1798 a supplemental volume. These two scholars together compared 1,346 different Hebrew MSS. and 342 reported editions, or a total of 1,688 different texts. The real and conclusive outcome of this tremendous task was the establishment of the fact that the basal Hebrew text of all the examined MSS. was practically one and the same, namely, the official text fixed during the second or third century A.D.

IV. THE VERSIONS

The Samaritan Pentateuch. This text of the Pentateuch is not a translation of the original Hebrew, and hence cannot be called a version. It is, rather, an independent Hebrew text, written in the Hebrew characters extant before the adoption of the square letters. Its chief value is found in its independent transmissions of the Hebrew text from the time of the Samaritan schism, about 400 B.C. Its variations from the Massoretic text have been carefully collated and amount in all to about 6,000 items, only about 1,000 of which, however, have any significance in textual work. Some of these variants, however, are so important that no commentator on the pentateuchal books can afford to disregard them, and no textual critic would venture to omit them. The oldest MS. of the Samaritan Pentateuch is not thought to be older than the tenth century A.D., though the claims of the Samaritans at Nablous, the only extant colony of Samaritans, reach back to the conquest of Canaan.

The Greek Bible: The Septuagint (LXX). The founding and growth of Alexandria, subsequently to the conquest of the Near East by Alexander the Great, the settlement there of a large Jewish colony and the smothering effect on the Jews of the Greek language, religion and culture, created a demand for a translation of the Jewish sacred writings into Greek. The Jews, with the co-operation of Ptolemy Philadelphus (285-247 B.C.), undertook the task of at least beginning a translation of the Hebrew Bible. The books were translated at different times by men unequally prepared for the task, the whole process extending over a period of approximately two hundred years, from about 250 to about 50 B.C.

The translation of the Law was in the nature of an official translation, and was made with considerable care. In the other portions the translators took some liberties with the text itself and with the arrangement of the material; e.g., after Jer. 25¹³ they inserted chs. 46-51 rearranged in an order to suit their own opinions; the Hebrew order is resumed beginning with 25¹⁵. Most of the liberties taken with the Hebrew text may be explained by the purpose which the translators had in view. The plan was so to present the Hebrew Bible in Greek dress as to make it acceptable to the Greek-speaking Jews of that day. For this end fidelity to sense was emphasized rather than a stiff literal rendering of the original; hence the translators felt free to make slight changes or additions to round out the sentences or to reproduce figurative expressions by more easily understood words.

Moreover, due perhaps to pressure exerted by the more liberally minded Jews of Alexandria, the translators added to the collection a number of books not recognized as sacred by the Palestinian Jews (see art., Intertestamental Literature, p. 187, and art., Formation of the O.T., pp. 97-8).

Although the oldest Hebrew MS. dates from the tenth century, there are numerous earlier Greek MSS. of the LXX. The earliest and most important of these are: (1) The oldest and most complete (covering the whole Bible), is the Codex Vaticanus ("B" in catalogues), in the Vatican library in Rome—of the fourth century; (2) the next in value is Codex Alexandrinus ("A" in catalogues) in the British Museum—of the first half of the fifth century; (3) Codex Sinaiticus ("S"), as old as "B" but fragmentary, in Petrograd or Leningrad; (4) Codex Ephræmi ("C") of the fifth century, a palimpsest, in Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris. (See art., Transmission of the N.T., p. 862.)

The first printed copy of the LXX appeared in the Complutensian Polyglot. Swete's three volume edition (1887-94) of the LXX has been standard since its appearance, though the new Cambridge edition by Brooke and McLean records a much larger amount of material for critical study.

Rival Greek Bibles. The adoption of the LXX by the Christians of the first century prejudiced its value for the Jews of that age. Several rivals appeared, each claiming to be the most accurate rendering of the Hebrew. (1) The first response to a call for a new translation was made by Aquila, a proselyte to Judaism in Pontus, Asia Minor, about the middle of the second century. His translation is known to have been in use in 177 A.D. To satisfy the demand for an absolutely accurate translation he made his renderings slavishly literal, trying to translate every word and particle, regardless of sense, the requirements of the Greek language, or the expression of clear thought. Nevertheless, the translation of Aquila became the official Jewish Greek version of the O.T.

(2) The Christians of the second century resented such a rival translation; and a new translator, an Ebionite Christian of Pontus, or of Ephesus, bearing the name Theodotion, came to the front. His translation appeared about 180-192 A.D. in the reign of Commodus. Though based on the Hebrew text, it is in reality a revision of the LXX, showing many improvements over the original LXX, and expressing itself in much more correct and idiomatic Greek. The work was so well done that its Daniel has displaced the original LXX translation of that book in the extant Greek version; Theodotion also filled up the gaps in the LXX text of Job.

(3) The third great Greek translator was Symmachus, an Ebionite. His activity falls in the reign of Severus (193-211 A.D.). His version displays remarkable fidelity to the original Hebrew, uses clear and idiomatic Greek, and reveals keen appreciation of literary form. The excellence of the translation aroused the admiration of Jerome, who said of the three rivals: "Aquila translates word for word, Symmachus follows the sense, and Theodotion differs slightly from the LXX."

Origen and His Hexapla. The greatest biblical scholar of the early Christian centuries was Origen, born at Alexandria in 186 A.D., who laid the foundation of historical biblical study. When he entered upon his task he found the O.T. in Hebrew, the LXX, and the three versions mentioned in the preceding paragraph. As a result of somewhat close study he came to the conclusion that "every MS. differs from every other MS." He then conceived the idea of making a comparative study of the different versions and MSS., in order to find the one best MS. or version. To accomplish this, for himself and other biblical scholars, he planned a monumental work, called "The Hexapla" (i.e., the "sixfold" book), upon which he spent twenty-eight years of his life. In this he arranged in six parallel columns (1) the Hebrew text of the O.T., (2) the same Hebrew text in Greek letters, (3) the Greek translation of Aquila, (4) the Greek translation of Symmachus, (5) the LXX, with his own revision, (6) the Greek translation of Theodotion.

The purpose of the Hexapla was to make available a Greek text that would properly represent the original Hebrew. Origen's Hexapla has survived only in fragments here and there in works of ancient writers, or on the margins of MSS. The original MS. was seen in the library of Cæsarea at the beginning of the seventh century, where at an earlier time Jerome consulted it. Bishop Paul of Tella translated the fifth column, Origen's revision of the LXX, into Syriac, 617-618 A.D.

Origen's work, in turn, inspired three great scholars of the third century: (1) Eusebius of Cæsarea (260-340), (2) Lucian of Samosata (martyred 311), and (3) Hesychius in Egypt. These three furnished Greek revisions for all the east coast of the Mediterranean Sea, Eusebius for Palestine, Lucian for Asia Minor, and Hesychius for Egypt. These three revisions, however, never superseded the LXX; they give us, however, valuable critical material for approaching the original text of that version, and for determining the true reading of some difficult passages in the Hebrew O.T.

Latin Bibles: the Vulgate. While Greek was the prevailing language of the Christian Church down into the third century, the dominance of Rome gradually crowded it out of official use. Latin became so prevalent, especially in North Africa, that demands arose for the translation of the Bible into Latin. The earliest Latin translations are commonly called "Old Latin," the O.T. being a translation of the LXX, not of the original Hebrew. In course of time revisions were made on the basis of the best Greek texts available. At the request of Pope Damasus, Jerome, the most distinguished biblical scholar of that day, undertook one of these revisions—that of the Old Latin Psalter. His experience soon convinced him that he could accomplish better results by translating directly from Hebrew into Latin than by attempting a revision. A careful study of Hebrew under competent Jewish teachers, and a first-hand acquaintance with the topography of Palestine, gave him a background for the task. From about 390 to 404 he worked assiduously at Bethlehem and translated the entire O.T. from Hebrew into Latin. He also put into Latin the apocryphal sections of Daniel and Esther, and the apocryphal books of Tobit and Judith.

Jerome's translations were bitterly assailed on account of his elimination of well-worn words and phrases that appeared in the Old Latin; and he was so deeply affected by these criticisms that he died a broken-hearted man. During the next three centuries, however, the translation gradually gained recognition on the part of the church Fathers until it became the leader among the Latin versions of the O.T., a position which it has maintained to the present time. (See further on Latin Bibles, the Syriac Bible, and other Versions, art., Transmission of the N.T., pp. 864-5.)

V. TEXTUAL CRITICISM

The Problem. In the preceding discussion attention has been called, among other things, to the fact that following the establishment of the O.T. canon and the fixing of the official text considerable care was exercised in the transmission of this text. But there is no evidence of similar care during the period between the writing of the autographs and the final determination of the text and its pronunciation; on the contrary, there is much internal evidence to show that much liberty was taken with the text. True, Philo asserts that the Jews never altered a word written by Moses, and Josephus maintains that nothing was added to the text of Scripture or taken therefrom, but it has long been recognized that these, like other Jewish traditions, cannot be accepted at face value. There is, of course, little to support the charge that the Jews corrupted the text willfully, from dishonest and polemical motives; but when we consider the abundance of possible sources of alterations or errors it is readily seen that changes may have been introduced unintentionally or from motives not dishonest (see above on "Origin of Variations").

The belief that even the earliest Hebrew MSS. present a text which cannot be considered an exact reproduction of the autographs is based upon considerations like these: (1) The O.T. contains passages in which the Hebrew text as it stands cannot be translated without violence to the laws of grammar, or which are irreconcilable with the context or with older passages (e.g., 1 Sam. 13¹; cf. A.V. with R.V.). (2) Parallel passages found in more than one book differ in such a manner as to make it clear that the variations are due largely to textual corruption in the course of transmission (cf. 2 Sam. 22 with Ps. 18). (3) The ancient versions, some of which were made before the fixing of the official text, contain various readings which often bear a strong stamp of probability and remove, or lessen, the difficulties of the Hebrew text (see in R.V. footnote to Ps. 22^{16c}).

Most of these changes from the original are due to accident; others, however, are in the nature of intentional alterations (see above). There seems to have been a time when the letter of the sacred books was thought of less importance than the spirit, when the words were not regarded as so sacred that to alter them would be sacrilege. If an expression seemed likely to cause misconception, or sounded irreverent, there was no hesitation about altering it; and even when the text as a whole was regarded as sacred, the early scribes believed that its sacredness would be preserved better by removing the offending expressions than by superstitious regard for the mere letter.

Considering all these facts it is vain to deny the existence of errors even in the oldest MSS. now in existence. To discover and, insofar as possible, to remove these errors is the task of the textual critic; for textual criticism may be defined as the effort to remove from a literary production all textual errors and blemishes and to restore the ipsissima verba of the author. In the case of the O.T. the problem is complicated by the fact that the available MSS. represent not the text of the autographs but a text fixed several centuries after the books were written. This means that the ordinary methods of textual criticism, the comparison of MSS., would take us not to the autographs themselves but to a text upon which the non-critical judgment of the scribes settled some time after the opening of the Christian era. Surely, the textual critic cannot be called too ambitious if he sets as his goal the restoration of the earliest reading attainable, which is the text of the autographs. The material on hand may not be sufficient to enable the critic to retrace the exact steps of transmission, and thus to remove the errors in the order in which they crept in; moreover, the restoration of the autograph text may never be more than approximate, the degree of approximation being determined by the amount of available evidence; nevertheless, to stop at a certain amount of correction when the material is not exhausted is to be unfaithful to an opportunity.

Method of Textual Criticism. How, then, may the original text of O.T. books, or at least an approximation to such text, be secured. For reasons already stated it cannot be done simply by a comparison of MSS., as in the case of the N.T. or of the classical writings. May we depend upon conjecture? Now, undoubtedly, conjectural emendation has its place; but it ought to be the last resort of the critic, to be employed only in cases of necessity. How easy it would be for the critic to impress upon his emendations the stamp of his own prejudices, to say what he thinks the author ought to have written rather than what he actually wrote! Surely, conjecture is a dangerous tool, an edged tool, with which, the proverb says, children and fools must not play. Many dark passages have, indeed, been illuminated by conjecture, but one cannot and must not depend upon it entirely or exclusively.

While Hebrew MSS. are of little value in attempting to restore the original text, and while conjectural emendation cannot always be relied upon, the critic has access to a valuable apparatus in certain recensions of the O.T. books which contain texts nearer in point of time to the autographs than the official text fixed in the second century A.D. These are the recensions preserved in the ancient translations, some of which were made earlier than the fixing of the official text, while others, though produced later, evidently had access to MSS. not affected by the official text. The four translations of greatest value for purposes of textual criticism have received attention in the section on "Versions" in this article cf. also art., Transmission of the N.T. (pp. 864-5). They are the Greek translation called the Septuagint (LXX), the Aramaic translation or translations known as the Targum or Targums, the Syriac translation commonly called the Peshitta, and the Latin translation of Jerome, the Vulgate. Other Greek translations made from the original Hebrew, those of Aquila, Theodotion and Symmachus, insofar as they are preserved, make valuable contributions. Some help is given by some ancient translations based chiefly on the LXX, but in the consultation of these the critic must always bear in mind that they are not derived directly from the Hebrew. Their chief value lies in the fact that they enable us to determine with greater accuracy the text of the LXX.

The use of the ancient versions for purposes of textual criticism is not without its difficulties: (1) Sometimes the text has not been transmitted in its original purity; the translations have suffered in transmission as much as has the original Hebrew text; (2) different parts of an ancient translation were translated by different men; some appear to be accurate and literal reproductions, while others give evidence of much freedom and even carelessness; at times it is not easy to determine the Hebrew text underlying the translation. Consequently, before using the translation for purposes of textual criticism the critic must reasonably assure himself that he possesses the translation in its original purity. Having done this, he must eliminate such variants as have the appearance of originating with the translators (some variants may be traced to difference in idiom; others to a desire to make rough places smooth; still others to certain theological tendencies of the age in which the translation was made). The remaining variations will be due to difference of text in the MS. or MSS. used by the translator or translators. These the critic must compare carefully with the text in the existing Hebrew MSS., in order to determine on which side the superiority lies. For many years scholars have labored on this difficult and somewhat tedious task and as a result of these patient and painstaking labors we are to-day in possession of a text of the Hebrew Bible that is far superior to the text embodied in the Hebrew MSS. or in the printed editions of the Hebrew Bible.

The Essential Trustworthiness of the Transmitted Text. The foregoing discussion reveals the fact that it is not possible to trace with absolute accuracy the successive stages in the transmission of the O.T. Evidently the earlier copyists were not as painstaking as were those of the period following the fixing of the official text. As a result not only have accidental changes crept into the text, but even intentional alterations were made. But while the presence of errors and intentional changes must be recognized, the biblical student should not feel unduly disturbed by the uncertainties and obscurities presented in the available MSS. (1) Numerous as are the deviations from the original, they are not more so than might be expected in a book that was handed down by copyists for so many centuries. (2) The changes from the text of the autographs do not affect the fundamental thought or teaching of the O.T. books; the reader may rest content that by studying the text reproduced in the English translations he gets close to the heart of the biblical message. (3) The task of the textual critic is not an easy one. But as a result of the patient labors of experts we have to-day a much more accurate Hebrew text than was available for any preceding generation. And we may turn to the study of this text in the full assurance that if we use the right method in the right spirit we may come to understand and appreciate the words written by holy men of God, as they were moved by the Holy Spirit.

Literature: Buhl, Canon and Text of the O.T.; Geden, Outlines of an Introduction to the Hebrew Bible; Green, General Introduction to the O.T.—the Text; Kenyon, Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts; Price, The Ancestry of our English Bible; Weir, A Short History of the Hebrew Text of the O.T.

THE CHRONOLOGY OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

BY PROFESSOR ELMER A. LESLIE

The limits of space for this discussion demand that we restrict ourselves to results rather than to processes, for few subjects bristle with more difficulties than does this. For a compact and discriminating statement of the processes by which these results are obtained consult The Cambridge Ancient History, vol. i, ch. 4.

The Assyrian inscriptions furnish the following fixed dates:

854 B.C. The Battle at Qarqar or Karkar (Ahab participating).

842 B.C. Jehu's tribute to Shalmaneser III.

738 B.C. Menahem of Israel tributary to Assyria.

734 B.C. The Syro-Ephraimitic War.

722 B.C. The Fall of Samaria.

701 B.C. The Invasion of Judah by Sennacherib.

These form fixed points from which the chronologically less reliable biblical data may be approached.

This article presents: (1) The significant events in Hebrew history in chronological order, following a fair degree of consensus of scholarly opinion. (2) A synchronizing of Hebrew history with that of contemporary related peoples. (3) The various portions of the O.T. literature dated approximately and connected chronologically with the era from which they come.

Semitic Origins. The cradle and spreading center of the various Semitic peoples was the vast Arabian Desert in Western Asia, which is regarded by some scholars also as the original Semitic home. From this as a center in periodic migrations, layer after layer of Semites have deposited themselves in Egypt, Mesopotamia, Syria, and Palestine.

(1) In prehistoric times, in an epoch that lies beyond the remotest horizon of history, Semites entered the Nile Valley and mingled with the population already there, impressing their language upon the region.

(2) The first migration of historic times is the Akkadian, which began in the 5th or 4th millennium B.C. (Kraeling). These Semites migrated into the Tigris-Euphrates Valley and drove out and assimilated the Sumerians, taking over their cuneiform script. They became the peaceful Babylonians, and later the military Assyrians who sprang from them (becoming independent before 1400 B.C.).

(3) Probably in the third millennium B.C. the Hittites (non-Semites, Khatti, Kheta, Heth—earliest written record from annals of Babylonian king Samsu-ditana, whose reign ended 1924 B.C., according to Barton) established kingdoms at Mitanni, Boghaz Keni, Carchemish, Hamath, and elsewhere. For a time they ruled Babylon.

(4) About 3000–2500 B.C. came the Amorites (possibly so called from the Babylonian city, Amurru). Driving out the non-Semitic cave-dwellers of Palestine and strengthened by later forces, they set up the first dynasty of Babylon (2210–1924 B.C.), thus ending the period of Babylonian city kingdoms (Ur, Erech, Lagash, Nippur, Agade). Hammurabi, the greatest king of this dynasty (2130–2088 B.C., so Ungnad) gave to Babylonia the famous Hammurabi code of laws with which later Hebrew law has points of contact. If the Amraphel of Gen. 14⁹ is to be identified with Hammurabi, Abraham would be a contemporary of Hammurabi. But this identification is precarious.

(5) Between 1800 and 1750 B.C. the non-Semitic Kassites from the region east of the Tigris invaded Babylonia and founded the third Babylonian dynasty.

(6) Contemporary with them came the Canaanite migration. They settled chiefly along the Mediterranean and in the region east of the Jordan.

(7) In the early 17th century B.C. came the Aramaean migration into Mesopotamia. Out of this was to come later the vigorous Aram. Probably the biblical narrative of Terah's journey from Ur-Kasdim (Gen. 11) reflects this migration. Cf. Amos 97, Kir = Uru (Sumerian); thus Amos 97 supports Gen. 11³¹ (Kraeling).

(8) In 1680 B.C., the Hyksos, "the shepherd kings," probably Semites, secured control of Egypt.

(9) The middle of the 17th century B.C., when Egypt was occupied by the Hyksos, is the most suitable time for the Aramaean migration of the Hebrews, under Abraham, which brought to Palestine ancestors of the Israelites, Ammonites, and Moabites.

(10) These settlers were re-enforced by another Aramæan branch later in the seventeenth century B.C. This is reflected in the Jacob narratives. This included the Edomites.

(11) While the Hyksos were still on the throne of Egypt (so Breasted) in the late years of their rule, the Rachel tribes migrated to Goshen, as is reflected in the Joseph stories.

(12) The Aramæan migrations reflected in the narratives of Terah, Abraham, and Jacob are forerunners (C. Noyes) of the Habiru, Semites who invaded Palestine in the 14th century when Egypt's control had weakened. (Cf. Tel-el-Amarna tablets; see p. 251b).

Israel in Egypt. Israelite tribes were in Goshen, on the eastern border of Egypt, probably during the brilliant 18th and 19th dynasties. The important kings and achievements of this period follow:

Ahmose I, 1580-1557 B.C., expelled the Hyksos.

Thutmose III, 1501-1447 B.C., conquered and compactly organized Palestine, Phœnicia and Syria into an empire. Jacob-el and Joseph-el appear in his geographical lists as Palestinian place names.

Amenhotep III, 1411-1375 B.C. Under him the power of Egypt was at its height.

Amenhotep IV (Ikhnaton) 1375-1358 B.C. Under Ikhnaton and his predecessor the Tel-el-Amarna correspondence took place. He was a brilliant idealist who attempted a monotheistic (pantheistic) reform. Breasted calls him the first individual and the first idealist of the world.

Rameses II, 1292-1225 B.C. The Pharaoh of the oppression. He built Ramses and Pithom (Ex. 111). In 1272 B.C., he made a formal treaty with the Hittites. Cf. Cambridge Ancient History, vol. ii, pp. 149f.

Merneptah, 1225-1215 B.C. The Pharaoh of the Exodus. In 1223 B.C. he quelled the revolt of Asia against him and engraved upon a granite stela a hymn of victory in which occurs the name "Israel" as the name of a people. Until recently it was the only known place outside the O.T. where the name Israel occurred. It has been shown by Scheil, however, that the name occurs as a personal name, "Israel, son of Rishzuni," on a Babylonian seal cylinder from before 2600 B.C. (Cf. Barton, Archæology and the Bible, p. 326). The name in the Merneptah inscription is, however, the first extrabiblical appearance of "Israel" as the name of a people. It proves that only a part of Israel sojourned in Egypt. The Exodus under Moses occurred about 1220 B.C.

Table of Dates. The following tables connect the O.T. literature with important contemporary events. The dates are all B.C. A comparison, however, with dates suggested in the commentaries in the present volume on the historical books and on the prophets will show that on some of these dates there is still a difference of scholarly opinion.

First Period: 1200-1013 B.C.

ISRAEL (BEFORE THE DIVISION), THROUGH THE REIGN OF SAUL

1200-1028 Period of Invasion and Conquest.

1150 Battle of Barak against Canaanites under Sisera.

1155-1080 Eli.

1100 Gideon and Abimelech.

1100-1020 Samuel.

1080-1028 Philistine domination.

1065-1013 Saul.

1028-1013 Saul's reign.

OTHER NATIONS

1194 Settlement of the Philistines in Palestine.

1100 Report of Wen-amon (Barton, op. cit., pp. 410f).

FRAGMENTS OF O.T. LITERATURE BEFORE 1000 B.C.

Song of Lamech, Gen. 423-24.

Song of Miriam, Ex. 1521.

The Ritual of the Ark, Num. 1035f.

The Oath Concerning Amalek, Ex. 1716.

The Song of Satire on the Amorites, Num. 2127-30.

The Song of the Well, Num. 2117f.

A Fragmentary Station List from the Book of the Wars of Jehovah, Num. 2114f.

A Fragment from the Book of Jashar, Josh. 1012f.

The Song of Deborah, Judg. 5.

A Proverb "of the ancients" quoted by David, 1 Sam. 2413.

Two Riddles and a Triumph Song of Samson, Judg. 1414, 18 1516.

The Fable of Jotham, Judg. 97-15.

The Curse and Blessing of Noah, Gen. 925-27.

The Blessing (a summary of tribal history) of Jacob, Gen. 49.

The Oracles of Balaam, the Seer, Num. 23, 24.

Second Period: 1013-933 B.C.

ISRAEL (BEFORE THE DIVISION), THROUGH THE REIGN OF SOLOMON

1050-973 David.

1013-973 David's reign.

973-933 Solomon's reign.

OTHER NATIONS

- 1000 The Aramæan occupation of Syria.
- 969-936 Hiram of Tyre.
- 950 Rezin founded the Aramæan kingdom of Damascus. His successors Hezion, Tabrimmon.

FRAGMENTS OF O.T. LITERATURE FROM THE TIMES OF DAVID AND SOLOMON

- A song celebrating the prowess of David, 1 Sam. 18⁷ 21¹¹ 29⁵.
- The Benjamite Battle Cry, 2 Sam. 20¹.
- David's Lament over Saul and Jonathan, 2 Sam. 1¹⁹⁻²⁷.
- David's Lament over Abner, 2 Sam. 3^{33f}.
- The Parable of Nathan, 2 Sam. 12¹⁻⁴.
- The Blessing (a summary of tribal history) of Moses, Deut. 33.
- The Book of the Wars of Jehovah.
- The Book of Jashar (of the Valiant?).
- The early strand of narrative in Samuel (1 Sam. 9, etc.).
- The Court History of David, 2 Sam. 9-1 Kings 2.
- The Book of the Acts of Solomon.
- The kernel of the Temple narratives.
- The Code of the Covenant, Ex. 20²³⁻²³¹⁹.
- The so-called "J" Decalogue, Ex. 34.

Third Period: 933-843 B.C.

ISRAEL (THE NORTHERN KINGDOM) FROM JEROBOAM I TO THE REVOLUTION OF JEHU

- 933-912 Jeroboam I.
- 912-911 Nadab.
- 911-888 Baasha.
- 888-887 Elah.
- 887 Zimri.
- 887-876 Omri.
- 880 Omri conquered Moab.
- 876-854 Ahab. Prophetic activity of Elijah.
- 858, 857, 854 Three wars with the Aramæans.
- 854 Ahab allied with Benhadad II of Damascus against Shalmaneser in the battle of Qarqar (Karkar).
- 854-853 Ahaziah.
- 853-842 Joram. Wars against Benhadad II of Syria.
- 850 Mesha throws off the Israelite yoke (Inscription of Mesha).
- 850 Prophetic activity of Elisha.

JUDAH (THE SOUTHERN KINGDOM) FROM REHOBOAM'S ACCESSION TO 843 B.C.

- 933-917 Rehoboam.
- 917-915 Abijam.
- 915-875 Asa.
- 875-851 Jehoshaphat.
- 851-844 Joram.
- 844-843 Ahaziah.

OTHER NATIONS

- 954-924 Sheshonk I (Shishak) of Egypt, campaign against Israel and Judah.
- 900 Benhadad I of Damascus conducts war against Israel.
- 884-860 Ashurnazirpal of Assyria approaches Hebrew territory.
- 859-825 Shalmaneser III of Assyria.
- 849 and 846 Campaign against Damascus and allies.
- 845 Hazael of Damascus wars against Israel.

O.T. LITERATURE OF THE NINTH CENTURY B.C.

- The kernel of the Elijah narratives, 1 Kings 17-19, 21, 2 Kings 1, 2.
- The kernel of the Elisha narratives, 2 Kings 2-8 13¹⁴⁻²¹.
- The revolution of Jehu, 2 Kings 9, 10.
- Chronicles of the Kings of Israel, similar to the Book of the Acts of Solomon.
- Chronicles of the Kings of Judah, similar to the Book of the Acts of Solomon.
- The J Document, about 850 B.C.

Fourth Period: 843-722 B.C.

ISRAEL (THE NORTHERN KINGDOM) FROM JEHU TO THE FALL OF SAMARIA UNDER SARGON IN 722

- 843-816 Jehu.
- 842 Jehu pays tribute to Shalmaneser III of Assyria.
- 816-800 Jehoahaz.
- 800-785 Joash.
- 785-745 Jeroboam II.
- 760 Prophetic ministry of Amos.
- 750-735 Prophetic ministry of Hosea.
- 744 Zechariah.
- 744 Shallum.
- 743-737 Menahem.
- 738 Menahem pays tribute to Tiglathpileser III (Pul).
- 737-736 Pekahiah.
- 736-734 Pekah.
- 734 Syro-Ephraimitic war. Rezin (Damascus) and Pekah (Israel) against Ahaz (Judah).
- 733-732 Tiglathpileser places Hoshea on the throne of Israel.
- 733-722 Hoshea.
- 722 Sargon captures Samaria. Fall of Israel.

JUDAH (THE SOUTHERN KINGDOM) FROM QUEEN ATHALIAH TO THE DEATH OF AHAZ

- 843-837 Athaliah.
- 837-798 Joash.
- 798-780 Amaziah.
- 780-740 Azariah (Uzziah).
- 740-735 Jotham.
- 740-701 Prophetic activity of Isaiah.
- 735-720 Ahaz.
- 725-690? Prophetic activity of Micah.

ASSYRIA

- 842 Shalmaneser III makes his fourth campaign against Damascus.
- 810-782 Adadnirari III conquers the west including Israel ("the land of Omri"), Phoenicia, Edom, Damascus, but not Judah.
- 745-727 Tiglathpileser III of Assyria.
- 738 His western campaign.
- 733-732 Tiglathpileser III makes campaign against the west.
- 732 Fall of Damascus.
- 727-722 Shalmaneser V.
- 722-705 Sargon of Assyria.
- 722 Sargon carries 27,290 Israelites captive.

O.T. LITERATURE OF THE EIGHTH CENTURY B.C.

- Continuation of Chronicles of the Kings of Israel.
- Continuation of Chronicles of the Kings of Judah.
- The E Document, about 750 B.C.
- The Writings of Amos.
- The Writings of Hosea.
- The Writings of Isaiah 1-39 (excluding 24-27, 131-142 21, 34, 35).
- The Writings of Micah, 725-690 B.C.

Fifth Period: 722-538 B.C.

JUDAH FROM THE FALL OF ISRAEL (THE NORTHERN KINGDOM); THE JEWISH EXILES (AFTER 597) TO THE RETURN

- 720-692 Hezekiah.
- 711 Judah "punished" by Sargon.
- 701 Sennacherib besieges Hezekiah, who becomes his tributary.
- 692-638 Manasseh, a vassal of Esarhaddon.
- 638 Amon.
- 638-608 Josiah.
- 627 Prophetic activity of Zephaniah.
- 626-585 Prophetic activity of Jeremiah.
- 621 The discovery of Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomic reform.
- 615 Prophetic activity of Nahum.
- 612 The fall of Nineveh.
- 608 Battle of Megiddo, death of Josiah.
- 608-597 Jehoiakim.
- 605 Battle of Carchemish.
- 600 Prophetic activity of Habakkuk.
- 597 Jehoiachin. The first captivity.
- 597-586 Zedekiah.
- 592-570 Prophetic activity of Ezekiel (in Babylonia).
- 586 The destruction of Jerusalem. The second captivity.
- 561 Release of Jehoiachin by Evil-Merodach.
- 540 Prophetic activity of Deutero-Isaiah (Isa. 40-55).
- 538 Cyrus gives exiles permission to return.

ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA

- 722-710 Merodach-Baladan of Babylon struggles for the mastery of Assyria.
- 711 Sargon's expedition against Azuri of Ashdod.
- 705-681 Sennacherib of Assyria.
- 703 Sennacherib's expedition against Merodach-Baladan of Babylon.
- 701 His campaign against the west. Shuts up Hezekiah "like a caged bird" in Jerusalem. Carries away 200,150 people and much booty.
- 681-668 Esarhaddon of Assyria.
- 668-626 Ashurbanipal of Assyria.
- 625-604 Nabopolassar of Babylon founds the Chaldean kingdom.
- 612 Fall of Assyria to Nabopolassar, Medes and Scythians.
- 605 Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon defeats Necho at Carchemish.
- 562-560 Amel-Marduk (Evil-Merodach).
- 560-556 Neriglissar.
- 556-538 Nabonidus.
- 553-529 Cyrus of Persia masters Media, Lydia and Asia Minor and at length, 539, Babylonia.

EGYPT

- 712-700 Sabaka.
- 700-689 Shabataka.
- 689-664 Taharka.
- 664-661 Tanutamon.
- 663 Destruction of Thebes by Ashurbanipal.
- 663-609 Psammetichus I.
- 609-593 Necho.
- 605 Necho defeated at Carchemish.
- 593-588 Psammetichus II places a Jewish garrison at Elephantine.
- 588-566 Apries (Hophra).

O.T. LITERATURE FROM THE SEVENTH CENTURY TO THE PERSIAN PERIOD

- Combination of J and E Documents.
- Deuteronomy written 650. Introduced 621.
- Zephaniah, 627.
- Jeremiah, 626-585.
- Nahum, 615.
- Habakkuk, 600.
- Portions of Lamentations, 586-570.
- Ezekiel, 592-570.
- Code of Holiness (Lev. 17-26), 560.
- Combination of J, E, D, 560.
- The Deuteronomic editing (late 7th century) and the exilic re-editing (c. 550) of the Books of Kings.
- Deuteronomic narratives of Joshua, Judges, and Samuel.
- The Song of Moses (Deut. 32).
- Isaiah 131-142 21.
- Deutero-Isaiah (40-55).

*Sixth Period: 538-323 B.C.*FROM THE RETURN TO THE DEATH OF ALEX-ANDER THE GREAT
JUDAH RESTORED

- 538 Return of a band of exiles under Sheshbazzar.
- 537 Altar for burnt-offerings rebuilt.
- 536 Foundation of temple laid.
- 520-518 Prophetic activity of Haggai and Zechariah.
- 520-516 The rebuilding of the temple under Zerubbabel and Joshua.
- 460 Prophetic activity of Malachi.
- 444-432 Nehemiah's first and second visits to Jerusalem. The rebuilding of the wall. Eliashib high priest.
- 411 Jehohanan high priest at Jerusalem.
- 407 Bagoas, governor of Judah (Elephantine papyri).
- 397? Activity of Ezra. Introduction of Priestly Code.
- 351 Jaddua high priest.
- 350 Jerusalem taken by Artaxerxes III.
- 335 Samaritan schism. Samaritan temple built on Mount Gerizim.
- 331 Syria and Palestine mastered by Alexander the Great.
- 323 Death of Alexander and partition of his empire.

PERSIA 538-331 B.C.

- 538 Cyrus in control of Babylon.
- 529-522 Cambyases.
- 525 His Egyptian expedition.
- 522-521 Gaumata.
- 521-485 Darius I.
- 485-464 Xerxes I.
- 464-424 Artaxerxes I.
- 408-358 Artaxerxes II (Mnemon).
- 358-337 Artaxerxes III (Ochus).
- 337-331 Darius III.

EGYPT TO 331 B.C.

- 525 Cambyases masters Egypt. Does not harm Jewish temple in Elephantine.
- 411 Destruction of Jewish temple in Elephantine.

O.T. LITERATURE FROM 538 B.C. TO THE GREEK PERIOD 331 B.C.

- Isa. 637-641², 538-520.
- Haggai and Zechariah 1-8, 520-518.
- Majority of the Psalms collected, many pre-exilic in origin.
- Malachi, 460.
- Obadiah, 460.
- Trito-Isaiah 56-66 (excluding 637-641²), 460-450.

Isaiah 34 and 35, 450.

Job, 450-400.

Priestly code and priestly redaction of Pentateuch, 500-400.

Memoirs of Nehemiah, 444-432, and Ezra? after 397.

Ruth, 400.

Joel, 400.

The "little Apocalypse," Isa. 24-27, 340-332.

*Seventh Period: 323-150 B.C.*FROM THE DEATH OF ALEXANDER TO THE END OF THE O.T. PERIOD
JEWISH COMMUNITY

- 323-198 Palestine under the (Egyptian) Ptolemies.
- 321 Ptolemy takes Jerusalem.
- 198-164 Palestine under the (Syrian) Seleucids. Onias III high priest contemporary with Seleucus IV.
- 175 Jason is high priest, contemporary with Antiochus IV.
- 171 Menelaus secures highpriesthood.
- 168 Antiochus attempts to suppress the Jewish religion.
- 168-163 The Maccabæan era.
- 168-160 Judas Maccabæus.
- 165 The rededication of the altar.
- 161 Alcimos is high priest, leader of Hellenistic faction.
- 160-142 Jonathan ruler, and from 153 high priest.
- 142 Jews under Simon (142-135) gain political independence.

SYRIA

- 323 Seleucus I Nikator of Babylon.
- 316 Seleucus driven out by Antigonus.
- 312 Seleucus founds Seleucid (Syrian) dynasty.
- 312-280 Seleucus I (Nikator).
- 279-261 Antiochus I (Soter).
- 261-246 Antiochus II (Theos).
- 246-226 Seleucus II (Callinicus).
- 226-223 Seleucus III (Ceraunos).
- 223-187 Antiochus III the Great.
- 186-176 Seleucus IV (Philopator).
- 175-164 Antiochus IV (Epiphanes).

EGYPT

- 323-285 Ptolemy I (Soter)
- 285-247 Ptolemy II (Philadelphus).
- 247-222 Ptolemy III (Energetes).
- 222-205 Ptolemy IV (Philopator).
- 205-182 Ptolemy V (Epiphanes).
- 182-164 Ptolemy VI (Philometor).
- 170-164 Ptolemy VII (Euergetes) jointly.
- 164-146 Ptolemy VII (Euergetes) alone.

O.T. LITERATURE FROM THE DEATH OF ALEX-ANDER TO THE END OF THE O.T. PERIOD

Jonah, 300.

Song of Songs, 300.

Zechariah 9-14, 300-250.

Proverbs compiled 300-250, many very old.

Chronicles, Ezra and Nehemiah, 300-250.

Beginnings of Greek translation of O.T.
(LXX), 250.

Ecclesiastes, 250-200.

Daniel, 167.

Esther, 150.

Psalms (final edition), shortly after 150.

Literature: Cook, The Cambridge Ancient History, vols. i-iv, esp. vol. i; Breasted, History of Egypt; G. A. Smith, Jerusalem from Earliest Times to A.D. 70; Barton, Archæology and the Bible, 5th edition; Creelman, An Introduction to the O.T. Chronologically Arranged; Beyer, The Literature of the O.T.; Article, "Chronology of the O.T.", in Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible; Chronological Table at close of T. H. Robinson, Decline and Fall of the Hebrew Kingdoms.

THE OLD TESTAMENT IN THE LIGHT OF ARCHÆOLOGY

BY PROFESSOR CHRISTOPHER R. NORTH

Definition of Term. The term "archæology" has a wide range of meaning, and it is necessary to define the sense in which we use it. In its widest application it denotes the study or science (Greek logos) of ancient things (Greek archaia), and is practically equivalent to the history of the remote past. Thus the study of the O.T. itself may be called archæology. A somewhat narrower definition is necessary for our present purpose, since we are concerned with the O.T. in the light of archæology. To most people archæology suggests the spade, and means nothing more nor less than excavation. Roughly, this is correct, though it should be remembered that in Egypt especially many monuments are above ground, and that when Edward Robinson in 1838 and 1852 traveled in Palestine identifying biblical sites he was an archæologist, even though he used no spade. The following may serve for a working definition of the subject: The O.T. in the light of what exploration has revealed of ancient Palestine and the adjacent countries (Egypt, Syria, Phœnicia, the Euphrates-Tigris Valley, etc.).

The importance of the study is obvious, since it supplies us, so far as its materials go, with facts contemporary with the O.T. period. A large number of inscriptions are exactly dated. It is true that the majority are more or less mutilated; but what we are able to read of them is contemporary, as a rule, with the events recorded in them, and presents no difficult textual problems of the kind with which we are familiar in the study of the O.T. text.

History of Archæological Research. The materials are already vast, though, as might be expected, they are more full for some localities and periods than for others. It is only just over a hundred years (1822) since the first ancient Egyptian text, that of the Rosetta Stone, was deciphered, whilst Babylonia did not begin to yield up its secrets until the middle of the century. Both languages, as well as the pre-Babylonian Sumerian, can now be read with tolerable ease, and the histories of the Nile and Euphrates-Tigris Valleys traced with some confidence and fulness as far back as the fourth millennium B.C. Perhaps the most surprising discoveries are those which have more recently come to light on the Mediterranean (Cretan and Ægean) and Hittite civilizations, of which scarcely the memory had been preserved. The languages of these last still await decipherment, though substantial progress has been made with cuneiform, as distinct from hieroglyphic, Hittite; but a great variety of inscriptions is available in Egyptian, Sumerian, Assyro-Babylonian, Phœnician, and Moabite (both of which differ only dialectically from Hebrew), and in various dialects of Aramaic. These have thrown a flood of light upon the language, history, and religion of the O.T. Up to the present, excavation in Palestine has yielded little in the way of inscriptions, but materials of a scarcely less valuable kind have been forthcoming. Excavations have been undertaken on the sites of Gezer, Taanach, Megiddo, Jericho, Samaria, Beth Shean, on several sites on the edge of the Philistine plain, and on Ophel, the ancient Zion or City of David. Much has been learned of the culture, such as it was, of ancient Israel, and a tolerably complete picture may be drawn of the everyday life of O.T. times.

Necessary Cautions. It is necessary at this point to enter a caution. The Assyriologist, e.g., is interested in Assyria for its own sake, for what it adds to the sum of knowledge. Naturally, however, the interest of a Babylonian story of the Deluge is enhanced by reason of its relation to the O.T. story, especially for the student whose first concern is with the Bible. But there is some danger that we may have no interest in archæology except as it confirms, or, it may be, negates what we are told in the Bible. And it is necessary to say that if our interest is one-sidedly utilitarian, if we are only concerned to affirm or deny the truth of the O.T., we shall not obtain the best results from our study. Obviously, a great deal of the archæological material has no direct bearing upon particular O.T. texts. But it would be foolish on that account to neglect it. What archæology gives us is, broadly, a contemporary background of ancient civilization, into which we may set the O.T. as part of a larger whole. That is not to deny the uniqueness of the part; it is to say that the whole, quite apart from particular details in it, is a very valuable commentary on the part. The O.T. is endowed with new life and freshness as we study it in its context, that of the stirring and multitudinous life of the ancient East.

We have entered this caution, partly in the interests of that larger appreciation of the O.T. which a study of archæology should give, and partly because, if our first concern is either to prove, or disprove, the O.T., we are in danger of putting theories before facts. We must avoid making an unconditional ally of archæology. This is done by two classes of writers. On the one hand, we hear of "monumental facts and higher critical fancies," and those who set out with that thesis may easily make believe that archæology confirms the O.T. when, indeed, it does nothing of the kind. On the other hand, those who have a theory to prove may easily be misled by verbal similarities between the O.T. and extra-biblical writings into supposing that the Hebrews had no original ideas, that they were slavish borrowers who tricked themselves out in the thought-forms of older and more advanced civilizations. So they may regard Hebrew religion as a branch of Babylonian religion, and reduce the O.T. to a complicated system of astral mythology.

Archæology and Criticism. Before we proceed to examine detailed correspondences between archæology and the O.T. it may be well to say something more regarding the first of the errors above, since it is that to which readers of the Bible are most prone. The untenability of the "pan-Babylonian" theory, representing the second error, will appear as we illustrate the parallels between the Babylonian material and the religious ideas of the O.T. It is well known that criticism has referred the oldest considerable portion of the O.T., the J document of the Pentateuch (see art., Pentateuch—Its Origin and Development, p. 142), to the ninth century or thereabouts B.C. This conclusion was arrived at, not upon archæological grounds, but simply from a study of the O.T. itself. But the critical theory for long received, as it were, negative confirmation from archæology in that the earliest known writing in the old West Semitic alphabet was the Moabite Stone, cir. 850 B.C. Some bronze fragments of bowls discovered in Cyprus, and inscribed with Phœnician characters, were assigned by Lidzbarski to the second millennium B.C., but there were no means of dating them exactly. The upholders of the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch accordingly fell back upon the theory that Moses wrote in cuneiform, the arrow-shaped writing of Babylonia. Cuneiform, of course, is a script, not a language. Hebrew might be written, more or less accurately, in cuneiform, and so, for that matter, might English. There are two theories: (1) that Moses wrote in cuneiform, in Babylonian, and that what he wrote was later, when the West Semitic alphabet was invented, translated into Hebrew; (2) that he wrote in cuneiform, but in Hebrew, and that this was later transcribed into the Hebrew characters. In support of this second theory it is urged that there are Canaanite, that is, substantially Hebrew words, in the Tel-el-Amarna letters, cir. 1400 B.C.

An inscription in the Phœnician script has recently been found at Byblos, dating from the thirteenth century B.C. That Moses might have written in the Hebrew language and script can therefore no longer be doubted. To say that the Phœnician script was in use in the age of Moses does not, however, prove that Moses used it; still less does it prove that he wrote the Pentateuch. The documentary theory of the Pentateuch was formulated before the Moabite Stone was found, and it depends on considerations, partly linguistic, which archæology cannot very well overthrow, partly historical, which archæology has done much to confirm. If archæology can prove that the Aaronite priesthood goes back to Moses, or that the principle of sacrifice at a single sanctuary is earlier than the seventh century B.C., to mention only two matters of importance, it may overthrow the critical position, but so far it has done nothing of the kind.

But while archæology has not overthrown the critical position it is in some details tending to modify it. Sellin in Germany, and Welch in Britain, though avowedly critical in their methods, represent a movement to date the documents earlier than the Wellhausen school had done. The reason would seem to be that they are influenced, consciously or unconsciously, by archæology. The importance of Babylonia and Egypt for O.T. study has of late years become increasingly obvious. Here were advanced civilizations going back to the fourth and fifth millenniums B.C., civilizations, moreover, which early and profoundly influenced life and thought in the land subsequently occupied by the Hebrews. What necessity, then, to postulate a late date for the development of O.T. religion, as though the Hebrews had to live entirely to themselves, and to find their way unaided? Why may not much of it be early, Mosaic? The reaction is at present, perhaps, rather too strong; archæology cannot dictate to criticism. It may be, however, that the criticism of the later nineteenth century will be modified along the lines of recognizing (1) that Hebrew origins go further back than had been supposed; and (2) that the documents of which the Pentateuch is composed were not entirely ad hoc writings, but included a considerable amount of material that is older than the dates at which they were finally reduced to writing; e.g., there are close parallels between the Book of the Covenant (Ex. 20:22-23:33) and the Laws of Khammurabi (c. 2100 B.C.).

The parallels between the archaeological materials and the O.T. may be summarized under two heads: (1) Historical; (2) Moral and Religious.

1. HISTORICAL MATERIAL

The Patriarchal Age. The first Hebrew king to be named on an Assyrian monument is Ahab, by Shalmaneser III (853 B.C.), while the Moabite Stone makes mention of Omri, who was, however, dead when the inscription was cut. For the period prior to the Omri dynasty archaeology and the O.T. appear to be engaged in a most tantalizing game of hide-and-seek. We read on a Babylonian tablet from Dilbat, near Borsippa, of one Abarama, probably some Babylonian Abram, who hired an ox (1965 B.C.). Another (his name is spelled Abamrama) in 1963 B.C. tenanted a farm and duly paid his rent (Barton, Archæology and the Bible, pp. 316f.). It is probable, then, that Abram was a common name in Babylonia about the time when the biblical Abraham is said to have lived. It is likely that the Amraphel of Gen. 14¹ is the famous Khammurabi, but that neither proves nor disproves that Gen. 14 is history.

The name Jakub-ilu, or Jacob-el, is found in Babylonia during the Khammurabi period, and once the shortened form Jakub. The names Ya'kb'ra and Yashap'ra, the former certainly, the later probably, the Egyptian equivalents of Jacob-el and Joseph-el respectively, appear in the list of Canaanite cities captured by Thothmes III in the fifteenth century B.C. (Barton, op. cit., pp. 325f.).

About fifteen years ago a Babylonian cylinder seal was found bearing the name Israel son of Rishzuni. It may with some confidence be assigned to the time of the dynasty of Sargon of Agade, which flourished between 2800 and 2600 B.C. It is to be noted that it is a personal and not a tribal name (Barton, op. cit., p. 326).

It would be precarious to identify the persons bearing these names with the patriarchs of Genesis; still less do they guarantee the historicity of the patriarchal stories. It may be, however, that similar discoveries await the archæologist, and that ultimately sufficient evidence may be forthcoming to show that Hebrew origins lie further back in the past than many in recent years have thought.

From the Exodus to the Division of the Kingdom. With regard to the Exodus the most natural conclusion from the book of Exodus is that it took place in the reign of Merenptah cir. 1220 B.C. (Ex. 1:11²³, notes). Any extra-biblical reference to a relation between Merenptah and Israel is, therefore, to be eagerly welcomed. Sir Flinders Petrie in 1896 discovered such a reference in Merenptah's funeral temple at Thebes. Unfortunately, it creates as many difficulties as it solves. Merenptah includes Israel in a list of peoples whom he had subdued. His exact words are, "Yisraal is desolated; its seed is not." The context makes it clear that Israel was a people already located in south Palestine. Needless to say, the O.T. knows nothing of such an encounter, since the Red Sea incident can hardly have such a reference. The question is raised whether on the basis of archaeology the Exodus must not be dated earlier than the reign of Merenptah. The O.T., if its chronology is anything to go by, does preserve another tradition of the date of the Exodus. In 1 Kings 6¹ we read that Solomon began to build the Temple in the fourth year of his reign, and in the four hundred and eightieth year after the Exodus. The date of Solomon's reign is about 977 B.C., which would give us about 1450 for the Exodus. This is two centuries earlier than Merenptah, but it is fifty years before the Tel-el-Amarna tablets. In the Amarna period Palestine was a province of the Egyptian empire, and the tablets consist largely of letters from petty kings and governors in Palestine to their Egyptian overlords. (The fact that the letters are written in Babylonian is eloquent testimony to the cultural influence of Babylonia over the "Westland.") It may also be mentioned in passing that Jerusalem is already in the Amarna letters called Urusalim.) Now, the letters of Abdi-Khiba of Jerusalem contain references to the incursions into the country of a people called Khabiru. Are these Khabiru Hebrews, or in any way connected with them? It may be confidently affirmed that in cuneiform writing the equation is quite possible, that, indeed, the word 'Ibhri (Hebrew) could only have been written with the consonants of the word Khabiru. There are other notices of these Khabiru. They appear as mercenaries in southern Babylonia in the third millennium B.C. In the first half of the second millennium they again appear as mercenaries, this time in the service of the Hittites. And it is likely enough that they are the Aperu whom we meet with in Egypt in the period 1300–1100 B.C. It is not necessary to equate the Khabiru absolutely with the Israelite-Hebrews of O.T. story. Gen. 10²¹⁻²⁵ 11^{16f.} show that the name “Hebrew” had a wide connotation, wider than “Israelite,” while in 1 Sam. 14²¹ Hebrews and Israelites appear to be distinct.

It is difficult to fit the Amarna letters into the simple story of the O.T. Any construction we may put upon the evidence can only be tentative. It is hard to believe that there is not some connection between Khabiru and Hebrews. On the other hand, the O.T. tradition of an Exodus in the reign of Merenptah is too strong to be set aside entirely. Is it possible that only some of the tribes went down to Egypt, perhaps the Joseph tribes, which are specially associated with Egypt? That these came out of Egypt in the time of Merenptah, and that they were joined, perhaps at Kadesh Barnea, by related tribes who had been in Canaan all along, or who had entered two centuries before with the Khabiru, or, possibly, as a part of the Khabiru movement? Some O.T. passages, e.g., Gen. 33¹⁸⁻³⁴ 48²², seem to be reminiscent of wars of conquest before the days of the Egyptian sojourn. Still other tribes—there is reason to believe Asher—only joined the Hebrew confederation after the actual settlement in Canaan. (For a discussion of this question see F. C. Eiselen, The Prophetic Books of the O.T., pp. 29–35.) Finally the tradition of the Egyptian sojourn and the Exodus became the common possession of all the tribes.

Excavations at Beisan (Beth Shean), begun in 1922 and still in progress on behalf of the University of Pennsylvania, have brought to light a stele of Rameses II (1292–1225 B.C.), in which, report states, the Pharaoh claims to have built the city of Rameses with Semitic labor (cf. Ex. 1¹¹). Beth Shean was still occupied by the Egyptians in the reign of Rameses III (1198–1167 B.C.), well after the traditional date of the Exodus. From the Egyptians it passed into the control of the Philistines, a fact that enables us to understand the stranglehold which these peoples of the sea had in the days of the Judges and Saul upon the country that was later called after them. (See Macalister, A Century of Excavation in Palestine, pp. 73f., 158, 171f.)

Macalister's own work on Ophel (see map 3, end of Commentary) for the Palestine Exploration Fund has finally proved that the eastern and not the western hill of Jerusalem was the Zion, or David's City, of the Bible (cf. 2 Sam. 5⁷). Portions of the Jebusite wall have been uncovered, and the identification of the enigmatical Millo (2 Sam. 5⁹) proposed with some confidence. The word, which denotes a “filling,” is an apt description of some masonry which seems to have been intended to close up a breach in the north wall of the Jebusite city (cf. 1 Kings 9²⁴ 11²⁷). (See Macalister, op. cit., pp. 104f.)

Divided Monarchy. For the time of the divided monarchy correspondences between the O.T. and the monuments are frequent, and go to prove the substantial reliability of the Bible narrative. Pharaoh Sheshonk I (954–924 B.C.), the Shishak of 1 Kings 14²⁵⁻²⁸, left a long list of conquered Palestinian cities. These include places in the Northern Kingdom as well as in Judah. The Bible gives no hint of an invasion of Israel. The monarchs of ancient time were nothing if not bombastic, and frequently credited themselves with victories more sweeping than they actually achieved; but it is likely enough that Israelite cities sent presents to Sheshonk, if only to keep him out of their territories.

Shalmaneser's mention of Ahab as fighting with the Arameans of Damascus and others against him at the battle of Karkar (853 B.C.) has already been referred to. The Bible is silent about this. It does, however, help us to understand Ahab's sudden change of policy toward Damascus (1 Kings 20³⁴⁻⁴³). Safety from the Assyrian menace had to be purchased by the putting aside of old animosities. Similarly, we may assume, the marriage of Ahab and Jezebel, which had such disastrous religious consequences, was in the first instance a political measure directed against Damascus.

The so-called black obelisk of Shalmaneser III tells of tribute received from Jehu in 842 B.C. Again the O.T. is silent. Jehu founded a new dynasty. Moreover, he had waded to the throne through torrents of blood. And however his own generation may have accepted him, we know that the prophet Hosea, a century later, thought his revolution a very inglorious affair that merited retribution (Hos. 14¹). Jehu himself apparently did not feel too secure, and purchased protection from Shalmaneser by paying him tribute. It is worthy of note that Shalmaneser calls Jehu “the son of Omri.” Jehu was not a descendant of Omri; indeed, it was he who brought to an end the dynasty of Omri. But that he should be called the son of Omri, and Israel generally on Assyrian monuments “the land of the house of Omri,” is evidence that Omri was a more remarkable man than the very summary account of his reign (1 Kings 16²³⁻²⁸) would lead us to suppose. The Moabite inscription of Mesha (cf. 2 Kings 34) with its statement that "Omri oppressed Moab many days" points in the same direction. Several of its phrases echo the religious ideas of the O.T., and the whole suggests that at this time Israel and Moab were on much the same plane of cultural and religious development.

Valuable light is thrown upon the last days of the kingdom of Israel by the inscriptions of Tiglath-Pileser III (745-727 B.C.) and Sargon (722-705 B.C.). In particular the Assyrian annals enable us to correct the unsatisfactory Bible chronology of the period. (See art., Chronology of the O.T., p. 108.) The submission of Ahaz of Judah to Assyria is confirmed by Tiglath-Pileser's statement that he received tribute from him (cf. 2 Kings 16⁸). Menahem's tribute (2 Kings 15^{19f.}) is also recorded, likewise the discomfiture of Pekah (2 Kings 15^{29f.}). We also learn, what is not obvious from the Bible narrative, that Hoshea, the last king of Israel, was a creature of Assyria. We should imagine from 2 Kings 17³⁻⁶ that Samaria was reduced by Shalmaneser IV (727-722 B.C.). The Assyrian account makes it clear that while the siege was begun by Shalmaneser, the city only fell after the accession of Sargon. It is not likely that the new monarch, who was a usurper, and would have much to do to consolidate his position on the throne, was present in person. Sargon tells us that he carried away twenty-seven thousand two hundred and ninety people from Samaria, and that he peopled the land with settlers from other parts of his empire. The majority of the inhabitants were suffered to stay where they were, for Sargon distinctly states that he permitted the rest to keep their possessions, that he appointed a governor over them, and imposed upon them the tribute of the former king. There is, therefore, no need to make a mystery of the "lost ten tribes." Those who were deported lost their identity in the land of their exile. Those who remained intermarried with the settlers brought in by Sargon, and became the ancestors of the Galileans and Samaritans of N.T. times.

The most circumstantial parallel between an Assyrian record and a historical passage of the O.T. is the beautifully preserved cylinder of Sennacherib (705-681 B.C.) describing his campaign of 701 B.C. For the critical problems arising out of the biblical account (2 Kings 18¹³⁻¹⁹³⁷ Isa. 36, 37), which appears, at least in Kings, to be drawn from three sources, the reader is referred to the commentary on the Kings passage. Sennacherib tells how he shut up Hezekiah "like a caged bird, in Jerusalem, his royal city," how he imposed upon him a tribute of thirty talents of gold, eight hundred of silver, and accessories. (2 Kings 18¹⁴ gives the figures as thirty talents of gold and three hundred of silver.) Sennacherib naturally does not mention the appalling disaster that befell his army, but it is significant that he does not claim to have entered Jerusalem. Some scholars, among them Rogers (Cuneiform Parallels to the O.T., pp. 337f.), believe that Sennacherib made two campaigns in the west, one in 701 B.C. and the other some fifteen years later; that two of the sources in 2 Kings (18¹³⁻¹⁶ 18¹⁷⁻¹⁹⁸) refer to the earlier, while the third (19³⁻³⁵) with its story of the Assyrian disaster and its reference to Tirhakah (v. 9), who did not become king of Egypt until 693 at the earliest, refers to the later campaign. Although this solution of the problem is very attractive, it cannot be said to be conclusively proved. The only notice we have of a campaign of Sennacherib in the west after 701 is a fragment describing an expedition against Arabia some time between 688 and 682 B.C.; and it is by no means certain that Isaiah and Hezekiah, who figure so prominently in the Bible story, were alive at that time. However that may be, the disaster that befell Sennacherib's host was almost certainly bubonic plague. Herodotus has a story (Book II, 141) to the effect that the quivers and bowstrings of the Assyrians were devoured by field mice. This may point to the spread of disease by rats, and we know from 2 Sam. 24^{16f.} that the angel of Jehovah, who figures in 2 Kings 19³⁵, was regarded as the agent of pestilence. Before passing from the reign of Hezekiah we may mention the famous Siloam inscription, which describes the construction of the long tunnel between the Virgin's Spring and the Pool of Siloam (see map 3). Although it consists of six lines only it is the longest ancient Hebrew inscription yet found, and throws valuable light upon the defensive measures undertaken by Hezekiah for the safety of his capital (cf. 2 Kings 20²⁰).

The recent discovery of a Babylonian chronicle throws valuable light upon the closing days of the kingdom of Judah. It appears that Nineveh fell in 612 B.C., not 606 as hitherto supposed, and that when Pharaoh Necho led his armies into Syria he was in alliance with the remnant of the Assyrians, and not hostile to them. (Contrast 2 Kings 23²⁹ and cf. Gadd, The Fall of Nineveh.)

The Exile and the Restoration. The inscriptions of Nebuchadnezzar are mostly concerned with his building operations, and make no mention of the fall of Jerusalem. Neither is there any exact parallel to the Edict of Cyrus (2 Chr. 36^{22f.} Ezra 1¹⁻⁴), though an inscription of his has been found proclaiming a general amnesty, and affording facilities to gods and peoples to return to their own dwellings.

A welcome addition to knowledge of the little documented post-exilic period is afforded by a collection of well-preserved Aramaic papyri from Elephantine, in Upper Egypt, written in the fifth century B.C. They are the literary remains of a Jewish colony of the Persian period, and include conveyances, contracts for loans, marriage settlements, and the like, drawn up with all the thoroughness of a modern lawyer. The most important of them is a copy of a letter sent in 407 B.C. to Bagoas, the Persian governor of Judah. These Egyptian Jews had a temple, with all appurtenances for sacrifice. They worshiped Jehovah under the name of Yahu, and with him they associated four other divine beings, one of them certainly a goddess. Three years before they wrote to Bagoas their temple had been destroyed and burned by their Egyptian neighbors. When this disaster came upon them they had written to Johanan, the high priest in Jerusalem (see Ezra 10⁶ Neh. 122^{2f.}), but he had not vouchsafed any reply. They now ask the governor to give permission for the temple to be rebuilt and its sacrifices reinstated, and add that they have sent a similar request to Delaiah and Shelemiah, the sons of Sanballat (Nehemiah's old enemy, Neh. 21⁰, etc.). There is also a note, apparently in the messenger's handwriting, purporting to give the verbal permission of Bagoas and Delaiah to rebuild the temple and to offer meal offerings and incense as formerly. Note that nothing is said of burnt offerings, though these had been included in the petition. The omission is significant, and probably intentional.

All this is surprising. The reason why no reply had been forthcoming from the high priest is obvious: these Egyptian Jews were schismatics, with their temple outside Jerusalem. Equally obviously, they were not conscious of being schismatics, or they would not have risked being snubbed by appealing to such a dignitary as the high priest. But how came they to have a temple at all? The answer must be that they knew nothing of the Deuteronomic law of one legitimate sanctuary. Neither did they keep the Passover and the feast of unleavened bread until, in 419 B.C., they were ordered to do so by one "brother Hananiah." Who this Hananiah was is uncertain, but he appears to have come to Egypt on a mission similar to that of Ezra and Nehemiah to Jerusalem, for the purpose of enforcing a stricter obedience to the law. In another papyrus complaint is made that since the advent of Hananiah in Egypt things have gone ill with the Jews. And when the orthodox party in Jerusalem failed them they appealed to the civil authority and the Samaritan faction. These papyri contain startling matter, but of their importance there can be no question.

The above summary will sufficiently illustrate the value of archæology for the O.T. historian. It is clear that archæology and criticism must each pursue their own course, without prejudice from the other. Sometimes archæology confirms the O.T., sometimes it supplements it, occasionally it corrects it. Nevertheless, it must be apparent to every unbiased student that the monuments when read intelligently neither set aside nor discredit the O.T. documents. They offer their services, not as a substitute, but as a supplement, by the aid of which we may study from without the history of the Hebrew people.

2. MORAL AND RELIGIOUS MATERIAL

Art and Culture. Before we pass to parallels strictly religious a few words may be said about the light thrown by archæology upon the cultural life of the Hebrews, since art and culture stand in a middle relation between the material and spiritual elements in the life of a people. In this connection we are reminded of the principle that God chose the foolish things, and the weak things, and the base things, and the things that are despised, and the things that are not (1 Cor. 127¹). It may be said quite summarily that except in the realm of literature the artistic achievements of the Hebrews were poor indeed. Living in the very center of cultural influences from Egypt, the Mediterranean, and Babylonia, they nevertheless developed no new artistic forms, and what they copied they mostly spoiled. This is sufficiently shown in their pottery, which consists of feeble copies of foreign models.

As far as Palestinian excavation illustrates the religious life of the Hebrews it is mostly on its darker side. The standing pillars of Gezer enable us to picture the orgiastic rites at the "high places." The jars containing infants' bones are gruesome testimony to the revolting practice of child sacrifice (cf. Mic. 67). The nude and coarse Astarte figures that are found in all strata of the pre-exilic period give added emphasis to the fierce denunciations of the prophets (cf. Isa. 28 Jer. 228 441^{f.} Hos. 417, etc.). The name Egeliah ("bull-calf of Yah") on a potsherd from Samaria shows how far reaching was "the sin of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin." The religion of Elephantine is a survival of these crudities. It is evident that the prophets were voices crying in the wilderness, and that few understood or gave them heed. When we consider their surroundings we can only marvel at their greatness, the memorial of which endures for all time in the pages of the O.T.

Types of Literature. The literature of the O.T. is various, and parallels have been quoted for almost every department of it. More than one Babylonian parallel has been cited to the book of Job. There are Babylonian and Egyptian psalms, and the forms of these, and sometimes the ideas and phraseology, are similar to those of the O.T. Both Babylonia and Egypt had also Wisdom literatures, from which correspondences have been cited to Proverbs and Ecclesiastes. Poetry similar to the Song of Songs also existed outside of Israel.

It is obvious that sensuous love poetry like that of the Song may be produced quite independently all over the world. The theme of the suffering righteous man too is sufficiently familiar to recur independently. It is convenient to speak of Babylonian Job texts, though the name "Job" does not occur in them. The book of Job is one of the greatest—some say even the greatest—single piece of literature that any age or country has produced; and it may be said without fear of contradiction that its religious conceptions are incomparably higher than those of any alleged Babylonian parallel. (See art., The Bible as Literature, p. 19; cf. p. 483.)

Creation and Flood Stories. The purpose of the present article may be met by a comparison of the Hebrew accounts of the creation and the Flood with those current in Babylonia. There are obvious resemblances:

1. Between the Hebrew and Babylonian Creation Epics. The first thing that strikes us is the arrangement by sevens: the Babylonian has seven tablets, or cantos, with which compare the Hebrew seven days. Though there are differences the order is, in general, the same; e.g., the heavenly bodies are created in the fourth epoch, man in the sixth. Both conceive of an original watery chaos or abyss, denoted by what is essentially the same word—Hebrew tehôm, Babylonian tiāmat. The Hebrew tehôm was originally a personal name, for it is used without the article: "Darkness was upon the face of tehôm." The Babylonian tiāmat is a she-monster against whom the god Marduk engaged in mortal combat. Both accounts conceive of a super-celestial ocean upheld by a firmament. The Hebrew word denotes something beaten out, usually of metal. The Babylonian speaks of a "covering," and describes how the victorious Marduk formed it by splitting Tiāmat like a flat fish into two halves, making one of them a covering for the heavens. The conception of a world-encompassing ocean is found elsewhere in the O.T., notably in the Flood story, which speaks of the fountains of the great deep (tehôm) being broken up and the windows of heaven being opened (Gen. 7¹¹).

2. Between the Hebrew and Babylonian Accounts of the Flood. The resemblances between the Hebrew and Babylonian accounts of the Flood are even more close. In the genealogy of the Priestly Code in Gen. 5 the number of antediluvians is ten. As the Jehovistic genealogy of ch. 4 now stands the antediluvians of the line of Cain number eight, but it can be shown with reasonable probability that in the original tradition the number was ten, as in P. The Babylonians, like the Hebrews, divided history into an antediluvian and a postdiluvian period. According to their story the number of antediluvians was ten, with an average longevity of forty-three thousand and two hundred years. As in the Bible story, the tenth patriarch, Ut-napishtim, escaped from the Flood. He, like Noah, is warned of the approaching catastrophe by the god Ea, whose favorite he is. Instructed by Ea, he builds a ship, making it watertight with bitumen (cf. Gen. 6¹⁴), and embarks in it his possessions, his family and kindred, craftsmen, animals domestic and wild. He shuts the door of the ship. (In the Bible it is Jehovah who shuts the door—Gen. 7¹⁶—but the similarity of the phrase, occurring as it does at the same point in the story, is remarkable.) As in the Bible the ark rests on the mountains of Ararat, so Ut-napishtim's ship is held fast by the mountain of Nisir. In addition to a dove and raven Ut-napishtim sends out a swallow. When he comes out of the ship he sacrifices on the top of the mountain. As Jehovah smelled the sweet savor of Noah's sacrifice, so does the Babylonian story tell with reiterated emphasis how the gods smelled the savor, the sweet savor, and gathered like flies over the sacrificer. Finally, as in the Bible, a promise is given that never more shall a flood destroy mankind.

Evidently, there is dependence somewhere. How may it best be accounted for? The hypothesis of direct borrowing either way is improbable, especially for Gen. 1, which comes from an exile writer who would only have been revolted by the Babylonian epic if he had first met it in all its mythological crudity in the land to which he had been deported.

Nor is it likely that the two recensions go back to a proto-Semitic source: it is difficult to think that stories in which water is such a prominent element could have grown up in the arid steppes of Arabia. The stories, it is most likely, are native to the Euphrates-Tigris valley; they were Sumerian in origin, were taken over by the Semitic Babylonians, and became naturalized in Palestine when Babylonian culture spread to the Mediterranean before the Hebrew conquest. In the same way we may account for the similarities between the Book of the Covenant and the laws of Khammurabi. (For the details see W. W. Davies, The Codes of Khammurabi and Moses.) When the Hebrews entered Palestine they inherited from the Canaanites much that the Canaanites had in their turn learned from the ancient civilization on the Euphrates. Some will prefer to believe that a nucleus of Babylonian story and legal procedure was carried to Palestine by Abraham, but in the present state of our knowledge of the patriarchal period this cannot be asserted with confidence, although the probability of it may be conceded.

Unique Elements in the Old Testament. However we may explain the relationship, what the Hebrews learned from their neighbors they used in their own way, and in the realms of literature and religion they touched nothing they did not adorn. It is when we note, side by side with the resemblances, the differences between the Hebrew and Babylonian stories, that we see the uniqueness of the O.T. Underlying the Babylonian stories is an exceedingly gross polytheism: the gods emerge out of the chaos. It is improbable that Gen. 1 teaches the doctrine of creation out of nothing; but God is one, supreme, and he forms the creatures with his word. The Babylonian gods decide to have a flood for want of something better to do: "their hearts prompted them," so the story goes. The creation epic does not scruple to describe how they celebrated their exaltation of Marduk by getting drunk. When the Flood is in progress they are desperately frightened, and sit cowering like dogs in heaven. When it is over they fall to unseemly wrangling about the responsibility for it. The Hebrews needed to be inspired by the Spirit of God when they set out to transform such unpromising material.

Nothing has been said of extra-biblical parallels to the prophets, for the sufficient reason that there is nothing that demands comment. A few parallels are adduced, but they only touch the circumference, and do not penetrate to the real inwardness of prophecy. It is extremely unlikely that any parallels that go to the heart of the matter will ever be found; had there been any to find, some tidings of them would have been heard by now. The prophets believed that they stood in the counsels of the Most High, that the very words they uttered were given them by God. The silence of archæology in face of this claim is eloquent. The prophets are the miracle of the O.T. Archæology cannot explain them; it has nothing to do but pay them homage.

In conclusion: The monuments have not spoken their last word; but if we are justified in drawing inference from that which is known, it is safe to assert that though the monuments may swell into infinity they will offer nothing to equal, much less to supersede, in substance and spirit the O.T. We may receive gratefully every ray of light, but the time has not yet come, nor ever will come, when we may lay aside the O.T. and substitute the hymns and prayers of Babylon or Egypt to give to us the bread of life Jesus found in the pages of the sacred book of his people. Let us welcome the light and knowledge God has bestowed upon us; let us rejoice in them with perfect assurance that they are for good and not for evil; let us learn to use them wisely and honestly, and let us still be ever alert listening for other words, uttered ages ago, but not yet audible to modern ears. "It is for us to catch these messages, and to understand them, that we may fit them into the great fabrics of apprehended truth to the enrichment of ourselves, and to the glory of our common Lord."

Literature: Barton, Archæology and the Bible; Rogers, Cuneiform Parallels to the Old Testament; Driver, Modern Research as Illustrating the Bible; Handcock, The Latest Light on Bible Lands; Wardle, Israel and Babylon; Macalister, A Century of Excavation in Palestine.

THE OLD TESTAMENT AND SCIENCE

BY PROFESSOR W. G. JORDAN

Preliminary Remarks. It is important to define clearly the scope and limitation of the subject. It is not science and religion: between these two spheres of life, it may, in a sense, be said that there is no direct conflict. Devout men holding different views and standing at different stages of culture have had similar experiences of repentance, faith in God and loyalty to Jesus Christ. One of the keenest controversialists of the last century has expressed this fact in his own forceful fashion. Speaking of the great passage Mic. 6⁶⁻⁸, Huxley says, "In the eighth century B.C., in the heart of a world of idolatrous polytheists, the Hebrew prophets put forth a conception of religion which appears to me to be as wonderful an inspiration of genius as the art of Phidias or the science of Aristotle." "But what extent of knowledge, what acuteness of scientific criticism, can touch this, if anyone possessed of knowledge or acuteness could be absurd enough to make the attempt? Will the progress of research prove that justice is worthless and mercy hateful; will it ever soften the bitter contrast between our actions and our aspirations, or show us the bounds of the universe and bid us say, Go to, now we comprehend the infinite?" Without reducing religion to mere feeling we may maintain that on definite actions the real conflict is not here.

Neither is it the conflict between science and theology with which we have to deal. That is a large subject to which much thought has been given and on which much has been written, and the positions of opposing parties have been constantly changing with the increase of knowledge and the varied outlook on the natural and spiritual worlds. These two disciplines have each their own sphere and purpose—one seeking to find the laws that rule in the world in which we live, the other to find God and vindicate the ultimate spiritual nature of life. Their relationship is not likely to be finally settled, at any one period, so that discussion will end; and that is well, because the intellectual movement is an essential part of a living religion. It is impossible for us to stand still or to go back to the simplicity of earlier days, but "it is important for us to note that in the early Hebrew religious system, as in the other religions of the Ancient East, there is no trace of a suggestion that natural knowledge, or any conception of the nature of the world, was regarded as an impediment or handicap to religion. Thus the fields of religion and science have not yet been differentiated. It would, therefore, be idle to seek here evidence of any opposition between the two" (C. Singer, in Science, Religion and Reality, p. 90; edited by Needham, published by the Macmillan Company).

But, as the same writer points out, opposition was bound to arise. With regard to the cosmologies through which the ancient religions sought to give a rational view of the world, we have to admit that "historically we now know that on another mental level such cosmologies form an obstacle when they once were an aid." We are now concerned, in a limited form, with this historical question as it affects the interpretation of the Bible and especially that of the O.T. The same scholar maintains with regard to Greek culture that considering the enormous mental energy that it displays and the vastness of its interests, "the comparative backwardness of the religious development of that culture is a very striking feature. Greek religion—using that word in the restricted sense—never reached the rational standard of the Hebrew religion" (op. cit., p. 91). We must try to show that the growing monotheism in Israel was the cause of the unity of view, and also how it is that the science of a particular period is not inseparably bound up with religious faith. The lack of unity, due to polytheism, is even more marked in the earlier nations; of Egypt it is said: "In the sphere of cosmology no reasoned system was developed: besides Ptah, the potter Hnum of Elephantine, as well as other gods, claimed to have been creator. Nowhere can any uniform dogma be found" (Encyclopædia Biblica, vol. ii, p. 1217, published by the Macmillan Company).

The Problems Not Absolutely New. For many centuries there was no progress in what we call "natural science," and the critical discussions, stimulated by the Greek spirit, gave place to dogmatic theology and practical ecclesiastical organization. But there were anticipations of the questions which had to be faced more fully in the later periods. We are told that Aristarchus of Samos (about 250 B.C.) was denounced by the Stoic Cleanthes for attempting to show that the earth moves round the sun just as Galileo was condemned by the theologians of the seventeenth century. For the influence of Pythagoras (582-500 B.C.) and others, and "the reversion of Aristotle to the geocentric point of view," see Simpson, Landmarks in the Struggle Between Science and Religion, p. 23. Philo (born 20 B.C.) had to exercise his ingenuity upon the text of Scripture to make the story of creation square with his philosophy; and with the early Fathers the allegorizing method, used by the Stoics in their interpretation of Homer, was the favorite method of evading difficulties that sprang from the literal interpretation of Scripture.

The Modern Movement. The story of the growth of physical science and the conflict between men of science and theologians is a long one. We have to admit that the official theologians have in many cases fought a losing battle. It is well that supposed new facts should be carefully scrutinized and that new ideas should be shown to rest upon adequate reasons. But it is unfortunate that loyalty to the Bible has so often been invoked to oppose discoveries which have finally been proved by unanswerable arguments and convincing experiments. In our own generation we have watched the discussions connected with biological science and seen the belief in "evolution" steadily gaining ground among all classes of thinkers and working its way into the study of history, literature, and philosophy. Whatever may be the final form that it will take, it has been, especially since Darwin, the leading principle in scientific thought. Some zealous Christians regard the whole scientific outlook as skeptical, if not atheistic, and "a proportion of scientific men, incensed by the mere discrepancy of the biblical and scientific record, have abandoned more or less completely their relation to religion" (Singer, op. cit., p. 148). The historian tells us that the conflict over the new astronomical views, three hundred years ago, which removed the earth from the center of our system and set the sun in its place, was even more bitter. Pains and penalties were then more easily inflicted. But most of us still feel that "the heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handiwork." It is clear, then, that it is necessary to seek a definite statement of what is involved in the supposed "discrepancy between the biblical and scientific record."

The Elements in the Modern Situation. The history of criticism and apologetics shows us that, with rare exceptions, the representatives of the churches have been intensely conservative. They have clung as long as possible to traditional views regarding the dates of ancient documents and have presented a stubborn resistance to a superficial "rationalism" with its sweeping assertions regarding miracles and the supernatural. There is a certain satisfaction in this because, first, it showed a determination not to be ruled by mere negation, not to lose hold of the realities of inspiration and revelation, but to wait until they were transformed by the new light into richer and nobler forms. And, second, this very tenacity in the defense of orthodoxy drove scholars back to a more careful study of the nature of Hebrew literature. Modern scholarship, in its general movement, has been controlled by facts, discovered in different departments and pointing to the same conclusion.

(1) Physical Science. Here we have been brought from the small limited world of the ancients to the vast universe revealed by modern astronomy. The world of the Hebrews was a small affair of three stories, the heavens above, the solid earth, and the regions under the earth. The Babylonians had a larger view of the world and a longer historical perspective. To-day the round earth rolling through space and the immensity of the starry sky are conceptions familiar to us all. With this goes the thought of the great age of the earth and the long history of lower and higher forms of life on it. Without considering hypotheses concerning the origin of worlds and of life it is evident that our view of the universe, built up through centuries of observation and experiment, is vastly different from that of the Hebrews.

(2) The History of Mankind. Though the word "history" does not receive its full application in reference to those periods when there were no written documents, yet it is clear that even then there was movement, progress in the conquest of nature and the acquiring of instruments to meet common needs. In those days, when men were laying the foundation of all that was to follow, they had a keen sense of the invisible and in their own way were seeking God, "if haply they might feel after him and find him" (Acts 17:27).

(3) Archæology, in the stricter sense, has proved the existence of great civilizations, in full swing, thousands of years before the Hebrews came upon the stage. A hundred and fifty years ago all that was known of the nearer East was found in the O.T. and a few fragments of Greek literature; now our museums and libraries have rich stores of monuments and documents which reveal to us the great empires of Egypt and Babylon, in all their splendor, with their roots reaching into the remote past. (See art., O.T. and Archaeology, p. 114.)

(4) Biblical Criticism. The facts acquired from outside have shed light upon the origin and history of the Hebrew people, but the most powerful influence in changing the views of theologians has been the patient study of the sacred text in the endeavor to gain its permanent message by relating it to the life out of which it sprang. In dealing with any great subject that is involved in the study of the O.T. the real problem is to place the whole book in its true position in the history of the world. We can see clearly that the Hebrew people were not "scientific" in our sense of the word; they were not curious and speculative in the same sense as the Greeks; their sense of the nearness and direct action of God upon life did not lead them to the investigation of "the laws of nature." Hence, while they prized the story of the past, and found God in it all, the conception of its slow processes and gradual development was foreign to their type of mind. That we have been compelled to lay aside many of their traditions is not on account of abstract reasonings, but because the study of the documents has made possible a more living view of the growth of this literature and of the divine guidance running through the whole history. (See arts., O.T. and Criticism, p. 129; N.T. and Criticism, p. 885.)

The Documentary Theory. The most radical change in regard to the nature and origin of any of the parts of the O.T. is the investigation carried on for over a hundred and fifty years into the structure of the Pentateuch. (Something similar, on a smaller scale, may be seen in the analysis of the book that bears the name of the prophet Isaiah.) The taking over of the O.T. from the Jews by the Christian Church along with a solid body of literary traditions involved the acceptance of certain views as to the origin of the earth and the form of the solar system, which were regarded as inseparable from its theology. After remaining almost stationary a long time these two systems of tradition dominating science and theology broke down under the influence of the new knowledge. The philosophy of Aristotle and the cosmology of the O.T. ruled side by side for about two thousand years. They were both assailed by the new spirit of adventure and discovery, of observation and experiment. After the fresh living movement of the Reformation, the Book was placed by Protestants in the position of the Pope and its infallibility claimed in a rigid mechanical fashion. It is worth repeating that orthodoxy could and did stand against attacks in the name of "reason," and that a freer, larger view could maintain its place in the church only through the patient minute study of the sacred text. In the abstract we have to concede the possibility that God could inspire a man who never crossed the Jordan to write the first five books of the Bible. But when the contents and nature of the books were carefully examined by scientific methods the conviction was gradually formed, and in many ways confirmed, that this had not been the case. The evidences of compilation and the use of various names for the God of Israel had long been noted, but when, with other varieties of thought and expression, they were brought to bear upon the analysis of the documents, it was seen that the different parts of the Pentateuch could be related to the various periods of the life of Israel, as it was lived not in the wilderness but in Palestine. We are closely concerned with this fact, as we shall see, because it bears strongly upon the central point of our subject, the cosmogony in Genesis. True, science touches the biblical story at other points, but limitation of space makes an exhaustive discussion impossible. Moreover, the consideration of a particular subject transfers the entire subject to the realm of the concrete; besides, the underlying principles remain everywhere the same.

Old Testament Reference to the Universe. Before discussing the particular problems connected with the first chapter of Genesis we need to remember that similar views as to the structure of the world are implied in allusions scattered throughout the Bible. The exact nature and form of the earth beneath and the heavens above are not discussed; they come out incidentally in prose and poetry as the physical features of the world in which the writers live. The general outlines are there, but when we try to make a complete picture and ask questions as to what is the condition of things under the earth and how precisely "the firmament" encircles it above and around, there is no clear information. The three features are always there—the waters around and below the earth, the green earth itself with its varied forms of life, the firmament and the heavens above:

(1) "The earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein. For he hath founded it upon the seas, and established it upon the floods" (Psa. 241. 2). "On the same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up" (Gen. 711). "When I shall bring up the deep upon thee, and the great waters shall cover thee" (Ezek. 26¹⁹). The word "deep" is the same as in Gen. 1¹. There is a suggestion that the waters under the firmament are connected, but it is in a late book where we meet the thought of a system. "All the rivers run into the sea, yet the sea is not full; unto the place whither the rivers go, thither they go again" (Eccl. 17).

(2) References to "the earth" are plentiful, often with joy in the God-given showers and sunshine that make it fruitful: "Of old hast thou laid the foundations of the earth; and the heavens are the work of thy hands" (Psa. 102²⁵). "He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man; that he may bring forth food out of the earth" (Psa. 104¹⁴). "The earth is full of the loving kindness of the Lord. By the word of the Lord were the heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth. He gathereth the waters of the sea together as an heap: he layeth up the deeps in store-houses" (Psa. 33^{5, 6}).

(3) It is difficult for us, when we have passed beyond childhood, to realize that men once thought of the heavens as a solid vault above which God held his royal court. The firmament appears to be a solid structure forming a division between the waters and into it the stars are set. "It is he that sitteth upon the circle of the earth, and the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers; that stretcheth out the heavens as a curtain, and spreadeth them out as a tent to dwell in" (Isa. 40²²). "Canst thou with him spread out the sky, which is strong as a molten mirror?" or, as it has been rendered, "So strong—so like a molten mirror smooth?" (Job 37¹⁸; cf. Ezek. 1²⁶). These incidental references in prose and poetry show the simple view of the size and structure of the world that prevailed; it is a popular presentation of nature as it appeared to men who had not attained to systematic observation and had no instruments to assist their eyes and ears. In the later periods there might be some speculation as to the heaven or heavens, the highest heavens or the shadowy underworld, but, as a rule, men did not venture over the ragged edges and outward fringes of the visible world. The world, as thus viewed, can kindle varied emotions: the glory of the sun (Psa. 19), the splendor of the starry sky (Psa. 8), the awe-inspiring storm, the peals of thunder as "the voice of the Lord" (Psa. 29), "the showers that water the earth," symbol of kindly rule (Psa. 72⁶), the darkness and mystery of night, the bright day that invites to labor—all this and more summed up in words of adoration and gratitude: "O Lord, how manifold are thy works. In wisdom hast thou made them all: The earth is full of thy riches" (Psa. 104²⁴). The Hebrews were neither speculators nor mystics, but had a wholesome joy in the order and beauty of the world.

It is round the system of cosmogony and chronology that the discussions turn in the time of the early Christian fathers, and still more when science reached its modern stage of careful observation and exact measurements. The case is well summed up by a recent writer from the standpoint of science in two brief statements; after quoting them, it will be our business to show that biblical criticism has made it possible for us to justify them. For, while the movement of science forced a reconsideration of the whole subject, the intensive study of the Hebrew literature has shown the advance in Israel from early tradition to scholastic learning. "Finally, the cosmogony of Scripture is in great part the common-sense outlook in the pre-scientific age in the modern acceptance of the term 'science'; it is the cosmogony of the childhood of the race. Yet it also corresponds to the science of the age, for the creation narratives embody definite attempts at explanation of how all things came into being. At the same time they show the transforming Spirit of God at work upon myth and naïve observation, even as it works upon the heart of man." "The fact remains that the spiritual leaders of a people whose religious sensitivities were the most exquisite that the world has ever known took the inherited cosmogony of the racial group, and under the illumination of the inspiring and enlightening Spirit of God, made of it a vehicle for the proclamation of eternal truths that are at once independent of the categories of any age and yet must be represented through those of each particular age in order to be made real to the age" (J. Y. Simpson, Landmarks in the Struggle Between Science and Religion, Doran, pp. 56, 57).

The Chronology. The O.T. contains data from which a chronology has been compiled extending from the creation of the world to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans in 586 B.C. Three different available texts of the Pentateuch give different numbers for the period from the Creation to the Flood: the Hebrew, 1,656 years; Samaritan, 1,307 years; Greek, 2,242 years. The question as to which of these numbers may be original cannot be settled and is of little interest now that we know that they are not to be accepted as historical. An examination of the different periods shows that there is a mingling of traditions with attempts at systematic arrangement. Dates before the founding of the kingdom of David (about 1000 B.C.) are uncertain; the chronology of the later period can, in a measure, be corrected from Assyrian records, and after the Exile a nearer approach to accuracy is possible. (For a more detailed discussion see art., Chronology of the O.T., p. 108.) In modern times Bishop Usher (1580-1656), using the data offered by the Hebrew text, proposed a scheme of biblical chronology that was generally accepted, and until recently was printed in the margin of the English Bibles. It placed the date of the creation of the world at 4004 B.C. To reject this date it is not necessary now to turn to physical science, as it has been proved that four thousand years before Christ great civilizations existed, already having behind them a long history. The theory of documents throws light on this branch of the subject in that it shows that the section in which this elaborate chronology appears is the latest of those which form the Pentateuch. In Gen. 51-5 the chronology starts with the nine hundred and thirty years of Adam's lifetime. Adam (the Hebrew word for "man") is here used for the first time as the name of an individual. So the ideas of a world about six thousand years old and Adam as the name of the first man stand or fall together. This we now see, when we examine the nature of the latest document; "the Priestly Code" is not primitive tradition but late Jewish learning, which served a noble purpose in its time but belongs to the sphere of religion rather than to that of science. Comparing this with earlier documents, it is clear that chronology, like all other forms of thought, had a development. The early stories refer to things that happened "once upon a time"; striking events such as an earthquake (Amos 1¹ Zech. 14⁵) were used to mark a point of time; later the accession on the death of a king could be used to fix a date (Isa. 61¹). An elaborate chronology was the achievement of a later time; this particular one has now fallen to pieces, but the thought that prompted it, namely, the desire to place the life of this small nation in the larger framework of the world's life implies a wonderful faith in the one God and in the unity of the world.

The Cosmogony. When we survey the long history of interpretation and the controversies of ancient and modern times, we can easily understand that the great passage Gen. 11-24^a has been the real battle-ground. This is explained by the fact that it is in its own way an orderly scientific statement. Even before the difference in age, substance, and style of the two chapters was clearly demonstrated, the beautiful story beginning Gen. 24^b was felt to be in a different atmosphere. Huxley, the most persistent critic of traditions, did once refer to the building up of a man's rib into a woman as "this monstrous legend," but surely that was a slip, for as a "legend," a symbol of the fact that man and woman were made for each other, the story, though childlike, is beautiful. This wonderful short story of man's entrance into the world, the first shock of temptation, the failure and shame, the sympathetic thought of the pains of motherhood, and the depressing influence of hard, grinding toil which has made labor seem to be a curse—there is something here when it is not turned into rigid dogma that tends to disarm criticism. "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return" (Gen. 3¹⁹; cf. Job 1²¹) is a mournful refrain that comes to us even in brighter circumstances.

The Real Meaning of the Cosmogony. This noble statement which stands at the beginning of our Bible, according to the view that is now held, would not maintain its present position if the order were historical; with such an arrangement one would place first the simpler story that follows it (24^{b-23}). But for a version intended for use by the great mass of people no sensible person would venture now to disturb what has come to be a noble preamble to the whole book. The time for subtle apologetics and artificial harmonizing has passed and we can do justice to both these chapters in the light of the knowledge that we have gained. We do not attempt to reconcile them with each other or with the science of our own day. In the one we have the dry land as yet unvisited by rain, man made out of the dust of the earth, the animals presented to him, and finally woman formed to give the companionship which they cannot completely supply; the other has behind it the great watery chaos, suggestive of Babylonian floods. To this wonderful chapter we must devote a few words, stating its present situation in the realm of biblical study, and acknowledging that modern science compelled a reconsideration of the whole question. It is needless to give in detail the many attempts to harmonize the account in Genesis with the views held by men of science, at various periods, as to the origin of the world and the appearance of living creatures. (See Eiselen, The Christian View of the O.T., ch. 2.) Those scholars who accept the documentary theory regard that as a closed chapter. They surrender the science but see more clearly the high place of the chapter in the history of science and religion.

Some have regarded Gen. 1 as poetry in form, but that is not generally accepted. "The Poem of Creation" is an attractive title which has been used to remove the subject from the sphere of scientific discussion. The orderly movement with the repetition of stately phrases does suggest a certain poetic effect. The modern scholar takes the statement literally so far as it can be clearly interpreted. The earth was in a chaotic condition when God formed it into an ordered world by the separation of the waters into two divisions above and below the firmament, and by the separation of those below the heavens from the land. The land and water were then supplied with inhabitants in a certain definite order. The agency that brought this about was the word of God. "For he spake, and it was done; He commanded, and it stood fast" (Psa. 33⁹). The brooding spirit is mentioned at the beginning but plays no part in the later movement. The word "create" (bārā) does not appear to be used in the canonical literature with the sense of "making out of nothing." (2 Macc. 7²³ is claimed as making the first use of it in that sense.) The creation took place in a certain definite order, and definite orders or species were fixed (each "after its kind"). The process lasted six days and was brought to an end by "the rest of God" on the seventh day. Here a reason is given for the sanctity of the Sabbath. This was a very noble and reasonable view to be held by a small nation two thousand five hundred years ago. Even after the solid framework breaks to pieces there are permanent truths of religion that have played a tremendous part in the history of the world.

The thing that has become clearer the more the matter has been investigated is that this cosmogony, simple as it seems, has had a long and eventful history within and outside of Israel. The connection with the ancient Babylonian cosmogonies is now generally conceded (cf. on Gen. 1). The background is that of the vast Babylonian plains, the region of great floods. The principle of division producing the heavens and the dry lands is present in both. But we are a long way from the grotesque mythologies and crude polytheism of early Babylonia, not to speak of the still earlier Sumerian prototypes. Just when or how these ideas came into the life of Israel is an unsettled question. Further, it is probable that the growth of the statement into the form that we now have, involves a slow historical process. The order of creation with its eight works may have existed before it was brought into the six-day scheme. We know that the late period in which the process was completed was a time when the sanctity of the Sabbath was coming to a supreme place. The idea of long struggles after a rational view of the world coming here to clear expression, adds to the final result both dignity and strength.

The most striking feature of this cosmogony, considering the period when it arose, is its clear monotheism. That the monotheism had its own history is a fact which cannot be dwelt upon here. At the time the narrative was written the Babylonians still worshiped the stars, but a Hebrew prophet could cry, "Lift up your eyes on high, and see who hath created (bārā) these," etc. (Isa. 40²⁶). The stars played little part in the life of the Hebrews; in the story of creation there is a slight allusion to them—"the stars also." Here there is neither astronomy nor astrology; the heavenly bodies do not dominate the life of man, which is in the hand of God; they simply "rule" day and night by giving light for man to labor, fixing his period of rest and settling the times of the seasons for the church festivals. It is a small world, a limited conception, but it enshrines a great principle which, when the world is enlarged, is liberated for fuller service.

Conclusion. The conclusion, then, to which we have come is that in this cosmogony there is science, the science of the times in which it was written, and that science here as elsewhere must grow old, become, as we say, "out of date." This, indeed, is a process which takes place much more rapidly now than it did in ancient times. To claim present authority for dead science because it is in the Bible is foolish and harmful. What we are seeking is a clear view of the case as it has emerged from disputes in which sometimes there has been more heat than light. And while not aiming at elaborate apologetic, there are two remarks that need to be made in regard to the service rendered to science and religion by this cosmogony. Tyndall, in his famous Belfast presidential address, quotes Lange on the impossibility of continuing scientific investigation with the belief in a number of gods thus: "But when the great thought of one God acting as a unit upon the universe has been seized, the connection of things in accordance with the law of cause and effect is not only thinkable but is a necessary consequence of the assumption." This is no doubt correct from the point of view of the man of science, but the historian recognizes that this monotheism is not a mere assumption but an achievement of humanity, toward which the Hebrew race has played an important part and which finds, in the chapter that has provoked so much discussion, its highest and most formal pre-Christian expression. We may concede that the authoritative position gained by the Hebrew cosmogony checked speculation and retarded the progress of the modern scientific movement, but for centuries it preserved the ideas of the oneness of God and the unity of the world in a form suited to the capacity and knowledge of the Christian world. Science can make little progress in the primitive communities where polytheism and magic hold sway.

The three strong aggressive religions of the world—Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism—rest upon this monotheistic belief, though it may not have reached in any of them its full and final perfection in its application to theology, science, and art. The long story has often been told of the struggle in various ages between these different aspects of human thought. For the world at large it is not yet a closed chapter, but students of science and of Scripture are coming more and more to an understanding that recognizes in this ancient cosmogony permanent elements and admits that the framework shattered by advancing knowledge did in its own time and way render service to the higher intellectual life. We cannot accept, as the final verdict, the words of one so high in the ranks of science as Tyndall when he said of Gen. 1: "It is a poem, not a scientific treatise. In the former aspect it is forever beautiful; in the latter aspect it has been and will continue to be purely obstructive and hurtful." When we no longer demand for it literal acceptance or spend our time in seeking to harmonize things that are worlds apart, we are all the better prepared to do justice to the place that it has held and the influence it has exerted in the past. The Bible has in it many poetic expressions regarding the world which should not be hardened into rigid science, but a survey of the whole subject warns us against attempting to dissipate its real science into poetry, as the simple science has its own tale to tell of the progress of humanity in its search for God. Of this great chapter we may still say: "It shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off" (Isa. 55¹³).

The whole matter may be summed up in these words: Permanent harmony between science and the Bible will be secured when each is assigned to its legitimate sphere. Science has a right to ask that, when men are seeking purely scientific information, they should turn to recent textbooks in biology, geology, astronomy or other sciences; but in the sphere to which Jesus and the N.T. writers assigned the O.T., science cannot deny or seriously question its inspiration or permanent value. Unprejudiced science has never done this. It is perfectly ready to recognize the inestimable religious and moral value of even those biblical narratives which refer to scientific facts, not because of their scientific teaching, but because of the presence of eternal truth in the form of primitive science. If anyone wishes to know what connection this world has with God, if he seeks to trace back all that now is to the very fountain head of life, if he desires to discover some unifying principle, some illuminating purpose in the history of the world, he may still turn even to the early chapters of Genesis as a safe guide.

Literature: Temple, The Relation Between Religion and Science; Huxley, Science and Hebrew Tradition; Tyndall, Fragments of Science, vol. ii; Draper, The Conflict Between Religion and Science; White, A History of the Warfare of Science with Theology; W. S. Jordan, Ancient Hebrew Stories and Their Modern Interpretation; J. Y. Simpson, Landmarks in the Struggle Between Science and Religion; Needham, editor, Science, Religion and Reality; Commentaries on Genesis by Driver and Skinner.

THE OLD TESTAMENT AND CRITICISM

BY PROFESSOR CHRISTOPHER R. NORTH

Meaning of Term. Criticism, by those who are opposed to it, is so often assumed to mean adverse criticism, "censure," that it is perhaps necessary to remind ourselves that in itself the word bears no such sinister meaning. It is derived from the Greek word krinō, "to judge," of which the Latin equivalent is to be seen in the second part of the word "discern." Criticism is discernment of the qualities of an object. Wesley reminded his preachers that the judge is always supposed to be on the prisoner's side. In the same spirit criticism seeks to approach its subject matter without preconceived ideas of any kind, and to arrive at conclusions strictly in accord with the evidence. As applied to any ancient writing the task of criticism is to discover how the document originated; if the document purports to be historical, whether in fact it is so; finally, whether the moral and religious ideas it contains are worthy expressions of divine truth.

Legitimacy of Criticism. The legitimacy of criticism as applied to the O.T. has been questioned on two grounds: (1) that as applied to a sacred and inspired writing it is at once unnecessary and even impious; (2) that our Lord gave his sanction to certain beliefs about the authorship and historicity of some of the O.T. books, and that these beliefs must therefore be accepted as final.

With regard to the first of these objections it may be urged that although the inspiration of the Scriptures has always been an article of faith in the Christian Church, no attempt has been made to define the manner of their inspiration in such a way as shall be binding upon all Christians. The second objection is perhaps more serious. It is urged that our Lord spoke of the Law of Moses (Mk. 144 Lk. 2444) and the book of Psalms (Mk. 1236) in such a way as to invalidate forever any discussion as to the authorship of these books; and that he referred to Jonah in such a way as to guarantee the truth of the story concerning him (Mt. 1240).

Now, if our Lord was possessed of absolute omniscience, this objection would perhaps have to be accepted as final. But have we any warrant for claiming such omniscience for him? All the indications are that his was a true humanity, which would seem to rule out omniscience. He is reported to have asked questions, from which the natural inference is that he needed information. On one point he definitely disclaimed knowledge (Mk. 1332). The phrase "he emptied himself" (Phil. 27) seems to mean that when he came to earth Jesus laid aside certain prerogatives of divinity, and accepted for himself the limitations that are incident to the state of being a man. We read that he advanced in wisdom (Lk. 252), that it behooved him in all things to be made like unto his brethren (Heb. 217), from which it would seem to follow that his intellectual attainments were such as might be acquired by study, and that his knowledge of secular and scientific subjects was such as was open to men in the first century.

We must take it, then, that reverent criticism of the Scriptures is a legitimate proceeding. We may further be sure that in a universe of which God is the author and guardian of truth no criticism can do any ultimate harm to the Scriptures. If criticism is undertaken with unworthy motives, it must come to naught. And even if its motives are pure, if its conclusions are unsound those conclusions will be shown to be false. If traditional beliefs have been wrong, ultimately they must be replaced by better. In any case there is no need for men of faith to tremble for the ark of God.

Types of Criticism. It is convenient to consider criticism under four heads: (1) Textual or "Lower" Criticism; (2) Documentary or "Higher" Criticism; (3) Historical Criticism; (4) Moral Criticism.

1. Textual or "Lower" Criticism. The purpose of textual or, to use the technical term, "lower" criticism, is to recover, as far as possible, the actual words of any writing as it left the hands of its author. The oldest extant Hebrew MS. of the O.T. of certain date is not older than the tenth century A.D., well over a thousand years after the autograph copies from which it is descended. What were the fortunes of the text during that long period, and how far does the text of Hebrew Bibles to-day represent the actual words of the O.T. writers? For the answers to these questions the reader is referred to the article, The Transmission of the O.T., pp. 99f. It is, however, not out of place to point out here that if God had been pleased to communicate to men Scriptures verbally inspired, he would surely have provided that their text should be transmitted without error. It is small comfort that the Scriptures should once have been inspired in the very letter if, owing to the accidents of transmission, that letter is sometimes uncertain. And all the indications are that the text has in places suffered beyond sure hope of recovery. The logical inference is that verbal infallibility is not a necessary condition of divine revelation, from which we are led to look beyond the letter to the spirit that giveth life (2 Cor. 3⁶). A further reason why mention should be made of "lower" criticism is that only so can we understand the true meaning of the, as it has proved, unfortunate term "higher criticism."

2. Documentary or "Higher" Criticism. If the term "criticism" has given rise to misunderstanding, the misunderstanding has only been deepened by the use with it of the adjective "higher." It should, however, be noted that the words "lower" and "higher" in this connection are technical terms, and that they were in use long before anyone thought of applying critical methods to the study of the Bible. "Higher" criticism was never intended to mean a method applied by men who think themselves superior to their fellows in critical acumen. It was so called simply to distinguish it from "lower" or textual criticism, the purpose of which has already been indicated. The function of "higher" criticism is to determine, if it be possible, the authorship, date, and place of origin of any writing. In a modern printed book these particulars are usually given on the title page. In the case of a book written in antiquity they must be inferred from whatever internal and external evidence is available. Such criticism is called "higher" because it deals with problems nearer to the source of the writing than textual criticism does. Obviously, a book must be in existence before its variations of text can become an object of study: it is the task of the higher or documentary criticism to find out how it came into existence. The problem thus dealt with is usually more difficult of access than a textual problem. Again, therefore, the term "higher" criticism is in some measure justified. Strictly speaking, any man is a higher critic who seriously gives himself to the study of the authorship of the books of the O.T., no matter how conservative his conclusions may be. It is further to be noted that the "higher" criticism as such does not concern itself with the historical accuracy of the documents with which it deals.

It is quite possible for a higher critic to conclude that Moses wrote the Pentateuch. Generally speaking, however, the trend of critical opinion has been away from the traditional positions as taken over by the church from Jewish rabbinical scholars. For the methods of criticism, and its results as applied to the several O.T. writings, the reader is referred to the "Introductions" to the books concerned, and in particular to the article, The Pentateuch—Its Origin and Development, pp. 134f.

If we consider the O.T. as a whole, the outstanding conclusion of literary criticism lies in its affirmation that the prophets are earlier than the Law. There are, of course, portions of the Pentateuch that are earlier than the earliest writing prophets; there are perhaps portions of the prophetic books that are later than anything in the Law. But, broadly speaking, the statement holds good that, whereas the order of acceptance of the books by the Jews was Law—Prophets—Writings (see art., The Formation of the O.T., pp. 91f.), the actual order of writing was Prophets—Law—Writings. This means that the creative impulse in O.T. religious development came from the prophets. The Talmud stands committed to the statement that the "Men of the Great Synagogue," whoever they may have been, wrote Ezekiel and the books of the Minor Prophets. But if there is one book of the O.T. which more than any other bears the stamp of its author, it is the book of Ezekiel. However negative criticism may sometimes have appeared, it certainly has brought the prophets out of the obscurity in which for so long they were hidden. That is as it should be. What we have in the Law is the application to the daily life and needs of the ordinary Israelite of the ethical monotheism proclaimed by the prophets of the eighth to the sixth centuries B.C. It is true that there was some descent from the heights on which the prophets themselves moved. The master truths of prophecy, born in the experience of a succession of the greatest souls of all time, were, consciously or unconsciously, adapted to average Israelite capacities. But although sacrifice, so strongly denounced by the prophets (Amos 5²¹⁻²⁵ Isa. 1¹¹⁻¹⁵, etc.), riveted itself more firmly on Jewish practice, it is significant that in post-exilic times we hear no more of those constant lapses into idolatry that are so characteristic of the whole period prior to the Exile.

A little thought will make it apparent that no literary criticism can lessen the religious value of the O.T. The O.T. is what it is, and ultimately it must be judged by its intrinsic religious worth. Nor can literary criticism diminish the contents of the O.T.; it can only rearrange them in a somewhat different order. No critic proposes to abridge the O.T., nor in any way to interfere with the canon. So long as the materials for any study are not in their proper time sequence it is not possible to see in them anything other than a more or less imperfectly related series of fragments. Once that order has been properly determined, it is possible to see the living unity of the whole. What criticism has done is, by endeavoring to redistribute the O.T. sources in the order in which they were written, to make possible a more coherent and convincing conception of the organic growth of O.T. religion. By this means a new suggestiveness is given to the profound Pauline phrase, "when the fullness of the time came" (Gal. 4⁴). To this fullness more minds have contributed than was once supposed. For example, the book of Isaiah contains the work of many others besides the eighth-century Isaiah of Jerusalem. Some of the most inspired utterances in the O.T. are anonymous (e.g., Isa. 40-66). God gave not the Spirit by measure (Jn. 3³⁴), and those who received it were careless of their own fame. What criticism reveals is not a revelation that is external and unrelated to human experience, communicated through a few; but a revelation of God in the history, thought, and experience of a people, a revelation that many witnesses have contributed to record.

3. Historical Criticism. It has already been said that the higher criticism as such is not concerned with the historicity of the documents with which it deals. It is, however, obvious that one of its results must be to raise the problem of historicity. Thus, if it is a conclusion of literary criticism that a certain document was written five centuries after the events it describes, we are bound to ask whether its account of those events is a true one. In the absence of any indications to the contrary we may decide that it is. But when we have two accounts of the same incident, as of the institution of the monarchy (1 Sam. 8, 10¹⁷⁻²⁴; contrast 1 Sam. 9¹⁻¹⁰¹⁶, and see commentary), or of David's introduction to Saul (1 Sam. 16¹⁴⁻²³; contrast 17⁵⁵⁻⁵⁸), the question must then be asked, which of the two accounts, if either, is the true one? And it will sometimes appear that we cannot claim literal accuracy for both without resorting to the most desperate harmonizing expedients. It is just here that criticism has raised serious misgivings in many devout minds. It is not "higher" criticism in its narrower meaning that is feared, but its implications for history. If some parts of the O.T. are not historical, how are we to know what is true and what is not? Can we even be sure that any of it is? Are we not shut up to the alternatives all or nothing?

To this the answer must be in general terms that most either-or propositions are of the nature of false disjunctives, and untrue to life. Even the wildest critic would decline to say that the O.T. contains no history at all; while every critic who values his reputation as a historian knows that it contains a good deal. We cannot therefore accept the negative horn of the dilemma. To accept the positive, and assert categorically that the O.T. contains no historical inaccuracy, is to be in a position equally untenable. Thus, according to some portions of the Pentateuch, sacrifice was to be permitted only at one central sanctuary, and the only persons who were competent to officiate were priests descended from Aaron. That being so, laymen like Gideon (Judg. 6²⁴), Manoah (Judg. 13¹⁹), Samuel (1 Sam. 9¹³), David (2 Sam. 6¹³), were not competent to sacrifice at all, much less to build altars. Nor were the sons of David, a Judahite, qualified to be priests (2 Sam. 8¹⁸, where the R.V. text is the only possible translation of the Hebrew). Moreover, if there was only one legitimate altar, that in Jerusalem, it is incomprehensible that so zealous a champion of Jehovah as Elijah should complain that the altars of Jehovah had been thrown down (1 Kings 19¹⁰), and that he should repair the desecrated altar on Carmel (1 Kings 18³⁰). It is no remedy to say that these are declensions from the right statute: David and Elijah were devout worshippers of Jehovah, and evidently knew no better than to do as they did. The difficulties vanish when we recognize that the Pentateuch contains also an earlier law of the sanctuary than that which permits one altar only (Ex. 20^{24f.}), and that while quite early after the settlement in Canaan Levites began to acquire priestly functions (cf. Judg. 17¹³), it was only gradually that the family of Aaron came to have a priestly monopoly. (Cf. Deut. 18¹⁻⁸, seventh century, where all Levites are priests; Ezek. 44¹⁰⁻¹⁶, sixth century, where the non-Zadokite Levites are excluded; and the Priestly Code, fifth century, where the family of Aaron alone among the Levites are qualified to sacrifice.) It has been noted above that, speaking generally, the prophets are earlier than the Law. It is only as we apply this principle to the history of Israel that the historical books, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, become really intelligible. If the Law was complete before the Conquest, the history of the following centuries is full of insoluble enigmas. If in its present completed form it is post-exilic, the main features of the history and religious development become convincingly clear.

Although this is not the place to deal at length with the miraculous element in the O.T., it may be noted that many of the difficulties felt by the modern mind are removed by the method of comparative treatment of sources. Thus the stories of the plagues (Ex. 7¹⁴-12³⁶) and of the crossing of the Red Sea (Ex. 14) are composite, and consist of elements from the three main Pentateuchal sources, J, E, and P (see art., The Pentateuch, p. 137b). Analysis shows that the miraculous element in the stories is least developed in J, the earliest, and is most prominent in P, the latest of the documents. The inference is clear: the plagues have a basis in fact, being all more or less related to physical conditions in the land of Egypt; they became magnified into the portents of P by frequent and triumphant repetition.

Rightly understood, there is no part of the O.T. that is without historical value when put into its proper time setting. A narrative may or may not be historically trustworthy as an account of what happened centuries before it was written; it is always of value as reflecting the thought of the time when it was written. And in a very proper sense the thought of a people is as real a part of its history as its commercial and political fortunes. To take an extreme example: the book of Leviticus contains a maximum of legislation and a minimum of action. But if we want to picture the everyday sacrificial ritual of the second temple, we need nothing more detailed and circumstantial than the first seven chapters of Leviticus. If we wish to know the procedure that was followed from the Persian period down to the time of our Lord, when a new high priest was consecrated, we need only turn to the account of the consecration of Aaron in Lev. 8.

The O.T., then, contains the materials from which, with the supplementary aid of archaeology, a trustworthy history of Israel may be written. We may even go so far as to say that the O.T. writers came nearer to being historians in the modern sense than any ancient writers prior to the time of Herodotus. Their historical writing, however, was not exactly history in our sense of the word. What they give us is a philosophy of history rather than a scientific and unimpassioned description of the past. They were before all things preachers of righteousness; their main purpose was to influence the life and thought of their contemporaries. It is not that they were entirely uninterested in the past for its own sake; the early writers in particular tell of the past with a naïveté that is entirely free from theological bias. But the editors who gave their final form to the historical books were continually reading out of the past lessons for their own present, and inevitably their conception of the past was colored by the needs of that present. It is only what we should expect. The demand for history uncolored by the prejudices and ideals of the author is something essentially modern, and we have no right to expect it of the O.T. What we have there is in its own way warmer and more moving than history after the modern fashion; and if we want scientific history, we can with patience obtain it from the materials which the O.T. itself supplies.

4. Moral Criticism. It has already been said that the O.T., like any other literature, must stand or fall by its own intrinsic quality. This principle has led many quite confidently to announce its approaching dethronement from the high position it has so long occupied in the literature of the world. Rationalistic writers have openly made jest of some of the stories it contains. Many Christian people have been puzzled by what appears to be its imperfect morality, and have sought refuge in a deeper devotion to the N.T. and a tacit neglect of the O.T.

Now, if we are going blindly to insist on the dogma of an equal inspiration of every verse in the Bible, we must inevitably defeat the purpose we have in view. Instead of persuading people to love the Bible more we shall only succeed in making them skeptical of its claims to reverence. Frankly, the O.T. does contain stories that are unedifying, some of them even told without apparent moral censure. We think of Noah's drunkenness (Gen. 9²⁰⁻²⁷); of Lot's incest (Gen. 19³⁰⁻³⁸); of Jacob's theft of the blessing (Gen. 27); of the command to Saul to slaughter all the Amalekites, and the censure passed upon him for not fulfilling it to the letter (1 Sam. 15); of the, from the standpoint of to-day, barbarous conception of corporate responsibility that demanded the hanging of the seven sons of Saul (2 Sam. 21). The conclusion seems unavoidable that much of the morality of the O.T. is imperfect as judged by Christian standards. This was quite frankly recognized by our Lord himself (Mt. 5²¹⁻⁴⁷). It also seems to have been recognized in one form or another by all the leading N.T. writers; by Paul (Rom. 8³); by John (Jn. 1¹⁷); and by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews

(10¹⁻⁴). At the same time it is undeniable that our Lord nourished his own soul from the O.T., and that "the Scriptures" was the common designation of the O.T. in N.T. times (Lk. 42¹ Jn. 5³⁹ Acts 17², etc.). There must, therefore, have been that in the O.T. which satisfied the conscience and ministered to the spiritual life of Jesus and his apostles. In other words, the O.T. contains, besides much that is imperfect, much also that reaches heights that are nothing short of sublime. No pre-Christian literature ever produced a passage like that describing the martyrdom of the Suffering Servant in Isa. 53. (See art., The Divine Element in the Bible, p. 28.)

To say this means that the O.T. itself is quite capable of passing judgment on its own imperfect morality, does, indeed, tacitly pass such judgment insofar as it shows how that which was unworthy gradually gave place to what is above sane moral criticism. In some passages we can actually see the judgment of a more enlightened conscience being passed on earlier and crude conceptions. For example, there is little doubt that the three "sister-wife" stories in Genesis (12¹⁰⁻²⁰ 20, 26¹⁻¹¹) are variants of the same story. In two of them the sister-wife fiction is simply a lie; in the third, which comes from the comparatively late E document, the writer is at pains to explain that Sarah really was Abraham's half-sister (Gen. 20¹²). That may be only a fiction, but it shows the way in which men's minds were moving. Of King Amaziah we read that he deliberately mitigated the severity of the old custom of putting to death innocent children with a guilty father (2 Kings 14^{5f}; contrast 2 Sam. 21 above). A comparison of the two accounts of David's numbering of the people (2 Sam. 24¹ 1 Chr. 21¹) shows quite clearly how men's ideas of the moral character of God could change. Actions that they had no difficulty in ascribing to God in the tenth century they could not bring themselves to ascribe to him in the third.

Once more, the solution of the problem is to be found in the analysis and dating of the sources of which the O.T. is composed. By that means we are able to see how God progressively revealed himself to men as they were able to receive him. As one lesson was learned another was taught. It could not be otherwise. Moreover, a careful analysis reveals the fact that the transient elements in the O.T., such as the "ban" (see e.g., Josh. 7), polygamy, and the law of blood revenge, are roughly those that are pre-Mosaic, while those that are permanent and that were received into and perfected by the gospel of Christ, are those that sprang from the new impulse that Moses gave to religion for his countrymen and for the world. It is true that the transient elements did not at once die out. For long they persisted side by side with higher conceptions; but their disappearance was only a matter of time.

It may confidently be predicted that the canon of the O.T. will never be abridged. Men will naturally turn more frequently to some portions of it than to others. They always have done so. It may be that an occasional abridged volume for devotional purposes will do no harm if it gives us wider margins and larger print. But the canon will never be revised. If we are rightly to value our Christian heritage, we need to be at once humbled and encouraged by the view backward over the whole of the long road by which God has led us to it. And no one possessed of imagination and sympathy with the race in its upward striving toward God will wish to see a single verse of the marvelous record perish from the affection of his fellows. We conclude, then, that so far from the O.T. being discredited by criticism, its title to reverence has been abundantly vindicated. It stands for all time as a memorial of the goodness and severity of God (Rom. 11²²) that prepared the way for the coming of Him in whom all its promises are fulfilled.

Literature: Peake, The Bible: Its Origin, Its Significance, Its Abiding Worth; G. A. Smith, Modern Criticism and the Preaching of the O.T.; W. R. Smith, The O.T. in the Jewish Church; Driver, Introduction to the Literature of the O.T.; Simpson, Pentateuchal Criticism; McFadyen, The Approach to the O.T.

THE PENTATEUCH—ITS ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT

BY PRESIDENT FREDERICK CARL EISELEN

Meaning of the Term Pentateuch. According to the arrangement in the Hebrew Bible the O.T. consists of three parts, called Law, Prophets, Writings, or, in Hebrew, Tôrâh, Nebhîîm, Kethûbîm. The first division, the Torah, so called because it embodies practically the entire legal system of the Hebrews, is sometimes called "The Five Books of Moses"; the early rabbis speak of it as "The Five-fifths of the Law," an indication that the fivefold division was introduced at a very early date; and the early church Fathers, beginning with Tertullian, employ the term, still in common use, "the Pentateuch." The full form of the name in Greek would be pentateuchos biblos, translated "five-roll book"; but in common usage the noun is omitted and pentateuchos comes to have the meaning of the complete expression freely rendered "the fivefold book." Strictly speaking teuchos denotes not the book or roll itself, but, rather, the box or chest in which it was kept; but Symmachus, an early translator of the O.T. (see art., Transmission of O.T., p. 104b), uses it as the equivalent of the Hebrew word megillâh, or "roll."

The five books in the Pentateuch are: Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy. Even the English reader can see that Genesis forms a book by itself, and so does Deuteronomy. The general contents and characteristics of Leviticus separate it from the books on either side; while the opening words of Exodus (11-7) and the closing words of Numbers (36¹³) clearly show that these two books also are considered complete in themselves.

General Contents. All the material in the five books, varied as it is, may be arranged under two heads: (1) History: The historical portions of the Pentateuch cover the period beginning with the creation of the world and ending with the encampment of the Israelite tribes in the plains of Moab. This period may be divided as follows: (a) the beginning of all things (Gen. 11-119); (b) the Hebrew patriarchs (Gen. 11¹⁰-50²⁶); (c) the Exodus from Egypt and the organization of Israel into a more or less compact national unit, with a national consciousness (the historical sections of Exodus, Numbers, Deuteronomy). No attempt is made by the authors to furnish a complete history; many events of considerable importance from the point of view of the historian are treated briefly or are passed over lightly; nevertheless, the stream of history is never wholly interrupted, and though at times it almost disappears, it always reappears and flows on to the end. (2) Law: The early readers focused their attention upon the legal elements in the Pentateuch; consequently, the books came to be known as Law or Torah (see above). Leviticus consists entirely of legal material; Exodus and Numbers are a mixture of law and history; Deuteronomy consists mainly of addresses embodying law; and even Genesis, which is chiefly narrative, mentions the laws of marriage and of the Sabbath as given in primeval times, gives regulations concerning food in the days of Noah, and relates the institution of circumcision in the time of Abraham.

The Hexateuch. It is customary among scholars at the present time to group together not only the first five books and call the collection the Pentateuch, but to add Joshua and designate the whole as the Hexateuch, i.e., the sixfold book. Joshua is added because "its contents, and, still more, its literary structure, show that it is intimately connected with the Pentateuch and describes the final stage in the history of the origines of the Hebrew nation" (see for details the commentary on Joshua). The divine promise that the descendants of Abraham should occupy Canaan, repeatedly made in Genesis and never lost sight of in the succeeding books, attains its realization only in Joshua. The following considerations probably account for the separation of the material in Joshua from the Torah: (1) Moses could not be connected with this material as its author; (2) the contents made it impossible to set it apart with the books of the Pentateuch as Torah, i.e., as an authoritative rule of life. (Much of what is said in the succeeding paragraphs concerning the Pentateuch would be valid in a discussion of the Hexateuch.)

Mosaic Authorship: the Arguments. In the latest portions of the O.T. it seems to be assumed that the Law, or Torah, is the work of Moses (Ezra 32 76 2 Chr. 34¹⁴); but it is by no means clear that in these passages "Torah" is used of the entire Pentateuch; it may refer simply to the legal system embodied in the Pentateuch, or, possibly, to only a part of this system. But whatever the significance of these and similar O.T. passages may be, Philo of Alexandria, and Josephus, the former writing near the opening of the Christian era, the latter during the closing decades of the first century A.D., proceed on the assumption that Moses wrote the entire Pentateuch, and the same may be true of some N.T. writers (Mt. 8⁴ Mk. 7¹⁰ Lk. 20³⁷, etc.). The Babylonian Talmud (Baba bathra, 14^b), embodying early official Jewish tradition, makes the definite claim: "Moses wrote his own book, the section about Balaam and Job." Only the closing verses of Deuteronomy are ascribed to Joshua, on the reasonable assumption that Moses could not have written during his lifetime the statement, "And he died there" (Deut. 34⁵). However, a commentary on this verse in the Gemara assigns even these verses to Moses, stating that he wrote them "with weeping."

The view that Moses wrote the entire Pentateuch, with the possible exception of the closing verses, maintained itself without serious opposition until the time of the Reformation; the objectors were few and exerted little influence. Conditions changed during the period of the Renaissance and the Reformation; and since then, as will be pointed out more in detail below, scholars in increasing numbers have become convinced that Moses could not be the author of the Pentateuch in anywhere near its present form (see succeeding sections of this article). On the other hand, arguments in favor of the Mosaic authorship have been put forward with much skill by those who still defend the traditional view. Limitation of space will not permit a detailed presentation of these arguments. (For a full discussion see Eisselen, The Books of the Pentateuch, chs. 4-7.) Here it may be sufficient to state the several lines of argument and to give a brief evaluation of them.

The arguments may be arranged in four groups: (1) Indirect evidence, which includes such considerations as lack of unanimity among those who deny the Mosaic authorship; the manner of literary composition practiced among the ancients; and the unity of theme and plan. (2) External evidence is found in N.T. statements, especially in the words of Jesus, in the traditions current among Jews and Christians, and in the testimony of O.T. books other than the Pentateuch. (3) Direct internal evidence consists of statements in the books of the Pentateuch themselves that Moses wrote something. (4) Greatest reliance is placed on what may be called indirect internal evidence, i.e., evidence found in the contents of the books apart from definite statements which point to Moses as the author. This argument is cumulative, and may be presented under various heads: (a) Evidence pointing to the origin of the Pentateuch in the desert; (b) the influence of Egypt reflected in the Pentateuch; (c) the lack of personal acquaintance with Palestine on the part of the author; (d) the apparent influence of Israel's nomad life on Pentateuchal legislation; (e) linguistic characteristics pointing to an early date.

What is the weight and value of these arguments? Of course, if it were possible to limit consideration to the facts and phenomena emphasized by the defenders of Mosaic authorship, and if the conclusions reached by them could be accepted without question, the arguments might appear quite formidable, if not overwhelming. However, without going into details, it may be well to keep in mind some rather important considerations (the facts presented in the succeeding sections are of great significance and should be studied in this connection; but for the present attention is being confined to a few general considerations and conclusions): (1) One cannot escape the conviction that the method followed by the defenders of the traditional view is neither fair nor scientific. Only the facts that can be interpreted in favor of Mosaic authorship are taken into account; contradictory facts are passed over lightly or are entirely ignored. (2) The only argument that has anything to do directly with the writing of the Pentateuch is the linguistic argument; but this has proved so unsatisfactory that it is now rarely used by those who know Hebrew, for the simple reason that further study has disproved the high antiquity of the alleged archaic words and forms. (3) The student of the Hebrew legal system as a whole, not of a few well-chosen examples apart from the larger context, finds it exceedingly difficult to believe that the desert wanderings furnished an opportunity for framing the intricate criminal, civil, moral, and ceremonial codes embodied in the Pentateuch.

Indeed, all that the facts presented may prove is that the Pentateuch may contain some elements originating in Mosaic times; they cannot prove that these elements were preserved in written form. Nor is it possible to point out definitely any of these Mosaic elements, for they may have undergone in the course of transmission either accidental or intentional alterations. The only conclusion warranted by the facts may be briefly expressed in these words: Whatever may be the time of the final composition or compilation of the Pentateuch, it contains elements, both historical and legal, which may have originated in the days of Moses. These elements were later modified in the spirit of the first great leader; and the result of this development, continuing throughout several centuries, is embodied in the present Pentateuch. If there were no evidence to the contrary, it might be legitimate to take a further step and ascribe the entire work to Moses. But if such a step is taken, it is in the nature of an inference and nothing more. On the other hand, fairness requires that in case there are facts that seem to militate against acceptance of Mosaic authorship, these too must be carefully examined before the final verdict is given. This examination is undertaken in the succeeding paragraphs.

Progress of Pentateuchal Criticism. As stated in the preceding section, few questions based on careful examination of facts were raised regarding the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch prior to the Reformation. In the tenth or eleventh century a Spanish Jew, Rabbi Isaac ben Jasos, pointed out that Gen. 36³¹ must be later than the founding of the Hebrew monarchy, and in the twelfth century Ibn Ezra called attention to certain passages which he found difficult to harmonize with belief in Mosaic authorship. The Renaissance and Reformation caused a marked change. The Renaissance aroused men's interest in literature and science; the Reformation aroused their interest in religion as a personal experience. In the Renaissance men began to think for themselves in matters of science and literature; in the Reformation they began to think for themselves in matters of religion. It was inevitable that the awakening of thought and the substitution of reason for authority in science, secular literature and secular history should ultimately affect sacred literature and sacred history as well. At any rate, some of the leaders in the Reformation movement, like Luther and Karlstadt, did not hesitate to express independent judgments with reference to the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. Similarly, Andreas Masius, a learned Roman Catholic, maintained that the Pentateuch received its final form from Ezra or some other man of God.

The general church, Protestant and Roman, did not adopt the liberal attitude of these leaders, but continued to regard belief in the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch an essential article of faith. Nevertheless, the facts to which earlier writers had called attention continued to assert themselves, and new facts came to be discovered; hence it is not strange that scholars within and without the church continued to insist that the belief in Mosaic authorship was not well founded (e.g., Spinoza, Hobbes, Peyrerius, Simon, Clericus, etc.), and to propose various theories in explanation of the facts. The value of these and similar discussions lies not in the conclusions reached, but in their insistence on the facts which demanded consideration and explanation.

Jean Astruc, physician of Louis XIV and professor of medicine in Paris, gave new direction to the whole investigation. He did not deny the Mosaic authorship, but following out suggestions made by earlier writers, he maintained that Moses used several literary sources, which he incorporated, practically without alteration, into the Pentateuch. On the basis of his discovery that in some sections of Genesis the divine name Elohim (God) was used, and in others Yahweh (Jehovah), he analyzed the book into two principal sources—the Elohist and the Jehovist—admitting at the same time the presence of smaller sections from nine or ten minor sources. Having compiled Genesis in this manner, Moses, he said, then wrote the remaining four books of the Pentateuch. (The Conjectures, in which this theory was set forth, was published in 1753.)

Theories of the Composition of the Pentateuch. The investigations begun by Astruc were continued by scholars during the latter part of the eighteenth and the first half of the nineteenth century. Among them were J. G. Eichhorn, W. M. L. De Wette, F. Bleek, H. Ewald, F. Tuch, K. D. Ilgen, H. Hupfeld, K. H. Graf, each of whom made one or more definite contributions to the advance in knowledge. In the course of these and later investigations, various theories were proposed to account for the complicated facts discovered by the investigators as follows: (1) The Fragment Theory, which looked upon the Pentateuch as "an agglomeration of longer and shorter fragments, between which no threads of continuous connection could be traced." The arguments in support of this theory were drawn chiefly from the middle books of the Pentateuch in which, because of the presence of extensive legal sections, the transitions are frequently quite abrupt. (2) The Supplement Theory, based upon a better appreciation of a common plan and purpose running through the entire Pentateuch. According to this theory, the Elohist portion of the Pentateuch was the oldest; subsequently this was revised by the Jehovist, who annotated the older work and added to it a considerable number of new and independent sections. Deuteronomy was thought to be the latest addition. (3) The Document Theory, which is a modification of the Supplement theory made necessary by advance along two lines: (a) The discovery in 1853 by Hupfeld of a second Elohim source; (b) a better understanding of the interrelation of the different literary layers in the Pentateuch. The theory owes its name to the fact that by those who accept it the Pentateuch in its present form is thought to be the result of the compilation of material coming from at least four documents, each of which is thought to have had originally an independent existence. (In a sense the Fragment Theory as well as the Supplement Theory might be called Document theories, because both of them recognize the presence of material coming from different sources; but in each of the three cases the term used is descriptive of the most significant characteristic.) Though in the course of time various symbols have been used to designate the four documents, and though even now complete uniformity is lacking, at present the four documents are generally known as J, E, D, P. The first, called J, i.e., the Jehovistic document, uses in the sections narrating events prior to the call of Moses the divine name Jehovah; E, the Elohist document, uses in the corresponding sections the divine name Elohim; D, the Deuteronomic Code, furnishes the heart of the present book of Deuteronomy; P, the Priestly Code, is a document combining both history and law, which owes its name to the fact that it is written from a distinctively priestly point of view. These four documents in turn are thought to embody material taken from still earlier sources which had an independent existence in written or oral form.

The Graf-Wellhausen Theory. The Document Theory is the prevailing theory at the present time, but not in the form in which it was first presented. After undergoing various transformations it emerged in a form now commonly known as the Graf-Wellhausen Theory, or the Development Theory, and it is in this form that it is most widely accepted at the present time. The theory derives its name from the fact that two of its most convincing exponents were K. H. Graf—a pupil of Edward Reuss, one of the first scholars pointing the way to the new view—and Julius Wellhausen, one of the foremost O.T. scholars of the past generation. The special contribution of the theory to Pentateuchal research was the determination of the chronological order and of the dates of the several documents. The four documents are thought to have originated in the order J, E, D, P, and their dates, not considering later additions, were fixed as follows: for J, about 850 B.C.; E, about 750 B.C.; D, about 650 B.C.; P, about 500–350 B.C. Other scholars assisting in the development of this theory are: W. Vatke, J. F. L. George, A. Kayser, A. Kuenen, etc. Modern scholars, with few exceptions, accept in all essentials the conclusions of the Graf-Wellhausen school regarding the order and dates of the Pentateuchal documents. A few still date E earlier than J, and a smaller number date P earlier than D; and there are some who, while accepting the theory in substance, assign the documents to dates earlier than those given above.

In more recent years scholars who accept the general position of the Graf-Wellhausen theory have given special attention to the determination of the age of the material embodied in the several documents. The earlier adherents of the theory were inclined to assign not only the completed documents, but also practically all the material embodied in them to relatively late dates. Later investigations have clearly shown that this tendency was unwarranted, and that much of the material, both historical and legal, originated very early and was handed down, orally or in written form, until finally it was given a place in the longer documents. H. Gunkel, A. Merx, H. Winckler, A. Jeremias, R. Kittel, and others have been very active in the pursuit of this particular line of study.

Criticism of These Theories. It must not be thought that during all these centuries no efforts were made to uphold and defend the Mosaic authorship. During the earlier post-Reformation period several defenders of the traditional views came to the front, among them Huet, a Jesuit; Heidegger, a Calvinist; and Carpzov, a Lutheran; others, while admitting the possibility of later additions and revisions, insisted that the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch in substantially its present form might be maintained. Among these writers the more prominent were Du Pin, Witsius, Spanheim, Prideaut, Vitringa, Calmet. During the nineteenth century Hengstenberg, Haevernick, Keil, Green, and a few others, all of them splendidly equipped from the point of view of scholarship, did their best to uphold or re-establish the traditional views. The twentieth century has not produced a single defender of the Mosaic authorship who can compare with these men in intellectual power, in a grasp of the problems involved, or in ability to marshal his arguments.

Some scholars, admitting a degree of truth in the newer views, but unwilling to accept them in their entirety, have proposed theories of their own, which, they believe, explain the facts without departing so far from traditional views. Here belong men like A. Klostermann, Jas. Orr, B. D. Eerdmans, J. Dahse, A. Trøgelstra, H. M. Wiener, and others. Most of these more recent views do not represent a return to the old traditional position, but are a combination of the Supplement Theory and a modified Document Theory. Unfortunately, as has been pointed out so forcefully by Professor Skinner (The Divine Names in Genesis, passim), the textual-critical foundations on which these views are largely based are rather insecure. In other words, though many minute questions of Pentateuchal criticism are still obscure, and though some of the views now held may have to undergo modifications, the Document Theory, as presented in its main outlines by the Graf-Wellhausen school, appears to have the better of the argument at the present time.

The Pentateuch a Compilation. The modern critical view of the origin and development of the Pentateuch includes the following items: (1) The Pentateuch is a relatively late compilation of material taken from written sources, all of which reached their final form subsequently to the time of Moses. (2) The compiler depended chiefly upon four documents: J, traces of which are found throughout the entire Pentateuch; E, closely interwoven with J and, like it, found throughout the Pentateuch; D, found chiefly in the book of Deuteronomy, though traces of it are found also elsewhere; P, which served as the groundwork for the entire compilation. (3) D is identical with the Book of the Law that served as the basis of Josiah's reform in 621 B.C.; it was in existence separately at that time; hence the Pentateuch in its final form cannot be older than that date, though some of the material embodied in it may be much older. (4) J and E are both older than D, and, according to most investigators, D is older than P. (5) The several documents show such striking differences that, on the whole, it is quite easy to separate them.

Any adequate discussion of the modern view must therefore include at least four points: (1) The Pentateuch is a compilation of material from different documents written at different times. (2) The Pentateuch contains some material that originated subsequently to the time of Moses. (3) The Book of the Law found in the days of Josiah was not the Pentateuch in its final form but the Deuteronomic Code. (4) The Pentateuch in its present form is the result of gradual growth during several centuries following the age of Moses.

In support of the claim that the Pentateuch is a compilation of material taken from different sources, attention is called to the following facts:

(1) The peculiar use of the divine names Jehovah (Yahweh) and Elohim in narratives of events prior to the call and commission of Moses. There are large sections of Genesis and of the opening chapters of Exodus which systematically use the name Jehovah, while others with equal consistency use Elohim. (See the table in Eiselen, The Books of the Pentateuch, p. 125.) Is there any significance in the fact that in Gen. 11-24a, the account of creation, Elohim is used thirty-five times and Jehovah not at all, while in 24b-25, also dealing with creation, the combination Jehovah-Elohim is used exclusively? Does it mean anything that in Gen. 12-16 Jehovah is used twenty-seven times and Elohim not at all? Or, why is it that in Gen. 33-50 Jehovah occurs but once, while El or Elohim is found fifty-seven times? Is it strange that even with only facts like these before them scholars should reach the conclusion that the peculiarity in this use of the divine names points to the use of at least two distinct documents in the composition of Genesis? (This was the Document Theory as presented by Astruc; later investigation led to the discovery of a third document in Genesis, and finally to the recognition of the composite character of the entire Pentateuch.) Of course various attempts have been made to explain the usage described without assuming the use of different documents (see Eiselen, The Books of the Pentateuch, ch. 8), but the present writer is quite convinced that the facts in the case receive a natural and satisfactory explanation only on the assumption that the author had access to at least two different sources, one believing that the name Jehovah was known from the beginning, the other, that it was first revealed to Moses (Ex. 313-16 62, 3).

(2) The presence of repetitions and discrepancies both in the narrative and the legal portions of the Pentateuch. Would such duplications appear in a work coming in its entirety from one and the same author? We find them in both the narrative and the legal portions, as follows:

(a) In the narrative portions: Repetitions and discrepancies, which are found in large numbers, are of three kinds: (i) In some instances the duplicate narratives appear side by side, as in the case of the story of creation (cf. Gen. 11-24a with 24b-25). While attempts have been made to deny the presence of parallel accounts, as a matter of fact these two chapters cannot be satisfactorily explained except on the assumption that we are face to face with two distinct accounts, which must be traced to two different authors. (ii) In other cases it may seem to the casual reader that he is dealing with a single continuous story; and yet closer study reveals the presence of repetitions and even discrepancies which show that the narrative in its present form is the result of compilation. Thus a careful reading of the narrative of the Flood (Gen. 6-9) reveals two accounts of man's corruption and God's consequent displeasure; also repetitions in the statements concerning the entering into the ark, the rising of the water, the perishing of all living creatures and the drying of the earth; some passages speak of one pair of every kind of animals being taken into the ark, while others distinguish between clean and unclean animals and state that of the former seven pairs of each were preserved; according to some verses the Flood continued for forty days, according to others, one hundred and fifty.

(iii) There are, in addition to these cases pointing in the direction of compilation, some parallel accounts of the same events, not placed side by side, but found in different parts of the Pentateuch. Under this head may be mentioned duplicate accounts of the origin of names like Beersheba (Gen. 21³¹ and 26^{32, 33}), Bethel (Gen. 28^{18, 19} and 35¹⁵), Israel (Gen. 32²⁸ and 35¹⁰); there are two accounts of the promise of a son to Abraham (Gen. 17¹⁶⁻¹⁹ and 18⁹⁻¹⁵); the father-in-law of Moses bears two different names (Ex. 2¹⁸ and 3¹); there are two accounts of the sending of manna and quails (Ex. 16 Num. 11), etc.

(b) In the legal portions. Repetitions and discrepancies here are equally numerous, but again only a few typical illustrations may be given: (i) Attention may be called to differences in the legislation concerning the place of sacrifice. According to the Book of the Covenant, Jehovah may be worshiped in different places—in every place where he may record his name, and the altar must be built of earth or unhewn stone (Ex. 20^{24, 25}); the Deuteronomic Code prohibits repeatedly and emphatically the worship of Jehovah at local sanctuaries, and insists with the same emphasis that his worship should be centered in one place (Deut. 12²⁻⁷; cf. 14²³ 16^{2, 6, 7}, etc.); the Priestly Code specifies that the same altar which, according to Ex. 20^{24, 25}, is to be made of earth or unhewn stone, is to be built of acacia wood (Ex. 27¹).

(ii) Similar differences may be seen in the laws with reference to the priesthood. The Book of the Covenant knows no priestly race; it agrees with the earlier historical records, which assume that the priests may be taken from any tribe, and that the heads of families may offer sacrifice (e.g., Judg. 13¹⁹ 1 Sam. 7¹⁷ 20²⁹ 1 Kings 18^{30f.}, etc.); Deuteronomy recognizes a priestly tribe—the Levites (17^{9, 18} 18¹ 21⁵), implying everywhere that the priesthood was limited to the tribe of Levi and, also, that all the members of the tribe of Levi were priests; the Priestly Code expresses a still different view, namely, that the priesthood is limited to a particular family within the tribe of Levi, the sons of Aaron; while it assigns to other members of the tribe the lower offices and tasks connected with the sanctuary (Ex. 28¹ Num. 35-10 18¹⁻⁷).

(3) Differences in theological conception, style, and vocabulary constitute another argument in favor of the composite character of the Pentateuch. These differences are discussed in greater detail in the succeeding paragraphs; hence it may be sufficient here simply to call attention to some striking differences in the two stories of creation (Gen. 11-24^a and 24^{b-25}). Note, for instance, the primitive God concept reflected in the second, which is the earlier, of these stories: "Jehovah-Elohim" is said to "form" or "fashion" man and the animals, and to "breathe" into man's nostrils the breath of life; he "takes" a rib from the man's body, "closes up" the opening, and "builds" the rib into a woman; he "plants" the garden, "takes" man and "sets him down" in it, etc. It requires no extraordinary powers of observation to see that the conception of Deity in the first, or later narrative in ch. 1 moves on a much higher, more spiritual, and more ethical plane. Moreover, even the English reader of these stories can appreciate certain striking differences in style, and at least the student of Hebrew is impressed by certain easily traced differences in vocabulary. Then when we remember that the same differences characterize the rest of the Pentateuch it becomes practically impossible to escape the conviction that, whoever may have been responsible for putting the Pentateuch in its present form, he must have drawn material from different literary sources composed by different authors.

Characteristics of the Four Principal Pentateuchal Documents. For the sake of clearness a brief statement may here be made regarding the peculiarities of language, style, and thought which differentiate the principal sources used by the compiler.

(1) Peculiarities of language. A full appreciation of the facts here enumerated requires a knowledge of Hebrew; but even the English reader can recognize some of the linguistic peculiarities. The following words are characteristic of J: "Jehovah" is the name of the God of Israel in the narratives of pre-Mosaic times; "Sinai," not Horeb, is the name of the mountain on which the Law was given; "Israel," not Jacob, is the name of the third patriarch, following the birth of Benjamin; "Canaanites" is the name used to designate the inhabitants of Palestine; "Aram Naharaim" is the regular name for Mesopotamia; "Egypt" is used, as the equivalent of Egyptian. Characteristic phrases are: "To find favor (or grace) in the sight of . . ."; "to call on the name of . . ."; "to run to meet . . ."; "took him a wife"; "to preserve seed alive"; "to dwell in the midst of. . . ." The longer form of the pronoun of the first person, anôkhî, is used, not anî; the Hebrew particle na is frequently used with the imperative for the sake of emphasis.

As characteristic of E may be noted: "Elohim," not Jehovah, is the divine name in the E sections of Genesis; "Amorites," not Canaanites, is the name of the pre-Israelitish inhabitants of Palestine; "Horeb," not Sinai, is the name of the mountain of God; "Jacob" is used in preference to Israel as the name of the third patriarch, from Gen. 32³² on; "Jethro" is the name of the father-in-law of Moses. Among characteristic expressions are: "the man Moses"; "to bring up" (from the land of Egypt) instead of "to bring out," as in J.

D also has its characteristic words or phrases (for since J and E were in existence when D was written, we might expect to find indications that the author was influenced by the language of both these earlier documents): As in E, "Horeb," not Sinai, is the name of the mountain on which the Law was given. Some of the striking phrases are: "that your days may be long"; "a mighty hand and a stretched out arm"; "the stranger, the fatherless and the widow"; "and remember that thou wast a bondman in Egypt"; "to do what is right (or evil) in the eyes of Jehovah"; "with all the heart and with all the soul"; "to observe to do."

The linguistic peculiarities of P are exceedingly numerous. Driver (Introduction to the Literature of the O.T., 1910 edition, pp. 131f.) enumerates fifty expressions characteristic of the narrative sections of P, many of which appear rarely or never elsewhere, some of them only in Ezekiel: "Elohim," not Jehovah, is used in Genesis; "Paddan Aram" is the regular name for Mesopotamia; "Sinai," as in J, not Horeb, is the mountain of God; anî, the shorter form of the pronoun of the first person, is used one hundred and thirty times, the longer form anôkhî only once; ammim, literally "peoples," is used in the sense of "kinsfolk," especially in the two expressions, "That soul shall be cut off from his kinsfolk," and "to be gathered unto one's kinsfolk." Other characteristic phrases are: "to be fruitful and multiply"; "this selfsame day" (literally, "the bone of this day"); "after their families"; "soul" (Hebrew, nephesh) in the sense of "person"; "throughout their generations"; "congregation of the Israelites"; "according to the mouth (i.e., command) of . . ."

(2) Peculiarities of style. Even the reader of the English Bible can "feel" certain differences in the style of different sections of the Pentateuch. As in other matters, the differences between J and E are not as great as those between JE on the one hand and D and P on the other; which is due to the fact that J and E come from approximately the same age—the creative age of prophetic narration, both of them representing the same general point of view. It may be noted, however, that J dwells less than E upon concrete particulars, while it excels in the power of delineating life and character. Its author is, indeed, the best narrator in the Bible. E is perhaps a little more terse in style, but its narratives are on the whole so well told that it is not easy to see wherein they fall short of J, except that at times they lack the spontaneous charm and strength of the other. The style of P is much less spontaneous; it is "stereotyped, measured, and prosaic"; the descriptions are "precise and methodical"; there is a tendency to describe an act or event in full each time it is mentioned; P shows a preference for "standing formulæ and expressions." In general, it seems that the author's practical acquaintance with the Law created certain habits of thought and forms of expression which he carried over into his treatment of purely historical subjects. In a comparison of style D might almost be left out of consideration because, while J and E are chiefly historical, D represents legal literature; this difference in subject matter would inevitably produce differences in style, even though the author were the same. However, it is possible to institute comparisons between D and the legal sections of P: The style of the latter is cold, legal, formal, and precise; that of the former rhetorical and hortatory, closely resembling that of the great prophets. The differences in style and vocabulary—much more numerous than this brief list would seem to indicate—cannot be explained, as has been attempted, on the basis of difference in theme or subject matter, because in many instances the differences appear in sections dealing with one and the same theme.

(3) Peculiarities of theological thought. J reflects a very primitive and pronounced anthropomorphic conception of the Deity. Jehovah is represented not only as forming human resolutions and as swayed by human emotions, which is common in other and later books, as well, but also as performing his acts in a human way (cf. illustrations from the story of creation, above, under section (3) of "The Pentateuch a Compilation"). J shows less tendency than is seen in other parts of the Pentateuch to explain significant events by appeal to the extraordinary, supernatural, miraculous; there is more general recognition of the play of natural forces. This appears, e.g., in the stories of the plagues of Egypt (Ex. 8:1-4, 20-32 9:1-7, etc.; compare these with 8:5-7 9:8-12, etc.), and of the crossing of the Red Sea (Ex. 14:21). E reflects different and more advanced theological ideas. True, these narratives still recognize the legitimacy of the local sanctuaries and their equipment, but they give no support to unspiritual practices of worship, and the putting away of "strange gods" meets the author's full approval. The God of these parts does not appear in bodily form but in dreams (Gen. 20:3 31:24 Num. 22:9, 20), and he carries out his plans through the ministry of angels (Gen. 21:17 22:11 28:12). Closely connected with this conception is the representation of Abraham as a prophet (Gen. 20:7), while Moses, though not called a prophet, is intrusted with a prophetic mission (Ex. 3). Though the standpoint of both J and E is prophetic, there is in E less evidence of conscious ethical and theological reflection. D also has its own characteristic theological conceptions. It will have nothing to do with the local sanctuaries, because they have corrupted Jehovah worship and have led to such differences in the conception of Jehovah that in reality Israel was worshipping at its various sanctuaries not one Jehovah but a number of different Jehovahs; hence the insistence in Deut. 6:4, "Jehovah our God is one Jehovah" (cf. 6:5 10:12 11:1, 13, 22 for a statement of the fundamental law of Deuteronomy). While J and E consider the "pillar" perfectly legitimate, D prohibits it (Deut. 16:21, 22); unlike J and E, D insists again and again that there is only one legitimate place of worship (Deut. 12:5, 11, 14, 18, 21, 26, etc.); unlike P (see next paragraph) D recognizes all the Levites as priests (Deut. 17:9, 18 18:1 21:5).

The theological conceptions of P present striking contrasts to those of the other sources. The representation of God is much less anthropomorphic, and there are no angels or dreams as means of divine communication. The author's outlook is narrow; the promises made to the patriarchs are restricted to Israel, and the writer's ideal is the Israelitish theocracy. In the legal sections of P religion is defined largely in terms of ritual and form, which is at variance with the spirit of J and E; there is an elaborate ritual for the offering of sacrifice, and great prominence is given to sin and trespass offerings, not mentioned elsewhere in the Pentateuch. A sharp distinction is made between the priests and the Levites (see above); only here is introduced the high priest with all his functions and privileges.

Post-Mosaic Elements in the Pentateuch.

Astruc, who saw evidences of compilation only in Genesis, could hold that Moses was the compiler of Genesis and then wrote the rest of the Pentateuch (see above, under "Progress of Pentateuchal Criticism"). Later investigation, as has been pointed out in the preceding paragraphs, has convinced scholars that the entire Pentateuch is a compilation. If this conclusion is warranted—and the present writer believes that it is—belief in the Mosaic authorship becomes practically impossible. Some time must have elapsed between the last event recorded—the death of Moses—and the production of the compilation in its present form. There are, however, some additional specific considerations that strengthen the conviction that Moses was not the author, such as the presence of references and passages which by their very contents imply that they were written subsequently to the time of Moses (for details see Eiselen, The Books of the Pentateuch, ch. 11). There are, for instance, certain literary considerations, e.g., the use of the third person in referring to Moses (Ex. 6:26, 27 Num. 33:2), or the account of Moses' death (Deut. 34:1-8). Some of the geographical terms point in the same direction. The territory east of the Jordan is called "beyond Jordan" (Num. 32 Deut. 15 44:1, 46, 47, 49), implying that the author lived west of the Jordan, which would not be true of Moses. Residence in Palestine is suggested also by the use of the geographical term neghebh, i.e., the southern portion of Judah, with the general meaning "south," and of the term "sea," i.e., the Mediterranean Sea, with the general meaning "west." The name "Hebron" (Gen. 13:18 23:2 37:14 Num. 13:22) was of post-Mosaic origin (Josh. 14:15 15:13); the same is true of the name "Dan" (cf. Gen. 14:14 Deut. 34:1 with Judg. 18:29). In the same direction point passages like Deut. 34:1 (cf. Judg. 10:3, 4) and Gen. 40:15.

A number of historical statements or allusions also imply a post-Mosaic date. Thus Gen. 36:31 presupposes the establishment of the monarchy in Israel, generations after the time of Moses; the expression "the Canaanite was then in the land" (Gen. 12:6 13:7) has no meaning unless it was written at a time when the Canaanites had disappeared at least as an independent people. Deut. 21:2 refers to the conquest as an accomplished fact; Ex. 15:13, 17 presupposes the establishment of Jehovah's sanctuary on Mount Zion, which was not the case until the days of David. If Moses wrote the entire Pentateuch, it is not strange that he was in doubt regarding the name of his own father-in-law (cf. Ex. 2:18 Num.

10²⁹ with Ex. 31 18¹). Moreover, the characterization of Moses in certain passages reads as if it came from someone other than Moses (e.g., Ex. 11³ Num. 12³ Deut. 34¹⁰). The legal sections of the Pentateuch contain some enactments which presuppose a background other than that of the desert (e.g., Ex. 23¹⁹ Deut. 19¹⁴), and there are some archaeological notes which seem to have originated at a relatively late date (e.g., Ex. 30¹³, 34 38²⁴⁻²⁶ Deut. 31¹).

Frequently the assertion is made that there is no good reason for denying the passages mentioned and others of a similar nature to Moses, that practically all of them can be interpreted as coming from him, and that the few exceptions may be regarded as later interpolations, without assuming that the whole work is a relatively late compilation. But while it is true that Moses might perhaps have written some of the passages enumerated, others cannot possibly come from him; and in every case the only natural interpretation is that which ascribes the passage to another author. Again, while some of the passages might perhaps be thrown out as interpolations, others are so closely bound up with their context that they would carry with them large sections of the Pentateuch, and the resulting breaking up of continuity in narration would increase rather than diminish the difficulties. On the other hand, the difficulties disappear if it is admitted that the narratives or the legal sections in which the alleged post-Mosaic elements are found were written in the periods to which modern scholarship assigns them.

Chronological Order of the Pentateuchal Documents. Is it possible to arrange in chronological order the documents from which the material used in the compilation of the Pentateuch was taken? Scholars have sought to find an answer to this inquiry by studying the documents along the following lines: (1) the historical situation reflected in the documents; (2) the theological standpoint expressed or implied; (3) the relation of the Pentateuchal documents to other O.T. writings; (4) peculiarities of vocabulary and style; (5) the relation of the documents to each other.

The conclusions reached may be summarized as follows: (1) J and E reflect the historical situation of the period of the Judges and of the early monarchy; D that of the later monarchy, especially conditions reflected in the account of Josiah's reforms in 621 B.C. and in the utterances of Jeremiah; P that of the later exilic and the post-exilic period, especially the age of Ezra and Nehemiah. (2) In the case of each of the four documents the theological standpoint agrees with what is known of Hebrew theological thinking during the period to which it is assigned on the basis of the historical situation reflected in it. (3) J and E have points of contact with O.T. writings known to have originated before 650 B.C. (e.g., the prophetic books of the eighth century); D with the literature that originated between 650 B.C. and the Exile (e.g., Kings, Jeremiah); P with that of the post-exilic period (Malachi, Ezra, Nehemiah, Chronicles). D seems to have been unknown prior to the seventh century, P before the Exile. (4) The style and vocabulary of each document are what they might be expected to be if the documents were actually written during the periods to which the historical background assigns them. (5) In their legal as in their historical sections JE, D, and P represent three successive stages of development—P implies the prior existence of D, D the prior existence of J and E. (6) The available evidence points to the following approximate dates for the documents: J belongs to the early centuries of the monarchy, perhaps about 850 B.C.; E originated not long before the appearance of the eighth-century prophets, about 750 B.C.; D presupposes the activity of the eighth-century prophets and may have been written during the reactionary reign of Manasseh, about 650 B.C.; P originated among the descendants of the exiles in Babylonia, about 500 to 450 B.C., and was completed in Palestine in the days of Ezra-Nehemiah, before 400 B.C. This statement regarding the dates of the documents does not exclude the possibility of some material having been added subsequently.

Growth of the Pentateuch. The successive stages in the development of the Pentateuch may be outlined as follows:

(1) The earliest literary period in Israel, as among other peoples, was preceded by an age of song and story. The songs, which centered around significant happenings in the life of the family, clan or tribe, or portrayed the heroic exploits of individuals, were highly prized, and were recited or sung both by the common people and by professional singers. Alongside of these songs grew up stories and legends glorifying important persons and events. Some of this material undoubtedly goes back to pre-Mosaic times.

(2) In time collections of these songs were made (cf. Num. 21¹⁴ and Josh. 10¹³; also art., The Poetic and Wisdom Literature, p. 154). Similarly individual stories came to be combined in cycles, each cycle centering around an outstanding personality (cf. the patriarchal narratives).

(3) Following the occupation of Palestine, the Hebrews assimilated in large part the native population and rededicated to Jehovah many of its local shrines. With the sanctuaries some of the traditions which had grown up around these sacred places were taken over by the conquerors.

(4) Gradually the new religion introduced by Moses permeated the pre-Mosaic material and led to various modifications that brought this material into harmony with the new and higher religious and ethical conceptions.

(5) The entrance into Palestine meant the transition from a nomadic to a more settled mode of living. This forward step necessitated the adaptation of old laws and the formulation of new laws to meet the new needs. At some of the sanctuaries collections of such laws may have been made (e.g., the Book of the Covenant, Ex. 20²²⁻²³¹⁹). In the same places efforts may have been made to preserve in connected and more permanent form the early songs and stories.

(6) During the period of the United Monarchy traces of connected prose writing first appear. After the division of the kingdom this new literary interest continued to flourish. Finally it resulted, in the prophetic circles, in the collection of ancient songs and stories, their revision under the influence of the prophetic ideas and ideals, and their compilation into extensive "histories," tracing human history back to the beginning of man's life upon earth. Several of these "histories" may have been produced, but only two of them, J and E, the former written in Judah, the latter in Israel, seriously affected the growth of the Pentateuch.

(7) Probably during the reactionary reign of Manasseh, when the lessons taught in J and E needed to be impressed upon the people, the two documents were combined into a single continuous narrative. J was made the basis of the combination, because (a) J was a document of Judah, where the combination was made; and (b) the Northern Kingdom had disappeared in 722 B.C.; consequently E, as the product of a foreign and no longer existent people, had to be content with a secondary position.

(8) At approximately the same time D assumed literary form. In a sense, D is a compromise between priestly and prophetic ideals. The author (or authors), who possessed all the moral fervor of the eighth-century prophets, sought to make the prophetic teaching more effective by making it more concrete. Hence he retained, as far as possible, existing forms, usages, and traditions and poured into them a deeper and more spiritual significance.

(9) After the acceptance of D as the law of the land, during the reign of Josiah, the desirability of combining the new law code with the earlier documents, JE, which had come to occupy an important position, was recognized. This feeling was strengthened by the dissolution of the national life, when the few remains of national and sacred literature came to be highly prized. Consequently, some time during the sixth century B.C., D was united with JE, the compiler, or compilers, introducing into the older work such modifications as were necessary to maintain or establish logical connection.

(10) The publication of the "prophetic" D caused the priests to feel that their own interests were in danger and that the phase of religion represented by them might suffer; hence, shortly before the Exile in 586 B.C., they collected the laws dealing with priestly interests and ideals into a short code, which by modern scholars is called the "Law of Holiness" (Lev. 17-26; see commentary on Leviticus).

(11) During the Exile, especially through the efforts of Ezekiel, Deutero-Isaiah and their collaborators, religion became spiritualized. But while this spiritualizing process was going on the question seems to have arisen in the minds of some: The higher stage of religion having been reached, how may the lapses of the past be avoided? The answer was: By insisting upon obedience to definite rules and regulations. With the promulgation of D the reign of written law had its beginning; the Law of Holiness and the laws of Ezekiel (chs. 40-48) mark further steps in the development of legalism; but the culmination of the legalistic tendency may be seen in P, which originated among the exiles in Babylon.

(12) The new law, backed by the authority of Moses, soon came to be accepted as final authority. The seat of authority was transferred from the present experience of communion with God to laws which were thought to have originated at a time when God was believed to have been especially close to his people. This new interest in the law impelled a priest or priests who were under the influence of the new point of view to rewrite the early history of Israel, tracing it back to creation, perhaps for the sole purpose of furnishing a proper historical setting for the laws of P.

(13) The necessity of amalgamating the two parallel histories of the Mosaic and pre-Mosaic ages, JED and P, must have been felt soon after the compilation of P. As long as the two existed as separate works side by side, they would seem to compete for recognition as the authoritative word of Moses or of Jehovah. Serious conflict could be avoided only by uniting the two into one continuous work. The task may have been undertaken by Ezra, or, if not by him, by some contemporary who was in hearty sympathy with the ideals of P.

(14) Thus, aside from minor alterations made at a still later time, the Pentateuch reached its completed form before 400 B.C. The finished work was called Torah or Law. Subsequently it was divided at natural dividing points into five parts or books, so that the whole came to be known as the Five-fifths of the Law; from this designation came the name Pentateuch, meaning Five-Roll Treatise, which was coined by Greek writers, from whom it passed into Latin and other western languages.

Permanent Value of the Pentateuch. In the introduction to the commentary on Genesis attention is called to the permanent value of that book from the standpoint both of history and of religion, and in the proper places brief statements on the same subject are made in connection with the other books of the Pentateuch. Consequently, it is not necessary in this connection to do more than to sum up in a few words the entire situation with reference to the permanent value of the Pentateuch. Elsewhere the present writer has written concerning Gen. 1-11: "The purpose of the narratives being primarily religious, it is only natural that the lessons reflected in them should be religious lessons. The one supreme truth taught throughout the entire section is 'In the beginning God'; but each separate narrative teaches its now characteristic lessons." (For a concise statement of the more important truths expressed or implied, see Driver, The Book of Genesis, p. 70.) The patriarchal narratives which follow are of the highest value both historically and religiously; and a similar statement may be made with reference to the other narrative sections of the Pentateuch. All the important incidents in the early history of Israel as recorded in the Pentateuch remain unaffected by modern conclusions regarding the origin of these books; nor is their religious value affected. These narratives still reveal the hand of God in the events culminating in the organization of Hebrew national life, and they still furnish striking illustrations of the reality of a Divine Providence.

The inherent value of the laws embodied in the narrative portions remains the same whether they come from Moses or were, as modern scholars believe, the product of the divinely guided experience of the nation from Moses to Ezra. The modern view does not alter the fact that the Hebrews were the first to learn and to teach that the supreme goal of life is righteousness and to give expression to pure and lofty ethics in objective law. The principles of Hebrew legislation, whether they were established by Moses or by some other man or men of God, remain to this day the "bone and marrow" of the world's greatest legal systems. Whenever the Decalogue assumed literary form, "the marvelous perfection of this summary of moral law, its intrinsic excellency, the universal applicability of its several precepts, and their abiding and unchanging nature, place these commandments in advance of anything to be found elsewhere in the annals of human legislation" (Terry, Moses and the Prophets, p. 28). Thus it is with the entire legal system. Modern scholarship does not tend to deny or doubt that the laws of Israel are permeated by a Divine Spirit, for the important question is not, When, where and by whom were these laws written? but, Do the character and spirit of the laws bear witness to the presence of God?

Literature: Keil, Introduction to the Canonical Scriptures of the O.T.; Raven, O.T. Introduction (these two represent the traditional point of view); Driver, Introduction to the Literature of the O.T.; McFadyen, An Introduction to the O.T.; Bewer, Literature of the O.T.; Green, The Higher Criticism of the Pentateuch (traditional); Wiener, The Origin of the Pentateuch (traditional); Brightman, The Sources of the Hexateuch; Simpson, Pentateuchal Criticism; Eiselein, The Books of the Pentateuch.

THE LEGAL AND HISTORICAL LITERATURE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

BY PROFESSOR W. G. JORDAN

Literature and Life. Literature suggests life; it is often defined as an expression and criticism of life. Law, on the other hand, is apt to be regarded as something cold and hard. But both law and "literature" existed before "letters"; and in diverse literary forms the records of ancient customs and traditions have been preserved. It will be our purpose in this brief sketch to show that in different forms and degrees they are revelations of a growing experience through which the spirit of God has given a unique and permanent gift to the world's religious life.

The literature with which this article is concerned arose in Palestine during the period between 1200 B.C. and 150 B.C.; but it had its roots in a more distant past and its successors in later Jewish literature. It passed through various stages as oral transmission, general literature, sacred literature and finally canonical literature. (See art., Formation of O.T., p. 91.) While the dates of the different parts of this literature can be fixed only approximately, a fairly reliable outline has been reached which shows a living movement not accounted for by the genius of any group of men or the toils of any one generation but suggests "a discipline" (Deut. 81-5) which links all these into an organic whole and gives an impression of spiritual unity. This outline has been made possible by the study of separate yet related lines of history, political, literary and linguistic, ecclesiastical and religious. It can claim to have solved some large problems and revealed many smaller ones not easy to solve. Both in the region of law and history it has shown that there are strata in the documents which reveal separate stages in a life that was never at rest and never as simple as a superficial view would suggest.

Modern investigations have given a large background to the Nearer East. Archaeology and comparative religion have made clear two things: (1) the great age of "civilization," thus making Hebrews and Greeks comparatively modern people, and (2) the fact that though a religion may in a real sense be traced to a great man as its founder, e.g., Moses, it was not written upon an empty page but was cast into the soil as a living seed which had to struggle for its life in the midst of a luxuriant crop of what came later to be regarded as "weeds." In Palestine to-day types of religious belief and practice may be found against which the men of prophetic spirit, in Israel, had to fight through those thousand years of conflict and progress. In the beginning criticism tended to be negative in its view of the primitive period; further investigation, however, has clearly shown that the origin of the national unity of the Hebrews and the foundation of their religion were linked together in the great crisis in connection with which they came into the land which was to be the scene of their historical and religious life. The sublime figure of the great leader, Moses, who himself never crossed the Jordan, is magnified rather than dwarfed by the mists that surround "the Exodus."

THE LAW-LITERATURE

A religious movement in early days was bound to center round a great personality who, in a simple form, united in himself some of the qualities of priest, prophet and statesman. Many modern scholars maintain that the "Ten Words" of Ex. 20¹⁻¹⁷ can, when freed from later expansions, be traced back to Moses. That question, as also the relation of this small group of laws to Deut. 5⁶⁻²¹, is too complicated for discussion here. We must, however, conceive of Moses as one who, by uniting a number of tribes in the worship of Jehovah, lifted religion above the low nature worship, and thus started a movement which could reveal all that was implied in it only through the struggles which at times threatened to destroy it, and through the God-given teachers who in defending the teaching of Moses raised it to a higher level. (Ex. 34 probably contains an older and ritualistic decalogue.)

Babylonian and Hebrew Law. Questions have been raised about the background of the Hebrew law-literature, especially since the discovery (in 1901) of the Code of Hammurabi, who was king of Babylon about 2,000 B.C. The Empire of Babylonia was then in a flourishing condition and the Hammurabi code reflects the life of a highly organized community whose social conditions and commercial interests had to be carefully defined and regulated. The contrast between the circumstances and needs of this vast Babylonian organization and the small settlements of Hebrew tribes is very great. The superiority of Babylonian civilization is reflected in the existence of law and judicial procedure far in advance of anything that Israel could have required; nevertheless, the similarities between the two systems are striking, one conspicuous example being the retention of the primitive "law of like" (Mt. 538). Some have traced these similarities to direct literary dependence; however, in most instances it is not a question of "borrowing"; the two peoples belonged to the same racial stock, known as the Semites; their roots went back to a common life in the distant past. From the common Semitic culture developed both the Babylonian and the Hebrew civilization, the Semities of Babylonia reaching an advanced degree of civilization long before the younger branch that we call Hebrews had passed the semi-nomadic stage. (See further art., O.T. and Archaeology, p. 114.) The connection of the Babylonian code is closest with the collection of laws called "The Book of the Covenant" (Ex. 20-23).

The Book of the Covenant. In very early times short lists of rules were arranged in fives and tens to help retention by memory. Later longer codes grew out of these and were absorbed into still larger collections. The Book of the Covenant (Ex. 20:22-23:33) is the earliest of these. This collection of laws has been subjected to a searching analysis, which has revealed the fact that while it consists of various elements, it is, on the whole, the code of a pastoral people. There seems to be a distinction between "words"—direct and absolute divine commands—and "judgments"—judicial decisions or common law. The aim throughout is the rule of Jehovah's people by laws that are just to all classes, slaves as well as free men.

The Deuteronomic Code. Deuteronomy comes into the life of the people two or three centuries later, after the Northern Kingdom had been broken. The book in its present form consists of three elements—historical reviews, exhortations, and laws. It is with the latter that we are now concerned. Those laws are called specially "Deuteronomic" that are linked to the demand for centralizing the worship of Jehovah in Jerusalem. The effort to centralize Jehovah worship grew out of the conviction that while there had been many Baals, Jehovah is One, and that the purity of worship could be maintained only if it were confined to a single sanctuary. The general impression made upon the careful student is that so far as the substance is concerned this code is largely in the nature of a repetition and expansion of the earlier code, "The Book of the Covenant." However, the influence of the prophets is clearly seen, and the element of persuasion is prominent. In all probability the Deuteronomic Code in its original form was the law book which formed the basis of King Josiah's reforms (2 Kings 22, 23; 2 Chr. 34, 35. See further commentary on Deuteronomy, and art., Pentateuch, p. 143).

The Priestly Code. In the two codes considered thus far the observances of festivals and the rules of ritual appear alongside of social legislation, and the humanitarian emphasis is quite marked. In the Priests' Code, found mainly in the middle books of the Pentateuch, the ritual of worship and sacrifice is the chief feature. But even here there are traces that the prophets have not preached in vain, that the ideas of sin and purity are seeking symbolic expression and a deeper religious significance. One must resolutely put aside the thought of this great body of ritual legislation, upon which later Judaism on its priestly side came to rest, as a late invention. Many of the ritual provisions are survivals from pre-historic times, and the development of the code represents a long and slow process. In the code in its final form were included not only individual laws which had come down from earlier days but also smaller collections formed in earlier centuries. The so-called Holiness Code in Lev. 17-26 is an example of such an early collection of laws. The Holiness Code has striking points of contact with Ezek. 40-48, and may come from the priestly circles in exile.

A definite claim for Mosaic authorship of the whole Pentateuch is not found until a relatively late period (cf. 2 Kings 14:6 with 2 Chr. 25:4); yet the rise of such claim is easily understood when we observe the living thread which connects the earliest laws with the latest, and at the same time keep in mind the tendency to mass the results of a long movement round the names of a single great leader, preferably one appearing in the early stages of the movement. In this connection the history of the word Torah, commonly translated "Law," is of real interest. In the beginning it had the general meaning "teaching," then it came to be used of definite precepts resulting from such teaching, later it was applied to a body of such precepts, and then finally it assumed the technical meaning "the five books of Moses." This is the meaning it has had for orthodox Jews during many centuries. No other section of their Scriptures was placed by them on the same level. Whatever part foreign influence may have played at different points, this "law-literature" is a genuine production and reflection of Hebrew life and religion. It played its part in building up the solid Judaism which saved the O.T. for the world and enabled the race and religion to survive the loss of the temple and the land. (For the glorification of this law-literature cf. Psa. 1, 19 and especially 119.)

HISTORICAL LITERATURE

For a proper appreciation of the historical literature more than critical ability is required; it calls for an attitude of sympathy and for imagination. There is a certain clearness and precision in law and ritual. "Thou shalt observe this festival at a certain time and in a definite manner." "This thing thou shalt not do." Such commands and prohibitions are intelligible; though, at times, their origin and meaning may call for careful research. In the interpretation of historical literature the difference between the Oriental and the Western mind must be considered; moreover, in the days when the biblical records were written our modern division of science and art, fact and fiction, philosophy and theology had not come to any clearness. The Hebrew view of such things was simpler than our own or that of the Greeks. (See further arts., O.T. and Science, p. 125, and Formation of O.T., p. 91.)

Literature Dealing with the Prehistoric Period. Our present concern being with historical literature we cannot deal at length with what must be regarded as the prehistoric period; i.e., as commonly understood, the period prior to Moses. The "historical" narratives in the O.T. begin with the story of creation and the origin of the various elements constituting what may be called early civilization. In these narratives (Gen. 1¹-11⁹) numerous evidences of Babylonian influence have been discovered; but it is well to remember that the real significance of the early chapters of Genesis is found not in these common elements, but in that which represents the differences—the general spirit and atmosphere. Whatever the Hebrews may have drawn from the past they transformed under the influence of the Divine Spirit and used it for their own purpose, which had a constant relation to their God Jehovah; for they regarded their God as the God of history, first of their own nation, and then of the whole world. That this simple non-scientific people should feel the need of placing themselves in the large framework of the world's history, is the wonderful thing in these early narratives. The explanation of the origin of language (Gen. 11⁹) may be unscientific, but the protest against the arrogance of overgrown power that forgets God is a permanent contribution. Thus in many other instances the real significance of a story is to be found not so much in a statement of fact as in the teaching of a great truth.

The same remark may be made in connection with the patriarchal stories. Though compiled from different documents belonging to different periods there is a similarity of purpose discoverable throughout these sketches. The material was not at hand for complete biographies or consecutive chronicles, but the precious fragments pieced together have gained a unity and spiritual influence of their own. Abraham, in the view of all the writers, is the type of the man of faith to whom the will of his God is supreme. Jacob suggests the clever contriver of his own destiny who must face the ghosts of the past and finds God in them. Nowhere is the idea of Providence that overrules evil for good more dramatically set forth than in the story of Joseph.

The Historical Period. When we pass into the actual historical period we have to admit that in many cases the records are scanty and that history and story stand side by side. The compilers of the books of Kings refer to certain chronicles (events of the days) from which they drew information, but no trace of these chronicles can be found. All such archives have perished except the lists of kings and certain facts concerning the history of the temple that have been preserved in the canonical books of the O.T. More elaborate chronicles are found in the ancient inscriptions from Babylon and Egypt. We may regret the small supply of interesting facts, but we must remember that a book destined to come down through the centuries would have been overburdened by a large freight of that kind and that we have ample compensation in what have been termed "family stories," as these give vivid pictures of real life.

The general outline is clear even if there is much darkness in places where we would desire a clear strong light. For instance, the seventh century is one of the most important in the history of religion, and yet little exact information is given. But let us glance rapidly at what we have. The older portions of the books of Joshua and Judges show the various tribes not yet united, fighting fiercely against the Canaanites for their existence in their new home. The suggestion of prolonged struggles with the Philistines is there also. In Samuel we meet the final conflict between Hebrews and Philistines for the supremacy of Palestine. Saul's career, with its tragic close, is the prelude to this great conflict; David comes upon the scene, settles that problem and builds a kingdom; his choice of a capital gives Jerusalem a place in history that it has never lost. In the early chapters of Kings, Solomon's extravagant, luxurious court, which sowed the seeds of disruption, is brought vividly before us. The experience of the Northern Kingdom with its alternate scenes of brilliant success and sordid failure is enrolled in a few wonderful pages of history, always interesting, often tragic. Assyria now comes upon the scene and from that time on we name the periods of Israel's history from the great world conquests that overshadowed her life: Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, Greek, Syrian, Roman. These names call up a succession of tragedies through which the nation shrinks but the religion grows. When Judah is left alone we can trace her history through and after the exile and note the various steps in the building of the Jewish church and the preparation for Christianity. A real history is this, quivering all through with restless life. (See art., History of Hebrew People, p. 60.)

Specimen Narrative. A wonderful picture of real life is given in 2 Sam. 21-24; though found at the end of David's life story, in reality it probably belongs to the beginning, showing that it comes from a source that had escaped the compiler of the book. No one questions its substantial historical accuracy; and from the religious point of view it is of the greatest significance. It interprets the famine as God's punishment for the broken treaty: "there is blood upon the house of Saul"; this is a very primitive view (cf. the advance on this in Deut. 24 Ezek. 18 Lk. 13). The picture of the mother watching over the bodies of her sons so that they might have the burial without which there is no rest; the gratitude of the men of Jabesh-gilead; every touch, in a story that to us is strange and sad, brings out some feature of ancient thought; men seeking to interpret nature, trying to find justice and atonement, in other words, desiring to find God in their life. Such a picture is a treasure for those who are interested in the life of humanity and the progress of revelation.

Students of the O.T. regard the story of Absalom's rebellion (2 Sam. 13-18), an episode in the history of David's court, as "the richest jewel in the antique historical writing in Israel" (Gunkel). It should be read as one piece; the evil counsellor, ever at hand to encourage the adventure in wickedness; the unnatural outrage delicately told; the brother justly indignant waiting for his revenge; the sorrow of the father and the exile of the favorite son. This is at first a family affair, but when Absalom returns, plunges into politics and plays the demagogue, it becomes a thing of national importance. Then the scene becomes crowded with actors, and each leading man must make his choice and assume his position in relation to the king. The account of the deciding battle, the grim determination of Joab, whose patience is at last worn out, and the pathetic cry of the father—"Would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son"—is an impressive climax which will never lose its power to move the hearts of men.

When we turn to consider stories which have been the subjects of keen controversy as to whether they can be placed on the same plane of historical accuracy or are, rather, symbolic pictures, we meet the claim, in some cases at least justified, that the freer interpretation gives a larger meaning. Why should we trouble as to who slew Goliath (1 Sam. 17⁵⁰ 2 Sam. 21¹⁹ 1 Chr. 20⁵) when the simple story is such a splendid illustration of the fact that it was David, the youth from Bethlehem, who was destined to settle the Philistine problem? "Coming events cast their shadow before them" was an ancient belief even if not explicitly stated. The same question on a greater scale comes up in connection with the Elijah stories, especially the magnificent scene on Carmel. True, when we examine the records we find that the Elijah stories are set among political annals of Ahab's reign with which they have little or no relation. In the former Elijah stands out alone, a great figure representing courageously the religion of Jehovah; it is in his experience that the conflict with the Phœnician Baal finds supreme expression. Surely, it is impossible to find in all literature a finer picture of the decisive conflict between two types of religion (1 Kings 18). Alongside of this must be placed the scene in which the bold prophet denounces the base cruelty, the ruthless avarice of a despotic king (1 Kings 21). There may be differences of interpretation as to details but there is general agreement that these narratives represent historical and religious literature of the highest order.

Christian scholars did not abandon the literal and photographic interpretation of the wonderful stories in Daniel until they came, by historical research, to see that it was a nation (and not a few individuals) that was cast into the fiery furnace and the den of lions. Worthy record is this of the first great attempt to destroy by persecution a nation's religion and literature, and of the sublime faith with which the loyal worshipers of Jehovah met the crisis.

Primary Purpose. In conclusion attention may be called once more to the fact that the purpose of the historical literature of the O.T. is essentially and predominately religious. This is clearly recognized by the Jews, for they do not call any of the so-called historical books by that name. The five books of the Penta-teach they designate as Law, because in these books practically all Hebrew legislation is embodied. Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings they include in the list of prophetic books, because they recognize the essentially prophetic purpose of the authors. The other "historical" books belong to the third division of the Jewish Canon, called the Writings. Concerning the books of Kings, which are the principal historical records of the O.T., it has been truly said: "Kings, by virtue of its contents belongs as much to the prophetic books as to the historical. It is not a continuous chronicle; it is a book of prophetic teaching in which, sometimes history, sometimes story, is employed as the vehicle of teaching. It enforces the principle that God is the controlling power and sin the disturbing force in the entire history of men and nations." In a similar manner the religious purpose dominates the other O.T. historical books. The writers embodied only such historical material as was thought to illustrate the self-revelation of God in the history of individuals and of nations, or to bear in some marked way upon the coming of the kingdom of God. A modern secular historian is disappointed at many omissions which would be unpardonable in a strictly historical production. But it is readily seen that the religious purpose of a narrative or group of narratives may be served, and the didactic value may remain, even though there should be discovered omissions or inaccuracies with reference to details.

Literature: Gardiner, The Bible as Literature; Strachan, Hebrew Ideals; Peters, Early Hebrew Story; Gordon, The Early Traditions of Genesis; Jordan, Ancient Hebrew Stories and their Modern Interpretation; History and Revelation, or The Individuality of Israel; McC Fayden, The Messages of the Prophetic and Priestly Historians.

THE PROPHETIC LITERATURE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

BY PROFESSOR A. R. GORDON

The prophetic literature is in a peculiar sense the creative part of the O.T. Through the personalities of the prophets the light of revelation broadened "unto the perfect day." And in their application of the great principles of faith and morals the prophets are abiding sources of inspiration for all who seek after righteousness.

Seer and Prophet. Our English word "prophet" is derived from the Greek prophetes, "spokesman" (for a god). To this correspond two sets of terms in Hebrew: ro'eh, "seer," with its cognates hozeh, "gazer," sopheh, "spyer," and shomer, "watchman"; and the more specific nabi, "prophet," literally "spokesman," with its cognates mal'ach, "messenger," and melis, "interpreter" (of Jehovah). In the interesting note, 1 Sam. 9⁹, the "seer" is referred to as the spiritual forerunner of the "prophet." Originally, however, the two formed separate orders, the seers being related to the augurs or diviners of other nations, and the prophets to the ecstasies. Neither at first enjoyed a high reputation in Israel, the insight of the seers lending itself all too frequently to charlatanry and greed (cf. Amos 7¹²), and the enthusiasm of the prophets tending to evaporate in sheer fanaticism. Both orders were ennobled by their common devotion to Jehovah. Increasingly, under his influence, the insight of the seers became insight into his character and purpose, and the enthusiasm of the prophets enthusiasm for his name and honor. In the greater prophets the qualities of both were blended. The prophet may be defined, indeed, as a man who with his inward eyes open to the eternal realities "sees the vision of the Almighty" (Num. 24⁴), and inspired by his vision speaks in burning words of that which he has seen. To adapt Emerson's phrase, he is a seer who becomes a sayer.

Prophetic Inspiration. The prophets all felt that they were inspired by the living God. It was he who opened their eyes to see. As Amos expressed it, "Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret to his servants the prophets" (37). It was he also who inspired them to speak. His spirit "came mightily" upon them—literally "rushed" or "leaped" upon them—and compelled them to prophesy (1 Sam. 10¹⁰). He took one from following the flock, and said to him, "Go, prophesy unto my people Israel" (Amos 7¹⁵). He laid his hand upon another, and instructed him how to speak and act (Isa. 8¹¹). He put his words in the mouth of another (Jer. 1⁹; cf. 20⁹). He actually gave another his word to eat (Ezek. 33). Thus the prophetic message was an "oracle of Jehovah," a "burden of Jehovah," a "thus saith Jehovah." And the people accepted it as such. Even while they rebelled against the message, they recognized that God had been speaking to them through his servants the prophets (Jer. 7²⁵ Ezek. 2⁵ etc.). No doubt, an ecstatic element clings to the nobility of the prophets; but this in no way detracts from the reality of their inspiration. In all genius there is something of the ecstatic. The inspired poet or painter is transported above the common plane, and in his "fine frenzy" sees those visions of beauty which he molds into works of art that are "a joy forever." In his moments of spiritual exaltation the prophet also is raised to the heights, sees his vision of the Almighty, and in his own style and measure speaks to us "the words of eternal life."

True and False Prophecy. An appreciation of the issues involved in the conflict between true and false prophets will help us more clearly to understand the nature of prophetic inspiration. This conflict emerges as early as the reign of Ahab, when the prophet Micaiah does not hesitate to describe the four hundred "prophets of Jehovah" who encouraged the king to go up against Ramoth-gilead, for "the Lord would deliver it into his hand," as inspired by "a lying spirit" which the Lord had put into their mouth (1 Kings 22²³). The later prophets have much to say of these false prophets, Micah denouncing them as "prophets that make my people to err" (35), Jeremiah as those "that prophesy lies in my name" (23²⁵), and Ezekiel as those that by their "lying divinations" hunt lives "for pieces of bread" (13^{18f.}). On the surface there is little to distinguish the true prophets from the false. Both introduced their prophecies by "Thus saith Jehovah." Both conscientiously believed they were speaking in his name and by his authority. There was a marked difference, however, alike in the tone and in the content of their prophecies. In the glib assurances of the four hundred prophets of Ahab's time, for example, Jehoshaphat detected too obvious a readiness to say what would please the king (1 Kings 22:7). The same weakness characterized the false prophets throughout. As Micah says, they spoke of peace when they "bit with their teeth," and proclaimed war against such as "put not into their mouths" (35). In fact, they were professional prophets, who made their prophecies suit their payment.

On the other hand, the true prophet was "full of power by the spirit of the Lord, and of judgment, and of might, to declare unto Jacob his transgression, and to Israel his sin" (Mic. 3:8). In his classical analysis, Jeremiah (23:16) carries the difference back to its ultimate source in the heart. The false prophets, he says, had no personal knowledge of God. In his fine image, they had never stood in the council of Jehovah (v. 22)—had never entered into immediate touch with him, or felt his spirit moving in their hearts. Thus they harped continually on the same old string, merely repeating what former prophets had said, or "stealing my words every one from his neighbor" (v. 30), instead of waiting upon Jehovah himself, and from his never-failing treasury bringing forth "things new and old." Hence, also, they had no real message for their generation, but glossed over truth and judgment by honeyed words of peace (v. 17). In other words, the false prophet was a materialist, who "divined for money" or selfish advancement, a traditionalist, who clung to the past and refused to advance in the knowledge of God's mind and will, an easy moralist, who preached the gospel of "peace, peace, when there was no peace," and himself followed the doctrine he preached; the true prophet was an idealist, who drank of the living wells of religion, a progressive, who continually advanced in knowledge and grace, an earnest moralist, whose words were no vain repetition of an empty "dream," but a fire that pierced to the conscience of his hearers, or a hammer that broke the stoniest heart in pieces (v. 29).

The Prophetic Call. The greater prophets were launched upon their ministry by a definite call. As a rule, this took the shape of a vision, which was either the precipitate of thoughts and feelings that surged within the mind of the prophet, or the lighting up by a sudden flash of illumination the experiences through which he passed. Occasionally the vision was determined by external stimuli, like the sight of a man with a plumbline testing a wall (Amos 7:7), or someone carrying a basket of late autumn fruit (8:1), a twig of almond blossom in the spring (Jer. 11:1), or a boiling cauldron at a cottage door (11:3). In describing their visions the prophets throw them into dramatic molds. Jehovah opens their eyes, and they see. He asks them what they see, and then he explains the meaning of it. Of course this is but the objectifying of a real psychological experience. Illumined by the light of the Eternal, the prophet sees into the heart of things, grasps the inner meaning of the facts of nature and life.

The vision is thus intimately related to the personality of the prophet, and gives the keynote to his future ministry. The austere herdsman Amos saw visions of impending judgment, and thus became the prophet of justice. The more sensitive Hosea felt the touch of God's love in the tragedy of his home, and became the prophet of love. The kingly Isaiah saw the Holy One on his throne high and lifted up, and became the prophet of holiness. Jeremiah read the lesson of his life as he walked in the fields round Anathoth, and became the prophet of personal religion. Ezekiel saw the vision of the glory of Jehovah, and became the prophet of regeneration. The nameless singer of the Exile heard heavenly voices of comfort, and became the prophet of comfort. Zechariah saw visions of the New Jerusalem, and became the prophet of hope.

Spheres of Prophetic Activity. It will already be evident that the prophets were interpreters of the mind and purpose of God, in the fullest sense of the term. They had seen the vision of the Almighty, and their task was to make the vision real to their fellows. To begin with, they were progressive revealers of the character of God. Through them God unveiled himself "by divers portions and in divers manners," until in the fullness of time he appeared to men in the person of a Son. But the prophets were as directly concerned with the conduct which God required of his people. Thus they became the great moral teachers of Israel. The people as a whole believed that God was satisfied with the ritual obligations of Sabbath-keeping, sacrifice, and prayer; the prophets insisted that he cared above all things for justice, mercy, and loving-kindness.

A great part of their teaching was devoted to social questions. In the most emphatic terms they denounced the social sins of graft, monopoly, greed, oppression and exploitation of the poor, bribery, luxury, sensuality, and drunkenness; with the same boldness they called for honesty, truth, good will and humanity in all men's dealings with one another. Nor did they hesitate, if need arose, to lay hold on the affairs of state, and try by wise counsel and direction to guide the destinies of the people along the right paths. In doing so, however, they acted not as political partisans, but as divinely commissioned representatives of the kingdom of righteousness, love and peace, which God was establishing on earth, and for which they were appointed to prepare the way.

The Prophets' Outlook on the Future. Though prediction is not of the essence of prophecy, the prophets were as vitally interested in the future as they were in the present. Being in such intimate touch with the mind and purpose of God, they were able to forecast the broad lines of his activity for Israel and the world in general. Their predictions bore mainly on the immediate future. While in details they might be vague, and occasionally mistaken, they did correctly anticipate the issues of history, and prepared their people for what was to be. They had also their gaze directed to the farther horizon. The earlier prophets, Samuel, Nathan, and Elijah, no doubt expected that the kingdom of God would be built upon the basis of the kingdom of Israel as it then was. A later generation foresaw nothing but doom for Israel. But out of the wreckage of the empirical kingdom the boldest of the prophets beheld the emergence of an ideal kingdom, which should embrace all the nations of the earth, a kingdom ruled by a Messianic King, Prince, or Shepherd, he and his ministers governing in the spirit of justice and love, binding the peoples together in the bonds of brotherhood, and thus inaugurating a new age of harmony and peace. (See art., Israel's Messianic Hope, p. 177.)

Forms of Prophetic Speech. The original prophetic preaching would seem to have been a kind of elevated chant. As late as Elijah and Elisha this preaching was purely oral. With Amos we reach the stage of written prophecy. An interesting illustration of the literary method of one of the prophets is given in Jer. 36, where we read how Jeremiah dictated to his secretary Baruch "all the words of the Lord, which he had spoken unto him," issuing a second edition, with "many like words added unto them," when the first book was destroyed in the fire by King Jehoiakim. The written prophecy would thus be a substantial reproduction of the spoken word, occasionally revised and brought up to date in the light of subsequent events. The prophecies of Amos and his great successors are in the form of elevated poetry. The language is "simple, sensuous, and passionate," the context being studded with brilliant gems of imagery. The movement is rhythmical, with meter, parallelism, and strophic arrangement as in the poetic books proper. (See art., Poetic and Wisdom Literature, p. 154.)

In Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah only a few narrative sections are in prose. With Jeremiah, however, prose begins to play a larger part; and broad tracts of Ezekiel are as prosaic as Leviticus. The authors of the glowing prophecies in Isa. 40-55 and 56-66 revert to poetry, though here the style is literary, not the deposit of the spoken word. In the later prophets, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, the speech of prophecy passes into the dialectics of the rabbi or teacher. The same tendency appears in the apocalyptic prophets (see below). While the earlier Apocalyptists write in highly colored poetry, the characteristic product of Apocalypse in the O.T.—the book of Daniel—is almost entirely in prose. And the more developed Apocalypses of the intertestamental period are cast in the same mold.

Primitive Prophecy. The first clear instance of prophetic inspiration in the O.T. is seen in Deborah, who roused the people of Jehovah to the battle for independence against Sisera (Judg. 4^{ff.}); but the typical prophets of this early period appear in the bands of religious enthusiasts who enter the scene during the stress of the Philistine peril (1 Sam. 10^{5f.}), and in later crises sweep through the land on Jehovah's errands, clothed in the hairy mantle and leathern girdle of their order (2 Kings 18), often with the "sign of Jehovah"—the letter tau, resembling the Saint Andrew's cross—tattooed upon their forehead, breast, or hands (1 Kings 20⁴, etc.), their whole appearance and behavior conveying to more sober minds the impression of madness (2 Kings 9¹¹). In outward guise these "sons of the prophets" are hardly distinguishable from the prophets of Baal or of other gods. What gave the promise of higher things was their enthusiasm for Jehovah and his people.

The greater personalities who soon emerged above the common crowd shared their enthusiasm. Only they moralized it. Samuel was supremely concerned for the deliverance of his people; but he saw that the king who should deliver them must be "a man after Jehovah's heart," counting that "to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams" (1 Sam. 15²²). Nathan was equally concerned for the honor of Jehovah and his people, and boldly denounced David for the evil he had done in the sight of Jehovah by robbing the poor man of his wife (2 Sam. 12^{7f.}). His successors were zealous defenders of the liberties of the people. It is significant that at the disruption of the kingdom under Rehoboam the prophetic party supported Jeroboam as the champion of popular rights, Ahijah the Shilonite as Jehovah's representative giving him the Northern tribes as his lawful possession (1 Kings 11^{29f.}), and the prophet of Judah, She-maiah, assuring Rehoboam that "this thing was of Jehovah" (12^{22f.}). Elijah raised the twofold struggle to a definite issue, contending on Carmel for the sole supremacy of Jehovah (1 Kings 18^{21f.}), and at Naboth's vineyard for the privilege even of the humblest citizen to enjoy his own inheritance against the encroachments of the king (21^{17f.}). Elisha carried the former cause to victory through fire and sword; and at the same time by his acts of love and mercy he showed the people that Jehovah is best honored by a life of human sympathy and kindness (2 Kings 4^{1f.}).

Prophets of the Assyrian Age. The most creative period in the history of prophecy is that which opens with Amos of Tekoa toward the close of the reign of Jeroboam II of Israel (about 750 B.C.). In the course of a generation he and his successors, Hosea, Isaiah, and Micah, brought the principles of ethical monotheism into clear expression. Taking their point of departure from Samuel's antithesis of sacrifice and obedience, they sharpened the antithesis, and likewise gave practical content to the abstract notion of obedience. First, Amos insisted that what Jehovah required of his people was not sacrifice but justice (5²¹⁻²⁴); then his contemporary Hosea insisted that what he required was not sacrifice but love (6⁶); Isaiah insisted that what he required was not sacrifice but holiness, which for him was a blend of justice and love (10¹⁻¹⁷); while Micah in his classical definition of religion pure and undefiled, summing up the teaching of all three, insisted that what he demanded was not sacrifice, however extreme, but "to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God" (6⁸⁻⁹).

Prophets of the Decline and Fall of Judah. After a period of quiescence under the reactionary King Manasseh, prophecy came to life again through the menace of the Scythian invasion about 627 B.C. The first of the new galaxy of prophets was Zephaniah, the prophet of the Day of Jehovah. But the brightest star in the cluster was Jeremiah, the prophet of personal religion, who was led through the failure of the Deuteronomic Reformation to his epoch-making conception of the New Covenant, not of the letter, but of the spirit (31³¹⁻³⁴). Contemporaries of Jeremiah were Nahum, the prophet of the fall of Nineveh, and Habakkuk, the prophet of faith. But his true spiritual successor was Ezekiel, who carried his principle of individual responsibility to its full logical conclusion (18^{1f.}).

Prophets of Restoration. Ezekiel forms the link of connection between the earlier prophets of doom and the later prophets of restoration. Up to the day of the destruction of Jerusalem he prophesied of "lamentations, and mourning, and woe" (21⁰); then he became the prophet of regeneration, the herald of the coming deliverance, and the father of Judaism. The true prophet of restoration, however, is Deutero-Isaiah (Isa. 40-55), with his good news of salvation, and his interpretation of the sufferings of Israel as the ransom for the sins of the world (cf. p. 168b). A generation afterward, Haggai and Zechariah encouraged the despondent people to press on with the building of the Temple; while about the middle of the fifth century B.C., Malachi and Trito-Isaiah (Isa. 56-66) sought to relieve the depression of their time by renewed insistence on devotion of heart and life as the one condition of salvation, the latter heightening the force of his appeal by his pictures of the new heavens and the new earth. The author of the matchless little book of Jonah, some two centuries later, aimed at quickening the sense of missionary obligation among his people by the story of God's love and mercy toward sinful but repentant Nineveh.

Transition Toward Apocalypse. The later prophets had their eyes increasingly turned toward the future. This tendency finds its characteristic expression in Apocalypse, that peculiar literary form in which spiritual truths are impressed, not by direct appeal to heart and conscience, but by a series of visions in which the destinies of Israel and the other nations are unfolded, these visions converging on a final Judgment scene, when the Ruler of the nations separates the sheep from the goats, and gives his people dominion over all their enemies, within and without. An approach to Apocalypse is found in Ezekiel's prophecy of Gog (chs. 38, 39); but the type assumes its first definite shape in the ardent utterance of Obadiah, contemporary with Malachi and Trito-Isaiah. Apocalypse takes on vividness of coloring in Joel, Zechariah 9-14, and Isaiah 24-27, all of them products of the late Persian and Greek eras. Finally, it comes to maturity in the book of Daniel, written to face the emergency under Antiochus Epiphanes (168-165 B.C.), which forms the model for the elaborate works of the Apocalyptic school during the next two centuries. (See art., Intertestamental Religion, p. 200.)

Literature: Eiselen, Prophecy and the Prophets; Gordon, The Prophets of the O.T.; Knudson, The Beacon Lights of Prophecy; T. H. Robinson, Prophecy and the Prophets in Ancient Israel; J. M. P. Smith, The Prophets and their Times; W. R. Smith, The Prophets of Israel; N. Micklem, Prophecy and Eschatology.

THE POETIC AND WISDOM LITERATURE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

BY PROFESSOR A. R. GORDON

It is now recognized that a large part of the O.T. is poetic in spirit and structure. This applies not merely to the poetic literature proper, but also to the bulk of the prophetic books. The Revised Version has rendered a great service in printing the former in parallel lines. Unfortunately, it has not extended the same principle to the prophetic literature. Thus the poetic quality of these books continues to be obscured for the English reader. One of the chief merits of the more modern translations is to reveal the poetic form wherever it appears in the original. Our enjoyment of the literature is much enhanced thereby. (See art., The Bible as Literature, p. 19.)

General Characteristics. "All good poetry," says Wordsworth, "is the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings." This is peculiarly true of O.T. poetry. The Israelites belonged to a race endowed with vehement passion; and their poetry is surcharged with this spirit. Hence the force of its appeal. "Deep calleth unto deep" as heart speaks unto heart.

If poetry be the overflow of feeling, the best poetic speech is that which gives the most adequate expression to feeling. For this purpose the O.T. poets had an almost ideal instrument in Hebrew. No language could more perfectly fulfill Milton's requirement that poetic speech must be "simple, sensuous, and passionate." With a childlike simplicity of form it combines a singular intensity of feeling and a pictorial power that lends itself to the boldest play of imagination. Figure crowds upon figure; mixed metaphors are common, and hyperboles a matter of course. The Hebrew poets can quite naturally picture the floods clapping their hands, the hills singing for joy, the stars from their courses fighting against Sisera, and the sun and moon standing still "until the nation had avenged itself of their enemies."

Poetic speech is also musical. The origins of poetry are found in song; and the language of poetry retains the music of song. The O.T. poets are as sensitive to musical charm as those of other nations, and show often surprising power in the wedding of sounds to tones of feeling, as in the reproduction of the gallop of war-steeds at the battle of Megiddo (Judg. 5²²), or the brilliant picture of the flashing of chariots in the assault on Nineveh (Nah. 23^f). Many of the psalms also, and the finer passages of Job and the Song of Songs, are real studies in harmony. Rime is rarely found, except in the older folk-poetry; but assonance and alliteration are frequent, and elaborate acrostics are found in Psa. 9, 10, 25, 34, 37, 111, 112, 119, and 145, Prov. 31¹⁰⁻³¹ Lam. 1-4, and the reflective poem in Nah. 1.

A more specific quality of poetic speech is rhythm. Being the language of the heart, it moves with a beat resembling that of the heart. This movement is not peculiar to poetry, for in its more elevated moods prose also may be rhythmical. The distinction is, that in prose the rhythm is "unbound," or free; in poetry it is "bound," or metrical. A poem is a work of literary art, composed of a number of parallel lines, marked by a measured movement of pulse within the lines, and as a rule also by a measured movement of thought between the lines.

The presence of a metrical movement within the lines was long denied in the case of Hebrew poetry. Recent research has tended more and more strongly to establish it. As the result of an extended series of investigations it may now be asserted that Hebrew meter, like English and Germanic, is governed by the number of strong accents, the intervals being filled by a somewhat free choice of weaker elements, the number of which is limited only by the demands of musical time. The most frequent measure in Hebrew poetry consists of three such accents to the line. There is, however, much less rigidity than in modern verse. Thus in the more majestic psalms and odes a broader rhythmical effect is gained by the breaking in of a measure consisting of four accents to the line. This again may resolve itself into musical phrases of two pulses each, a variety which adds much to the life and energy of the poetry. But the most interesting measure in Hebrew is the elegiac—associated mainly with lamentations, though also with songs of joy and mirth—a combination of the three-pulse and two-pulse measures, which well reflects the choking of the voice under the influence of any strong emotion, whether of sorrow or of joy.

The movement of thought between the lines was first clearly recognized by Bishop Lowth, who in his famous lectures On the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews (1753) developed the principle of parallelism, defining it as "a peculiar conformation of sentences, whereby the poets repeat one and the same idea in different words, or combine different ideas within the same form of words, like things being related to like, or opposites set in contrast to opposites." Lowth distinguished three types of parallelism:

1. Synonymous, where the original thought is repeated "in different but equivalent terms," as in the opening bars of the songs of Lamech and Deborah (Gen. 42³ Judg. 52¹), or in Psa. 11, where we have an instance of what Lowth describes as a "triplet parallelism."

2. Antithetic, where "a theme is illustrated by contrast with its opposite," as in Gen. 42⁴ Judg. 51⁹ Psa. 16, and normally in the "Proverbs of Solomon" (Prov. 101^f).

3. Synthetic, where the idea is expanded in certain directions, as in Ex. 15¹ Judg. 51⁶ Psa. 26, and generally in the "Hezekiah" collection of proverbs (Prov. 251^f).

Of this third type of parallelism there is a variety, described as Spiral, Progressive, or Climactic, where the changes are rung on some key word, as in Judg. 53⁰ Psa. 13, and especially in the "songs of Ascent," e.g., Psa. 121, with its play on the words "help," "keep," and "slumber."

The normal unit in Hebrew verse is the distich, or couplet, of two parallel lines, though the monostich, or single line, occurs sporadically, as in Psa. 18¹ 87¹. Examples of the tristich, or combination of three parallel lines, are found in Psa. 11 51¹ 451^f. Prov. 251³; the tetrastich, or four parallel lines, in Psa. 13 55²¹ Prov. 271^{5f}; the pentastich, or five parallel lines, in Psa. 6⁶, 7 Prov. 242³⁻²⁵; the hexastich, or six parallel lines, in Psa. 991⁻³ Prov. 3021⁻²³; and still larger combinations in the latter context, and elsewhere.

The occurrence of selahs and refrains (the latter, e.g., in Psa. 42, 43, 46, 49 Isa. 98-21 Amos 46-11) is evidence that the parallel units coalesce to form more extended groups. Attempts have recently been made to force practically the whole of Hebrew poetry into four-lined stanzas, each composed of two parallel units. Such a scheme may easily enough be applied to many of the psalms, the idyls in Songs, and even the speeches in Job; but it cannot be imposed on the folk-songs and the prophetic literature in the main without doing grave violence to the text. The selahs and refrains show that in the psalms also the stanzas are by no means of the uniform length of two parallel units. Again, therefore, we must allow for more freedom than rigid theory is willing to concede.

Folk-Poetry. Poetry begins in folk-song. Much of the earliest folk-song is of battle. This is as true of Israel as of other nations. The first recorded poem in the Bible is the battle-song of Lamech (Gen. 423^f). And long after Israel had risen to a higher stage of civilization, the joy of battle continued to fire the hearts of the people, and inspired their most stirring strains. The tribes were roused to battle by the wild notes of the war-chant (Judg. 51² 2 Sam. 201); and the returning warriors were welcomed with repetitions of joyous couplets, sung by the women in responsive chorus, to the accompaniment of music and dancing (Ex. 152¹ Judg. 113⁴ 1 Sam. 187). Out of these emerged in due course songs like those of Moses (Ex. 151-18), Joshua (Josh. 1012^f), and Deborah (Judg. 51-31), which for daring imagination, combined with swift, dramatic movement, force and fire, are worthy to be placed alongside the most splendid battle-songs in any language.

Songs of victory pass occasionally into satire, as in the taunt-song over stricken Moab (Num. 2127-30), and the coarse lampoons of Samson and the Philistines at each other's downfall (Judg. 1516 1624). A nobler development appears in songs of national hope and aspiration, like the Blessings of Noah (Gen. 925-27), Isaac (Gen. 2727-29), Jacob (Gen. 491-27), and Moses (Deut. 331-29), but especially the four Blessings of Balaam, the son of Beor (Num. 237-10, 18-24 243-9, 15-19), with their glowing pictures of future prosperity for Israel.

Songs of labor also fill a large place in the folk-poetry of Israel. The culture of the vine is peculiarly associated with song. It is probable that the fragment, "Destroy it not, for a blessing is in it" (Isa. 65⁸), is a snatch from some old vintage song. The "joy of the fruitful field" is coupled with that of the vine-dressers (Isa. 1610), and the "joy in harvest" compared with that of men "when they divide the spoil" (Isa. 93). The song of Deborah alludes to shepherd-songs, accompanied by "pipings for the flocks," around the troughs (Judg. 511, 16). The opening of a well in the desert inspires the charming well-song (Num. 2117^f). Other songs of nature are suggested by such headings in the Psalter (see mgs.) as "The hind of the morning" (Psa. 221); "The dove of the distant terebinths" (Psa. 561); and "The lilies" (Psa. 451 601, etc.).

The only suggestion of a wedding song in the earlier literature is found in Gen. 2460, where Rebekah is sent to her new home with the naïve wish that she may become the mother of thousands of ten thousands. There is abundant allusion, however, to songs of social life, e.g., the "sounds of mirth and song" that sped the parting guest on his way (Gen. 31²⁷), the jests and riddles of the bridal week (Judg. 14¹⁰⁻²⁰), the singing of men and maidens at the gate (Job 21^{11f.} Lam. 5^{14f.}), the senseless reveling at the tables of the rich (Isa. 24⁹ Jer. 7³⁴ Amos 6⁵), which often degenerated into brutal scorn of the poor and unfortunate (Job 30⁹ Psa. 69¹²). Reference to dirges for the dead is also common (Gen. 50¹⁰ Judg. 11⁴⁰ 1 Kings 13³⁰ 2 Chr. 35²⁵ Jer. 9¹⁷⁻²² Amos 5¹⁶, etc.), while two classical laments of David have been preserved to us, that most tender expression of manly sorrow for Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. 1¹⁹⁻²⁷), and the equally sincere, if less poignant, utterance of grief over Abner (2 Sam. 3^{33, 34}).

Even the most secular of the folk-songs of Israel are touched with religious emotion. The songs of Moses and Deborah might, indeed, with equal propriety be described as hymns of praise to Jehovah, who is regarded as the real Lord and Leader of Israel's hosts, the inspirer of heroic deeds, and the giver of victory (Ex. 15^{1f.} Judg. 5^{1f.}). The ark, which was the visible symbol of his presence among the people, was accompanied to and from the battlefield by sacred strains (Num. 10^{35f.}). The simple greetings of daily life and work had likewise their religious note (Ruth 2⁴ Psa. 129⁸). Naturally, the worship of the sanctuaries was attended by songs of a more distinctively religious character (Amos 5²³), while the service of God in the Temple was inaugurated by Solomon's hymn of dedication (1 Kings 8^{12f.}), a worthy forecast of the nobler songs that were afterward to exalt "the place of his habitation."

Proverbial Lore. The simplest mental life is no mere bundle of feelings; it consists equally of observation and judgment. And as men give voice to their feelings in song, they embody their judgments in those terse, sententious sayings we call proverbs. The Edomites, near kinsmen of Israel, have been justly celebrated for the wealth and brilliance of their proverbs, and the Israelites themselves shared to the full in the racial inheritance. The historical literature of the O.T. enshrines not a few pointed aphorisms, while in the book of Proverbs we find the noblest treasury of proverbial wisdom that any nation has to show.

The generic name for proverb in Hebrew (māshāl) implies likeness or comparison. Good examples are found in the earliest proverb quoted in the Bible, "Like Nimrod a mighty hunter before the Lord" (Gen. 10⁹), and in the popular saying, "As is the mother, so is her daughter" (Ezek. 16⁴⁴). Other primitive proverbs are apt illustrations of general principles, like the "proverb of the ancients" cited in 1 Sam. 24¹³, "Out of the wicked cometh forth wickedness," or the barbed arrow shot by Ahab, "Let not him that girdeth on his armor boast himself as he that putteth it off" (1 Kings 20¹¹). A proverb deriving its point from the sense of contrast to ordinary expectation is found in the taunt leveled against Saul—"Is Saul also among the prophets?" (1 Sam. 10¹²). This type of proverb leads to the fully developed antithetical couplet, illustrated in

"The fathers have eaten sour grapes,
And the children's teeth are set on edge"
(Jer. 31²⁹ Ezek. 18²).

As implying likeness or comparison, the proverb is linked, on the one hand, to the riddle, and, on the other, to the parable. The riddle may be described, in fact, as a veiled proverb, and the parable as an expanded proverb. A good example of the former is found in Samson's riddle (Judg. 14¹⁴), and of the latter in Jotham's parable (Judg. 9⁷⁻²⁰).

The main development in proverbial lore is associated with the name of Solomon. In 1 Kings 4³² he is credited with no fewer than three thousand proverbs, while aphorisms of a certain literary stamp are technically known as "proverbs of Solomon." Here the original one-lined shaft passes definitely into the couplet form, with parallelism in all its types, which is so characteristic of the book of Proverbs.

In later times the cultivation of the art was carried on in the schools of the wise, who more and more replaced the prophets as moral guides and teachers of the people. To these Wise Men we owe the main part of the book of Proverbs. They played also the part of popular preachers, rendering their appeal more effective, as Jesus did, by an abundant use of illustrative parables. (See intro. to Proverbs.)

Collections of National Song. The songs of which we have spoken were inspired by no literary ambition. The old "makers" simply poured forth the feelings of the moment, and for the most part their poetic effusions passed away with the occasion that gave them birth. Only a few select gems found a lodgment in the hearts of the people, or were handed down by mōshelim, professional balladists or reciters (Num. 21²⁷), who sought to keep alive the memory of the brave deeds of old. Not till the establishment of the kingdom under Solomon does any attempt seem to have been made to preserve this inheritance in written shape. About this time, however, we meet with two separate anthologies of folk-poetry:

1. The Book of the Wars of Jehovah, a collection of battle-songs from Israel's wars of conquest and independence, which is referred to as the source of the curious fragment of place-names in Num. 21^{14f.}, but to which also may plausibly be assigned the song of Deborah (Judg. 5) and the songs of the ark (Num. 10^{35f.}).

2. The Book of Jashar, or the Upright, that is, probably, The Book of Israel's Good Men, a collection more varied in its range, being (unless the "Upright" be Jehovah) cited as the source of Joshua's battle-song (Josh. 10^{12f.}), David's lament over Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. 1^{19f.}), and Solomon's hymn of dedication (1 Kings 8^{12f.}), according to the LXX rendering.

The Poetic Books. The earliest of the poetic books proper may be Lamentations, a collection of five elegies on the downfall of Jerusalem, belonging to various dates within a century or two after the tragedy, and reflecting the sorrow of city and people under the chastening hand of Jehovah.

The real heart of the poetic literature, however, is found in the Psalter, "the Hymn Book of the Second Temple." As at present arranged, it is composed of five books, after the analogy of the Pentateuch; but it is clearly a complex of earlier collections, such as "the psalms of David," "the prayers of David," "the psalms of Asaph," "the psalms of the sons of Korah," and "the songs of Ascent," dating from various periods after the Restoration, and reflecting the varying moods of the devout soul in its approach to God. (See intro. to Psalms, pp. 509f.)

The loftiest heights in O.T. poetry are reached in the book of Job, a spiritual drama on the problem of suffering, set in a prose framework, no doubt based on popular tradition, both elements belonging to the fifth century B.C., and reflecting the triumph of faith in its struggle with the sorrows of the time.

A book of very different quality is the Song of Songs, which is now generally regarded as a choice anthology of Hebrew love songs, dating from the earlier half of the third century B.C., and reflecting the happiness of youthful love in the villages of Palestine.

The Wisdom Literature. As we have seen, the characteristic expression of wisdom among the Hebrews takes the form of proverbial sayings. The most complete collection of these is found in the book of Proverbs, a post-exilic compilation of "proverbs of Solomon" and "sayings of the wise," to which are added as appendices "the words of Agur," "the words of King Lemuel," and the praise of the good wife. The book is thus a compendium of Hebrew wisdom at its purest and best. While never rising to the heights, it keeps true to the "paths of righteousness," and remains an invaluable guide for the man who wishes to live an honest and fruitful life.

The introductory chapters of Proverbs are more hortatory in style. The general tone of these chapters is still essentially practical; but in ch. 8, doubtless as the result of Greek influence, the majestic figure of Wisdom becomes the subject of a speculative effort which makes her the foster child, associate, and representative of God. A grave protest against such incipient gnosticism is raised in "the words of Agur" (Prov. 30), where the possibility of any kind of speculative knowledge of God or his manifestation on earth is dismissed. Brilliant poetic expression is given to the same agnostic tendency in the Ode on Wisdom incorporated in Job 28, where Wisdom is known only to God, who discovered her when he established the laws of the universe, and who has no intention of revealing the secret to man. But the classical instance of negative philosophizing in the O.T. appears in the book of Ecclesiastes, with its haunting refrain, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity," a book which is redeemed from absolute pessimism only by its Hebrew inheritance of faith and sanctified common sense.

For a fuller treatment of the poetic and Wisdom books see the introduction to the individual books in the commentaries.

Literature: W. T. Davison, The Praises of Israel and The Wisdom Literature of the O.T.; Eiselen, The Psalms and Other Sacred Writings; Gordon, The Poets of the O.T.; Gray, The Forms of Hebrew Poetry; G. A. Smith, The Early Poetry of Israel.

THE OLD TESTAMENT CONCEPTION OF GOD

BY DEAN A. C. KNUDSON

It might with some plausibility be maintained that in the O.T. we have to do not with one but with many conceptions of God. The people of Israel were not at any time so completely unified that they all shared the same world-view, and even if they had been, their thought varied from age to age so that in such a national literature as that of the O.T. we would still have no uniform body of teaching. What we actually have in it are developing and divergent opinions. But while this is true, each generation or age had its own dominant ideas, and these gave to the current thought of God a certain unity. Then, too, the view of God in one age of the nation's history stood organically related to the views of earlier and later ages so that what we find in the O.T. is not a number of independent conceptions of God but, rather, one conception unfolding through the centuries.

General Characteristics. The O.T. conception of God had four general characteristics. First, it was practical. It grew out of and was sustained by life. The theoretical reason had very little to do with it. No doubt the belief in God answered various questions that the early Hebrews raised with reference to the world and the course of events in it. But it did not owe its origin to these questions nor was it to any appreciable extent supported by speculative considerations. There are in the O.T. no arguments that seek to prove the existence of God or the possibility of our knowing him. His being and self-revelation were taken for granted. The heavens might declare his glory (Psa. 191), but this was because people already believed in his existence. There was in ancient Israel no theoretical atheism or agnosticism. The fool might live as though there were no God (Psa. 141) and devout men might be deeply impressed with the limitations of their knowledge of him (Job 117 2614 Isa. 558, 9 Prov. 301-4), but that he actually existed and that he could to some degree be known was not disputed. Life itself, history, prophecy, the consensus attested his being, and the needs alike of the nation and the individual confirmed it.

In the second place, the O.T. conceived of God as personal. It represented a standpoint sharply distinguished from polydemonism, on the one hand, and pantheism on the other. No doubt the belief in vague impersonal spirits was to be found in ancient Israel; it persisted as a relic from an earlier period or was taken over from the Canaanites. But it had no recognized place in the national faith as expressed in the O.T. Indeed, it was distinctly rejected as foreign to the worship of Jehovah. Nor was there any tendency to identify Jehovah with the impersonal forces of nature. Throughout the whole of O.T. history he remained distinct from them—their personal master. One reason for this theistic or personalistic cast of Hebrew thought was the fact that Jehovah from the very beginning was regarded as primarily a God of history rather than of nature. It was as a directing agent in the affairs of men rather than as the cause of the orderly processes of nature that he revealed himself to Israel; and hence a clearly defined personal character was uniformly attributed to him.

This appears in the personal name which he bore. Whatever may have been the origin and derivation of the name "Jehovah" (see Gen. 426 Ex. 313-15 62, 3), it differentiated the God of Israel from all other gods, and even after the belief in the existence of other gods had ceased in Israel it still continued to give to him a uniquely individual and personal character. This is evident from the anthropomorphic methods of expression which we find throughout the O.T. These anthropomorphisms are somewhat more refined in the later books, more psychological and less physical in nature. But this, if anything, only makes them all the more personal in their implications. God everywhere in his relation to Israel is represented as a living, feeling, acting Being. That he is also free is likewise everywhere assumed. Creation was his free act, and the course of human history is freely determined by him. He is not bound by the laws of nature but through miracle can work out his own purposes. Nothing is more characteristic of Jehovah than what we call personality.

Another general characteristic of the O.T. conception of God is found in its inherent tendency toward monotheism. This tendency appears from the very outset in the exclusiveness of Jehovah. "Thou shalt have no other gods before me" was the foundation stone of the Mosaic religion and of the Israelitic religion as a whole. This commandment, it is true, did not at first exclude the belief in the existence of other gods, but it did by a practical logic of its own point in that direction, and it successfully resisted every attempt to introduce a female deity by the side of Jehovah and also every movement to break him up into a number of local Jehovahs. The Canaanitic and other Semitic religions had female deities, and they were not unknown to the Israelites, but Jehovah himself remained lone and solitary. He had no female counterpart, and all the immoral religious practices associated with the sexual principle he indignantly repudiated. His oneness thus saved his moral purity; and it also preserved his greatness. Had he followed the example of Baal (cf. Hos. 2¹³, 17) and permitted himself to be divided up into a number of local Jehovahs, he would have lost that magnitude of being which belonged to him as God of the entire nation and as the sole Being worthy of worship. Poly-Jehovism was as foreign to the true genius of Israelitic religion as was Baalism itself (Deut. 6⁴). The Hebrew heart insisted on absolute loyalty, and such loyalty could be directed only to one Being. Monotheism was thus implicit in Israel's religion from the very beginning.

A fourth characteristic of the Hebrew idea of God was its ethical quality. There has been some question as to whether the Mosaic Jehovah was a moral Deity. And it is no doubt true that Moses did not make moral obedience the essence of religion in the same explicit way as the eighth-century prophets. But that he insisted on loyalty to Jehovah as the basal virtue, and that this loyalty in view of its ideal and sacrificial character was essentially ethical, can hardly be questioned. There is nothing in the work of Moses more distinctive and more significant than the passionate and sustained devotion to Jehovah that he evoked among the Israelitic tribes. It was this that formed the basis of their national unity, it was this that differentiated them not only formally but qualitatively from other peoples, and it was this that made of Jehovah—instead, for instance, of Chemosh—the God of righteousness and the Creator of the world. We are then justified in saying that the Mosaic Jehovah, who by a marvelous act of deliverance won the undying loyalty of his people, was in principle a moral Deity, and that it was no accident that the later prophets laid such a unique stress upon his absolute rectitude. In so doing they simply put out at interest the pound they inherited from Moses.

The O.T. conception of God was, then, practical, personalistic, monotheistic, and ethical. These were its fundamental characteristics. But it was only gradually that they came to full expression, and no exposition of the O.T. teaching concerning God would be adequate that did not take account of the different stages through which it developed. The most important contributions to O.T. theology were made by the literary prophets. These men belong to the middle period of Hebrew history. So in outlining the history of Hebrew thought it is customary to distinguish three periods: the preprophetic (1200–750 B.C.), the prophetic (750–450 B.C.), and the post-exilic or legalistic (450–150 B.C.). With the idea of God in each of these periods we will deal briefly.

The Preprophetic Period. Before the time of Moses the Hebrews were probably polytheists (Josh. 24², 14^f. Ezek. 20⁷), though this did not necessarily exclude the belief in one supreme Deity on the part of some of the more enlightened members of the race. It was Moses who transformed the religion of Israel into a monolatry, i.e. the worship of one God, and with him the history of the religion of Israel in the proper sense of that term begins.

1. Jehovah and Baal. The period from Moses to Amos was characterized by a fusion of Jehovah with Baal. The name "Baal," which means lord or master, was applied to Jehovah (Hos. 2¹⁶), and by many he was conceived of in much the same way as Baal was by the Canaanites. The same rites and customs were adopted in his worship. Evil practices, such as prostitution and the use of images, crept into his sanctuaries. He became the God of the land, the giver of its grain, its new wine and its oil, losing much of his earlier ethnic sternness as a desert Deity. With the Israelitic settlement in Canaan he nominally triumphed over Baal, but actually he later to a large degree succumbed to him.

2. Divergent Conceptions. This, however, was true only of the popular religion. The purer Mosaic faith continued to have its representatives, especially in prophetic circles. It was linked up with the higher national interests and with civic justice. But it was not carried out to its logical consequences, nor was it differentiated as sharply as it might have been from the popular beliefs and practices. Between the Baalish and the genuinely Jehovistic tendency in preprophetic Israel there was a distinct difference of spirit, and this gave rise to a certain tension in the religious life of the nation. But the difference or the tension was felt rather than clearly formulated. The result was that no thoroughly consistent view of God was developed. Cruder and more adequate views lived side by side. In estimating these a distinction needs to be made between theoretical beliefs and practical postulates. The latter as expressed in prayer and the living faith of the people outran the former. Men did not in those days devote much attention to what we would call theological questions. They did not set themselves the task of bringing out the intellectual implications of faith. Everything was spontaneous or traditional, and hence we should not expect to find a homogeneous body of beliefs in the documents that have come down to us from them.

3. Divine Unity. In discussing the nature of God it is customary to distinguish between his metaphysical and his ethical attributes, and this distinction will in a general way be observed in the present article. The metaphysical attributes of the preprophetic Jehovah may be reduced to three: personality, unity, power. With the first two we have already dealt briefly. They were characteristic of Jehovah as conceived in the entire O.T. There was, however, one important contribution made to the development of the idea of the divine unity in the preprophetic period, of which note should be taken. This came from Elijah. He seems to have identified Jehovah with deity in such an exclusive sense as to imply the non-existence of Baal (1 Kings 18²⁷) and of other gods in general. At least it is evident that he meant to deny that Baal or any of the other gods, whether they existed or not, was for Israel God in the proper sense of the term. For his own people he regarded Jehovah alone as truly divine. While not thoroughly monotheistic, this was a significant step in that direction.

4. Divine Power. So far as the power of Jehovah, the most fundamental of his metaphysical attributes, is concerned, there are several divergent representations in the preprophetic literature. In not a few instances he seems to be represented as a localized deity or at least as a deity with a limited sphere of influence. He had a home. At first it was Sinai or Horeb (Judg. 5⁴¹. 1 Kings 19⁸). Later it was the land of Canaan (1 Sam. 26¹⁹), and especially the sanctuaries in the land (Gen. 22¹⁴ 28¹⁶¹). He was spoken of as "a man of war" (Ex. 15³), and so closely was he associated with the armies and wars of Israel (Ex. 17¹⁵. Num. 21¹⁴ Judg. 5²³ 1 Sam. 17²⁶, 36) that it has been held that his power was limited to the battlefield and had nothing to do with the everyday affairs of men. Again he was so intimately identified with the Israelitic people that he seemed inseparable from them and limited in his power by them. Outside of Israel he received no recognition and apparently exercised no authority (Ruth 1¹⁶).

But while there are many passages that seem to represent Jehovah as thus limited geographically, racially, and otherwise, there are other passages that leave with us a distinctly different view. Some of these for instance speak of him in a way which implies that he had his abode in heaven rather than at any particular place on earth (Gen. 11⁵, 7 18²¹ 22¹¹, 15-17). And while heaven itself was no doubt thought of as a place, it was not apparently regarded as attached to any particular region but as offering direct access to every part of the earth. It suggested, therefore, a kind of omnipresence. From other passages it is also clear that Jehovah was not confined to Canaan. In the early patriarchal narratives we find him manifesting himself to his servants wherever they might be, in Egypt or the distant East (Gen. 12¹ 24¹². 26¹². 46⁴). Nor was his power circumscribed by that of the nation. He was superior to his people, both punishing and helping them. He could save by few as well as by many (1 Sam. 14⁶). There was nothing too hard for him (Gen. 18¹⁴). He was equal to all the needs of those who sought his aid.

5. Divine Creation and World-purpose. In the literature before Amos there are very few references to Jehovah's relation to the world of nature and to human history as a whole. Some have, consequently, concluded that the ideas of creation and of a divine world-purpose were entirely foreign to the preprophetic period. But this is hasty and unwarranted. The analogy of other peoples would suggest that Israel must have had its creation stories at an early date. The narrative in Gen. 1 (notes) probably represents the finished form of a story that had been current in Israel for centuries. An earlier form of the story seems originally to have stood at the beginning of the J document (Gen. 24^b), which dates from the ninth century B.C. A few poetic fragments from an earlier date (Judg. 5²⁰ Josh. 10¹², 13 1 Kings 8¹², 13) also suggest the idea of Jehovah's creatorship. The idea of his universal rule and world-purpose is not so distinctly alluded to, but it seems to have been implied in the popular belief in a day of Jehovah (Amos 5¹⁸⁻²⁰) and was assumed by the eighth-century prophets as known to the people of their time. There is, then, good ground for holding that the preprophetic Jehovah was both super-national and supra-mundane. Both creative activity and a power that transcended Israel were ascribed to him.

6. Spirituality. In the metaphysical sense of the terms he was also a "spiritual" and a "holy" Being. But these attributes did not in this early period differentiate him from other gods. They too were spirits, beings of an ethereal nature, endowed with a more than fleshly power; and they too had a mysterious, indefinable, fear-inspiring quality called holiness. In these respects there was no difference between them and Jehovah, except that these characteristics were ascribed to him in an accentuated form. So far as their practical effects were concerned, there is only one point that needs to be noted. The "spirituality" of the other gods did not exclude the use of images in their worship, but the case seems to have been different with Jehovah. There is a well-established tradition that Moses prohibited image-worship. This prohibition was to a large extent disregarded in later times, but there is no adequate reason for rejecting the tradition as unhistorical. What the exact basis of the Mosaic prohibition was we do not know, but it would seem that it must have grown out of the ascription to Jehovah of a higher degree of "spirituality" than that attributed to the heathen gods. In other regards the worship of Jehovah did not apparently differ much in early times from that practised at the Canaanitic shrines.

7. Ethical Character. We have already pointed out that there was a profoundly ethical bent to the conception of Jehovah from the beginning. But this was imperfectly developed during the centuries that intervened between Moses and Amos. Capricious anger (1 Sam. 6¹⁹ 2 Sam. 6^{6f.}), jealousy (Gen. 32² 11^{6f.}), favoritism (Gen. 12¹⁰⁻²⁰ 20¹⁻¹⁶), incitement to evil (Judg. 9²³ 1 Sam. 26¹⁹ 2 Sam. 24¹), and other ethical shortcomings were not infrequently attributed to him. Over against such facts as these, however, must be put others in which his moral character comes to clear and striking expression. Note especially Nathan's arraignment of David for his sin against Uriah the Hittite (2 Sam. 12) and Elijah's denunciation of Ahab (1 Kings 21). Then, too, the regular administration of justice was regarded as under divine protection. This is illustrated by the Book of the Covenant (Ex. 20²²⁻²³ 19), which deals to a large extent with questions of right and of humane regard for those in need.

The Prophetic Period. With Amos and Hosea we enter upon a new stage in the development of the idea of God. The preceding period had prepared the Israelites for a purging process. Their amalgamation with the Canaanites had contaminated the Mosaic religion but had not destroyed it. The introduction of Baalish rites and beliefs had produced revulsion as well as attraction. The difference between Jehovah and Baal was too great to be concealed or overlooked, and with the lapse of time it deepened into a sharp antithesis. This antithesis must have been felt to some extent by devout minds ever since the settlement in Canaan, but it did not receive a radical expression until the time of the eighth-century prophets. Through these men the Israelitic religion sought to cast off the foreign elements imported into it and to restore Jehovah to his original and unique pre-eminence. The new era thus inaugurated is one of the most important in the religious history of mankind. No movement quite comparable to it is anywhere else to be found. It raised the thought of God to a new level and gave to it an expression so striking that it has been to a large extent normative for all subsequent ages.

The eighth-century prophets and their successors in the next two centuries did not discourse on the nature of God nor on his metaphysical and ethical attributes; they were not teachers of theology. But they nevertheless did have fairly definite and consistent views on these subjects and they did much to elevate and clarify thought with reference to them.

1. Monotheism. The unity of Jehovah they developed into an explicit monotheism. They applied Elijah's negative attitude toward Baal to the foreign deities in general. These deities were perhaps not denied existence altogether. Some sort of being they apparently had apart from their idols. The prophets were probably none of them strict metaphysical monotheists or monists. But they were religious monotheists. For them there was but one God; other deities were "no gods." An explicit statement to this effect we do not find in the eighth-century prophets, but the idea is everywhere assumed (Hos. 8⁶ Isa. 28). And a century later, in Jeremiah (21¹⁶ 20) and in Deuteronomy (4³⁹ 64), it is plainly affirmed. Not until the following century, however, did it become an outstanding feature of prophetic teaching. It was Deutero-Isaiah who first developed it, repeatedly affirmed it (Isa. 43¹⁰, 44⁵, 45²¹), and supported it by arguments. One argument was drawn from the power of prediction which Jehovah alone possessed (Isa. 41²¹⁻²⁹), another from his work as Creator (Isa. 40¹² 42⁵ 44²⁴ 45¹², 18), and a third from the absurdity of all idolatry (Isa. 40¹⁸⁻²⁰ 41⁶. 44⁹⁻²⁰). The heathen gods, according to Deutero-Isaiah, were inseparably bound up with their idols; they had no creative power and no power to predict the future; they were, therefore, no gods. Jehovah, on the other hand, and he alone, had no connection with man-made images; he alone knew the future; he alone was Creator of the world; hence he alone was God. In Deutero-Isaiah we thus have an absolute and explicit religious monotheism.

2. Universal and Creative Power. The power of Jehovah, as we have seen, was even in pre-prophetic times connected with the idea of his creatorship and universal rule. But the connection was loose and undeveloped. It was the writing prophets who first made the universal and creative power of Jehovah a matter of religious significance. Amos saw in his universal sway a ground for rebuking the pride of the Israelites (97) and also a ground for asserting the certainty of their impending doom (92-4). Isaiah found in it a basis for the belief that the evils suffered at the hands of Assyria were a divine punishment for the sins of Israel (105). Indeed, in a generalized form this message was the burden of pre-exilic prophecy. The prophets also, and particularly Deutero-Isaiah, saw in the unlimited power of Jehovah a guarantee of the ultimate redemption of Israel. He had a purpose in the world, a purpose bound up with the fate of Israel, and the fulfillment of this purpose was made certain by the range of his power.

It was in this connection also that the creatorship of Jehovah was brought into prominence and made a fundamental article of belief. The pre-exilic prophets say little about it. Their message was primarily one of reproof and doom. But with the Exile the situation changed. Now the message needed was one of comfort and hope. Deutero-Isaiah, consequently, seized upon the idea of Jehovah's creatorship as one that furnished the firmest ground of assurance, and made it such a prominent element in his teaching that some have ascribed its origin to him. This, as we have seen, is a mistake. The idea was old. It was not the novelty of the idea that led Deutero-Isaiah to revert so frequently to it, but the novelty of the situation that confronted him. The idea had a religious value for his time that it had not had for earlier times, and this it was that led him to dwell with such fondness upon it. Later writers followed his example, and after his day it was an important article in the Israelitic creed (Gen. 1, Psa. 83f. 191 339 1042, 5 1485 Prov. 822-31 Job 2614).

3. Spirituality and Holiness. Spirituality and holiness continued to be ascribed to Jehovah in the prophetic period, but they were given a more refined interpretation, and the tendency was to conceive of them in an ethical as well as a metaphysical sense. In Isa. 313 we have the nearest O.T. approach to the N.T. declaration that God is a Spirit. Isaiah here in two parallel lines opposes God to man and spirit to flesh, thus practically identifying man with flesh and God with spirit. This sharp distinction between flesh and spirit gave a unique and more exalted character to the conception of the divine nature, and this in turn had an important influence upon the conception and practice of worship. Worship heretofore had to a large extent taken the form of rites and ceremonies; it had been closely bound up with the land of Canaan and the sacred places in it; it had also, in spite of the Mosaic prohibition, not been free from the use of images. In each of these respects the prophetic teaching marked a significant advance. Some scholars hold that the pre-exilic prophets repudiated all sacrifices and other external rites as unworthy elements in the worship of such an exalted and spiritual being as Jehovah (Amos 521-24 Hos. 66 Isa. 110-17 Mic. 66-8 Jer. 721, 22). But this conclusion is not warranted by the text. Isaiah, for instance, in his condemnation of the current cultus, associated prayer with sacrifice (115), but it is evident that he did not mean to condemn prayer as such. What he condemned was a merely formal prayer (2913), and so it was also with his condemnation of sacrifices and other religious rites. These rites as merely formal exercises were denounced as worthless, but when accompanied by the proper spirit they were not repudiated.

The first prophet clearly to recognize that the worship of Jehovah could be completely detached from the land of Canaan was Jeremiah (291-13). But in principle this independence was implied in the prophetic conception of religion. The Israelitic antipathy to image-worship antedated, as we have seen, the writing prophets. But it was transformed by them, especially by Hosea (84, 6 132), into a crusading spirit, and in the Deuteronomic reformation was carried to a triumphant conclusion. A century later it was reaffirmed by Deutero-Isaiah in terms of biting satire (449-20) as over against the Babylonian religion, and from that time on remained a characteristic feature of the Jewish faith.

The holiness of Jehovah was impressively proclaimed by Isaiah (63f.), and his message at this point was echoed by Deutero-Isaiah (4114, 16, 20 433, 14, etc.). Ezekiel also laid stress on the divine holiness (3621f.). The term with them lost its earlier suggestion of the incalculable and irrational and denoted the unapproachable greatness of God. It also tended to become identified with some one distinctive attribute such as the power, purity, or righteousness of God.

We thus see that the writing prophets represented a distinct advance beyond the earlier period in their conception of the metaphysical attributes of deity. But it was especially in the ethical realm that their thought of God transcended that of their predecessors. It has just been noted that there was a tendency on their part to identify the holiness of God with his righteousness.

4. Righteousness. This suggests one of the most characteristic elements of their teaching, namely, that they ascribed to righteousness an absolute character. They saw in it the unique and most essential element in deity.

This insight they expressed in various ways that brought them into conflict with the traditional religion. For one thing, they insisted that sacrifices and other religious rites were no divine requirement; they lay outside the law of God. God for them was no ecclesiastical disciplinarian. Again, as the positive counterpart of this they maintained that the essence of true religion is to be found in righteousness. God's only requirement is an obedient will (Amos 5²⁴ Hos. 6⁶ Isa. 116^f. Micah 6⁸). What he abhors is impurity, injustice, and inhumanity. The rich, insofar as they are guilty of these sins, are the special objects of his wrath. Then, too, they represented the impending day of Jehovah as one in which an even-handed justice was to be meted out to all nations. No special favor was to be shown to the Hebrews. Rather were they to be called to all the stricter account because of the privileged position which they in the past had enjoyed (Amos 3²). The day of Jehovah was thus to be one in which the eternal ethical ideal was to emerge in the order of time and God was to manifest himself as the absolute and righteous ruler of the world.

The righteousness which Jehovah, according to the prophets, demanded of his worshipers was as deep and broad as the ethical nature itself. It was subjective (Jer. 43^f. Ezek. 36²⁶) as well as objective (Isa. 117), personal as well as social. It involved mercy as well as justice. God for the prophets was "a just God and a Saviour" (Isa. 45²¹). Some of them stressed one attribute and some another. To Amos Jehovah was pre-eminently the God of moral law, to Hosea the God of love, to Isaiah the sovereign Lord of mankind, to Jeremiah the Searcher of hearts who enters into personal relations with men, to Ezekiel the jealous Guardian of an inflexible justice, to Deutero-Isaiah the Redeemer of Israel and of the world. But all of them saw in him the complete embodiment of their ethical ideal; no imperfection attached to him. Their view of the world, at least in intent, was an absolute ethical monotheism.

The Legalistic Period. The period following the decline of prophecy was more complex than might be suggested by its designation as "legalistic." The Law was the most prominent characteristic of the religious life of the period, but it did not exclude other important currents of thought. The prophetic teaching did not become extinct. It was presupposed by the Law, and expressed itself in the form of messianism (Joel, Isa. 24-27, Daniel) and of individual piety (Psalms). There was also a strong "humanistic" movement which we find reflected in the Wisdom Literature (Proverbs, Job, Ecclesiastes). These three different types of religious life and thought differed not a little from each other, but in their conception of God they were virtually at one. They all at this point accepted the teaching of the prophets; but they did not merely passively reflect it. They modified and developed it in various ways.

1. Absoluteness. To a certain extent the post-exilic period was reactionary. It was marked by a revival of ceremonialism and national exclusiveness that ran counter to the prophetic spirit. But while these reactionary tendencies affected seriously the practical religious life, they had little, if any, effect on the current theology. In theory post-exilic Judaism was rigorously monotheistic. No matter how much of a martinet Jehovah may seem to have been in his relation to the Jews, he was nevertheless regarded as "God of Heaven" and "Most High God" (Ezra 6¹⁰ Neh. 24 Dan. 3²⁸ Psa. 78⁵⁶). Instead of limiting the absoluteness ascribed to him by the classical prophets the post-exilic writers accentuated it. They dwelt at length upon his work as Creator and represented him as superior both in knowledge and power to the limitations of time and space (Psa. 8, 104, 139⁴⁻¹²).

2. Transcendence. The transcendence thus attributed to God no doubt obscured to some extent his immanence. The tendency was to detach him from nature and to think of him as above the world and apart from it, as One who in a miraculous way occasionally intervened in it. In other words, the tendency was toward a dualistic view of the world. This also had the practical effect of emphasizing the divine sovereignty rather than the divine Fatherliness. But while the post-exilic stress on the divine transcendence in these respects represented a decline in religious insight, it prepared the way for a significant advance. Jehovah heretofore had been a God of this world, a God of the living, not of the dead. This was true of the prophetic as well as the Mosaic and the popular conception of him. His power extended to heaven and to the underworld (Amos 9²), but for actual human life this had little or no significance. His real value to men was confined to the world as we see it. This world might be miraculously changed by a divine intervention, but it was still thought of as a world in which decay and death had their place. Not until the post-exilic period did the conception arise of a new heaven and a new earth from which death and sorrow would be forever banished (Isa. 258). And this was made possible only by the higher degree of transcendence now ascribed to Jehovah. He was now thought of as so superior to the order of nature that he was in no way bound by it but was able to destroy it (Isa. 516) and to create a new world-order in which the ideal values of the spirit would be eternally conserved. It was at this point that post-exilic Judaism made its most important contribution to the development of the idea of God. The transcendent character now attributed to him made possible the belief in the resurrection and the life to come (Isa. 2619 Dan. 122) and so transformed Israelitic religion from a this-world religion into a religion that knows no spatial or temporal limits.

Comparison with Greek Thought. In order to appreciate the uniqueness and greatness of the O.T. conception of God it is important to compare it with Greek thought on this subject.

1. Conception of Spirit. In one respect Plato and his followers had a higher or more refined conception of spirit and of the divine nature than did the Hebrews. The latter thought of spirit as an ethereal substance, an attenuated form of matter, and so ascribed to God a semi-material nature. Plato, on the other hand, introduced the idea of an "immaterial" form of existence and applied it to God. This manifestly represented a higher and more "spiritual" conception of the divine nature from the philosophical point of view; it was later incorporated into Christian theology under the influence, especially, of Origen and Augustine.

2. Transcendence and Dualism. In another respect there was a rapprochement between Greek and Hebrew thought. Both inclined toward an exaggerated conception of the divine transcendence and a resulting dualism. This was more pronounced with the Greeks than the Hebrews, but toward the close of the O.T. period, as we have seen, it became a prominent characteristic of Hebrew thought. There was, however, this difference—that the Hebrews looked upon the world as created by God, while to the Greek idealists matter remained more or less independent of the Deity, a resisting element. Greek dualism was thus more deep-seated than that of the O.T.

3. Personality. The main difference between Greek and Hebrew theology is to be found in their view of the divine personality. On this point Hebrew thought, as we have seen, was explicit. It conceived of God as a thinking, feeling, and willing Being. This conception was, of course, not altogether lacking with the Greek thinkers. But it was obscured in various ways. Plato, for instance, found true reality in the universal: for him, the more individual or particular anything was, the less real it was, and this prevented a proper recognition of that unique individuality which is a constituent element in personality. Aristotle rejected this phase of Plato's teaching, but represented God as so devoid of feeling and of will that while the world loved him he did not love the world. Such a God was manifestly not a person in the proper sense of the term. But while defective from the practical and popular standpoint, the Greek view of God carried with it an ethical and spiritual idealism that brought it into close kinship with Hebrew thought. This is a most significant fact. That Greek philosophy led to a world-view similar in its fundamental outline to that of Hebrew prophecy is striking evidence that the intellect as well as the heart demands for its satisfaction an intelligent Being as the ultimate cause of the world.

Relation to New Testament. The God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob was also the God of Jesus (Mk. 1226). It is impossible to understand Jesus' conception of God apart from that of the O.T. Yet there is a difference between them. The O.T. conception in spite of all its greatness did not arrive at completeness and unity. It represented a developing process, a development from nationalism toward individualism, from particularism toward universalism, from naturalism toward an ethical spiritualism; but the goal of a universal, individual, and ethical faith was not attained. The God of the O.T. remained bound more or less to Jewish nationalism and particularism. He also failed to rise to the level of self-sacrificing love so as to evoke from men the instinctive cry of "Abba, Father." Here it was that Jesus transcended the O.T. He conceived of God as Father and as Father of all men in a way that rendered obsolete all earlier nationalistic, particularistic, legalistic, and royalistic conceptions of him. It was in this sense that he fulfilled the law and the prophets. He lifted their conception of God to the plane of an absolute ethical perfection.

Literature: Addis, Hebrew Religion; Badé, The O.T. in the Light of To-day; Barton, The Religion of Israel; Budde, Religion of Israel to the Exile; Davidson, The Theology of the O.T.; Knudson, The Religious Teaching of the O.T.; Marti, Religion of the O.T.; Orchard, The Evolution of O.T. Religion; Ottley, The Religion of Israel; Peters, The Religion of the Hebrews; H. Wheeler Robinson, The Religious Ideas of the O.T.; H. P. Smith, The Religion of Israel.

THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

BY PRINCIPAL H. WHEELER ROBINSON

A group of Arab chieftains were scanning the night sky with Colonel Lawrence's glasses, surprised at the revelation of stars before unseen. The talk was of telescopes of ever greater power, revealing more and more stars. "When we see them all," one said, "there will be no night in heaven." But another asked, "Why are the Westerners always wanting all? Behind our few stars we can see God, who is not behind your millions." (Lawrence, Revolt in the Desert, pp. 138, 139.)

The Arab's words explain why a Semitic book, notwithstanding its limitations of "scientific" knowledge, still forms part of our greatest religious inheritance; behind its few stars it shows us God. The path by which that supreme knowledge was reached might be not less fitly described by some further words from the same book, in which the author pleaded with his Arab allies for a desperate venture: "There could be no honor in a sure success, but much might be wrested from a sure defeat" (p. 232). There speaks the veritable spirit of the great prophets who were the makers of the religion of Israel. Their persistent purpose became a crucifixion; it is always a cross that shows most of God. The moral struggle by which they reached God became itself a revelation of his nature.

When we look at the religion of Israel as a whole, we are justified in saying that the prophetic consciousness was to the nation as is the soul to the human body. We cannot, of course, make a clear-cut division of personality into these two elements. (Hebrew psychology never made the attempt, though the Greek psychology did. See the essay on "Hebrew Psychology" in The People and the Book.) But there is unmistakably something in human life which cannot be explained by external or physical categories, something we agree to call "soul," to denote the unifying center or nucleus, assimilating the external and the physical to itself, and transforming them into new products. This is what we see in the religion of Israel. It has its history, the history of a development extending over a thousand years, through which the activity of many factors can be traced—racial, geographical, political, economic, and social. We study the literature of the O.T. to-day in exactly the same critical fashion as we study any other body of literature.

But when we have gone behind the literature to the history it reveals, and have traced in that history the growth of a religion which has claimed and found a unique place in the world, the study of the religion brings us face to face with a comparatively small group of men who are, humanly speaking, its makers. These are the prophets of the great formative period from the eighth to the sixth centuries. The secret of their power and influence lies in their inner conviction that God is speaking to them and through them. This is the prophetic consciousness, and it is the soul of Israel's religion. All that went before—Semitic animism and Canaanite Baalism and Babylonian mythology—is so much "material" from which the soul assimilates all that is not alien to its controlling purpose. All that came after—the ritual of the Temple, the worship and piety of the Psalter, the ethics of the Wisdom Literature, the hopes of apocalyptic—can be truthfully described as the product of the prophetic consciousness, not in its substance, but in its dominating spirit and character. This is the point of view from which the present article is written, for it gives the Pisgah-view of Israel's religion.

I. THE EARLY RELIGION OF ISRAEL

x. Semitic Animism. The Hebrews emerge into the light of history from the nomadic life of the desert. In Doughty's Arabia Deserta we get a vivid impression of what that life was through what it still is, for the Moslem creed has left the deep convictions of the desert largely unchanged. Animism—the belief in souls and spiritual beings—is a living faith among the Bedouins of to-day, who still believe in demons to whom the diseases of mind or body are traced. The belief in psychical influences is illustrated by the power ascribed to "the evil eye." The worship of ancestors still finds expression in a sacrifice to the dead. There are blood-rites which take us back to what is probably the most primitive element in Semitic sacrifice—the disposal of the blood of a slain animal, to escape from its weird powers and taboos. The rising of the new moon (with which the Hebrew Passover seems to be linked) is still something of a festival to these Bedouins. We may, even now, find examples of the fetishism which underlies stone-worship, together with the equally ancient tree-worship.

Survivals of all these practices are recorded also in the O.T., though their grosser elements have naturally been eliminated or transformed by the prophetic religion. Comparatively little trace remains of the belief in demons (Isa. 13²¹ 34¹⁴ Lev. 16⁸ 17⁷; cf. 1 Kings 22²¹), for this was inconsistent with a developed belief in Jehovah. Ancestor-worship is reflected in a number of the customs and beliefs concerning the dead (Lev. 19³¹ Deut. 14¹ 18¹⁰, 11 26¹⁴ 1 Sam. 28¹³ Isa. 8¹⁹ Jer. 16⁶) and seems to be the original explanation of the teraphim (Gen. 31³⁴ Judg. 17⁵ 1 Sam. 19¹³ Hos. 3⁴). The blood-rites of the O.T. are too numerous even to be summarized here (e.g., Ex. 24⁶⁻⁸ 1 Sam. 14^{32f}. Ezek. 24⁸), but blood-revenge left its notable mark on early Hebrew law, as blood-communion with the Deity did on Hebrew sacrificial ritual. Another blood-rite is that of circumcision, which originally belonged to puberty (preceding marriage), and was transferred to infancy (Ex. 42⁴⁻²⁶). In ancient Israel the festival of the new moon was as important as that of the Sabbath became to Judasim (2 Kings 4²³ Hos. 2¹¹ Isa. 1¹³). The idea of sacred stones and trees is continued in the Mazzebe, or stone pillar, and the Ashera, or wooden post (standing as substitute for the sacred tree), which were constant features of the worship at the "high places" of Canaan, so that these invading nomads would find nothing strange in their use. It is possible also that something akin to totemism is represented in the list of "unclean" animals, and in some of the tribal and personal names (see art., Bible Customs, p. 74b).

2. Primitive Ideas of Jehovah. But we must not forget that some, at least, of the Hebrews who settled in Canaan brought with them a higher faith, in which was already to be found the germ of the prophetic religion (for fuller details, see art., The O.T. Conception of God, p. 158). The escape of Israel from that Egyptian control which had temporarily modified their nomadic life was bound up with the faith of a great leader, really the first of the prophets. Moses did for the name of Jehovah what Mohammed did for Allah—he gave it a new content, as that of Israel's deliverer from bondage. The name was old, but the meaning was new. The God whose power and grace Moses proclaimed was a local God, whose seat was Sinai; a storm-God, whose favorite "theophany," or manifestation, was in the phenomena of the thunder, conceived as his "voice"; a war-God, whose battle-song was chanted when the ark moved; an oracular God, who gave decisions in disputes about tribal custom. By transmitting the divinely given decisions to his people Moses became a lawgiver in very much the same sense in which the sheikh of the desert still settles the disputes of his group of nomads.

But when all this has been said, we are still left asking what there was to separate Jehovah, thus conceived, from the gods of other peoples surrounding Israel, and of the same Semitic stock—e.g., from Chemosh, the god of Moab (see on Moabite Stone, p. 117b). Two things at least we may say, and they take us far: (1) The power and purpose of Jehovah had been revealed in a great act of deliverance, an act which became a constant source of inspiration to the memory of the subsequent generations (Amos 2¹⁰ Hos. 11¹). He is a saviour-God from the beginning, who makes history the channel of divine revelation. History is the sacrament of the religion of Israel, a sacrament which grew in meaning and power with the progress of the history. God is known for what he is by what he does, and what he does is the history of his people. (2) The second distinctive feature of this primitive faith in Jehovah is that the relation between him and Israel is ethically conceived from the outset. He is not a merely tribal God, so tied to Israel that his co-operation might be taken for granted. The words of Jesus, "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you," might be applied to the Jehovah of Moses. He acts of his own initiative, and in that freedom of divine grace there is the necessary basis of a moral relation. Here is the germ of the later prophetic teaching (cf. Amos 3²), which carried this moral conception to its true issue by liberating it from nationalistic limitations.

3. The Influence of Canaan. This austere faith of the nomad Israelites was as much higher than the religion of the land they invaded as nomadic culture was lower than that of Canaan. For many centuries Canaan had been under the civilizing influence of the great empires, Babylonia and Egypt, east and west of it; it is, e.g., in the Babylonian language that the petty kings of Palestine correspond both with Egypt and with one another (see on Tel-el-Amarna Tablets, p. 116). The excavation of some of the walled towns of these Canaanites has told us much about their life, their religion, their burial practices, and their pottery. They had advanced far beyond the polydemonism of nomadic religion. The "phallic" emblems found at their high places show that the worship was of the reproductive forces of nature. Their goddess Astarte (Ishtar) stood for sexual love and reproduction. Baal, or "lord," was not a proper name, but a common designation of the local deity, the giver of fertility. Agriculture was bound up with religion, and the existence of temple-prostitutes shows the depth to which such nature-worship could fall. We get a glimpse of a Canaanite festival in Judg. 927; the three great festivals of Israel, namely, Unleavened Bread (as distinct from the Passover subsequently combined with it), the Feast of Weeks, and the Feast of Ingathering, were all agricultural festivals, doubtless borrowed from the Canaanites, like so much else.

It was inevitable that the new environment should profoundly affect the religion of Israel. At first, Jehovah was conceived as the God of Sinai, who comes thence on occasion to help his people (so in the Song of Deborah, Judg. 5). But when he became "naturalized" in Canaan (cf. 1 Sam. 2619 Hos. 93. 4) in the sense of being the God of the land, there arose the grave peril that he should be "naturalized" in another sense, and made to conform with the naturalistic Baals of Canaan. This was the issue that Amos and Hosea had to face—not that of Elijah's earlier challenge to choose between Jehovah and the Tyrian Baal, but to choose between a higher and lower idea of Jehovah.

4. "Prophecy" Before the Prophets. Primitive prophecy, in the sense of ecstatic and dervish-like products of abnormal psychology, may have sprung from the Canaanite religion, for an Egyptian document of 1100 B.C. (Wenamun) tells us that a frenzy came upon a Canaanite youth during a sacrifice, in which he uttered a prophetic message. This incident connects with the frenzy of the prophets of Baal on Carmel (1 Kings 1828), and the less violent, but none the less abnormal, behavior of those prophets of Jehovah whom Saul encountered (1 Sam. 1054). He was drawn to share it by psychical sympathy; so at a later period the Spirit of God constrained him to "prophecy," throwing off his clothes and lying naked a day and a night. It is significant that we should first hear of such Hebrew prophesying at the time of the Philistine occupation, as again, in the time of Elijah and Elisha, it seems connected with an outbreak of nationalistic zeal against the Tyrian Baal, introduced by Jezebel (2 Kings 9); the prophets, lower or higher, were always prophets of Israel, even when patriotism seemed to go with pessimism.

But our literature also reveals a succession of prophets prior to the eighth century who evidently stand, as Moses did, head and shoulders above these ecstatic bands. We can say little of Deborah, and Balaam was not an Israelite prophet, but there are Samuel (called not a prophet but a seer, 1 Sam. 99), Gad (1 Sam. 225 2 Sam. 2413), Nathan (2 Sam. 12

1 Kings 18f.), Ahijah (1 Kings 1129), Micaiah (1 Kings 228f.), besides the outstanding figures of Elijah and Elisha. Thus we must not think of eighth century prophecy, in either its lower and psychical or its higher and moral aspects, as something wholly without precedent (cf. the religious and moral ideals of the early stories of Genesis, etc., which assumed literary form prior to the eighth century).

II. PROPHECY

1. The Prophetic Consciousness. The psychology of the Hebrews was very different from that of to-day. It sprang from three main ideas, namely, those of (1) a principle of life and consciousness identified with the breath (nephesh); (2) psychical functions ascribed to the physical organs, e.g., the heart, kidneys, bowels (not the brain); (3) an invasive, wind-like spirit (ruach), accounting for anything abnormal in human character or conduct. The earlier forms of Hebrew prophecy sprang from an abnormal psychical and physical state (e.g., trance, ecstasy, dream), and some of these earlier phenomena remain in the later developments (Isa. 6, 811 Jer. 209 427 Ezek. 314, 15 Amos 7-9). But, in the case of the greater prophets, such features are altogether subordinate to moral and spiritual experience of the highest type; the abnormal, in their case, has been transferred from the center to the circumference of their consciousness.

The prophets believed in the "objective" reality of what they saw and heard, just as did Augustine and Bunyan, and their abnormal states were probably essential to a prophetic "call," and were generally regarded as guaranteeing prophetic inspiration (cf. George Fox and the early Quakers); but the cardinal fact for us is that they were led to interpret their own moral and spiritual experience as a message of God to Israel. That which their own conscience condemned they taught that their God condemned; in this "value-judgment" lies the ultimate secret of divine inspiration. The movements of the world-powers (Assyria and Egypt, Babylon and Persia) around the politically unimportant Israel became morally explicable as controlled by Divine Providence and expressive of divine judgment. These prophets were primarily speakers, not writers; they were led to write, as a testimony against the refusal to hear (Isa. 81, 16 308 mg., Jer. 36). It is around these testimonies, recorded by the prophets or their disciples, and much expanded by later editors and readers, that the O.T. has gathered. Thus the truth of its inspiration depends on the philosophical issue of the kinship of human spirit with divine, for this, in the last resort, is what "revelation" will mean. Is that which is true of the human spirit also true of the divine, in which it lives and moves and has its being?

2. The Protagonists of Prophecy. The truth which issued from this prophetic consciousness was cumulative, as the opening verses of the Epistle to the Hebrews declare; as W. Robertson Smith has said, one truth was enough to make a Hebrew prophet (The Prophets of Israel, p. 182). Thus we see Amos and Micah animated by the strongest democratic sympathies, and convinced that luxury and greed, injustice and hard dealing with the poor are hateful in God's sight; for these things the enthusiastic religion of the high places will never atone. They are the prophets of a righteous judgment, but Hosea is something more. He penetrates to the need for a changed spirit that shall issue in a changed national life; he believes in a God of covenantal love, as well as of righteous judgment.

The most majestic conception of God in the eighth century is that of Isaiah, the prophet of the "holy," i.e., of the transcendent God, revealed so impressively in the narrative of the prophet's call (Isa. 6). God desires from his people the holiness of moral innocence, justice, and humanity (1⁶, 17 5¹⁶), not that of mere ceremonial (11^{1f}. 29¹³). The emphasis falls on the necessity for faith (7⁹ 8¹⁷ 28¹⁶ 30¹⁵) in spiritual, as against material forces (2²² 31³). The symbolic names which he gave to his children (7³ 8^{1f}.) show his recognition of the divine commission given to Assyria, and his conviction that a "righteous remnant" (cf. 6¹³) would be left to Judah, after the divine judgment (cf. 25-22), namely, the laying waste of the fruitless vineyard (5¹⁻⁷); and that this remnant (12⁵, 26; cf. 81^{6f}.) would be established in Jerusalem (28¹⁶⁻¹⁸ 31⁵), the dwelling place of Jehovah (8¹⁸). Isaiah lifted the idea of God to a new level by the definition of "holiness" in ethical terms.

In strong contrast with Isaiah stands Jeremiah, the prophet of spiritual individualism, whose autobiographical poems (the best translation is that by Skinner, in Prophecy and Religion) describe his call (14-10), his mission (11¹⁻¹⁹), his anxious sympathies (41⁹ 81^{8f}. 131⁷ 23⁹), his sense of Jehovah's power (42³⁻²⁶), his lonely sorrows (15¹⁰⁻²¹), the divine compulsion which kept him to his task in spite of its difficulty (20⁷⁻¹⁸). The special contribution to religion made by Jeremiah is along this line of a direct personal fellowship with God developed through outer misfortunes and inner sorrows. His ideal is of an inward relation to God, as contrasted with dependence on the Temple and its worship (74) and conformity to an external law written on stone; i.e., he anticipated a time when all would share in the prophetic consciousness. This may be seen in his culminating prophecy of the "New Covenant" (31³¹⁻³⁴).

We find again another type of prophet in Ezekiel, the sacramentalist. His cardinal ideas are four: (1) the self-revelation of the holy and glorious God in history, and especially in the history of Israel; this explains both the doom of Jerusalem and its subsequent restoration; (2) the individual moral responsibility of men before God, as in ch. 18; (3) the supernatural work of the Spirit of God, in changing human hearts (36²⁴⁻²⁹) and in restoring the nation to vitality, as in ch. 37; (4) the sacramental realization of the holy presence of God in the restored Temple and city, as in chs. 40-48; the keynote is, "Jehovah is there," 48³⁵. The influence of Ezekiel on post-exilic Judaism was destined to be very great.

In his fellow-exile, Deutero-Isaiah (Isa. 40-55), the sacramental emphasis is replaced by the evangelical. The aim is the "comfort" of Israel (40^{1f}.) through the promise of a speedy deliverance from exile by the hands of Cyrus, the "anointed," i.e., the Messiah of Jehovah, who will overthrow Babylon and restore Israel to its homeland. This confidence is based on the power of Jehovah over nature (40^{12f}.) and history (41^{2f}.), and his knowledge of the future (41¹²⁻²⁹; contrast the folly of idolatry, 44^{9f}.). There also emerges a new and most impressive conception of the mission of Israel as "The Servant of Jehovah"—a clearly drawn and fully individualized figure, prophetic in function, patient and gentle in spirit, conscious of being a weapon in the divine hand, sustained by companionship with Jehovah, given the task of bringing the world to his feet, facing suffering in that mission, at last victorious through this very suffering endured for others (Isa. 42¹⁻⁴ 49¹⁻⁶ 50⁴⁻⁹ 52¹³⁻⁵³ 53¹²). This conception has more profoundly affected Christian than Jewish thought; for it had great influence on the consciousness of Jesus and on the N.T. (Cf. H. Wheeler Robinson, The Cross of the Servant, and in this Commentary the note on the Suffering Servant, p. 664.)

3. The Response to Prophecy. How far did the religion of the nation Israel as a whole reflect the great conceptions of its pioneers? Very little, to judge from our literary evidence, so far as the contemporaries of the prophets were concerned. We see that Isaiah formed a circle of disciples (8¹⁶), so creating the "righteous remnant" and inaugurating the idea of the church, as a spiritual and not simply as a national body (Buchanan Gray, Isaiah, p. 155). An attempt at national reformation on prophetic lines was made, first by Hezekiah (2 Kings 18^{3f.}), and in much more drastic and influential a fashion by Josiah (2 Kings 22 and 23). This is the reformation usually associated with our book of Deuteronomy, part of which seems to have been the mysterious "book of the Law" found in the Temple. It was probably drawn up by disciples of the prophets, who found their aspirations checked during the "heathenism" of Manasseh's reign; the book of Deuteronomy largely reflects the teaching of the eighth-century prophets, especially of Hosea. (See the Commentary on Deuteronomy in the New Century Bible, pp. 33, 34.) The ideals of the prophets are not left in the air; they are to be realized by centralizing all worship at the one sanctuary of Jerusalem, where presumably it can be kept free from corruption and abuse; the humanitarian desires of the prophets are now applied in the restatement of ancient laws and customs.

The reformation carried out by Josiah might have been no more than an episode in the history of Israel's religion; but the stern teaching of the capture of Jerusalem and the deportation of many of its chief inhabitants within the next generation gave a re-enforcement and a sanction to the words of the prophets which no king could command. It was inevitable that in thus becoming sacrosanct they should crystallize, losing the fluidity of origin; it was inevitable also that the reformation worked by the Exile in the popular religion of Israel should be something very different from anything these prophets had sought. That is true, however, of all history and all reformers, as it is true of life; the price of realization is always a loss of ideality.

III. THE TRANSFORMED RELIGION OF ISRAEL

The religious community which gathered in and around Jerusalem after the Exile was very different from the political state of which the decline and fall had been watched by the mournful eyes of the prophet Jeremiah. It was geographically and numerically small, politically dependent on Persia, economically impoverished. Its first struggles to exist, which are reflected in the pages of Haggai and Zechariah (chs. 1-8), were accompanied by political hopes doomed to disappointment, and the resultant disillusionment is seen in the book of Malachi, some seventy years later. But the wise and patriotic administration of Nehemiah, and the religious leadership of Ezra (see Neh. 8), marked the beginning of a new period, for which the discipline of the Exile and the new reverence for the teaching of the prophets had cleared the way. Henceforward we can speak of "Judaism" as a compact and definite body of belief, the strength of which was to be manifested in the second century B.C., when it had to meet the shock of Hellenistic propaganda and persecution. The characteristics of this religion of early Judaism can be seen in four bodies of literature now incorporated or partly incorporated in the O.T., namely, the Law, the Psalms, the Wisdom Books, and those beginnings of apocalyptic which were to have so rich and influential a development beyond the canon of the O.T. (see art., Inter Testamental Literature, p. 188).

1. The Ritual of the Temple. At the center of the post-exilic religious community was the worship offered to Jehovah in the Temple. Many of its details went back to the pre-exilic and indeed to the pre-prophetic days, for a priesthood is naturally conservative, and the old laws and customs of ancient sanctuaries had been collected and were carefully treasured. To understand them we have to go back to the codes of law of earlier date now enshrined in the "Torah" or Pentateuch—the Book of the Covenant (Ex. 20²²–23¹⁹) of perhaps the tenth century, the book of Deuteronomy of the seventh, the Law of Holiness (Lev. 17–26) of the sixth, and the "Priestly Code," which seems to have formed Ezra's Book of the Law, in the fifth. These codes contain much that we should call secular, as well as the ordinances of worship; but we must remember that the distinction is ours, not theirs; Jehovah is the ultimate lawgiver whatever be the law, just as the god Shamash is regarded as the inspirer of the Code of Hammurabi, and the community in all its life and activities is conceived as a "theocracy."

In the light of these earlier codes we can see the general trend of development and mark the new emphasis. Thus the new ceremony of the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16) takes its place by the side of the ancient festivals of the Passover (and Unleavened Bread), the Feast of Weeks and the Feast of Booths, and, indeed, becomes the most important of all the holy seasons. A new solemnity, a deeper sense of sin—indeed, a new conception of sin on prophetic lines—are characteristic of the Day of Atonement. We also find new types of sacrifice emerging after the Exile. Prior to it the typical sacrifices were the peace-offering, a communion-feast of the worshipers, at which only the blood and certain portions of the fat were reserved for the Deity, and the burnt-offering, a rarer form of animal sacrifice, in which the victim was wholly offered to God. But in these later days we hear of the sin-offering and the trespass-offering. The sin-offering was specially "holy," and was burned away from the altar, when offered for the high priest or the community; otherwise, it was, because of this special holiness, consumed by the priests (Lev. 6^{26f.}). This should prevent us from thinking of the victim as penally substituted for the sinner; it is, rather, a gift to restore a broken relation. The peculiarity of the trespass-offering was that it accompanied the restitution of misappropriated property, plus a fifth of its value (Lev. 6^{1f.}). But in both cases there is no attempt to deal with deliberate sin (Num. 15³⁰).

There has been a similar transformation of the priesthood. In earlier times anyone might sacrifice—no priest is mentioned in the Book of the Covenant, and David's sons were priests (2 Sam. 8¹⁸). The professional "Levite" hired by Micah (Judg. 17) belonged to Judah. By the time of Deuteronomy (18¹) the priests are identified with the Levites, the priesthood not yet being confined to Aaron's sons, as in the later Priestly Code (Lev. 15). In the poem known as the "Blessing of Moses," probably belonging to the eighth century, the tribe of Levi is represented as a priestly community (Deut. 33⁸⁻¹¹). Ezekiel confined the priesthood to descendants of Zadok (44¹³⁻¹⁵). But in the time of the Chronicler (cir. 300 B.C.) to be a priest is to be descended from Aaron (1 Chr. 6⁴⁹⁻⁵³). In this transformation of both sacrifices and priesthood we can see at once the new emphasis on the holiness of God and therefore on the holiness of those who approach him, but we can see also that the spirit of the old taboos still remains to limit the moralization of religion which the prophets so strongly urged. They would have found something to approve and something to condemn in the religion which developed as a result of their teaching. We must, however, not set the priest in too sharp an antithesis to the prophet, as is often done. If there were worldly priests of the type of Caiaphas, there were also pious priests of the type of Zechariah, the father of John the Baptist. Let anyone who would realize the inspiration of the Temple ritual within a responsive heart read from the Apocrypha the fiftieth chapter of Ecclesiasticus.

2. The Piety of the Psalter. But we need not turn from the O.T. to the Apocrypha to realize what the ritual of the Temple meant for religion. The book of Psalms is in form primarily a collection of liturgies, though it contains elements not intended for liturgical purposes. Its piety largely clusters round the ritual of the Temple, as many a familiar phrase bears witness (247 266 274 422-4 433 847 1343). Without the Temple, we should have had no book of Psalms, to the incalculable loss of man's devotional approach to God. It is in this book that we see the finest product of the prophetic spirit, working itself out in the praises and prayers of the devout. This is what the religion of Israel actually means in its noblest application to life. If in the Psalms we have lost the freshness and originality of the prophetic pioneers, we have gained by the translation of ideas once novel into the familiar language of piety. Of course there is much in the book of Psalms which goes back behind the prophets. But it is their spirit that animates the book, whether the psalmists look on nature, the handiwork of God, or on man, exalted by him to so high a place, and (in the case of the chosen Israel) dignified with so noble a history of Divine Providence.

The book of Psalms is indeed a compendium of both the religion and the theology of early Judaism, and we recognize in it again and again the great ideas of the prophets. (1) The idea of God is fully and confidently monotheistic, (e.g., Psa. 115)—the position reached for the first time by Deutero-Isaiah. To this one and only God belong both mystery and majesty, both "righteousness" and "loving-kindness." His majesty is expressed by the language of the old theophanies, though the emphasis now falls on the ethical attributes (Psa. 97), without elimination of what Otto has called the "numinous," or awe-inspiring elements (62 441^{f.} 855 908). The quality of loving-kindness, originally brought out by Hosea, is finely hymned in Psa. 366-10, where the companion quality of "righteousness" also appears—that "rightness" which is justice in weights and measures or in loyalty to a covenant promise. But always the mystery in God's personality remains, that distinctive something which cannot be reduced to our terms of right and wrong. The psalmists, as well as Deutero-Isaiah, repeatedly say that his thoughts are not as our thoughts. (2) This majestic God is the God of nature, though of a nature much more simply and crudely conceived than we usually think. The nature Psalms (8 191-7 29 65 104 148) together exalt both man and God; for if they show the wisdom and power of the Creator, they also show something of the dignity and meaning of human life, to which so wonderful a setting and so high a place have been given. The cosmology is still that of Babylonian myth—a flat earth, supported by mountain pillars, which also hold up the heavens; all around the earth the primeval ocean and its monsters; underneath it the gloomy abode of Sheol, from which there is no return; above the solid heaven is the palace of Jehovah, and the heavenly court of angels. But there is a noble conception of God as Creator which lifts these crude ideas to a level never reached by Babylon,—a conception which is due to the prophets of Israel. (3) This uniqueness is seen also in the intimate interrelation of God and human history. Religion grows out of experience, and the psalms which interpret the history of Israel (78 105 106 114 136) are characteristic of the religion. (4) It is further seen in the interrelation of God with human society. It is God's concern to find or create a community of worshipers, to oppose and overthrow the ungodly, within or without Israel. This partly explains the passionate imprecations against Jehovah's enemies (58 59 69 83 109 137), as it does explain the peculiar consciousness of a community within the community, a righteous remnant to whom God's honor is committed. Here we notice again how directly the work of the prophets is continued in these disciples of theirs, the psalmists. (5) Finally, we come to the personal religion of the Psalter, of which Jeremiah was the pioneer and chief inspirer. It is not "individualism" in our modern sense, as something consciously antithetical to "socialism"; it is, rather, an individual-social consciousness which merges itself easily into "corporate personality" and identifies itself with the community, so that we often find it difficult to know whether an individual or a group is speaking to us in the Psalms.

The notes of this personal religion, whether it be individual or social, are a strong trust in Jehovah (16 23 91), thankful joy in God (107) and constant dependence on him (103) who is omnipresent (139). The standards of conduct inspired by this trust are prophetic (15 24); the chief if not the only sacrifice is that of obedience (40) and uprightness of conduct (50). Sometimes the consciousness of "righteousness" is too prominent to satisfy a Christian conscience (1822-24 261-6, 11; cf. 1432); but the penitential psalms (6 32 38 51 102 130 143) show how well the prophetic lessons have been learned. There is also too much insistence on outward prosperity as the sign and proof of divine approval, and on adversity as always penalty; but this is bound up with the limitations of outlook in regard to life after death (see below, p. 173). Notwithstanding these limitations, the sense of fellowship with God seems to defy all barriers, as in the remarkable close to the seventy-third psalm, which is, by common consent, the "high-water mark" of the religion of the Psalter.

3. The Ethics of "Wisdom." Alongside of the piety of the Psalter there is another result of the prophetic transformation of religion, to be seen in the "Wisdom" literature, namely, the canonical books of Proverbs, Job, and Ecclesiastes, and the apocryphal books of Ecclesiasticus and the Wisdom of Solomon. It must be remembered that this literature largely belongs to the same post-exilic community which we have just seen in the Psalms, and gives us another side of postexilic life. The ascription of the "Proverbs" and "Ecclesiastes" (as later of the Greek book of "Wisdom") to Solomon is simply one of those literary traditions which are seen also in the general ascription of Psalms to David or of laws to Moses: Solomon became the prototype of "wisdom," by which was meant practical sagacity (1 Kings 3^{16f.}) rather than purely intellectual knowledge. Under the influence of the prophets the idea was extended to include moral and religious wisdom; the "wise men" (Isa. 29¹⁴ Jer. 9²³ 18¹⁸) became the mediators of prophetic teaching, without claiming the direct inspiration of the prophet; they appealed to reason and experience on a universal or "humanistic" basis. (See art., Poetic and Wisdom Literature of O.T., p. 157b)

The wisdom literature of Israel gives us the nearest approach of the ancient Jewish mind to philosophy. It is predominantly religious, because there could be no Hebrew "philosophy" of life apart from religion (even Spinoza illustrates this). It is chiefly practical and ethical (or prudential), passing into speculation only in regard to certain religious problems, such as the divine method of creation, the revelation of God in nature and history, and, especially, the principle of moral retribution in relation to the problem of suffering. Its ethics moves between the utilitarian and the intuitional standpoints, and great emphasis is laid on the value of moral education. The moral ideas inculcated are chiefly those of justice, helpfulness, forgiveness, humility, self-restraint, industry, while violence, sensuality and greed, slander and gossip are condemned (for the noblest account of Hebrew ethics see Job 31, rising far above the Decalogue in moral quality). The familiar contrast of "Wisdom" and "Folly" in the opening chapters of Proverbs illustrates this practical appeal for an individual choice, because virtue will bring prosperity and vice adversity. The fear of Jehovah is the beginning of wisdom (Prov. 9¹⁰); it is folly to be irreligious. There is real kinship between the partial wisdom of man and the complete wisdom of God. The Divine Wisdom is personified as God's agent in creation (Prov. 8; Wisdom 7²²⁻⁸⁸), the shaper of the cosmos, natural and social.

But across this mechanical application of the prophetic doctrine of retribution, as in most of the psalms, there comes also from the wisdom literature a powerful challenge of this conventionality, a challenge truer to the spirit of the prophets than any slavish acceptance of the doctrine of retribution (how often the true heir of a great leader is the man who opposes the consequences of his leadership!). The prophets taught that God administered the government of the world on lines of the strictest retributive justice, and they applied this to nations. But when some of their own number (Jeremiah and Ezekiel) applied this truth to individuals, they set the "wise men" thinking about life along lines that at last issued in the books of Job and Ecclesiastes. Neither of these books believes in a life beyond death; the justice of God must be vindicated here and now, if at all. Ecclesiastes gives up the attempt in pessimism and agnosticism (not atheism—the modern and Western attitude), but tells us to make the prudent best of things, though all is vanity. Job gives us the splendid thought (see Job 11–210) of a divine mystery in the suffering of the innocent which conceals a sufficient divine purpose—if we could know it—witness-bearing to the reality of disinterested religion ("Doth Job fear God for naught?").

4. The Hopes of Apocalyptic. The fourth and last great result of the prophetic transformation of religion for both faith and literature is that known as "apocalyptic," by which is meant the "uncovering" of the future. So far as literary form goes, this is the most direct continuation of prophecy, and it is not always easy to say where prophecy ends and apocalyptic begins. (See art., Intertestamental Literature, pp. 189–91; Backgrounds, p. 843.) The central doctrine of an imminent judgment was common to both. From the time of Amos, if not earlier, the belief in the "Day of Jehovah" as a day of judgment, and in its near approach, formed a common feature of prophecy. Indeed, it has been said, and probably with truth, that the origin of apocalyptic is partly due to the re-editing of unfulfilled prophecy (Charles, Eschatology, 2nd edition, pp. 108, 134–190). Thus, whilst Jeremiah reapplied his own "Scythian" prophecies (45–619) to the Babylonians, and found their fulfillment in the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C., Ezekiel makes a new application of them (38¹⁴⁻¹⁷) to the "eschatological" enemy whom he calls "Gog," lured to attack Israel by its apparent defenselessness, so that Jehovah may demonstrate and vindicate his honor against this enemy.

The most important piece of apocalyptic in the O.T. prior to the book of Daniel (165 B.C.) is Isa. 24–27, which illustrates the character of this kind of literature in its transitional stage. Here we find the declaration of the coming judgment (24¹⁻²⁰) which will overthrow the city of chaos, and be manifested in a series of inevitable disasters. Next follows the imprisonment, with a view to punishment, of the patron-angels and the earthly kings of the nations (24^{21, 22}), and Jehovah begins his reign in Zion in visible glory (24²³; there is no Messiah). He proceeds to celebrate his coronation-festival, and to remove the sorrow of all the peoples of the earth by the abolition of death (25⁶⁻⁸). During the time of wrath against Jehovah's enemies on earth and in heaven, his people withdraw into safety (26²⁰⁻²⁷¹). Finally, the trumpet sounds to recall the Jews of the Dispersion to Jerusalem (27^{12, 13}). Here we see the outline of apocalyptic about 300 B.C. (the interspersed songs have been left unnoticed).

In the later book of Daniel both the angelology and the symbolism are elaborated, though not so far as in the contemporary apocryphal apocalyptic, the so-called Dream-Visions of Enoch (83–90). The use of traditional names—Daniel, Enoch, Moses, Baruch, Ezra—for the recipients of the revelation is characteristic and significant; the writers of apocalyptic, though doubtless conscious of inspiration, must shelter themselves under the venerable names of the past. Just as a Jewish commentator (Rashi) imagines that a vision of Israel's future history was granted to Moses on Pisgah, so that he saw its striking scenes unrolled before his eyes, even so the apocalyptists in more elaborate literary form, and with use of much conventional material, imagine a vision of the great successive epochs of the world's history; but the culminating point is always the absolute and complete kingly rule of God. This is conceived as due to supernatural intervention, not to any slow evolution of good within the world, so that the "kingdom of God" for the apocalyptists is something very different from modern ideas of the world's future. It is customary to call this kingdom "Messianic," because it is sometimes linked with the idea of a "Messiah," i.e., an "anointed" representative of Jehovah (see art., Israel's Messianic Hope, p. 181); but the Messiah is not necessary to the idea of the Kingdom. The main conceptions of it are that Israel is in the right against the world, that Israel itself needs sifting in order to yield a righteous remnant, and that the Kingdom will be characterized by moral and physical perfection, or at least by great advance on present conditions of earthly life. In the later developments of apocalyptic the realms of heaven and Sheol come into the reckoning and the emphasis is shifted to them. The whole lurid panorama is thrown into the future, perhaps at long intervals of time, though the beginnings are conceived as close at hand. Consequently, the doctrine of resurrection and the ethical differentiation of the eschatology become of the greatest importance.

IV. THE LIFE AFTER DEATH

At first sight, it is strange that the O.T. should have so little to say about the life after death, when we remember how prominent this becomes in Jewish and Christian apocalyptic. Yet fuller inquiry will teach us that the gradual and late development of the idea was the very condition of its eventual vigor and value. There was time for many factors to co-operate, for men to become conscious of real needs—the first step toward seeking real satisfactions of them—and for the momentum of ethical monotheism to be brought to bear on the problems of human destiny, individual as well as national. It cannot be too clearly realized, especially at the present time, that a doctrine of life after death which means simply survival—a mere extension of this life—is of little value. The real significance of the Christian doctrine of immortality—which goes back to the Jewish in its origin—is in its content, not in its form. It is born of religion (as, indeed, was the Greek doctrine of immortality), and the values of religion flow into it. Its concern is with quality rather than quantity, and this characteristic is originally due to the religion of Israel. There was no moral or religious quality in the original Hebrew belief in “Sheol”—that vast, underground cavern in which the “shades”—not the souls or spirits—of the dead were gathered, just as they were in the Babylonian Aralu or the Greek Hades. To pass from the warm realities of life upon the earth to the cold semblance of that ghostly existence in Sheol could attract only a man utterly weary of living at all (Job 31³⁻¹⁹). To go down to the shades is literally to be humbled to the dust, a fitting fall for some tyrant conqueror of earth, whose corpse is left unburied upon it (Isa. 14⁹⁻²⁰). In Sheol, the nations are grouped apart, as in a sort of allocated cemetery, but their mighty men are reduced to a common helplessness; there is no moral or religious differentiation in this shadow-existence (Ezek. 32¹⁷⁻³²). A man will shrink from the gloom and deep darkness of Sheol as from the last enemy of all—for this is just what death means (Job 10²⁰⁻²²). There is no return from Sheol for him who has once entered it (Job 7⁹)—though Job wishes it were but a waiting room for him, until God had forgotten to be angry, and called once more for his unjustly treated servant (14^{13f.}). Even if the “soul” lingers temporarily about the mouldering corpse (14²²), it is the “shade” or ghost that goes to Sheol, the pale replica of the whole man, and not only the spiritual part of him. Where psalmists speak of being brought up from Sheol (e.g., Psa. 30³), they mean that they have narrowly escaped dying. The fact is that the body is essential to the Hebrew idea of personality, and there could be no conception of life after death until there was a doctrine of “resurrection,” i.e., of the restoration of the body, the real “self” (nephesh; even a corpse can bear this name).

There are two passages, and only two, in the O.T. which speak clearly of a resurrection of the body, and therefore of life in the real sense after death. The earlier of these is found in the apocalypse already noticed (Isa. 24-27) of about 300 B.C. In 26¹⁹ it is declared that (righteous) dead who have given up their lives for their religion will be brought to life upon the earth again, their corpses arising from the dust. The later reference is also to be found in an apocalypse, that of “Daniel,” about 165 B.C.; here there is a resurrection not only of the specially good, but also of the specially bad, to receive those deserts which they have somehow missed in the unprecedented upheaval of persecution (Dan. 12²). The moral and religious motive is plain, in this earliest emergence of faith in the resurrection. The motive becomes most apparent in other passages which, though they do not speak of life after death, do assert an intimacy of fellowship with God or faith in him, of which the implicit logic would be that death could not separate man from him. The most notable of these passages is Psa. 73²³⁻²⁵, that noblest assertion of dependence on God and confidence in him. Yet even here the inference is not drawn—the inference that because God is the rock of the believer’s heart and his portion forever there must be life after death to confirm and realize this truth. Indeed, some of the passages in which this faith has been plausibly found require a more historical explanation. The famous passage in Job (19^{25f.})—“I know that my Redeemer liveth”—seems, when properly translated, to signify a temporary and bodyless return to “life,” in order to see the delayed vindication of justice. In this and other passages (e.g., Psa. 16^{10f.} 17¹⁵ 49¹⁴), the Christian is naturally inclined to read a fuller meaning into Oriental imagery than is strictly justifiable; the figure of “waking” in the morning is a common one for deliverance (e.g., Psa. 30⁵), without regard to any life beyond death.

But though these expressions of confidence in God add nothing to the form of faith in immortality, they are very significant for its content, and, indeed, constitute the substance of that faith. It was the answer, as we may see from the book of Job, to the sorest need of the Hebrew mind and heart—the apparent injustice of life which seemed to deny, not God's existence, but his justice. No problem is more prominent in the religion of Israel than this, and none has created a more abundant literature. It was vital to the kind of faith in God which Israel possessed; it was a practical issue which must somehow be met, when the religious emphasis shifted from the national to the more individualized fortunes of men. The book of Job would be unintelligible if its background had been an assured faith in immortality; but instead, the book shows us a poet-thinker wrestling for a solution of the problem without that one solution which seems to us most obvious—that life beyond death will readjust all injustices of this life. There are other answers in the O.T., or approaches to answers, such as the exhortation of the psalmists to wait and see what will happen (here on earth, and before death) to the suffering innocent and to the prosperous guilty, or the gloomy skepticism of the book of Ecclesiastes; the highest point is reached in the great conception of Isa. 53, that the innocent may suffer vicariously and sacrificially for the guilty. The problem was such a pressing one just because it was so central to the teaching of the prophets. Their whole message stood or fell with the retributive justice of God. It is broadly true that this is vindicated within this life, and in the long run in the case of nations, because they do have a run long enough to work it out; it is not so true of individual lives which may, at least outwardly, miss their retributive award of good or evil. Thus the very criticism of prophetic truth in its individualized application was destined to issue in the great step forward into faith in a life beyond death as the necessary arena for the vindication of God's character and purpose.

V. THE CONCEPTION OF SALVATION

Meanwhile men had their earth here, however unknown or uncertain heaven or hell might be. What did the religion of Israel make of this life, lacking the reference of its problems to another? What, in fact, could faith in Jehovah do for Israelites, seeing it gave them no outlook beyond death? The answer to these questions is the conception of salvation, always central for a religion, always conditioned by the idea of what men are saved from as well as to. The religion of Israel is characterized by a strong realism, a strong emphasis on the worth and value of this present life, taken in itself. To be deprived of it is the greatest evil, and moral exhortation can offer no more impressive choice than that between life and good on the one hand, and death and evil on the other (Deut. 30^{15f.}). Of Wisdom, it is said that "length of days is in her right hand, in her left hand are riches and honor" (Prov. 3¹⁶). If we add to these "goods" of life the children who continue a man's life even after his death (by that "corporate personality" which makes the whole family a unit), we know the best that could come to the Hebrew, the most convincing signs and evidences of the moral approval of God, when the prophets had succeeded in moralizing the idea of God. In fact, Israel's life is positive and intense in its consciousness of value just because death is the absolute negation of it, and not the doorway to a life that can outrival it. The Israelite, therefore, appeals to Jehovah to save him from a premature death, or from the suffering of sickness, disgrace or poverty.

But the thought of these evils is crossed by another, as the religion deepens in moral quality. From the most primitive forms of religion in Israel, as elsewhere, there had been non-moral "taboos"—things which must not be done because of the fatal consequences they might bring, and some of these survived into the most developed faith (e.g., Deut. 22⁹, or the last clause of Ezek. 18⁶). But the general trend of the prophetic teaching was, as we have seen, to emphasize the moral aspects of "sin" as well as of "God"—neither of these religious terms being originally moral at all. Sin—which then becomes the religious aspect of moral evil—is presented in the O.T. chiefly under four aspects, so far as the terminology is concerned. It is deviation from the right way; the word most often rendered "sin" denotes "missing the way" (Prov. 19³; cf. Judg. 20¹⁶), while the word rendered "iniquity" (1 Sam. 3¹³) also means a "going astray," the same metaphor also appearing in the very familiar "turn aside" (Judg. 2¹⁷). Again, sin may be described juristically as guilt before a judge, the antithetical term being "righteousness," the status of a person acquitted before the tribunal, not to be confused with moral rightness, though often including it (cf. Ex. 92⁷); this was a favorite figure with the prophets. The most significant and characteristic term of all is that rendered "rebel," used of subjects revolting against their ruler (2 Kings 8²⁰ Isa. 12, 3). A fourth class of terms denotes sin by its intrinsic character as something evil or as bringing evil to its doer (1 Sam. 12¹⁷ Prov. 22⁸) and therefore "senselessness" (Deut. 22²¹). This usage comes nearest to our "vice."

The common feature of all these is, of course, opposition to the will of God; moral good is conceived not in the Greek terms of an ideal but in Hebrew terms, as a law.

Over against this conception of human sin we must put that of divine grace. We have already encountered the great word rendered "loving-kindness," and meaning the "duteous love" which man may show to man, or man to God, or God to man. In the pre-prophetic times, this "grace" of God is as unmoralized as the idea of sin; grace is the arbitrary favor of Jehovah, on which Israel is apt to presume (Amos 32). The relation of Jehovah to Israel throughout the whole period of Israel's religion is conceived in terms of a "covenant" (the word used denotes a "bond" of some sort). The covenant relation is not a bargain, but the obligation of a growing friendship. There was the covenant at Sinai (Ex. 243-8), a blood-communion between God and man. There was the covenant of Deuteronomy (291; cf. 2617, 18), which was a mutual engagement, inspired by the teaching of the eighth-century prophets. There was the covenant with Abraham (Gen. 177, 8), as conceived in the late Priestly Code, which was a divine promise, fulfilled in many institutions. Thus we may say that the idea of a covenant is the constant background to the idea of salvation or redemption. We can never hope to understand it by taking a particular sin or a particular sacrifice out of their context, and trying to understand them apart from their background. If the offering of a sacrifice does avail to secure forgiveness of sin, and the proof of this in recovered health or prosperity, it is always because of the renewal of the covenant of "duteous love"—though low minds might construe it as a mere bargain.

The fact that the predominant significance of Hebrew sacrifices is that of a gift brought to a superior must not mislead us; this is customary in the East. In fact, the whole practice of sacrifice in the religion of Israel is less important as "atonement" than we are apt to think, and belongs, rather, to a general conformity with religious ritual as God's requirement. The atonement that was made by sacrifice (in its whole setting) was a renewal of the broken covenant, not the suffering of a penalty; in fact, we do well to keep quite apart the ideas of a forensic "righteousness" and the acceptance of an offering, though they may be used to refer to the same event (cf. Rom. 325). We must not say that the prophets condemned sacrifice as such; what they condemned was the substitution of this external expression of worship for the more difficult realization of the will of Jehovah in moral conduct. This is finely seen in the well-known prophecy of the New Covenant (Jer. 3131f.), which we may regard as the democratization of the prophetic consciousness. What Jeremiah seeks in fact is the creation of a nation of Jeremiahs—i.e., of Israelites indeed. The old, external, national covenant has failed; the new must be constituted in an inner relation with the individual Israelite, so that external teachers will no longer be needed to impart the "knowledge" of God (which is volitional as well as intellectual). All this becomes a possibility only by an act of divine grace—a forgiveness of past sin, preparatory to this new creation, which is a free exercise of that duteous love of God toward man out of which his covenants, old and new, always proceed.

VI. THE UNITY OF THE TESTAMENTS

There could be no more suggestive point of contact between the O.T. and the N.T. than that which has just been named. The greatest prophecy of the most spiritual of the prophets is linked with words spoken in the upper room; it was both echoed and fulfilled in the "New Covenant" initiated by Jesus Christ. The Bible is a unity, and it is not critical study which disintegrates it, but such literalistic use of the Bible as treats it like a "jig-saw" puzzle. There are great and permanent ideas which run through the whole Bible and slowly emerge into a disclosure of their full meaning in the pages of the N.T. Some of these, such as the ideas of life after death, cannot be consecutively traced without reference to the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha (see the articles on the Intertestamental Period, pp. 187-213), with which every student of the Bible should have some acquaintance. But the dominant ideas of the N.T. may be seen already in the O.T. and unless we understand the religion of the old Israel we shall never know that of the N.T., which stands in such direct continuity with it.

We may think, for example, of the idea of God (always avoiding that frequent confusion between the development of the idea of God and the idea of a developing God, which is a contradiction in terms); that great conception of holy Fatherhood which distinguishes the teaching of Jesus, and is born of his filial consciousness, completes and rounds off the moral conception of Jehovah which the prophets achieved. Again, when we think of the cross of Christ as the nucleus of divine activity within this world's history, we have to remember that the achievement of Jesus was to bring together in word and deed those two conceptions which had never been united in Judaism, those of the Messiah and the Suffering Servant of Isa. 53. The newly made unity was his; but the materials he used, the elements of the conception, were drawn from the O.T., and they made the significance of his cross, which we see foreshadowed, not in every reference to wood within the O.T., but in the suffering for God and with God of a Job, a Jeremiah and a Hosea. The doctrine of the Holy Spirit is the very heart of Paul's teaching about Christian experience, and occupies a cardinal place in the fourth Gospel; that doctrine goes back to the wind (ruach = "spirit") that blew across Semitic deserts, the phenomenal energy that animated Hebrew leaders from time to time, the prophetic conviction that a "supernatural" influence must be brought to bear on the character and conduct of Israel to enable it to accomplish its destiny. The modern conception of human personality, which holds so central a place in the higher thought and philosophy of to-day, goes back to the N.T. teaching about man, and the dignity given to him by Jesus as a child of the heavenly Father, however degraded; but that conception itself points further back to such a passage as the eighth psalm, whilst the Christian doctrine of resurrection, as we have seen, is the direct product of Hebrew psychology. When we think of the Pauline conception of the church as the body of Christ, or the conditions of that mystical relation in which his life and that of the Christian are conceived as one, or the "representative" position which Jesus Christ holds as the head of a new race over against Adam, we are working with a conception of "corporate personality" which dominates much of the O.T., not only in the cruder forms which led, e.g., to the destruction of Achan's family, because Achan had broken a taboo, but also in the noble and spiritual transitions from the individual to the group and the group to the individual which characterize the "Songs of the Servant" in Deutero-Isaiah, and so many of the psalms and prophecies of the O.T.

It would be easy to show that the religion of Israel has left its imprint on practically every page of the N.T., and no writer or teacher or student of the N.T. can afford to neglect the O.T. The O.T. shows us the human in the divine; the N.T. shows us the divine in the human. Whether we study the prophetic consciousness in the O.T. or that supreme union of the human and the divine in the N.T., which we call the Incarnation, the crucial point is the same—the validity of a human experience to prove that the divine is really present and active, and that, in the greater or less degree, God is manifest in the flesh. Thus the prophetic consciousness which we found to be central historically is seen to be central also for philosophy and theology; in studying it we must meet the same challenge of auto-suggestion and self-illusion that religious experience to-day encounters, and the religion of Israel is thus brought into closest relation with the supreme issues of our own experience.

Literature: A useful list of books in English will be found in A Scripture Bibliography drawn up by the (British) Society for O.T. Study. The following may be named either for their importance or as suited to the needs of the readers of this Commentary: W. R. Smith, The Prophets of Israel (ed. Cheyne); Cornill, The Prophets of Israel; Budde, Religion of Israel to the Exile; Kautzsch, article, "Religion of Israel," in Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible, vol. v., pp. 612f.; Marti, The Religion of the O.T.; Hamilton, The People of God; Welch, The Religion of Israel under the Kingdom; H. W. Robinson, The Religious Ideas of the O.T.; H. P. Smith, The Religion of Israel; Gordon, The Prophets of the O.T.; J. M. P. Smith, The Religion of the Psalms; Skinner, Prophecy and Religion; T. H. Robinson, Prophecy and the Prophets in Ancient Israel; G. A. Smith, Jeremiah; Gray, Sacrifice in the O.T.; Peake (ed.), The People and the Book; Kittel, The Religion of the People of Israel; D. C. Simpson (ed.), The Psalmists; Welch, The Psalter in Life, Worship and History; H. W. Robinson, The Cross of the Servant.

ISRAEL'S MESSIANIC HOPE

BY PROFESSOR J. E. MCFADYEN

The most scientific study of Israel's Messianic hope would be an historical study. It would compare and contrast this hope as it was cherished in Israel with cognate hopes in other parts of the Oriental world, notably in Babylon and Egypt. It would trace that hope to its earliest beginnings, it would show how it was affected and colored by the contemporary historical situation, and how it was gradually transformed by the deepening spiritual experience of the people or at least of their noblest representatives. It would show how the victory, prosperity, fertility, which earlier ages had counted as the things most devoutly to be wished for in the happy day to which they looked forward gradually gave place, under the impact of prophetic teaching, to ideals which placed the supreme emphasis upon moral and spiritual values—how the warrior was merged in the martyr, how the victory achieved by the sword came to be felt as nothing in comparison with the victory achieved by the patient endurance of wrong, how deliverance from the enemy would have been but a poor salvation if unaccompanied by deliverance from sin, how the deliverer, once seen as a King prancing upon his war-horse, appeared to the purged eyes of a later time as one meek and lowly of heart, riding upon an ass, and how later still the old earthly materialistic hopes of conquest, victory, and dominion revived, sometimes obliterating, and sometimes blended with, the nobler ideals that had been achieved in the process of the ages. This would be a fruitful and illuminating study; but, while not ignoring the historical affiliations of the hope, we shall concentrate rather on its religious aspect, partly because that is the aspect of the Bible which this volume keeps more particularly in view, and partly because, while the broad outlines of the development are clear enough, an historical study frequently raises questions of the date and authenticity of particular passages to which it is not possible to give any definite answer and concerning which the opinions of competent scholars often diverge very widely.

Our study of the question, then, will be determined by these considerations. We shall consider first, the contents of the Messianic hope, and then the various types of personality who were to incarnate that hope or to inaugurate the Messianic age.

I. THE MESSIANIC HOPE

Triumph Over Evil. We may begin with the time-honored verse in Gen. 3¹⁵ which forms part of the divine curse upon the serpent for tempting Eve to her fateful disobedience. "I will put enmity between thee and the woman and between thy seed and her seed: it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." This verse has long been known as the "prot-evangelium," the first expression of the gospel, and it has been interpreted as a promise of man's ultimate victory over sin. The it, which is to bruise the serpent's head is the seed of the woman just alluded to, i.e., her descendants—humanity. Not without reason has it been questioned, however, whether, even in the broad sense, this is a Messianic text at all. For, taking the story literally, the struggle is between the race of men and the brood of serpents; for the serpent is a literal serpent, doomed henceforth to crawl on its belly (cf. 3¹⁴). And—again not without reason—it has been pointed out that the verse does not speak explicitly of the ultimate victory of man but, rather, of an eternal enmity and struggle between him and the serpent. But in answer to these objections it may be fairly urged that the serpent of the story is more than a literal serpent; it is the embodiment of an evil principle, a fit emblem of the glittering baleful fascination of sin which deflects men from obedience to the reasonable voice of conscience and of God. And, again, it is perhaps not straining the sense of the verse too sorely to say with Dillmann that a struggle ordained of God cannot be without prospect of success. Man was destined for dominion (cf. 2¹⁹ 12⁸), and though "now we see not yet all things subjected to him" (Heb. 2⁸), we can believe it to be the divine will that that dominion will one day be achieved, and indeed we see it achieved when "we behold Jesus" (Heb. 2⁹). So while the significant words of Genesis are in no sense a direct prophecy of Jesus, and not even an explicit promise of man's ultimate victory over sin, it may be fairly enough contended, in the larger light of revelation, that they are an implicit promise of that victory; and with wonderful appropriateness they are set at the beginning of our sacred Book, whose theme from beginning to end is salvation.

The Messianic People. Now this salvation, which is the will of God for men, is historically mediated; it comes to humanity through Israel, which holds, so to say, the religious secret of the world. Israel is very conscious, and very early conscious, of her unique place in the purpose of God for humanity. This consciousness expresses itself with varying degrees of spiritual insight; sometimes, indeed, it expresses itself in terms almost wholly materialistic. The promise to Abraham, e.g., in Gen. 12^{af}, is that his descendants are to become a great nation and so conspicuously prosperous that other nations could wish for themselves nothing better than a prosperity like theirs. That—and not that Israel is to bring blessing to the world—is the real meaning of the clause rendered, “In thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed.” But that rather materialistic hope takes on a much more spiritual complexion in Ex. 19^{5f}, which promises that, if Israel obeys Jehovah’s voice and keeps his covenant, they shall be “a kingdom of priests and an holy nation,” and in this sense Jehovah’s “peculiar treasure from among all peoples.” Whether we interpret this as a promise that the Hebrew people are destined to be the priests of humanity, or simply that each of them, priestlike, will have direct access to God, this is one of the most fundamental passages of the O.T. We may say that we have here the dawn of the great conception of the kingdom of God. The passage occurs in connection with the exodus of Israel from Egypt, the act which sealed Jehovah’s redeeming love for Israel, and to which later generations perpetually recur, as attesting the kindness, the power, the essential nature of God. The covenant then established had its moral and religious conditions; the people are to be a holy people, they are to be “a peculiar treasure” if they obey, and it is significant that the next chapter contains the Decalogue (20¹⁻¹⁷) which shows the nature of the law they are expected to obey. It follows by implication that disobedience would be drastically punished (cf. Amos 3²), but the redemptive end would be kept ever in view. This idea of punishment which was essentially disciplinary with its issue in redemption is beautifully worked out by Hosea in ch. 2, where Jehovah is represented as luring his foolish and idolatrous spouse Israel into the wilderness (2¹⁴) where, after a discipline of many days, the wedding-bond is renewed forever, and Israel receives the promise that wild beasts and war and all that had harmed shall harm her no more (2¹⁸).

Messianic Promises: 1. Return from Exile. The promise ran, “The Lord will keep thee from all evil” (Psa. 121⁷). Contrary to this promise Israel suffered severe affliction, and grimmer and more fatal to her high destiny than the evils mentioned in the preceding paragraph was the experience of exile. This seemed not only to blight Israel’s hopes but to destroy them, unless that experience could be reversed. But the love of their God reversed it. He who had long ago saved them from Egypt must save them from Babylon. So at a time when Hebrew hearts were sore and men wept as they remembered Zion (Psa. 137¹), in days when they were saying that they were being forgotten and ignored by their God (Isa. 40²⁷), a great prophet came forward (Isa. 40-55) with the inspired assurance that the sorrow would soon be lifted, Jehovah was coming to lead his people back across the transformed wilderness to their own dear land; “for ye shall go out with joy, and be led forth with peace” (Isa. 55¹²); and through the agency of the foreign Cyrus, Jehovah’s own Anointed (i.e., Messiah), that promise was to be fulfilled in the near future (cf. Isa. 45¹⁻⁵).

2. Transformation of Wild Beasts. From all evil—from exile, from wild beasts, from war, from idolatry. The last three points, lightly touched by Hosea, are taken up and developed by subsequent prophets. The first of the three receives immortal expression in the beautiful verses of Isa. 11⁶⁻⁸, where the wild animals that had ravaged the land are to have their nature so transformed that they will peaceably consort with the tame animals—“the cow and the bear shall be friends”—and so gentle will they be that a little child can lead them.

3. Destruction of War. But worse than the ravages of beasts are the ravages of war, and this too must vanish in the good time that is coming. How fearfully the burden of war must have weighed upon the ancient Hebrew heart, and how alien it was felt to be to the purpose of God for men is evidenced by the fact that the great oracle announcing its abolition “in the after-time” occurs twice in the prophetic books (Isa. 22-4 and Mic. 4¹⁻⁴). In the early days Israel had glorified war and had looked up to the God she worshiped as “a man of war” (Ex. 15³): now she knows better. The prophets were living in a world that was torn with strife, drenched with blood, and peopled by quarrelsome nations armed with swords and spears (Isa. 24), and they felt that this must end and would end in the Messianic age. But it is too often forgotten that the heartening words, “Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more,” are not merely a prophet’s or a poet’s dream. The prophets were realists as well as idealists, and in the most practical way they showed how this dream would become reality. It is not merely an aspiration, but the inevitable result of the program sketched by the prophet in sublimely simple words. He represents the nations who have some quarrel on foot as suddenly inspired by the great thought of carrying their quarrels to Zion for arbitration; for they say, "Out of Zion shall go forth instruction [or guidance], and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." With men like Isaiah and Jeremiah, whose souls were set on justice, to pronounce the word of the Lord, they could confidently anticipate an impartial decision. And through such men Jehovah would "judge between the nations and arbitrate concerning the peoples," and so wise and fair would the decision be that the nations would gladly accept it and go away content, resolved never again to wield the sword and spear for which they have now no more use, but to transform them into peaceful plowshares and pruninghooks. The abolition of war and the reign of eternal peace are to be secured by arbitration, and those things will come to pass when the natures of men are no longer swayed by passion but by reason and religion, when they abandon the bloody way of the sword and learn the way to Zion.

4. Disappearance of Idolatry. Further, in the coming age idolatry would be as intolerable as war, and, like war, it must disappear, the more so as the Messianic hope rested on Jehovah's covenant with Israel, and that covenant is rightly interpreted in the second commandment as excluding idolatrous worship of every kind. In keeping with this ideal, Mic. 5:12-14 describes the coming age as one in which not only every practice that savored of magic or superstition, but also all the heathen paraphernalia, such as stone pillars and asherim or wooden poles, that had for so long been associated with the worship of Jehovah, would disappear. This, however, was only a negative ideal, the positive counterpart of which was worship in the spirit. Of this we shall later have more to say; suffice it here to quote significant words of Jeremiah (31:6) which look forward to the day when men would speak no more of the ark of the covenant of Jehovah; it would never enter their minds, they would never think of it nor miss it, nor would they ever again make another. When we remember the stupendous place that the ark had filled in the early history and how its presence on a battlefield was believed to guarantee the presence of Jehovah himself (cf. 1 Sam. 4:3), these words of Jeremiah, which soar above the need for a material expression of religion into the region of pure spirit and which can gladly dispense with its most ancient and venerable symbols, are nothing less than wonderful.

5. Forgiveness of Sin. Most fatal of all to the communion with God at which the covenant aimed was sin, and an indispensable feature of the Messianic age would be the forgiveness of sins. "I, even I, am he that blotteth out thy transgressions, and I will not remember thy sins" (Isa. 43:25). This promise, of course, like everything else in the O.T., has historical relations; it was given to the exiles in Babylon, and the experience of exile, which was interpreted as due to the wrath of God (cf. Isa. 40:2), had greatly deepened the sense of sin. But by the deliverance from exile the divine forgiveness would be sealed, the love of God would have free course, and the people who were worthy to "inherit the land forever" would be a people who were "all righteous" (cf. Isa. 60:21), saved not only from war and idolatry but from sin, and rejoicing in their forgiveness.

6. Conquest of Death. But "the last enemy is death" (1 Cor. 15:26), and this too must be finally destroyed. The O.T., which confines its vision almost uniformly to this life and can do this the more contentedly as it is so radiantly sure of God and his presence in the world that now is, has very little to say of a life beyond the grave (see further art., Religion of Israel, p. 173; cf. art., Backgrounds, pp. 845-6); but we can rejoice that one of the later prophets has expressed his confident hope in the daring and splendid words, "He hath swallowed up death forever" (Isa. 25:8), words so adequate that the great apostle can find no better with which to conclude his magnificent argument for immortality (1 Cor. 15:54).

7. Exaltation of Jerusalem. It is not to be wondered at that the Hebrews, who were nothing if not patriotic, should have assigned a special place to Jerusalem in the glorious days to which they looked forward. We have already seen (cf. Isa. 22:1. Mic. 4:2) that it is to Jerusalem the nations are pictured as journeying to have their disputes settled by arbitration, for "it is from Zion that direction goes forth" such as is to be found nowhere else in the world. But it is good to remember that sometimes even this very pardonable limitation is transcended. There is nothing finer in the O.T. than the vision in Isa. 19:23-25 of Egypt and Assyria, ancient and recent enemies of Israel, united with Israel in the latter days in a triple alliance, and united simply as joint worshippers of Jehovah. Nothing is here said of Jerusalem as the necessary center of that worship; there is nothing here like the narrower hope of a later day expressed in Zech. 14:16 that the nations who are to worship Jehovah must not only come to Jerusalem, but that there they must celebrate the distinctively Jewish feast of tabernacles. But while it may be frankly conceded that the hope seldom takes so pronouncedly Jewish a form as this, it has to be admitted that Jerusalem—doubtless for reasons that are historically quite intelligible—is usually in the center of the picture, and that therefore the universalism is hardly ever complete. In the fine passage from which we have already quoted the prophecy of the abolition of death (Isa. 25⁶⁻⁸), it is upon Zion's hill that the rich feast is to be spread, of which all nations are represented as partaking; it is there that the veil of mourning is to be rent in twain and the tears wiped from every eye. Similarly in Jer. 31⁷ Jerusalem is “the throne of the Lord; and all the nations shall be gathered unto it, to the name of the Lord, to Jerusalem.” This emphasis upon Jerusalem may seem in strange contrast to the preceding verse which, by denying the importance of the ark, had seemed to carry us into an atmosphere of the spirit, to which material symbols and a special locality were irrelevant, and for this reason the verse has been denied to Jeremiah. However that may be, it embodies a characteristic Jewish limitation in the thought that it is only through the gates of Zion that men enter the city of God.

8. The New Heart. Having considered some of the blessings to be enjoyed by those who are privileged to share in the Messianic age—and these, as we have seen, include, according to some of the prophets, men of all peoples (cf. Isa. 45²², “Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth”)—let us now consider the character of the participants. They are to be, first of all, men of a new heart. This is a point emphasized more than once by Ezekiel (cf. 11¹⁹ 36²⁶). When exiled Israel has been brought back and settled in her own land and has given evidence of her sincerity by putting away all the abominable habits and idolatrous practices that had separated her from her God, then Jehovah will interpose with the inward regeneration which he alone can secure. “I will give them another—so LXX, with a very slight change from the Hebrew one—heart, and I will put a new spirit within them.” The words that follow define the meaning of this promise, explaining that for the stony heart, hard and impervious to the appeal of Jehovah's redeeming love, will be substituted a heart of flesh, i.e., soft, impressionable, responsive, yielding, obedient. This is a great prophecy, recognizing as it does the need of transformation, yet it is more limited in its outlook than one might suspect, for the succeeding words have a distinctly legal tinge. The people will evidence their transformation of heart by “walking in my statutes and keeping mine ordinances” (11²⁰). Here the influence of Deuteronomy, which had been published about thirty years before, is very plainly felt. Obedience is to be not to the law of the spirit but to the written law; and so the promise which seemed to breathe the pure spirit of prophecy turns out to be conceived in the temper of legalism after all. All the same it is a great word, and if we ignore its legalistic limitations, it can be adopted as a motto—there is none better—for the character of the Messianic kingdom. On another occasion (18³¹) when Ezekiel is seeking to stimulate the sluggish consciences of his people, he urges that it is their duty to “make a new heart and a new spirit for themselves”; but in 11¹⁹ 36²⁶ he regards the new heart and the new spirit as God's own gift to them. It is the everlasting antinomy of religion: “Work out your own salvation, for it is God that worketh in you” (Phil. 21^{2f.}).

9. The New Covenant. But a greater than Ezekiel uttered a prophecy peculiarly precious to our Lord (Lk. 22²⁰ 1 Cor. 11²⁵) and to the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (8⁸⁻¹²), which carries us into the region of pure spirit unsullied by any suspicion of legalism. Jeremiah (31³¹⁻³⁴) foresees the coming day when Jehovah—it is always he who, of his grace, takes the initiative—will make a new covenant with Israel and Judah. This he expressly contrasts with the old covenant made at the Exodus, and by implication, with the Deuteronomic covenant made a few years before (cf. 2 Kings 23³). Those covenants involved obedience to an external law, but the law of the new covenant was to be written on the heart. Obedience would no longer be deliberate conformity to an imposed law, but the spontaneous expression of an inward communion with God resting upon the knowledge of his will, knowledge which would not have to be communicated by one to another, but would be the common and inalienable possession of all. Though this covenant is represented as being made with Israel and Judah, its nature is such that it is destined to be universal. The law written upon the heart—the human heart and not Israel's alone; the direct and unmediated knowledge of God—these things point beyond Israel to the whole human race. Glorious as is this word of Jeremiah, even within its somewhat nationalistic context, he spoke even better than he knew.

10. The Outpouring of the Spirit. There is one other prophecy, held by Peter to have been fulfilled at Pentecost (Acts 21^{7f.}), which in spirituality and generosity of outlook would seem to rival this word of Jeremiah, and in a sense to be even more daringly explicit. It occurs in the picture of the latter days drawn by Joel (2^{28f.}); “I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions; and also upon the servants and upon the handmaidens in those days will I pour out my spirit." Here Jeremiah's "all, from the least to the greatest" is defined in detail, and we seem to be confronted with the wonderful vision of a world whose every inhabitant is, so to speak, an inspired prophet—every man and woman, even those of humblest social status, in possession of the Spirit. But, despite the "all flesh," Joel's vision is not quite so generous as that. The blessing is for Judah; the fate reserved for "the nations" is judgment in the valley of Jehoshaphat (cf. 32). Joel does not say, "Not only you, but also the heathen"; what he says is, "Not only you, but also your servants and handmaidens." So this fair vision is marred by a certain narrow nationalism after all; nevertheless, in the light of the Christian revelation, we may legitimately expand the words to a sense beyond that intended by Joel and regard the promise, "I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh," as descriptive of one of the features, indeed, the profoundest and most essential, of the happy time to which the O.T. looks continually forward.

What a glorious hope it was! Limited, if you like, at points, by features peculiar to the nation in which it was born—for was not Jerusalem to be the metropolis of the better world to be? But what a noble world! One from which war, sin, and death would be banished forever, and one whose every inhabitant would be possessed of the Divine Spirit and have the law written on his heart.

THE MESSIANIC FIGURE

Even in the O.T., to say nothing of the N.T., this hope is frequently connected with a person. The character of the figure at the head of the redeemed theocracy may change with the historical situation, but there is usually such a figure. Usually, but not always; there is no "Messiah," e.g., in Amos, or Zephaniah, or Nahum, or Habakkuk.

The Messianic King. In most cases that figure is a king. Not, indeed, that the word mashîach ("anointed") has any specific or exclusive connection with royalty. Other leaders of the people were, or might be, also anointed. In Ex. 29⁷ the high priest is anointed, and in 28⁴¹ the other priests as well. In 1 Kings 19¹⁶ Elijah receives a divine commission to anoint not only Jehu to the kingly, but also Elisha, his successor, to the prophetic office. The word could be applied even to a foreign ruler, as by the great-hearted prophet of the Exile to Cyrus (Isa. 45¹), whom he regarded as consecrated by Jehovah to the task of delivering his people from exile. But the term is pre-eminently applied to the king. No official was comparable to him. He was the head of judicial and religious as well as of civil and military affairs. He was in a peculiar sense Jehovah's "son" (cf. Psa. 27¹), a term otherwise applied only to the people (cf. Ex. 42²). It has, of course, to be remembered that Jehovah is the real king of Israel; so strongly is this felt that the later source in Samuel regards the demand for a king as an implicit rejection of the kingship of Jehovah (cf. 1 Sam. 8⁷). He is the glorious King (Psa. 24^{7, 10}) and essentially the earthly king is but his viceroy. But, as his viceroy, he is all-important, and, in some form or other, monarchy is felt to be the most essential element in Messiahship. Again and again this comes out in the N.T. In all the versions of the superscription on the cross (Mt. 27³⁷ Mk. 15²⁶ Lk. 23³⁸ Jn. 19¹⁹) Jesus is described as the King of the Jews, he claimed to be Lord of a kingdom though not of this world (Jn. 18³⁶), and after the resurrection the disciples ask him, "Lord, dost thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?" (Acts 1⁶.)

The Ideal Prophet. Before proceeding to a discussion of the references to the king, let us look at the promise in Deut. 18¹⁵ put into the mouth of Moses, "The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee [i.e., Israel] a prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me" (cf. v. 18)—a promise which Peter (Acts 3²²) and Stephen (Acts 7³⁷) claim to have been fulfilled in Jesus; and it is doubtless with this text in view that the Samaritan woman says, "I know that Messiah cometh; when he is come, he will declare unto us all things." The Samaritans apparently conceived Messiah as a prophet. It is abundantly clear, however, from the context of the promise in Deuteronomy that it involves no reference whatever to a coming Messiah. There the speaker is denouncing the unworthy and superstitious ways of ascertaining the will of God practiced by Israel's heathen neighbors by means of sorcery, necromancy, etc.; and in contrast with these religious charlatans he assures Israel that she will always have prophets, men like Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Jeremiah, to interpret the divine will. It would be no comfort to Israel, when entangled in any historical perplexity, to be assured that hundreds of years afterward a prophet would appear. Strictly speaking, the text is not a Messianic text at all. Yet it is not without some Messianic significance. While not predicted of Christ, it was certainly fulfilled in him, for in opposition to all the unworthy or inadequate expositions of the will of God, he is the perfect revelation of that will.

Messiah, when he comes, must be just such an one. The text is, in a sense, an anticipation of the character of the coming ruler as set forth in Isa. 11¹⁻⁶, and Peter and Stephen are true to its inner meaning when they claim it for Jesus.

Permanency of the Davidic Dynasty. To return to the king. A passage of much significance for the Messianic hope is Nathan's reply to David when he had proposed to build a worthy house for God (2 Sam. 7⁸⁻¹⁶). David was not unnaturally regarded by later generations as the real founder of the monarchy, and the coming king of the ideal age is therefore usually identified with one of his descendants (cf. Isa. 97). The passage before us anticipates an unbroken succession within the Davidic dynasty (v. 12). It regards the king as the possible subject of the divine chastisement (v. 14), and it were therefore idle to look in it for any promise of an ultimate ideal king. All that is here promised is that the throne of David shall be everlasting, that Jehovah will always be a father to the reigning king (cf. Ps. 27), and that his mercy will never depart from him (vv. 13-16).

Character of the Messianic King. But with Isa. 96^f. we approach the definite delineation of a character. Associated with the deliverance of Israel from the Assyrian yoke is the birth (or the gift, as the prophet calls it) of a child, destined to be none other than the Messianic King, for the insignia of government rest upon him. Wisdom and power are the two qualities singled out for special emphasis as fitting him to secure the peace, i.e., the welfare of his people. He is gifted with miraculous wisdom and divine strength, he is Wonderful Counselor and Warrior Divine (or Hero of Superhuman Might, as we might translate). Despite the traditional English translation ("Mighty God") the words do not imply that he is very God: this is not a prophecy of the incarnation. Deity is in him, but he is not Deity. Unfortunately, some ambiguity attaches to the meaning of the words rendered "Everlasting Father"; but here again there is quite certainly no prophecy of the incarnation. The words probably simply mean "Father," i.e., protector or benefactor (cf. Job 29¹⁶) "forever"—"the benevolent guardian of his people so long as he and they endure" (G. B. Gray). In virtue of his wisdom and his power he becomes a veritable Prince of Peace: and the perpetuity of his kingdom for all time is guaranteed by the simple fact that his throne is supported upon those ethical qualities of justice and righteousness which alone are eternal. The verse preceding this fine description (v. 5) had, like 22-4, declared the abolition of war to be one of the features of the Messianic age:

and the coming king, though depicted first as a warrior in order to secure the destruction of all that is opposed to his righteous will, uses his strength, as his wisdom, for the welfare of his people. His empire will be eternal, because it is built upon the indestructible foundation of righteousness. It is not unnatural to see in these great words an adumbration of the empire established by Christ, though it is not, of course, a prophecy of him. (See further the notes on Isa. 96^f.)

The figure portrayed in Isa. 11¹⁻⁵ is an advance upon the last, as it departs entirely from the warrior ideal and lays much more elaborate emphasis upon his moral and religious quality. Still of the Davidic line (v. 1), he is, as Schultz (O.T. Theology, vol. ii, p. 405) well says, "perfect alike as Sage, King, and Saint." The Spirit is to rest upon him, i.e., as his permanent endowment, and the quality of this spirit will manifest itself in the three different spheres of intellect, of practical life, and of religion. It will equip him with general wisdom and insight into the meaning and conditions of his office, with a penetration which will enable him to discover the ways and means to secure the ideal ends of his Kingship, and a strength to carry them out, and finally with a real appreciation of and reverent regard for the will of Jehovah whose servant he is. It is characteristic of the passionate regard of the Hebrew prophets for the defense of the rights of the exploited and defenseless members of society that the one feature of Messiah's reign singled out for special comment is his interest in the poor and the needy. Like a skillful and inflexibly honest judge, he will examine the cases that come before him with the sole desire to reach the truth, undeflected by specious appearances or plausible statements, and when he brings to book the wicked oppressors of the down-trodden, he will use his power to make an end of them (cf. Ps. 72⁴).

The passage from Mic. 5² which is quoted in Mt. 26 adds little that is substantial to the figure already drawn, and that little has been frequently misunderstood. Out of Bethlehem Ephrathah one is to come forth "that is to be ruler in Israel; whose goings forth are from of old, from everlasting." The last phrase almost inevitably suggests the pre-existence of the ruler whose historical appearance is here predicted, and nothing was more natural than to apply the prophecy to Christ, which was done the more readily on the strength of the pointed allusion to Bethlehem. But with the marginal translation of the last phrase, "from ancient days," the pre-existence disappears. The truth is that the words rendered "from everlasting" reappear in 71⁴, where they denote a time no further back than the days when Israel occupied territory on the east of the Jordan, while in 7²⁰ the other phrase, "from of old," signifies the days of the patriarchs. So far, therefore, from these phrases suggesting the pre-existence of the coming ruler, they mean nothing more than that he comes of an ancient family. The point of his origin in Bethlehem has also been usually missed; it is not that Bethlehem was David's home, but, rather, that not from the splendid capital Jerusalem but from the simple village or country town, "smallest among the clans of Judah," was the Saviour King to come. It is another aspect of the familiar biblical truth proclaimed by Paul that God chooses the weak and despised things to confound the mighty (1 Cor. 127¹).

With this passage may be taken the prophecy from Isa. 7¹⁴ quoted in Mt. 12³, "A virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel." This has for ages been taken as prophetic of the virgin birth of Jesus, and some recent scholars are prepared to defend the view that a miraculous birth is here intended. But a glance at the margin, which for the crucial word "virgin" reads "maiden" (the word practically means "marriageable woman") shows that the verse will not bear the heavy weight which traditional interpretation has put upon it. It is to the Greek version we owe the word "virgin," for which Aquila, a later translator, was quite justified in substituting the Greek word for "young woman." It is not even quite certain that the prophet has any particular young woman in view; but it is quite certain that the birth of the promised child is expected not only within that generation but soon. The sign is explicitly said to be given "to you," i.e., to Ahaz (and his court), whom Isaiah is addressing, but a birth to take place seven hundred and thirty-five years afterward would have been no sign to them. The prophecy is, therefore, not a prediction of Christ, nor does the name of the child imply that he is God incarnate. "Immanuel" means "God is with us," and the giving of the name is a confession of his mother's faith that God is manifesting himself in the history of her people.

More than a century later Jeremiah again takes up the Messianic promise (23⁵¹). In the coming days Jehovah will raise up a righteous "branch" or "shoot"—note the word, for it is applied less than a century after by Zechariah (38 6¹²) to Zerubbabel—who will belong to the Davidic line, and who, as King, will execute justice and righteousness and so bring security to the land and people. We welcome again the old emphasis upon ethical interests and on the King's passion for justice, but the new thing in this oracle is the king's name, "Jehovah [is] our righteousness." The Hebrew for this is almost certainly suggested by the name of the reigning king, Zedekiah (= "Jehovah is my righteousness"): the coming king and the people he governs will be indeed all that one called Zedekiah ought to be. They will all recognize Jehovah as the source and the giver of their salvation. This ideal is thus more distinctively religious than those which had preceded it. For reasons which are historically intelligible in the Exile, Ezekiel almost uniformly and no doubt deliberately avoids the word "king," substituting for it "prince"; but the royal figure, whatever we may call him, is charged with the old task of "removing violence and executing justice and righteousness" (459).

The Servant of Jehovah. But the fairest figure in the O.T., and the one which more than any other molded the consciousness of Jesus so far as that was molded by the literature of his people, is the suffering Servant of the great anonymous exilic prophecy preserved in Isaiah 40-55, and more particularly in the so-called Servant Songs (421-4 491-6 504-9 5213-5312). Though there is general agreement that the prophecy as a whole falls about 540 B.C., just before the close of the Exile, unhappily the fiercest controversies have been and are still being waged round the original meaning of the Servant Songs. Into these we do not propose to enter; suffice it here to say that one group of scholars regards the Servant as an individual, another as the community of Israel. Undoubtedly, in the prophecy outside the songs the Servant is Israel, not an individual (cf. 418), but whether the Servant of the songs is an individual or not does not really matter for our purpose; for nothing is more certain than that the ideal they embody and the character they portray were never completely realized by the community of Israel nor in any historical individual except Jesus Christ. (See the discussion on these various passages in the present volume, especially the note on p. 664.)

What was that ideal? It was the ideal of one who knew himself to be the servant of God and of humanity, commissioned to convey to the world the truth about God, one who dealt gently with the weak and discouraged and who discharged his high mission in self-effacing and unobtrusive ways (421-4), one who maintained unflinchingly his faith in God even when he seemed to have labored in vain (491-6), one who suffered violence and scorn unspeakable from those whom he came to help, but who never lost faith in the ultimate triumph of the cause he represented (504-9); it was the ideal of a man of sorrows, despised and rejected, unmurmuringly surrendering himself to a violent and dishonored death, but by this very suffering and death winning the guilty for God, and so lifted beyond death to a place of the highest honor as the acknowledged Saviour of the world (52¹³–53¹²). It was surely a true instinct that led the N.T. church to see in these marvelous songs an adumbration of the sufferings, the work, and the triumph of her Lord and ours (cf. Mt. 12¹⁸⁻²¹ Acts 8³²⁻³⁵, etc.). In this martyr whose death brought healing and salvation to those who had so cruelly wronged him, we have traveled immeasurably far from the old ideal of the Warrior King. Strictly speaking, such a figure is not in the Messianic succession at all: but in its religious inwardness and in its apprehension of spiritual reality, it is beyond comparison the greatest figure of them all. Small wonder that it appealed so powerfully to Jesus, or that the early church identified him with the figure there so graphically portrayed.

King and Priest. With the return from exile political hope revived. This hope is reflected in the cluster of oracles which in the pages of Haggai and Zechariah gather round Zerubbabel, and it was the more passionately cherished as Zerubbabel was in the direct Davidic line. From the closing verses of Haggai (22¹⁻²³) it is clear that that prophet reposed the most extravagant hopes in him, and the epithets with which he honors him attest his unique importance for the coming days. He is to be precious to Jehovah as the signet-ring upon his finger, and the instrument whereby his purpose is to be sealed; he is the elect one—"I have chosen thee"—the very title applied in Isa. 42¹ to the Servant. It is as if in him Haggai saw that prophecy fulfilled, just as Zechariah (38 6¹²) undoubtedly saw in him the "branch" or "shoot" predicted by Jeremiah (23⁵). But it is of much significance that alike in Haggai and Zechariah, Zerubbabel the civil ruler is associated with Joshua the high priest (cf. Hag. 11 2², etc.), and even more emphatically by Zechariah than by Haggai. An oracle which was subsequently altered because the hopes it expressed had been disappointed (Zech. 6¹¹⁻¹³, see notes there) had represented Zerubbabel as the "branch," crowned as Messianic King, with Joshua the high priest seated at his right hand. Considering the importance of the Temple for that period (see pp. 815–17) the presence of the high priest as almost co-ordinate in importance with the king is very natural, but it is none the less ominous; it is an indication that the old prophetic interest, whose glory it was to emphasize ethical ideals, is now being deflected in the direction of ritual—a tendency which received conspicuous development in the century that followed. The thing that makes Haggai and Zechariah, however, unique among the prophets, apart from the place they assign to the priest, is that they do not look forward to the Messiah, they find him in the prince who, they thought, by the building of the Temple, inaugurated the Messianic age.

A truly chivalrous figure emerges in the same prophetic book, though drawn by a later hand—the King who is seen approaching Jerusalem, "just and having salvation, lowly and riding upon an ass, even upon a colt the foal of an ass" (Zech. 9⁹). In the following verse he is represented as annihilating the instruments of war, chariots, horses, bow: he rules not by force, but by reason, by the word, and the word is such that, when he declares it, there is peace among the nations. And nothing is more natural than that a King of such a character and with such a policy should exercise universal sway, "from sea to sea, and from the River [Euphrates] to the ends of the earth" (cf. Psa. 72⁸). Nothing is here said about his relation to the Davidic dynasty, perhaps the fall of Zerubbabel had dealt a deadly blow to that faith: but all the more does this figure make a more universal and persuasive appeal. The same hatred of war animates this oracle as inspired some of the earlier oracles with which we have dealt (cf. Isa. 24 9⁵), the same delight in the "word" as the only means by which the world's peace may be permanently secured (cf. Isa. 23), and the same faith that the truly glorious figure is not the Warrior King but the Prince of Peace (cf. Isa. 9⁶). This would be true, if with one of the margins we read "just and having victory," i.e., just and victorious: if this means victorious in fight, at any rate he uses his power to abolish violence and to establish the reign of reason, justice, and peace. It would be still more true, if with the other margin we read "just and saved," i.e., saved and justified, i.e., vindicated, in the sense in which Deutero-Isaiah applies these words to the suffering Servant. But it would be truest of all, if with Sellin, following the LXX, we read "just and the savior of the meek (or poor), riding upon an ass, etc." This would present the Messianic King in the old grand prophetic light as champion of the defenseless (cf. Psa. 72⁴). In any case the point of the passage is that the King approaches not upon a war-horse, but upon an ass which was the symbol of peace. A King content to ride into Jerusalem on a beast which so little suggested military glory could inaugurate only a reign of spiritual dominion, very different from the nationalistic ideals of popular hope; and Jesus, in thus riding into Jerusalem, was doubtless not only claiming this ideal as his own, but claiming to be himself the King to whom the prophecy pointed.

The Son of Man. In one of the latest books of the O.T., if not the latest, appears a figure girt about with mystery, the figure known as "one like unto a son of man" (Dan. 7¹³). The chapter in which this phrase occurs presents a curiously impressive and sadly realistic view of history by means of imagery drawn from the animal world. Four fierce beasts are seen emerging from the sea—a lion, a bear, a leopard, and a beast more fiercely terrible still. Later, before the heavenly Judge, appears one like a son of man. As it is practically certain that the beasts represented four empires (see ch. 2, 11¹⁻³, notes) which the writer regards as resting upon brute force and therefore appropriately symbolized by wild beasts, it is very tempting to regard the one like unto a son of man as placed in deliberate contrast to them in order to symbolize the humane and therefore truly human empire by which they shall be followed and which is destined to be everlasting. Other verses of the chapter (e.g., 18, 22, 27) seem to bear out this interpretation, as the dominion which in v. 14 is promised to the one like a son of man is in these verses promised to "the saints of the Most High"—a phrase which, in its historical context, would be practically synonymous with the faithful Jews. In that case the passage would hardly be Messianic, in the narrower sense, at all. But the significance of the phrase is probably deeper than that. The figure, sprung upon us so suddenly and appearing only to disappear, may have been more familiar to the writer's contemporaries than to us. It is to be noted that he comes "with the clouds of heaven" (v. 13), and this may conceivably point back to a belief in one—no longer called a king, nor is anything said of his relation to the Davidic dynasty—who belongs to the transcendental heavenly world and who, as such, is fitted, as no king dreamt of by earlier prophets was fitted, to inaugurate the everlasting reign of the saints. The older ideals, tinged for the most part with nationalism, would by this ideal be thus definitely transcended, and we should have here a real foreglimpse of Jesus, who, though son of Israel, was also Son of man and Son of God in a sense which could not be predicated of any other son of Israel (cf. art., Backgrounds, pp. 845-6).

Fulfillment in Jesus. When we speak of Jesus as the Christ, we mean that Jesus is the Messiah, who fulfilled the hopes and the yearnings expressed in "divers portions and in divers manners" (Heb. 1¹) by the inspired men of the olden time. He fulfilled them, indeed, in a far deeper sense than most of them dreamt of. For some aspects of this hope, notably as it appears in prophets like Haggai and Zechariah, were political, and there is something to be said for the view that some of the formulations of that hope, nationalistic and political as they were, made it difficult, especially for the less spiritually minded of the people, to recognize the incomparable worth of Jesus when he came and to see in him the culmination and the crown of the whole movement of the Spirit of God within Israel which is represented by the long story of the O.T. But it would surely be doing pathetic injustice to that great literature not to recognize the spiritual passion which animates so much of it and the profound insight which saw so clearly what must be the essential features of any coming age worth looking forward to and the essential character of the one who would be worthy to preside over it. The nature of the hope and of the ruler who is to inaugurate it may change with the changing years. At one point in the development—during the Exile, when the monarchy is no more—the hope is no longer centered upon a coming king, but upon a Servant who triumphs through his suffering and vicarious sacrifice: at another point—just after the Exile, when an attempt is made to reconstitute the national life—that hope becomes associated with the Temple, and at the right hand of Zerubbabel sits Joshua the high priest, sharing, though it be in subordinate degree, the dignity of the Messianic King. But, taken as a whole and at their best, how noble is the future that the finer spirits of Israel conceived as laid up in the purpose of God, and how attractive, as they portray him, is the figure of him who is to usher in or to preside over this better day. Conceived by Jewish hearts and drawn by Jewish hands, yet how human and how universal they are. War, idolatry, sin, death—every evil and hurtful thing abolished; glad free worship offered unitedly to the great God of all by men who had been erstwhile bitter enemies—such was their hope for the future, and the personality, when there was one, with whom they associated that hope, was one who used his power to secure justice and peace, and whose ambition was so remote from military glory that he could ride into his capital city on the foal of an ass. Jesus fulfilled this and every other worthy hope of the O.T. (Cf. note on the identification of the Suffering Servant, p. 664.)

But while he fulfilled particular prophecies such as the one last quoted, it is far more true to say that he fulfilled all prophecy. There is a sense in which all prophecy is Messianic prophecy, inasmuch as it is, in virtue of its moral and religious demands, a presentation of the character to which God would have his people conform and which in the fullness of the time was to be perfectly exhibited in his elect Servant. It is a fact of curious and profound significance that, unlike the evangelists and the apostles, Jesus rarely appeals to specific texts. He claims to fulfill the Law and the prophets (Mt. 5¹⁷), and to the disciples on the way to Emmaus, "beginning from Moses and from all the prophets he interpreted to them in all the scriptures the things concerning himself" (Lk. 24²⁷); yet, though the contents of this exposition are broadly indicated in Lk. 24^{46, 47}, there is no detail and no such appeal to particular texts as have for ages formed the staple of the Messianic argument in the Christian Church. What he fulfilled was not so much the parts as the whole, for the essence of the whole was love (cf. Mt. 22⁴⁰). He is the consummation and the satisfaction of all the noblest aspirations cherished by holy men of old. Not only does he say "Yea" to them all, but he is himself "the Everlasting Yea" (2 Cor. 1²⁰). Wherefore it becomes the church, looking with adoring reverence upon this incarnate Affirmation of the gracious purpose of God for the world, to respond with its "Amen" to the glory of God (2 Cor. 1²⁰).

Literature: Riehm, Messianic Prophecy; Briggs, Messianic Prophecy; Delitzsch, Messianic Prophecies; F. H. Woods, The Hope of Israel; G. S. Goodspeed, Israel's Messianic Hope; Adeney, The Hebrew Utopia; Ottley, Aspects of the O.T. (Lecture vi); A. B. Davidson, O.T. Prophecy (chs. xviii-xxiv); Edghill, An Enquiry into the Evidential Value of Prophecy; W. J. Moulton, The Witness of Israel.

THE LITERATURE OF THE INTER-TESTAMENTAL PERIOD

BY PROFESSOR LESLIE E. FULLER

Importance of the Literature. It is almost a fixed tradition in some branches of the Christian Church that the span of centuries between the O.T. and the N.T. is a "period of silence." The claim is that from the time when the last O.T. book was written to the period of the writing of the first N.T. book the voice of inspired prophecy was silent, there were no other worthy mouthpieces of God, and as a result of this lack not a single page of literary material worthy of consideration was handed down.

To the literature that survived the term "apocryphal" was applied, carrying in the minds of many people the idea of something false or untrue. Although for a long time this literature has proved a fruitful field of study for scholars, many students of the Bible have remained completely ignorant concerning this intertestamental age, with its historical, literary, and religious problems.

There are, however, certain factors at work in the modern study of the Bible that are tending to alter this condition. The first of these is in the field of Introduction. Until recently it was assumed that the last book of the O.T., Malachi, was the last book to be written (about 450 B.C.). The period of silence was then thought to extend from about 450 B.C. to about 50 A.D., the time of the first written records of the N.T.—a period of about five centuries. Now, we know that several books of the O.T., such as Job, Ruth, Jonah, and a number of the psalms, were written in the fourth century B.C. or even later. At least Ecclesiastes and Esther are dated as late as the second century B.C. Thus the interim between the Testaments has been shortened from five to about two centuries.

A better appreciation of the history of religion, especially the religion of Israel, is another factor responsible for the rehabilitation of this period. The complete story of the religion of Israel cannot be told with the O.T. as its only source. Much essential information is secured from the study of the languages and literatures, as well as the religious, social, and political organizations, of contemporary peoples, a study made possible chiefly through exploration and excavation in Bible lands. The history and significance of the religion of Israel could not be fully understood or appreciated if we were deprived of the light from Arabia, Babylonia, Assyria, Egypt, and Canaan.

But the greatest single factor revealing the importance of the intertestamental period for the student of the O.T. as well as the N.T. is a fuller understanding of the entire Hellenistic world during the centuries concerned. The N.T. cannot be studied apart from Palestinian and Alexandrian Judaism, during the centuries immediately preceding the opening of the Christian era; equally important is a knowledge of general Hellenistic civilization with its religious and philosophical systems. If we are ever to have an adequate picture of the marvelous personality of Jesus, we must study it upon the background of Palestinian Judaism; if we are to understand the expansion of early Christianity we must take into consideration the preparation of the field by Judaism and Hellenism as reflected in the literature of the late pre-Christian centuries.

The purpose of this article is to make a survey of the Jewish literature of Palestine and the Dispersion in the intertestamental period extending from about 200 B.C. to 100 A.D. (The term "intertestamental" is hardly adequate, as some of the latest sections of the O.T. were written as late as 150 B.C. and some of the earliest books of the N.T. were written about 50 A.D.; which means that there is an overlapping at each end of the period.) It should be noted also that the survey will cover only the Jewish literature which shows more or less intimate relationship with the Palestinian or Alexandrian canon of the O.T.; Jewish writings not thus related are omitted. Thus the Palestinian portions of the Talmud and the works of Philo and his contemporaries do not come within the scope of this article.

Explanation of Terms. There are various terms applied to this literature which need explanation. The first of these is the term "Apocrypha." This term is derived from a Greek word meaning "something hidden." Originally it was used in a laudatory sense of literature hidden from the eyes of the uninitiated, and intended only for the wise. Later the term came to be used in a derogatory sense and was applied to literature of secondary value, and still later, in the days of Origen and Jerome, it was applied to literature considered false and heretical. There are those to-day who accept the last mentioned meaning; but, generally speaking, the modern use of the term does not involve such unfavorable judgment; it is used simply as a convenient designation of the non-canonical literature closely related to the O.T. and the N.T. In its broadest sense it includes the O.T. Apocrypha, the N.T. Apocrypha, and various other Jewish writings of a pseudepigraphal and apocalyptic character (see explanation of terms below). In a narrower sense the term is restricted to the O.T. Apocrypha or the N.T. Apocrypha.

The term "Pseudepigrapha" (meaning "writings under assumed names") is used with a narrower meaning than Apocrypha. Generally it is applied to all Jewish literature of the intertestamental period outside of the O.T. Apocrypha proper; but, as the term suggests, it is really intended to cover all the Jewish writings written under assumed names, such as Enoch, the Twelve Sons of Jacob, Moses, Ezra, etc. And there are some books of a pseudepigraphal nature in the Apocrypha proper, such as 1 Baruch, Epistle of Jeremy, and 2 Esdras.

The word "Apocalypse" calls for more extended explanation. Etymologically it means "revelation" or "disclosure."

Origin of Apocalyptic Literature. Apocalyptic literature (a subdivision of the pseudepigrapha—for the apocalyptic books are written under assumed names) represents a distinct literary movement in Judaism, continuing from the second century B.C. to the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries A.D. Its origin is still a matter of some discussion. One of the oldest theories traces the origin to Persian sources. Although this view was once very popular, it has few adherents at the present time. Some have advanced claims that the movement started among the Essenes, a communistic sect living in southern Palestine, but apocalyptic literature is far too loyal to the Temple and its attendant rites to have emanated from a heretical source. Others have defended the theory that the literature originated in the Dispersion, and represents a Jewish apologetic to the Hellenistic world and its culture. But, while some of the apocalyptic writings undoubtedly were produced by the Jews of the Dispersion, a majority of the writings originated in Palestine. Therefore, though the play of foreign influences on the Jewish mind must be recognized, in this case it is far more plausible to assume that apocalyptic literature was largely indigenous to Palestinian soil and represents a normal Jewish development.

The location of Palestine with its constant threat of invasion and war gradually prepared the soil for a persecution complex, which always forms the background of apocalyptic thinking. Unmistakable evidences of this appear as early as the days of Ezekiel; additional illustrations are seen in Zech. 9-14, Joel, Isa. 24-27 and 56-66. With this psychological condition already created, the Hellenizing policy of Antiochus Epiphanes and the oppression of the Romans were the one thing needed to crystallize the reaction to persecution into a philosophy and a literature of control. Again, the authors of apocalypses were members of the Pharisaic party, a party of laymen acting as champions of the common beliefs and hopes of the laity. This accounts for the fact that the apocalypses are in reality specimens of lay literature sponsoring popular beliefs in angels, demons, world judgments, Messiahs, catastrophic world endings, near approach of a Golden Age, bodily resurrection, the terrible punishment of the wicked and the sensuous and materialistic enjoyment of the righteous. The popularity and influence of this literature were greatest among the common people of Palestine, and especially in Galilee, the center of so many uprisings of the peasantry. In all probability the apocalyptic writings had their origin in lay circles outside of Jerusalem, and, as most scholars suppose, in Galilee.

The problem of all apocalyptic writing is the reconciliation of the current disasters with the power and the justice of God. In the case of Jewish apocalyptic thinking it must be remembered that many of the ancient worthies had promised the speedy coming of the Golden Age; but century after century passed with one disappointment after another. Foreign oppression continued unchanged and the question presented itself: How can this continued persecution be explained in view of the fact that Israel is the chosen race of God and God must still love his folk? Apocalypticism meets the issue squarely and, we maintain, honestly, especially in consideration of the day and age in which it was written. It attempts to create hope and encouragement for the dark days of persecution by picturing the wonders of God's power in the past and the approach of even greater and more wonderful manifestations in the near future. O.T. stories are rewritten and enlarged to show the special providence of God in protecting and guiding the destinies of Israel; and there are vivid and graphic pictures of the glories of the future wherein God arises to deliver his people from the domination of the Gentile and to mete out a much-deserved punishment to the wicked.

The method of the apocalyptic writers by which they sought to create hope and faith in God and loyalty to Jewish institutions forms one of the most interesting phenomena in religious literature. The writers place their revelations in the mouths of some famous personage of the past, such as Enoch, Moses, and Ezra; they always refer to their enemies, foreign nations, and kings in veiled and esoteric terms (the latter characteristic must not be taken as evidence of cowardice, for the prophets of the O.T. frequently followed the same method). Foreign nations are referred to as wild and ravenous beasts, domesticated beasts refer to Israel or a group or a leader in Israel; horns refer to kings and other rulers; stars refer to angels or superhuman beings. Apocalyptic literature was not misunderstood in its own day; e.g., the "abomination of desolation" in Daniel, which meant the desecration of the Temple by Antiochus Epiphanes in 168 B.C., was understood without difficulty by all the faithful in Israel living at the time the book was written. (Of course, later it was interpreted as referring to Rome and subsequently it received a different interpretation in every troubled age of the church.)

Major Differences Between Apocalypticism and Prophecy. A study of the points of contrast between apocalypticism and O.T. prophecy is necessary for a clearer understanding of the purpose and characteristics of apocalyptic literature. There are, of course, points of similarity. For instance, both claim to be true revelations of God, and both possess an eschatology, though in varying degrees. The differences, however, are far more significant.

(1) The prophetic message is sent forth under the name of its own author; apocalyptic literature assumes as its author the name of some great personality of the past. When prophecy is anonymous, as happens in a few instances, it makes no effort to go back to the distant past for its authority. To the writers of apocalyptic literature the O.T. canon was closed, the day of revelation was past, the present age of persecution was wicked and hopeless. Therefore the authors of apocalyptic writings preferred to remain unknown and, for the purpose of enhancing their authority, to place their writings under the name of some person within the period of revelation; such as Enoch, the Twelve Sons of Jacob, Moses, Baruch, Ezra, and many others. A typical apocalypse purports to start with the age of its assumed author and traces the history of mankind down to the Maccabean or Roman period (the time of its actual writing), and then to the Golden Age to come.

(2) Apocalyptic literature is largely a reinterpretation of prophecy. One prophet after another predicted the coming of the rule of God, but their predictions failed to materialize. The apocalyptic literature seeks to explain the failure and to reiterate the older promises in a manner adapted to the new conditions. The most remarkable reinterpretation of prophecy in apocalyptic literature is that of the seventy years of Jeremiah. Jeremiah said Israel would go into captivity for seventy years, to be followed by the restoration of Israel to Palestine and the coming of the kingdom of God. Originally the number seventy was a general term, representing most probably a lifetime, threescore years and ten. When at the close of the Exile and during subsequent centuries the Golden Age did not appear, the apocalyptic book of Daniel, written during the Maccabean crisis, reinterpreted the seventy years of Jeremiah as seventy weeks of years, or 490 years. In the thought of the author sixty-nine and a half weeks had already passed, leaving only one half of a week or three and one half years. When the three and one half years are completed, the Temple, which Antiochus Epiphanes desecrated in 168 B.C., will be cleansed, the daily sacrifice will be renewed, the resurrection will take place, and the Golden Age will be ushered in by the power of God. In Enoch the seventy years are interpreted as the rule of seventy patron angels, and the current age is placed in the rule of the seventieth angel, implying that the Messianic age is near at hand. In 4 Ezra (2 Esdras; see below) the seventy years or weeks of years of Daniel are reinterpreted so as to include the rule of Rome.

(3) The extensive use of symbolism, imagery, and vision is a striking characteristic of the apocalyptic writings. Few of these features appear in the prophetic books of the O.T., and to any considerable extent only in the writings of the post-exilic prophets, when prophecy had begun to decline. The origin of the use of this symbolism, so common to all the apocalyptic books, is still a matter of conjecture. It is possible that one of the motives for its introduction was a desire to create an atmosphere of antiquity, in keeping with the assumed name of the ancient author.

(4) The expectation of a catastrophic end of the present world is another peculiarity of apocalyptic literature. The idea of a spiritual transformation of the world is not foreign to the O.T.; but nearly all of the apocalyptic writers considered the present earth too wicked to contain the kingdom of God for more than a limited period of time. According to some passages the present earth and the present heavens are to be renewed by God (Enoch 37-71), but other passages announce that the entire world will be consumed by fire; following this catastrophe there will be seven days of silence, and then a new earth will be created (4 Ezra).

(5) Prophecy is always conditional in its prediction of future events; apocalyptic literature predicts the end of the age at a certain time, as a part of a predetermined and unchangeable plan of God. The prophets believe that sin will be punished, but if the nation will repent, captivity or other calamities may be averted. In apocalyptic writing the entire history of the world has been predetermined from the beginning; the current evil age is a forerunner of the coming rule of God, but it must run its course. The book of Daniel says that the new age will come in three and one half years, the Assumption of Moses says seventeen hundred and fifty years after the death of Moses. This new age cannot be hastened or retarded, it will come irrespective of human conduct.

(6) The doctrine of the future life of the individual is a unique contribution of apocalypticism. The prophets believed in a semi-conscious, nerveless existence after death, in an underground abode, beyond the bounds of communion with the nation and communion with God. This place, called Sheol, was without moral distinction; all the dead went there and remained there forever. One of the greatest contributions to religious development made by the apocalyptic writers was belief in a future life of the individual and in moral distinctions after death (the two O.T. passages, Isa. 26¹⁹ and Dan. 12², in which the resurrection of individuals is taught belong to the apocalyptic literature); the earliest expectations were rather crude; the pious were promised a bodily resurrection, to dwell in an earthly kingdom, for the purpose of witnessing the punishment of the apostate and enjoying the external prosperity of the new age. In later books appears the more spiritual conception of an eternal existence of the righteous in heaven, i.e., the dwelling place of God.

Minor Differences Between Apocalypticism and Prophecy. Besides the major differences considered above, there are a few minor differences which should be mentioned.

(1) The concept of a new heaven and a new earth, found only once in the O.T. (Isa. 65f.), becomes a permanent expectation of apocalypticism. The finest descriptions of the new heaven and new earth are found in Enoch 37-71 and 4 Ezra.

(2) The scope of eschatology in apocalyptic literature is much larger than in prophecy. The eschatology of the prophets was an eschatology of the nation. In the apocalyptic writings the eschatology of the individual comes to the front, although at first associated with an eternal kingdom on earth. Finally, when the earthly kingdom came to be regarded as temporary, the eschatology of the individual came to stand alone, apart from any period of national triumph on earth.

(3) Points of practical interest are quite different in the two types of literature. For example, the prophets were primarily interested in their own day and its immediate problems. They were preachers of a moral righteousness and champions of the social and religious integrity of the nation of Israel. They had the beginnings of a philosophy of history, but gave little attention to the future. If they manifested any interest in the future, it was only the immediate future. On the other hand, the apocalyptic writers gave little thought to their own age. They trusted in an all-powerful God and a God in close contact with his world; but as for their own age manifestations of God's power are withheld; demons and evil men are working the ruin of the world. The points of emphasis in apocalyptic writing are God's activities in the past and his expected activity in the future. Thus the prophets had a social gospel, which is practically wanting in apocalypticism.

Classification. The historical occasions for literary activity in the intertestamental period are varied. Perhaps the most significant occasion furnishing incentives for literary endeavor was the Dispersion of the Jews to every large center within the Mediterranean basin. The literature of the Dispersion was motivated by three objectives: (1) to control and retain racial identity; (2) to demonstrate the antiquity and priority of the Jewish Law; and (3) to construct a synthesis of Jewish and Greek thought that would be attractive to both Jew and Gentile. The occasions for literary activity in Palestine were the Maccabean Rebellion, the glories and triumphs of the Maccabean rulers, the party strife of the Pharisees and the Sadducees, the oppression of the Romans, and the Fall of Jerusalem. These occasions were periods of war, civil discord, persecution, foreign domination, and destruction of nationality. As a result, much of the literature carries a note of cynicism and pessimism.

The Jewish literature of the intertestamental period falls naturally into two large groups, the Apocrypha proper and the Pseudepigrapha. The books listed as O.T. Apocrypha proper are as follows: 1 and 2 Esdras, Tobit, Judith, Additions to Esther, Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, 1 Baruch, Epistle of Jeremy, Prayer of Azariah and Song of the Three Children, Susanna, Bel and the Dragon, Prayer of Manasses, 1 and 2 Maccabees. Generally speaking, these books represent the excess of the Alexandrian canon of the O.T. over the Palestinian or Hebrew canon. The Alexandrian canon is in Greek and is known from the early Greek translation called the Septuagint (LXX). Some manuscripts of the Septuagint contain also the Books of 3 and 4 Maccabees. At the Council of Trent, in 1546, the Roman Church declared all the books of the Apocrypha proper canonical, with the exception of 1 and 2 Esdras and the Prayer of Manasses.

The books of the Pseudepigrapha are listed as follows: 3 and 4 Maccabees, Enoch, Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, Jubilees, Letter of Aristeas, Sibylline Oracles, Psalms of Solomon, Zadokite Fragments, Assumption of Moses, 2 Enoch, 2 Baruch, 3 Baruch, Martyrdom of Isaiah, and the Books of Adam and Eve. 4 Ezra, which is the same as 2 Esdras 3-14, is frequently classed among the Pseudepigrapha.

The intertestamental books may also be classified according to the places of their origin and composition. Popular tradition, beginning as early as the third century A.D., assumed that all the books of the Apocrypha proper were originally written in Greek. The tradition reasoned that since the manuscripts were found in the Greek they must have been written in that language, and therefore they must have originated among the Jews of the Dispersion. Recent studies have definitely established the fact that many of them were composed in Hebrew or Aramaic. The same is true of many of the books of the Pseudepigrapha. Although the only extant manuscripts are in the Greek, it can be demonstrated that the Greek is a translation from a Hebrew or Aramaic original. Consequently, it is quite clear that while a part of the intertestamental literature comes from the Dispersion, especially Alexandria, a considerable portion originated in Palestine. The Palestinian group includes the books that bear proof of origin in Palestine and evidence of having been written originally in Hebrew or Aramaic; the Alexandrian group includes all books written by the Jews of the Dispersion, and bearing evidence of original composition in Greek.

1. Palestinian Group.

(1) General: Ecclesiasticus, Judith, Jubilees, 1 Maccabees, Epistle of Jeremy, Susanna, Bel and the Dragon, Psalms of Solomon, Zadokite Fragments, 1 Baruch, Martyrdom of Isaiah.

(2) Apocalyptic: Enoch, Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, Assumption of Moses, 2 Baruch, 4 Ezra (same as 2 Esdras 3-14).

2. Alexandrian Group.

(1) General: Tobit, 2 and 3 Maccabees, 1 Esdras, Prayer of Manasses, Prayer of Azariah and Song of the Three Children, Additions to Esther, Wisdom of Solomon, 4 Maccabees, Letter of Aristeas, Books of Adam and Eve, Sibylline Oracles 3-5.

(2) Apocalyptic: 2 Enoch, 3 Baruch.

The literature of the O.T. Apocrypha and the Pseudepigrapha is also arranged according to century and date of origin. (Many of the books being composite, they are divided into sections, each section being given with its date. Most of the dates are in round numbers and can be regarded only as approximate).

1. SECOND CENTURY B.C. (200-100 B.C.)

(1) General: Tobit (200); Ecclesiasticus (180); Judith (150); Jubilees (110); Sibylline Oracles 3 (125-100).

(2) Apocalyptic: Enoch 1-36, 83-90, 106-7 (200-160); Enoch 72-82 (125-100); Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (125-100).

2. FIRST CENTURY B.C. (100-1 B.C.)

(1) General: 1, 2, 3 Maccabees (100); 1 Esdras (100); Prayer of Manasses (100); Epistle of Jeremy (100); Prayer of Azariah and Song of the Three Children (100); Susanna (100); Bel and the Dragon (100); Additions to Esther (100); Letter of Aristeas (100); Wisdom of Solomon (50); 4 Maccabees (50); Psalms of Solomon (50); Zadokite Fragments (50).

(2) Apocalyptic: Enoch 37-71 (105-91), 108 (100-75).

3. FIRST CENTURY A.D. (1-100 A.D.)

(1) General: 1 Baruch (100); Martyrdom of Isaiah (100); The Books of Adam and Eve (100); Sibylline Oracles 4, 5 (80-130).

(2) Apocalyptic: Assumption of Moses (1-30); 2 Enoch (50); 2 Baruch (50-90); 3 Baruch (100); 4 Ezra (60-120).

The literature of the intertestamental period may be further classified under certain descriptive titles indicating the general types or kinds of literature.

1. History: 1 Maccabees, 2 Maccabees, 3 Maccabees, Zadokite Fragments.

Not all these books are history in any strict sense of the word. Indeed, 1 Maccabees is the only book of the group that measures up to modern historical standards; 2 and 3 Maccabees are only semi-historical; and the Zadokite Fragments are classed here only because they furnish the history and covenant of the Zadokite Sect.

2. Recensions of and Additions to O.T. Stories: Jubilees, Prayer of Manasses, Epistle of Jeremy, Prayer of Azariah and Song of the Three Children, Susanna, Bel and the Dragon, Additions to Esther, 1 Esdras, 1 Baruch.

Most of this material represents enlargements of O.T. narratives, sometimes the additions are appended to the canonical books, at other times they are inserted in the midst of the narratives, as is done, e.g., in Daniel and Esther. The book of Jubilees contains an apocalyptic reinterpretation of the book of Genesis from the standpoint of the later concepts of the Law.

3. Stories and Homilies: Tobit, Judith, Letter of Aristeas, 4 Maccabees, Books of Adam and Eve, Martyrdom of Isaiah.

The books in this group are largely works of fiction. Their purpose is to glorify Jewish customs and institutions.

4. Wisdom Literature: Ecclesiasticus, Wisdom of Solomon, Psalms of Solomon, Sibylline Oracles.

This literature is modeled on the Wisdom literature of the O.T., such as Proverbs and some of the Psalms. The Sibylline Oracles contain some apocalyptic material. They are cast in the form of short verses and epigrammatic statements. (The Proverbs and Parables of Achikar are omitted from this list, as they antedate the period of the intertestamental literature).

5. Apocalyptic Literature: Enoch, Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, Assumption of Moses, 2 Enoch, 2 Baruch, 3 Baruch, 4 Ezra (same as 2 Esdras 3-14).

Brief Survey of the Separate Books. This general survey of the intertestamental literature is here followed by a brief discussion of the separate books. (For the teaching of this literature see art., The Religious Development of the Intertestamental Period, pp. 200f.; and for details of interpretation the commentaries on the individual books in Charles, Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the O.T.) Only a few of the more important features of the different books can be noted, such as title, date and place of origin; there is also a brief statement of the contents and their value. (These notations follow the order of books suggested in the classification according to the types of literature represented by the books.)

I. HISTORY

First Maccabees. A valuable historical work concerning the Maccabean Rebellion, produced in Palestine about 100 B.C. The name "Maccabee" was first applied to Judas (24f.), and later to the entire family. The author was a man with Sadducean tendencies, tolerant, but loyal to his nation and the institution of the priesthood. The name of the Deity does not occur in the book.

The book opens with a short introduction starting with the conquests of Alexander the Great, and then treats in some detail the history of the Maccabean uprising, 175-135 B.C. The greater part of the book centers in the exploits of Judas, apparently the most remarkable figure of the rebellion. The book concludes with a short history of Jonathan and Simon to the year 135 B.C.

It is the most valuable because the most trustworthy record of the Maccabean Rebellion.

Second Maccabees. This book is not a sequel to 1 Maccabees, but simply a second book on the Maccabean Rebellion. It was written by a Pharisee, or a man with decided Pharisaic tendencies. It was written in Greek about 100 B.C.

The book purports to be an epitome of a larger work of five volumes (not extant) by one Jason of Cyrene. It treats of a much shorter period of history than 1 Maccabees, the period of 175-161 B.C., states the causes of the revolt and outlines the campaigns of Judas. Great detail is given as to the extent and drastic policies of Antiochus Epiphanes in his persecutions of the Jews.

The value of this book is more in the field of religious belief than history. It attained to great popularity in later centuries in the literature of the martyrs. The Roman Church uses certain portions of it to support the dogma of prayers for the dead (1243f.) and intercession of the saints (1511f.).

Third Maccabees. A product of Alexandrian Judaism very similar to the Letter of Aristeas. It was written in Greek about 100 B.C. The title is a misnomer, unless it be taken as synonymous with "persecution" or "persecuted folk."

The book is only semi-historical; many of its details are purely imaginary and fanciful. The story centers in an attempt of Philopater (Ptolemy IV) to enter the Temple at Jerusalem; he is frustrated by a timely divine intervention, returns to Egypt and begins a wholesale persecution of the Jews. Great multitudes are forcibly driven from their homes in all parts of Egypt and assembled in the Hippodrome in Alexandria. The king commands that the assembled multitude of Jews be trodden under foot by drunken elephants. Three times the day set for their destruction dawns, and each time some divine act of intervention occurs. The first time God causes the king to oversleep, the second time the king is thrown into a spell of confusion and forgetfulness, and the third time God sends a vision of angelic forms. The Jews are released and banqueted, and the king repents and becomes a patron of the Jews. Just as in the Book of Esther, the delivered groups are allowed to work their vengeance on the apostates until three hundred are killed.

The story possesses some real merit from a literary point of view, although at times its style is bombastic. Its prayers are among some of the finest in intertestamental literature. The story is a fine example of the type of literature current among the Jews of the Dispersion.

Zadokite Fragments. Written in Palestine in the middle of the first century B.C. The name "Zadokite" comes from the name of the sect whose covenant is found in the book. The text is fragmentary and incomplete. It was discovered in the ruins of a synagogue in Cairo in 1896.

The Fragments give a semi-historical narration of the founding of a new sect in Judaism, a group of dissenters who journeyed to Damascus and there drew up their covenant in 196 B.C. The Fragments contain chiefly a series of laws, which constitute the main part of the covenant. The new party consisted of a company of priests, hence the name "Zadokites." They dissented from the priestly circles at Jerusalem; they accepted the Law as final authority, but went a step further and ascribed canonical authority to the Prophets. The Fragments contain many laws which bear marked resemblances to the oldest sections of the Talmud, as the laws on the Sabbath, calendar, religious festivals, divorce, and many other social and religious matters. One of the most interesting features of the Fragments is found in their eschatology. Their authors expected a Messiah from Aaron (i.e., the family of Levi), to be preceded by a "Star" or a "Law-giver" and "Teacher of Righteousness." This differs from the O.T. tradition of a Messiah from the tribe of Judah.

The value of the Fragments lies in the fact that they furnish information concerning a hitherto unknown sect in Judaism. Also they help to piece out our knowledge of the development of legalism in pre-Christian Judaism.

II. RECENSIONS OF AND ADDITIONS TO OLD TESTAMENT STORIES

Jubilees. A Palestinian product from near the end of the second century B.C. It is a rewriting of the book of Genesis from the standpoint of late Jewish legalism, and for that reason at times has borne the title "Little Genesis." It carries over much of the text of Genesis intact; however, at times it discards whole sections; more often it introduces whole new sections, to suit its later theology. Its present title is taken from the chronological scheme into which the framework of the book is fixed: all the events of the book from creation onward are dated according to a series of jubilees.

The book opens with a much enlarged story of the creation of the world. The acts of creation, based on the six days in Genesis, are expanded to twenty-two distinct creative acts. Stories of angels and the introduction of a counter kingdom of evil, fallen angels and demons, constitute a vital part of the rewriting. All incidents derogatory to the Patriarchs are left out, and they are purged of all deceit and falsehood. The great age of Methuselah is largely accounted for by the fact that he spent the first seven years of his infancy in heaven with the angels. The rite of circumcision is made pre-existent, for the angels are circumcised. Many other late priestly institutions are traced back to ancient times; for instance, the daily incense offering is traced to Adam, the Feast of the Weeks to Noah, the law of the tithe to Abraham, and the Day of Atonement to Joseph. The book is highly particularistic: it opposes all intercourse with the Gentiles, and believes in the future total annihilation of the Gentiles.

The value of the book lies chiefly in the fact that it demonstrates and illustrates the tendency in later Judaism to trace late beliefs and institutions back to the earliest times, for the purpose of giving to these institutions greater antiquity and thus greater authority in the face of Hellenistic opposition. The book is also very valuable for the purpose of textual comparisons with the text of Genesis. Its conception of the Law, angels, and demons is of interest from the standpoint of history of religion.

Prayer of Manasses. A product of Hellenistic Judaism about 100 B.C. It was intended as a prayer of penitence uttered by Manasseh in connection with his Babylonian captivity recorded in 2 Chr. 33. It is a prayer consisting, according to the generally accepted arrangement, of fifteen verses, opening with a note of adoration, vv. 1-7, followed by confession of sin, vv. 8-10, and an appeal for forgiveness and a short doxology, vv. 11-15.

It is one of the finest prayers in the apocryphal literature; its diction is chaste, its spirit reverent and devout. It received some well deserved recognition in the English versions of the Reformation period.

Epistle of Jeremy. A Palestinian work of the beginning of the first century, not far from 100 B.C. It purports to be a letter from the prophet Jeremiah to the Babylonian exiles. In reality, it is a short prosaic composition of seventy-three verses, possessing very little originality or depth of feeling. It is full of repetitions and lacks the fire of the prophetic movement of which it claims to be a part. Its principal message is a condemnation of idolatry.

Prayer of Azariah and Song of the Three Children. A Greek product of about 100 B.C. In the LXX it is an integral part of the book of Daniel, inserted after Dan. 3²³. As a part of the book it did not bear a separate title for a long time. It is frequently referred to as the "First Addition to Daniel."

Vv. 3-22 contain the prayer of Azariah, one of the Three Children cast into the fiery furnace, a prayer of praise and adoration, and a request for deliverance in accordance with God's promises. Vv. 23-27 form a prose section narrating the increase in the heat of the furnace, and the appearance of an angel of the Lord, who protects the Three Children. Vv. 28-68 are in the nature of a song of praise calling upon all creation to praise God. A refrain urging such praise is used throughout the composition.

The "Addition" has little real value. It lacks the power and impressiveness of diction found in the Prayer of Manasses. Perhaps its chief interest lies in the fact that it illustrates the ease with which a second-rate piece of literature could become a part of the O.T. canon of the Jews of the Dispersion.

Susanna. A Palestinian product of about 100 B.C., frequently found in Greek versions at the end of Daniel. Hence it became known as the "Second Addition to Daniel."

It is a story or a parable intended to illustrate the necessity of more thorough cross-examination of witnesses, and at the same time to exalt the great wisdom and foresight of Daniel. It narrates a story of two elders who lusted after the same woman; being repulsed in their advances they resolved to accuse the woman of unchastity. A trial is held and the two elders present their charge of adultery. On the basis of their testimony, Susanna is found guilty, and is about to be put to death, when Daniel intervenes. He proves their charges false; whereupon the elders are condemned to the same fate which they had proposed for the woman: they are thrown into a ravine, and fire from heaven consumes them.

The value of this "Addition" also is very slight. Again we may wonder at the ease with which a story of little moral value became a part of the Alexandrian Canon of the O.T.

Bel and the Dragon. The third of the "Additions" to Daniel, produced in Palestine about 100 B.C., and usually found at the end of Daniel.

The story is told to illustrate the wisdom and cleverness of Daniel. The first story of Bel, a heathen god whom Daniel refused to worship, is the story of a heathen idol that was credited with devouring great quantities of food. Daniel cleverly used some ashes to detect the footprints of the men who carried away the food. The king then orders the priests of the idol slain and the idol itself destroyed. The story of the great "Dragon" (better "serpent") also adds to the fame of Daniel. Daniel kills the serpent, and an enraged populace has him thrown to the lions. He suffers no harm, being supplied with food through the prophet Habakkuk, who is transported miraculously from Palestinian harvest fields to Babylon, and then returned safely. Finally Daniel is rescued from the lions' den, and his accusers are thrown to the lions. (The story of Habakkuk appears to be an interpolation.)

Very little value can be attached to these stories. The book of Daniel with its many symbolical and miraculous elements must have been very popular among the Jews of the Dispersion to give rise to so many expansions, at least some of which drifted into the Greek versions of the book.

Additions to Esther. Composed in Greek about 100 B.C. The Additions consist of six passages of one hundred and seven verses, which bear the marks of diversity of authorship. The purpose of the additions is to furnish details with reference to certain parts of the canonical book of Esther, to supply the name of God absent from the canonical book, and to soften down a little of the hatred for the foreigner reflected in the O.T. book. There is little literary merit or value of any kind in the Additions, but they are of interest to the student of textual problems as illustrating the methods and processes of interpolation.

First Esdras. An Alexandrian work from about 100 B.C.; sometimes called the Greek Ezra to distinguish it from the book of Ezra in the Hebrew canon. It is a free Greek translation or paraphrase of the more important sections of the O.T. books of Ezra and Nehemiah. The book opens with some of the incidents of Josiah's Passover narrated in 2 Chr. 35, continues through Ezra and extends to Neh. 8. The one striking difference between this book and the canonical texts is the story of the Three Body Guards and the Decree of Darius. The Three Body Guards carry on an oratorical contest to determine which is the strongest: wine, the king, or women. The third Body Guard, who speaks in praise of women (with an appended story glorifying truth), wins the contest. Darius decrees the restoration of Jerusalem. The minor differences between this book and the canonical books are largely in matters of arrangement and offer a fascinating field to students of textual problems.

First Baruch. A small pseudepigraphical work, written in Palestine about 100 A.D. It is found in all the editions of the LXX, where it bears the name of Baruch (it is here called 1 Baruch to distinguish it from the other books credited to Baruch), the amanuensis of the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. 364). The Fall of Jerusalem certainly constitutes part of its background.

1 Baruch is a composite book illustrating various types of literature. Chs. 11-38 are in prose, dealing with conditions of the exiles in Babylon and containing a series of confessions of sin and statements of the causes of these sins. In the remainder of the book we find poetic material, some of it jubilant and some of it in the form of lamentations. Some of the contents resemble the Wisdom literature of the O.T. The book finally closes with a promise of the return of the dispersed Israelites and of the glorious future for Israel.

III. STORIES AND HOMILIES

Tobit. A product of Alexandrian Judaism, written as early as 200 or even 250 B.C. Not long ago it was thought to be Persian in origin, but now its Egyptian origin is definitely proved. The story centers around the journey of Tobias, son of Tobit, a God-fearing man, to a distant land, the consummation of a happy marriage, and his safe return home. Raphael, one of the archangels, accompanies Tobias on part of his journeys and protects him in times of peril. The story undoubtedly draws some of its material from current folk lore. Indeed, there are three folk stories now known all of which seem to have some relationship to Tobit; the story of Achikar, the story of the Egyptian god, Khons of Thebes, and the story of the Grateful Dead. Tobit contains several quotations from the proverbs and fables of Achikar, a reputed wise man once a prime minister of Sennacherib, king of Assyria. The story of Khons, god of Thebes, is an Egyptian story (some of Achikar's wonderful deeds centered in Egypt) of a certain princess living in a distant country, who was possessed with a demon, but was healed through the instrumentality of Khons. The story of the Grateful Dead was really a cycle of stories well known throughout the Hellenistic world. In brief, it was the story of a traveler who, finding the dead body of a debtor, with a fine exhibition of self-sacrifice gave it a decent burial. The spirit of the dead man followed his benefactor in human form, delivered him from many perils and rewarded him in various other ways.

The purpose of the book was to offset some of the dangerous superstitions of Egyptian paganism as it affected the Jews of the Dispersion. Hence, by using some of the popular stories afloat it tried to show the sovereignty of Jehovah over all other gods. It also endeavored to teach loyalty to parents, respect for the dead, prayer, almsgivings, and fasting. Its conception of angels and demons marks a transition between the O.T. conception and that of later Jewish literature. The story reveals the tremendous grip which popular stories and superstitions may have on the popular mind.

Judith. Written by a Palestinian Jew about the middle of the second century B.C. The title "Judith" is taken from a Hebrew word meaning "Jewess." The purpose of the book is not historical but didactic. The author belonged to an orthodox party like the "Chasidim," who were the forerunners of the Pharisees.

The book falls naturally into two sections: an introduction, chs. 1-7, and the story of Judith, chs. 8-16. The introduction, though somewhat overloaded with details of military plans, possesses real literary merit. Nebuchadnezzar had declared war against Media, and had asked aid from his western dependencies, including Palestine. The latter did not respond, so he determined to punish them, and accordingly set out with an army of 120,000 footsoldiers and 12,000 mounted archers, all under the command of Holofernes. After conquering all the lands to the north of Palestine, Holofernes laid siege to Bethulah in north Palestine with an army of 170,000 footsoldiers and 12,000 mounted men. After the city had been reduced to a point of starvation, with its water supply exhausted, Judith appeared on the scene as heroine and deliverer.

Much emphasis is placed on Judith's piety, regular habits of prayer and fasting, her beauty and her daring. Alone with her maid and a bag of clean food she makes her way into the camp of the enemy and into the presence of Holofernes. She finally accepts his invitation to a feast, but does not eat except from her own supply of clean food. At the close of the banquet, being left alone with Holofernes, who is now intoxicated and helpless, she, with a prayer to God on her lips, cuts off his head with two strokes. The head is carried to the village, where Judith is proclaimed victor and deliverer. The siege is lifted and Israel is saved from disaster. The book concludes with a hymn in eulogy of Judith, and with Judith dedicating her share of plunder to God. She dies at the age of one hundred and five years, and the land of Israel enjoys peace for a long time.

The purpose of the book is to create faith in and loyalty to the Jewish religious institutions. Its chief value is not historical but theological and religious. It furnishes an excellent cross-section of some of the beliefs of orthodox Judaism during this second century B.C. Judith is pictured as a strict observer of the Law, a fine type of Pharisaic righteousness. She keeps the later Jewish festivals enjoined in the Pentateuch, as the festival of the Sabbath, the New Moon and the Eves of the Sabbath (86); she also fasts, prays continually and abstains from unclean food.

Letter of Aristeas. A product of Alexandrian Judaism from about 100 B.C. Aristeas poses as a court official in the court of the Ptolemies in Egypt, narrates a series of incidents leading up to and including the translation of the Law (=the Pentateuch) into the Greek, i.e., the so-called LXX. The purpose of the letter is to glorify the Law and the priesthood, and to give general approval of the translation of the Law into Greek. Incidentally, it endeavors to answer the many objections to the translation. It is a typical product of the Dispersion, having as its ultimate aim the presentation of Jewish institutions in the most favorable light and at the same time to steady the wavering faith of many of the widely scattered Jews. The letter does not possess great literary merit, but gives a vivid picture of the life of the Jews of the Dispersion and of their interests.

Fourth Maccabees. A typical Alexandrian production from the middle of the first century B.C. It is a homily on the supremacy of "inspired reason" over passion. The book, adopting the terminology of the Platonic and Stoic systems, seeks to show that obedience to the Law is one way of attaining ultimate ideals. The author claims that the passions of men came from God; hence they cannot be eradicated, but can be controlled. Reason, exercising such control, becomes an opponent of the passions. Most of the illustrations are from the stories of biblical heroes, and more particularly from the story of Eleazar, and the Seven Sons in 2 Macc. 7. The writer shows how these seven sons bore up under the terrible tortures of Antiochus Epiphanes and uses their fortitude and steadfastness as an illustration of the conquest of reason over the passions. Its chief interest lies in its efforts to adapt Jewish ideas to Greek thought. It is a fine example of control literature.

Books of Adam and Eve. A Hellenistic-Jewish work from the end of the first century A.D. The work exists in two versions, one in Latin, the other in a Slavonic dialect. It has suffered much at the hands of Christian redactors.

The stories narrated represent a type of popular legends such as grew up around many of the biblical characters, and are embellished with many details. We may take as an illustration of the interest in details the story of Adam's death: The death of Adam is foretold to Eve in a dream; the death-bed scene is a memorable one as he is surrounded by his sixty-three children; Adam traces the cause of his death back to his fall; some efforts are made to avert his death, but all are of no avail; Adam is buried by the archangels, and Michael carries his spirit to Paradise. At the close of the books Michael warns against mourning on the Sabbath Day. It is of interest to note the great popularity enjoyed by these and other Jewish legends, and to see the way in which they were worked over and adapted by the early Christians.

Martyrdom of Isaiah. A Palestinian work from about 100 A.D., part of a larger work known as the Ascension of Isaiah. The latter consists of three sections; two are of Christian origin and are known as the Vision of Isaiah and the Testament of Hezekiah; the third, which is of Jewish origin, is known as the Martyrdom of Isaiah. The story is fragmentary. It is a legendary account of Isaiah's death by being sawn asunder in a tree trunk (cf. Heb. 11:37). The legend enjoyed great popularity and may underlie the N.T. statement.

IV. WISDOM LITERATURE

Ecclesiasticus. Written in Palestine previous to the Maccabean Rebellion, about 180 B.C. The title comes from the Vulgate, where, according to some, the word has the meaning "Church Book." Sometimes the book is called "Sirach," or by the Hebrew name of the author, "(Jesus) Ben Sira." The author appears to have lived in Jerusalem, where he was head teacher of a school; apparently, he was a man of wealth and a traveler. The book was translated into the Greek by the grandson of the author in 132 B.C.

In contents the book is somewhat similar to the book of Proverbs in the O.T. It contains numerous proverbs, maxims, and practical observations on human conduct, such as the observance of the Law, the need of wisdom in social and religious affairs, the punishment of the wicked, the reward of the righteous, the care of the poor and the needy, right conduct toward women, friendships, the training of children, need of self-control, chastity, and respect for parents and the aged; also warnings against falsehood, pride, intercourse with wicked men, and the misuse of power and wealth. Wisdom is defined as that faculty of common sense that enables one to distinguish between what is to one's advantage and what is harmful; it is personified and is represented as eternal and pre-existent; it is also identified with the Law, which is also declared to be pre-existent. Throughout the book there is the constant assumption of a strict monotheism, and a firm belief in Israel as the chosen nation of God.

Ecclesiasticus is one of the most suggestive books of the intertestamental literature; and probably was omitted from the O.T. canon only because it was written too late for its admission.

Wisdom of Solomon. Produced in Alexandria, about 50 B.C. The name "Solomon" in the title is purely a literary device as in the canonical book of Ecclesiastes. The book may have been written to combat the cynicism in the philosophy of Ecclesiastes. It can be divided into three parts: chs. 11-63, dealing with the destinies of the righteous and the wicked; chs. 69-10, setting forth the author's concept of wisdom; and chs. 11-19, which give an historical survey of Israel's history, express the author's theory of punishment, and condemn idolatry and its attendant evils. The general teaching of the book is a synthesis of Jewish and Greek ideas; the more important subjects covered are God, immortality, universalism, and the pre-existence of the soul. God is regarded as transcendent and removed from the world; he works through an intermediary, namely, Wisdom, which is personified and represented as co-architect with God. God loves all men (11^{23f.}). Immortality is immediate, that is, there is no intermediate state, no resurrection, nor elaborate final judgment. The pre-existence of the soul may be carried over from Greek thought (8^{19f.}). The religious ideas expressed or implied in the book are among the noblest produced in Hellenistic-Jewish centers during this period, and they find many an echo in the N.T.

Psalms of Solomon. Written in Palestine, about 50 B.C.; the writers were Pharisees; hence, by some writers the Psalms have been called the Psalms of the Pharisees. The use of the term "Solomon" in the title is in line with the general tendency of the age to produce pseudepigraphal literature (see above, under section on "Explanation of Terms"). The Psalms number eighteen and are modeled on the Psalms of the O.T.; many of them are very bitter in their condemnation of the sinners, i.e., the Sadducees, and the Gentiles. Psalm 17 looks forward to the near approach of an ideal temporary kingdom, with a Messiah from Judah; the hostile Gentiles will be destroyed, others will be converted, to serve in the kingdom. The Psalms throw much light on the sectarian strife which troubled Judaism during the first century B.C.

Sibylline Oracles. Books 3-5 of the Sibylline Oracles are largely Jewish in origin; they were written in the Dispersion and date from 125 B.C. to 130 A.D. The Jewish oracles are a part of a great mass of oracular utterances coming from different centuries and various religions. They are to be traced to a widespread practice in the Hellenistic world to seek divine guidance by means of inspired messages received from some Sibyl, generally a woman associated with a shrine; the oracles are given usually in verse form. Many of these Sibyls exerted great influence and enjoyed popularity extending over long periods of time. Religious cults were quick to recognize the power of these popular oracles for propagating belief; the Jews and later even the Christians did not hesitate to use them for their own propaganda. The Jewish Sibylline oracles are easily distinguished from non-Jewish by their subject matter, such as references to God, the Law, Israel, Beliar, the coming of the Messiah, and the typically Jewish condemnations of the evils of idolatry. The value of the oracles is slight, except as they reveal ancient methods of religious propaganda.

V. APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE

Enoch. A series of apocalyptic writings, Palestinian in origin, coming from about 200-75 B.C. It would be quite proper to speak of the books of Enoch, for there is unmistakable evidence of at least five divisions, coming from different periods.

Chs. 1-36 comprise the oldest part of the book, built around a still older fragment (chs. 6-11) of an "Apocalypse of Noah."

Most of this section was written before the Maccabean Rebellion, between 200 and 170 B.C. This portion deals with the fall of the angels and their lust after the women of earth, with the consequent introduction of all sinful practices and demonic influences. The lot of the wicked and of the righteous, the names of the archangels and their functions, the journeys of Enoch through earth, Sheol, and the heavens are other subjects receiving attention.

Chs. 83-90 were written in the same period as Daniel, about 175-160 B.C. This section relates a series of dream visions covering time from the beginning of man's history to the coming of the final judgment and the eternal earthly kingdom. Past disasters are treated as a series of world judgments culminating in the last world judgment or the final Judgment, which is still in the future.

Chs. 72-82 constitute a semi-apocalyptic work, written in the last part of the second century, about 125 B.C. It consists of minute descriptions of the heavens, the movements of the sun, moon, and stars, the divisions of the year and the succession of the seasons.

Chs. 37-71, better known as the "Parables of Enoch," are among the best examples of apocalyptic literature. They were written in the first part of the first century, about 100-75 B.C. There are three parables, dealing with the coming of the divine, pre-existent Messiah, the Son of Man, and the Kingdom of God, which is to be eternal, in a new heaven and a new earth.

Chs. 91-108 may be considered together, though they come from different sources. Chs. 91-104 are largely a unit, coming from the first part of the first century, about 100-75 B.C. Chs. 106, 107 are fragments of the Noah Apocalypse (see on chs. 1-36) and belong in the second century B.C.; chs. 105, 108 come from the same age as 91-104. All the sections deal with the coming of a temporary kingdom and the resurrection of the spirits of the righteous.

The apocalyptic sections of Enoch unquestionably furnish the richest background material for the study of the N.T. (Cf. art., Backgrounds, p. 846.)

Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. The Testaments are apocalyptic writings ascribed to the twelve sons of Jacob; they were produced in Palestine in the last quarter of the second century B.C., during the early, more prosperous days of the reign of John Hyrcanus. The author was a close adherent of the Chasidim, the forerunners of the Pharisees. The book has suffered much at the hands of redactors, both Jewish and Christian. The Jewish redactions consist chiefly of a few first century B.C. additions, returning from the teaching in the earlier portions of a Messiah from Levi to the more ancient belief in a Messiah from Judah; the Christian additions are easily distinguished and comprise about one twelfth of the entire book.

In literary form the Testaments leave much to be desired; some of the finest ethical teaching is expressed in the most unpromising literary form. Each Testament follows a regular literary standard and presents its material in a threefold division: The first division gives a historical survey of the life of the Patriarch, the second summarizes the lessons and warnings to be drawn from the virtues or sins of the Patriarch, and the third contains the apocalyptic material dealing primarily with the immediate future of the writer's own age.

The Testaments reach the high-water mark in Jewish ethics; they contain a body of ethical principles that bear close resemblance to certain utterances in the Sermon on the Mount. The command of Jesus to love God and one's neighbor is stated three times in the Testaments (Issachar 52 76 Dan 53), but with this difference: that one's neighbor is conceived of as a fellow Israelite. The doctrine of forgiveness also resembles the conception in the Gospels: divine forgiveness is conditioned on willingness to forgive one's fellow; and even though the offender will not repent when repeatedly forgiven, the spirit of hatred and resentment must be banished from the heart (Gad 63-7; cf. Mt. 1815f.). The Testaments are among the choicest products of the apocalyptic movement.

Assumption of Moses. A Palestinian writing, from the first part of the first century A.D.; that is, it was written during the lifetime of Jesus. The author evidently was a Pharisee with pacifistic tendencies. Originally the book consisted of two parts, the Testament of Moses and the Assumption of Moses. The present text depends largely on the Testament; only fragments of the Assumption have been preserved. The book is the protest of a Pharisee against the growing tendency of his party to blend political ideals with the Messianic hope; hence, while believing in the coming of the Kingdom, he has no room for a Messiah. The advent of the Kingdom is to be preceded by a period of repentance and a series of woes and supernatural signs. There is also a fragmentary account of the last days of Moses, his death, burial, and his assumption to heaven. It is significant that this little book, written during the lifetime of Jesus, agrees with him in the protest against the fusion of political and religious ideals. Some of the material in the book reappears in the brief Epistle of Jude (see notes there).

Second Enoch. An apocalyptic writing, from Jewish-Hellenistic circles, written in Greek in the middle of the first century A.D.; sometimes called the "Slavonic Enoch," because most of the extant sources are in Slavonic; also known as the "Secrets of Enoch." When the book was first discovered it was thought to be a variant of the better-known book of Enoch, but further study has established it as a separate work.

The incidents or stories in the book are concerned with the journeys of Enoch through the several heavens into the presence of God. A full description is given of each heaven and its contents. Arrived in the presence of God, Enoch is shown all the secrets of the world, including the heavens. These revelations he embodies in three hundred and sixty-six books. The closing chapters of the book deal with further revelations of the secrets of creation and other events; there is also a short history of Adam and his descendants. Finally Enoch returns to earth and instructs his children both in the past and the future.

The significance of the book lies in its teaching with reference to the final Judgment, angels, the pre-existence of the soul, plurality of the heavens and the temporary Messianic age of one thousand years. This is the only reference in Jewish literature to a temporary kingdom of one thousand years, that is, a millennium (cf. Rev. 20:1-8, notes).

Second Baruch. A composite book of apocalyptic type, largely of Palestinian origin; some of its material was written just before the Fall of Jerusalem in 70 A.D., and some later. In order to distinguish it from the apocryphal book of Baruch it is sometimes called the "Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch," due to the fact that the finest MS. of the book is written in Syriac.

There are two types of narratives in the book; one set is optimistic and patriotic in tone, the other is pessimistic. Chs. 27-30, 36-40 and 53-74 are the optimistic sections, written before the Fall of Jerusalem; chs. 1-26, 31-35, 41-52, and 75-87 are largely pessimistic, probably because they were written after Jerusalem was destroyed. With a few minor exceptions the entire book is the product of Palestinian Judaism. In the optimistic portions the hope of an age of triumph prevails, with a Messiah playing an active part; in the pessimistic sections the figure of the Messiah disappears, and the idea of a kingdom of triumph is abandoned.

It is one of the most interesting of the late Jewish apocalyptic writings contemporary with the N.T., especially in its ideas of sin, which resemble those of Paul, and its idea of the future as an age of incorruptibility following an age of corruption.

Third Baruch. An apocalyptic writing, of Greek origin, from about 100 A.D. It has suffered much at the hands of Christian redactors; frequently it is referred to as the Greek Apocalypse of Baruch. The book consists largely of a descriptive narrative of the contents of five of the seven heavens, with a description of the movements of some of the heavenly bodies and their attendant angels. It is of special interest because of its doctrine of the intercession of angels, and the further elaboration of the doctrine of the plurality of heavens. Its doctrine of sin is somewhat like that in 2 Baruch. The devil causes the fall of Adam, but no mention is made of inherited guilt.

Fourth Ezra (Esdras). A composite apocalyptic work, originating about 60-120 A.D. in Palestine. It is the same as 2 Esdras 3-14. The heart of the book is found in chs. 3-10, known as the Salathiel apocalypse. In this part apocalyptic literature reaches the highest point of rationalization on the meaning of sin and suffering and its reconciliation with the justice of God; a closely related question concerns the problem raised by the persecution of Israel, the chosen race. Chs. 11 and 12 contain the famous "Eagle vision"; in ch. 13 is the "Man from the Sea vision"; and in ch. 14 the "Ezra legend."

This book and 2 Baruch represent two of the most suggestive among the apocalyptic writings. In other apocalyptic literature obedience to the Law as the final hope of salvation is never abandoned; in 4 Ezra final salvation through the Law is questioned. The latter is the most deterministic of all the apocalyptic writings; the whole history of the world is pre-determined from the beginning. It is the only apocalyptic writing outside of 2 Enoch that places a limitation on the temporary Kingdom; but while the latter mentions one thousand years, in 4 Ezra the period of the renewed Kingdom is limited to four hundred years.

Literature: G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, vol. ii; Fairweather, The Background of the Gospels; Charles (editor), The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the O.T. in English; Oesterley, The Books of the Apocrypha: Their Origin, Teaching and Contents.

Also literature cited under article, Religious Development of Intertestamental Period, p. 213, and part IV of article, Backgrounds, p. 852.

RELIGIOUS DEVELOPMENT OF THE INTERTESTAMENTAL PERIOD

BY PROFESSOR LESLIE E. FULLER

Four distinct stages may be recognized in the religious development reflected in the O.T. (1) The nomadic stage, which was an age of origins and small beginnings; (2) the agricultural stage, which experienced a syncretism of the nomadic religion with elements contributed by the earlier inhabitants of Palestine, who had already attained to an agricultural mode of life; (3) the prophetic stage, which, pressed forward by the moral and religious problems created by the strange mixture of Canaanitish and Hebrew religion and the increasingly complex general culture, raised the religion to a very high level of spiritual and ethical appreciation and emphasis; and (4) the legalistic stage, which sought to preserve and protect the gains of the past by emphasizing implicit obedience to formal law and the painstaking observance and use of religious forms and institutions. The study of this development has commanded for a long time the best thought and effort of O.T. scholarship, which has been greatly aided not only by recent advances of knowledge in the fields of O.T. language, literature, and history, but also by the conscientious labors of archæologists and other students of contemporary history, religion, and civilization in general. As a result of this prolonged investigation and research O.T. religion, at least in its general outline and development, can now be presented in a perfectly clear and easily intelligible manner.

Scope of This Article. This article presents the stage of religious development immediately following that of the O.T. period, namely, the religious development of the intertestamental period. The ground work necessary for this study has been completed. Ancient literary remains have been recovered, carefully edited, and translated; commentaries, representative of the best scholarship, have been produced, and furnish a rich mine from which materials may be gathered; experience gained in the study of O.T. religion has aided in the solution of similar problems discovered in the intertestamental field. The several types of literature furnishing the source materials have been discussed in another connection (see art., Intertestamental Literature, pp. 190-2); where attention is also called to the various crises responsible for the literary activity, such as the Maccabean Rebellion, the domination of Palestine by Rome in the first century B.C., and the fall of Jerusalem in 70 A.D.; the influence of sectarian strife between Pharisee and Sadducee; the unifying forces running through large sections of the literature, such as loyalty to the Law, and the modifying influences exerted on the degree of loyalty to the Law by the appearance of another loyalty, namely, loyalty to the Messianic expectations. Excessive loyalty to the Law tended to crowd out emphasis on characteristic features of the Messianic hope, while intense loyalty to the Messianic hope tended to render the influence of the Law less absolute. The influence exerted on the authors by local and cultural environment has also been considered. Books written in Palestine follow closely the O.T. traditions, while the literature of the Dispersion reveals an attitude of receptiveness toward Greek thought.

The importance of the study of the religious development of the intertestamental period is determined by its relation to O.T. and N.T. religion. Apart from the Bible much of this literature would possess little or no interest. The intertestamental religious development must not be considered an orderly process of development. The literature as a whole presents many inconsistent ideas and even in a single book, which may be regarded as the product of one man's thinking, such inconsistencies are found. As compared with the O.T., there are points of advance, but also points of retrogression; and some of the earliest ideas are found even in the latest books written. Limitation of space makes an exhaustive discussion of the entire subject impossible; hence the present article will confine itself to the following ideas: God, man, angels, demons, preliminary and final judgments, kingdom of God, Messiah, resurrection, and life after death.

THE IDEA OF GOD

The idea of God in the O.T. is built upon an earlier Semitic conception of a God confined to one tribe and one locality. Other elements carried over from pre-Mosaic and early Semitic days include: (1) a vivid sense of the reality of the spirit world; (2) a belief in the far-reaching effects of divine power; and (3) a more or less deterministic or fatalistic view of the relation of Deity to the general world-order. The distinctive contribution of Israel to the God concept, made chiefly through the prophets, is (1) the insistence that there is only one God—monotheism; (2) the description of this one God as a God the very heart of whose being is holiness; and (3) the conviction that this God will establish his rule of holiness and righteousness upon earth—the kingdom of God (see pp. 158–64).

The intertestamental period causes little change in the essential character of the idea of God; but some of the more basic and inherent elements in the God concept are elaborated in some details, and descriptions are expanded as well as multiplied. One of the more striking features of the intertestamental literature is the great number of titles or names ascribed to God. The names applied to God in the O.T. are comparatively few in number, though in the later post-exilic writings a tendency to increase the number may be noted. The intertestamental writings furnish nearly one hundred divine titles and names. The succeeding paragraphs give a summary of the facts presented in the three groups of writings to be examined: (1) the non-apocalyptic books of Palestinian origin; (2) the apocalyptic books originating in Palestine; and (3) the literature of the Dispersion.

The Idea of God in Palestinian Non-Apocalyptic Writings. In this group of books Ecclesiasticus furnishes the best example of the enlargement and development of typical O.T. concepts. The author is a patriotic and loyal Jew and continues the best traditions of his race. He stresses the oneness of God, his eternal existence, his unlimited knowledge and wisdom, and his great power manifesting itself in the control of the world and the affairs of men. God is interested in all men, but he holds Israel as the chief object of his love and concern. The Book of Judith enjoins strict obedience to the Law as the main approach to God. Israel is God's own folk, and no matter how desperate their need, God always arises to the defense of his people. He uses the weak things of the earth to confuse the mighty. In Jubilees the Israelites are represented to be God's children. Only in a few places he is pictured as God of all men (128 22^{10f.} 30¹⁹). The name of the Deity does not appear in 1 Maccabees, though there are several references to the protecting power of heaven. Most of the literature in this group is highly particularistic, though the universalistic note is not entirely absent.

The Idea of God in Palestinian Apocalyptic Literature. The apocalyptic literature presents the most noteworthy developments in the conception of God. Frequently the rich imagery and symbolism have obscured the real meaning and purpose of apocalyptic literature; and much of this formal and external element seems fantastic and unreal; but when we hold in mind that this literature was the product of the lay minds of Judaism, and that it represents a cross-section of popular belief, we may be able to appreciate the fact that even these fantastic expressions represent legitimate attempts to rationalize the world and God's relation to it. The vision or picture element served to make real and impressive the power of God.

The numerous pictures of God's heavenly court, with its angels, archangels and the entire heavenly host, tend to display his glory and power. Many have looked upon this idea of a heavenly court as an intrusion from Persia; it is much more probable, however, that we are dealing here with a natural Jewish development, an attempt to display the glory, majesty, and power of God by picturing the extent and splendor of his court, and placing at his disposal multitudes of messengers and other helpers to assist him in governing the universe. Most people tend to describe superhuman realms in terms of their own social order. The typical political organization of the intertestamental period was the monarchy, the power of which was centered in the person of the ruler, whose power was gauged by the size and magnificence of his court and the number of his court attendants. Nearest to him stood his prime ministers, followed in order by officers of lower ranks to the most lowly attendant. In apocalyptic literature we have God represented as a King of great glory and majesty; archangels play the rôle of prime ministers, to whom only matters of supreme importance are intrusted. In addition to the archangels the heavenly court includes numerous angels of a lesser rank, down to the unnumbered myriads of heavenly attendants and ministers.

God's unlimited wisdom and knowledge are repeatedly emphasized. His knowledge is unlimited; he alone knows the end of the age; he knows all the secret and hidden things of men. His knowledge is so great that he knows the number of all the raindrops in the world. Much of this detail is an enlargement of O.T. ideas, especially as expressed in Isa. 40–55, where God is conceived as measuring or spanning every detail of the heavens. God's intimate knowledge of the world is always emphasized in apocalyptic literature for the purpose of showing that his concern for the most insignificant problems of mankind is of truly practical value and significance.

Perhaps the most suggestive contribution of apocalyptic literature consists in its reconciliation of present persecution and disaster with a belief in the power and righteousness of God. Apocalyptic writers considered their own age as hopeless; an age in which the power of God is temporarily withheld; during which many forces are arrayed against God and his people; demons and Satans are abroad and there is little to restrain them; the pride and arrogance of the wicked and apostates are unchecked; the domination and power of the Gentiles are in the ascendancy. How can such condition exist if God is a God of righteousness and power? The problem was very real; and in order to give encouragement and inspire hope the apocalyptic writers constantly emphasized the activities of God in the past, and promised that he would do even greater things in the immediate future. The wonders of creation, the guidance and protection of his chosen people, acts of special divine intervention and great miracles are stressed as manifestations of God. Moreover, when the people sinned he revealed the same power by sending some great disaster as punishment for sin. The current age of sin will come to an end in a terrible world judgment; and as soon as it has accomplished its purpose God's rule or kingdom will come and even greater wonders will be performed. Thus the sinner will be punished, and the saint who maintains his faith in the hour of persecution and suffering will find his reward.

Some students of Judaism have characterized the above view as a species of dualism; some have even called it deism. Both designations fall short of the truth, for nothing was so foreign to the Jewish mind of these centuries as the idea of a God who at any time is incapable of carrying out his purpose. There might, indeed, be periods when he would not interfere in the affairs of men, but even then they believed that he was active in the universe, maintaining the natural course of events. And even though Satan was considered the Prince of this world, and the demons were thought to be working the ruin of men, they were subordinate to God, and with the coming of the final Judgment they would be punished and banished from the world.

The tendencies toward universalism, on the one hand, and particularism on the other, found in the O.T. reappear in the apocalyptic writings. Most of the latter are decidedly particularistic. In Daniel all the hostile nations are destroyed. The same is true in Enoch 91f.; 1-36; and 83-90. In Enoch 94¹⁰ God is pictured as rejoicing over the destruction of the wicked. Only in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs are there pronounced evidences of universalism: all the Gentiles are to be saved; Israel with its Law is to be the medium of their salvation. To illustrate God's concern for some individuals among the Gentiles, it is stated that in the final Judgment Israel is to be judged by the best of the Gentiles.

The Idea of God in the Literature of the Dispersion. The idea of God in the literature of the Dispersion offers some striking contrasts to the orthodox position of Palestinian Judaism. There are far greater tendencies toward universalism; miracles and acts of divine intervention are numerous (cf. 2 and 3 Maccabees). Moreover, definite attempts are made in the direction of a synthesis of Greek and Jewish ideas, a synthesis wherein the basic principles of Jewish thought are retained and harmonized with Greek ideas and in some instances proven to antedate Greek thought. Both Philo and the Wisdom of Solomon retain belief in a personal God, although at times they approach pantheism. The motive of these writers in making a combination of Jewish and Greek thought was to combat the materialistic tendencies in Hellenistic life and culture and to furnish to their countrymen in the Dispersion a religious basis for everyday living. In the Wisdom of Solomon God is a creative force creating the world out of formless matter (11¹⁷); he does not work alone, for Wisdom, a personified force, labors with him. 2 Enoch 24² speaks of the earth being created out of nothing. The influence of Greek thought is seen in the Wisdom of Solomon 13³, where God is called the author of beauty. The same book gives some fine examples of God's mercy and graciousness (4¹⁵ 12¹³).

THE IDEA OF MAN

The O.T. is not very explicit in its conceptions of the nature of man, its point of focus being, not man and God, but first God and his requirements and then man. In other words, the O.T. is theocentric rather than anthropocentric. According to the earliest records man consists of two elements, body and soul (Hebrew nephesh); soul and spirit (Hebrew ruach) are not differentiated. In later records, a third element is added, so that man is thought of as having body, soul, and spirit. All the component parts of man's being in either the twofold or the threefold conception are needed to make a complete personality. Under the sway of the threefold concept, when a man died his body remained in the grave, his soul as a bearer of at least a portion of the personality went to Sheol, and his spirit went back to God. (While this may be regarded as the most systematically developed concept it is by no means consistently held even in the later writings.)

The Idea of Man in the Palestinian Literature. Comparatively few changes are made in the O.T. concept of man in the Palestinian literature of the intertestamental period. There seems to be a return to the older twofold concept, for in apocalyptic literature, especially, the spirit is mentioned more often than the soul as dwelling in Sheol. Thus the soul and the spirit are represented as bearers of the personality to Sheol. The significance of the change is readily seen in connection with the question as to the possibility of a return of the spirit part of man to the body, which is implied in the early ideas of the resurrection of the body. Man's personality, even though subject to the experiences of death and Sheol, lives on forever. This applies to the righteous and the wicked; there is no idea of total annihilation.

The Book of Ecclesiasticus (17^{1f.}) explains or enlarges the thought in Gen. 12⁶, which refers to man made in the image of God. (It seems rather odd that this term "image" is restricted to so few passages in Genesis.) God has endowed man with a mind and a heart and many other priceless gifts; but the supreme evidence of man's likeness to God is seen in his power to control nature.

The Idea of Man in the Literature of the Dispersion. Greater deviations from the O.T. idea of man are found in the literature of the Dispersion. Insistence on the pre-existence of the soul is the first and most radical departure from the Palestinian view (Wisdom 8¹⁹, 20). Man is made up of the body and this pre-existent soul, a kind of dualism foreign to the O.T. and the Palestinian intertestamental literature. The soul is immortal and is loaned temporarily to the body, which in some passages is thought of as a hindrance (15⁸ 223 31). Philo turns the Genesis story into an allegory, with these same dualistic tendencies interwoven. The most natural result of this Greek-Platonic idea of the pre-existence of the soul is that the Jews of the Dispersion abandoned the Palestinian concept of the resurrection. According to the Wisdom of Solomon, the soul enters directly into eternal life at the time of death; thus the need for an intermediate state for the soul disappears. 2 Enoch 23⁵ contains another reference to the pre-existence of the soul; 4 Maccabees 18²³ refers to the immortality of the soul, and further implies the pre-existence of good and bad souls.

Josephus asserts that the Essenes believed in the pre-existence of the soul; whether they did or not, the idea was adopted by the later rabbinic writers.

In 2 Enoch the souls of men are created before the creation of the world, and at the same time future abodes for each soul, good or bad, are prepared (23⁵, 49²). Wisdom is the creator of men out of seven substances (30⁸); flesh from the earth, blood from the dew, eyes from the sun, bones from stone, intelligence from angels and clouds, veins from grass, and souls from God and wind. The Hebrew designation of man, adam, is derived from the names of the four angels or stars guarding the four corners of the earth (30¹³). Man possesses free will, but the limitations of the body force the majority of men to choose evil instead of good. Death is the fruit of sin.

The fall of man is referred to again and again and certain theological implications are stressed, but it does not yet assume the position of a fully developed dogma. The story in Genesis is very simple: Adam and Eve disobey, and then they are expelled from the Garden of Eden; certain penalties followed; e.g., labor for food, pains of childbirth, thorns in the field and enmity between the seed of the woman and that of the serpent. (It is of interest to note that some of the penalties fall on nature.) There is no mention of any demonic incitement, no identification of the devil with the serpent; nor is there any hint of an hereditary tendency to evil being handed down to the race.

The Book of Jubilees carries over the Genesis story almost intact, with one exception, namely, Jubilees states that as a part of the punishment the animals were deprived of speech; which implies that prior to the Fall the animals talked like men. The first identification of the devil with the serpent appears in Wisdom of Solomon 22⁴; in other places the fall of man is traced to the evil communicated to men by the fallen angels (Enoch 69¹¹ 2 Enoch 31³). Man was righteous and immortal before he listened to the evil counsel of the fallen angels. A great number of penalties due to the Fall are specified in 2 Baruch 56^{6f.}, such as death, trouble, pain, sorrow, disease, sexual passions, birth of children, humiliation of mankind, and the extinction of goodness; the hereditary tendency to sin starts with the transgression of Adam and affects all mankind. The clearest statements in regard to this fact are found in 2 Baruch and 4 Ezra.

There are a number of references to the origin of sin. Ben Sira in Ecclesiasticus denies that it originated with God (15^{11f.}), but implies in another verse (14) that God implanted in Adam an "inclination" (yetzter). This might mean that God created evil, as later rabbinic writers claim that the evil "inclination" was the older of the two inclinations in man. As a matter of fact, Ben Sira's ideas of the origin of sin are by no means consistent; in one place its origin is traced to Eve's transgression (25²⁴) and in another place it is traceable to each man's own choice (21^{27f.}). Enoch 1-36 and Jubilees trace the origin of sin back to the Flood, when the fallen angels lusted after the daughters of men. Later sections of Enoch imply a rebellion in the heavens before the creation of the world. Several first century B.C. writings trace the beginnings of sin to the transgression of Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden (Wisdom 22⁴ Enoch 69^{6f.} 2 Enoch 313). In 2 Baruch the origin of sin is traced to Adam's transgression, and it is stated that certain penalties are handed down to his descendants. 3 Baruch pictures Sammael, another name for Satan, as planting a vine—interpreted as the forbidden tree—in the Garden of Eden and deceiving Adam (48). 4 Ezra places the origin of sin in the heart of Adam; the moment Adam yielded to temptation there was planted in his heart an evil heart (cor malignum); as a result there was introduced into the race an hereditary tendency to sin. All the evils of the world are traceable to this original sin of Adam (321f. 430).

TEACHING CONCERNING ANGELS

Angels, conceived as intermediary beings, play a relatively small part in the O.T. In the pre-exilic sections the "angel of Jehovah" is not a being distinct from Jehovah, but closely associated, if not identical with him; indeed, most of the appearances of the "angel of Jehovah" are theophanies. In the post-exilic portions, with Ezekiel and Zechariah marking the transition, angels become distinct from Jehovah and act as mediums of revelation and interpreters. The earlier prophets received their revelations direct from God and had no need for these interpreters; during the later period the sense of direct and immediate contact with God became obscured and greater stress was laid on the activity of mediators. In general, angels in the O.T., even after they become distinct from Jehovah, are non-personal and rather undefined beings possessing no moral character. The references to angels are confined to small sections of the post-exilic literature; the most developed conception of angels appears in the apocalyptic book of Daniel, where ranks among angels are recognized; the patron angels of Israel and other nations are mentioned, and a personal name, Michael, is given to the "prince" of Israel.

The general absence of a developed angelology in much of the O.T. is traceable to a rigid application of monotheism, which excluded the idea and function of intermediate divine or semi-divine agencies. Some of the intertestamental literature follows the general O.T. practice of making few or no references to angels. There are, for instance, no references to angels in Ecclesiasticus, 1 Maccabees, Wisdom of Solomon, and in other parts of the Apocrypha proper. The greater number of references to angels are in apocalyptic literature.

The appearance of a well-defined angelology in this period is due in part to the tendency of removing God more and more from direct contact with men, of stressing the divine transcendence and, in part, to a desire on the part of men to make real and vivid the power of God by picturing the resplendent glory of God's attendant retinue. Possibly also the matter of God's power as related to the manifold greater and lesser processes of natural phenomena hastened the differentiation of function and the personalization of forces. The primary function of angels was to display the glory of God; the more numerous and powerful the heavenly courtiers, and the larger the armies and legions of angels, the more convincing the evidence of the power of God. Many of the more powerful angels attain to personality and specialized functions, but myriads of them remain undefined and non-personal.

The Book of Jubilees traces the origin of angels to the first day of creation. 2 Enoch traces it to the second day, while other books assume a pre-existent state for angels. Later rabbinic tradition, in harmony with 2 Enoch, traces their origin to the second day of creation. In one place they are said to be made out of fire (2 Enoch 291^{f.}). All the angels, except the two highest orders, are inferior to men.

Angels are designated by a great variety of names and are arranged in a number of significant groups. The most general names are Sons of Heaven, Sons of God, Holy Ones, Watchers, Angels of the Presence, and Angels of Sanctification; in some of the dream visions they are called stars. The smallest group, four in number, is the order of the Angels of the Presence; it consists of four archangels, namely, Michael, Raphael, Gabriel, and Phanuel. (In one list Uriel is found in place of Phanuel.) Another group consists of seven archangels, namely, Uriel, Raguel, Michael, Saraquel, Gabriel, Raphael, and Remiel.

Mention is made also of a group of twelve and a group of seventy; this latter group is an order of patron angels of the nations, based on the seventy years of Jeremiah and the later reference in Daniel. Organized under the leadership of these higher orders of angels are the great hosts and armies of angels, which form an unnumbered multitude.

The various personal functions of the arch-angels are worthy of note. Michael occupies the highest position. As the special patron angel of Israel (cf. Dan. 10¹³), he rules over the best of men and Chaos, and is the giver of mercy and loving-kindness. Gabriel sits at the left-hand of God, presides over Paradise, the serpents, and the cherubim. Uriel is the keeper of the heavens and the starry hosts and presides over Tartarus. Raphael is the angel of healing. Remiel, probably the same as Jeremiel, presides over the souls of men or, more specifically, the treasures of the dead, those awaiting the resurrection and the final Judgment. Saraquel (Sariel) is placed over those who sin in the spirit. Phanuel is in charge of the repentance of men.

The character and functions of angels are described in great detail. Angels are regarded as beneficent creatures, closely related to men, and bearing many of the physical and mental characteristics of men; they possess high moral character, but carry certain limitations in knowledge. Their primary functions are to display the glory and power of God and at all times to praise and magnify his majesty. Other general duties are to act as messengers and interpreters of the will of God to men. In the distant past they acted as media of revelation, mediating the Law, considered as pre-existent, to men (cf. Gal. 3¹⁹). They convey the prayers of men to God, and in some instances they keep records of the good and bad deeds of men; they intercede at the throne of God for men (cf. especially 3 Baruch). All nations have special patron angels, Israel being especially favored in having the highest archangel, Michael, as its patron angel. All righteous Israelites have individual guardian angels; an idea which first appears in the Book of Jubilees (35¹⁷ cf. Mt. 18¹⁰). All cosmic forces and events are under the control of a lower type of angels, angels of natural phenomena, like wind, rain, fire, snow, frost, etc. These angels of natural phenomena do not keep the Sabbath, as the processes of nature must be carried on at all times (Jubilees 22^f; cf. Rev. 7^{1f}. 14¹⁸ 16⁵).

TEACHING CONCERNING DEMONS

In early Semitic religion God was conceived as the prime mover in all unusual events, everything that could not be explained as due to the activity of man, whether it was morally good or bad, was traced to direct divine interference. As time went on and the God concept became increasingly spiritualized and ethicized, it came to be felt that occurrences of a questionable or immoral nature could not be credited to Jehovah; hence a tendency arose to impose responsibility for such things upon other agencies. This tendency, of course, developed slowly, and the earliest references to "evil spirits" associate such spirits rather closely with Jehovah himself (1 Sam. 19 1 Kings 22¹⁹⁻²³).

Strictly speaking the O.T. is without a demonology, i.e., a systematized doctrine of evil spirits. There are only three sets of references to Satan as a separate and distinct personality in the entire O.T. In Zechariah (3¹), 520 B.C., he appears as subordinate to God and easily disposed of, with no independent control over evil. In the prose sections of Job (16^f), 450 B.C., he is introduced as a member of the court of Jehovah, who is commissioned by Jehovah to test Job within certain limits fixed by Jehovah; the Satan has no power not committed to him by Jehovah. Only in First Chronicles (21¹; cir. 300 B.C.), does Satan use the power of temptation apart from Jehovah, and only here is he opposed to the will and purpose of Jehovah (but cf. 2 Sam. 24¹).

The demonology of the intertestamental period is closely associated with the question of the fall of some of the angels from heaven. The stories of this event are not in agreement as to the time, place, or manner of the fall. Enoch 6^{1f}, which gives an enlargement of the story in Gen. 6^{1f}, places the incident just prior to the Flood, when a band of two hundred angels under the leadership of Semjaza came to earth, lusted after the daughters of men, and raised up from their union with the earth women several races of giants. The fallen angels instructed men in all sorts of evils; and when the giants died their disembodied spirits became the evil spirits or demons. In Jubilees 4 and 5 the angels are sent to earth to instruct men in the ways of righteousness, but while on earth they lusted after the daughters of men. The same results followed. According to a variant of the story in Enoch 69 and 2 Enoch 18 a few leaders of the angelic court started a rebellion in heaven before the creation of man; then, when man was created they acted as the agents of his temptation and downfall. In every case the fallen angels are represented as imprisoned, subject to some preliminary judgments and awaiting the final Judgment.

The greater part of the intertestamental literature presents, or at least assumes, the existence of a kingdom of evil spirits opposed to the kingdom headed by God. This counter kingdom is composed principally of evil spirits or demons, the disembodied spirits of the giants, who were the offspring of the fallen angels and human women. The ruling demons are designated as Satans, who, according to references in the later literature, were in existence as evil agencies even before the fall of the angels. The entire kingdom of demons is ruled by a chief demon, to whom at different times different names are given. The most important of these names or titles are Satan, Devil, Prince, Asmodeus, Mastema, and Beliar. The special domain of this counter kingdom of evil spirits is the earth and the air above the earth (cf. Eph. 2²). The power of the demons over the earth and its inhabitants is almost complete, at least for a limited period.

The most significant contribution toward a better understanding of intertestamental demonology is made by the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. There the evil things in human experience, such as envy, lust, anger, hatred, lying, adultery, and fornication, are all conceived as personal evil spirits, frequently called spirits of deceit. The various sins of men are traceable to incitement by these ever-present evil spirits. The righteous man is given a power to tread on these demons; and as long as he obeys the Law and remains watchful he is enabled to ward off all their incitements. Beliar is the chief demon, in command of this kingdom of evil spirits. One of the principal functions of the Messiah will be to subdue Beliar and deliver the righteous from the possible temptations of the evil spirits.

The general functions of the demons are much the same throughout the entire intertestamental period. Their normal functions are to tempt, to accuse the fallen, and to torment the condemned. The first of the functions is stressed almost exclusively in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. They possess the power to reside in men, and more than one demon may possess a single individual (cf. Matt. 12⁴³⁻⁴⁵). Seduction is a special function of the demons, operative especially in the case of women. They report all evil of men, a function closely akin to one of the functions of the angels. Many of the bodily ills of men are traceable to the work of demons.

The final destiny of the demons is determined at the final Judgment. Until that time the earth is their sporting place, but in the final Judgment they will be punished and banished from the earth. Their rule of the earth and the air is an accompaniment of the evil age, but at the consummation of that age their rule comes to an end. Their punishment and torture will continue forever.

PRELIMINARY AND FINAL JUDGMENTS

The O.T. idea of the "Day of Jehovah" forms the basis for much of the later thought of a final Judgment or judgments. The origin of the Day of Jehovah is to be found in the old Semitic conception of a tribal god fighting for his people. During the preprophetic period this tribal view obtained and the people believed that on the Day of Jehovah their God would arise to destroy his enemies or the enemies of Israel and permanently exalt his own people. In other words, the Day of Jehovah was expected to bring a vindication of Israel irrespective of moral character or conduct. In the hands of the prophets this conception underwent a radical change; they lifted the idea into the moral realm, and insisted that while the day would bring the destruction of Jehovah's enemies and the exaltation of his friends, he must determine his friends as well as his enemies on the basis of moral, not racial considerations. Consequently, Israel, not meeting the ethical standards of Jehovah, must suffer punishment; the Day of Jehovah means its destruction, not its exaltation.

The Day of Jehovah is described as a day of terror and great dread, a day of punishment and judgment. Primarily, the day comes in order to punish a sinful people, but its results are to be felt by the entire world-order; there are to be great disturbances in the cosmic order; even the fish of the sea come under its drastic and far-reaching punishments. The time of its coming and its duration are by no means clear. Frequently the prophets saw in a threatened foreign invasion the harbinger of Jehovah's coming day. In some cases the Day of Jehovah is conceived as a great exhibition or demonstration of the divine power to the world at large. Finally, the day is expected to usher in a new world order, the rule of God which will last forever.

Many details of the O.T. conception of the Day of Jehovah are carried over intact into the intertestamental literature; there are, however, some rather marked changes, only the most significant of which can be noted here. According to Daniel, an apocalyptic book of the second century, which has found a place in the O.T. canon, there will be a preliminary judgment for which the sword will be given into the hands of the "saints of the Most High." This preliminary judgment will be followed by the final Judgment, which in turn will be succeeded by the eternal kingdom or rule of God on earth. Enoch 83-90 in sketching the entire history of the world interprets the great disasters of the past (for instance, the Flood and the Babylonian Exile) as a series of world judgments; the writer's own age is about to close with the final Judgment, which will mark the conclusion of the cycle of world judgments. The Book of Jubilees introduces as the first step a series of Messianic woes or signs (ch. 23), which will be in the nature of preliminary judgments; then the kingdom of God, a kingdom of temporary duration, will be established; this will be followed by the final Judgment, and the eternal heavenly kingdom. In every book originating in this century, except in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, God is the sole agent of judgment; the Messiah has no share in it. The objects of the final Judgment are the hostile Gentiles, the fallen angels, the demons, and the apostate Jews.

There are two divergent views in the first century B.C.: (1) Enoch 37-71 looks upon the earth as too wicked to become the locus of the kingdom of God; hence the author promises a complete renewal of heaven and earth. The final Judgment is to be a great exhibition of God's power and will usher in this new world order. God himself will be the supreme judge, but he will place most of the actual work involved in the judgment in the hands of the divine Messiah. The fallen angels, the kings and the mighty ones, and the wicked Israelites are the particular objects of God's wrath. The new heaven and the new earth will endure forever. (2) The Psalms of Solomon present the second view, which looks for a temporary kingdom similar to that described in Jubilees. All hostile Gentile nations are destroyed; the remaining Gentiles are converted and made to perform the menial tasks of the kingdom. The agents of these preliminary judgments are God and the Messiah. The final Judgment comes at the close of the temporary kingdom, and precedes the ushering in of the heavenly kingdom. No time limit is fixed for the duration of the earthly kingdom. Possibly it was to last only during the lifetime of the Messiah.

The literature of the first century A.D. fixes a definite time limit for the temporary kingdom. 2 Enoch limits it to a millennium, i.e., a thousand years, and 4 Ezra limits it to four hundred years. In each one of these two cases the final Judgment comes at the close of the temporary kingdom and preceding the eternal age to come. In some of the sections in 2 Baruch, written after the Fall of Jerusalem in 70 A.D., where the temporary kingdom is abandoned altogether, the final Judgment comes at the end of the age of corruptibility and ushers in an eternal age of incorruptibility. Only in rare instances in the literature of this century does the Messiah function as an agent in the final Judgment.

The most significant contribution of the first century A.D. to the idea of final Judgment is the introduction of a series of Messianic woes or signs. The sufferings and persecution endured by the Jews during this century may account for their presence. The Assumption of Moses presents a series of signs or travail pains of the new age, such as earthquakes, the turning of the moon into blood, the darkening of the sun, the retirement of the seas into the abyss, and disturbances of the orderly course of the stars (103^{f.}). 2 Baruch divides these travail pains, indicating the coming of a new age, into twelve groups. The principal ones are wars, assassination of kings, death, famine, earthquakes, fall of fire, rape, unchastity. The climax is reached in the twelfth woe, wherein all the preceding woes are mingled together (27, 703^{f.}). Another vivid description is found in 4 Ezra 5. The signs preceding the new age will be: lack of truth and faith, great increase in iniquity, the sun and the moon will be moved out of their natural order, general disturbances in all the orderly processes of nature, great wars, women will bear monsters, children will be born prematurely, and wisdom will hide itself (cf. Matt. 24).

THE KINGDOM OF GOD

"Kingdom of God" is a term applied to the ideal future which the O.T. prophets expected soon to become a reality. During that age the will and purpose of God would be supreme; it would be, in a true sense, a theocracy; and conditions in the kingdom would be an expression of the character of God himself. Its seat is to be upon the earth, with Palestine as its center and Jerusalem its capital. The kingdom will continue forever, but this does not necessarily imply that individual members will enjoy eternal life; successive generations will guarantee the continued existence of the kingdom—a national immortality. The Messiah appears in only a few instances, and bears no organic connection with the kingdom. The glories of this kingdom consist in large part of external prosperity: e.g., the dispersed Israelites return to Palestine; the Temple is to be rebuilt; the Temple area is to be the center of a new fruitfulness; the whole land is to be well watered and the waste places restored to fertility like that which blessed the garden of Eden; animals of all kinds are to forget their fierce and savage habits and become the friends of men. Men are to enjoy the right of personal property and all kinds of material blessings will be theirs.

It would be a mistake, however, to think of the blessings as only material and external. There are also rich spiritual gifts anticipated. To begin with, admission to the kingdom depends upon proper spiritual qualifications—intimate personal relationship with God; sin has no place in the kingdom and consequently will be destroyed; it will be a kingdom of joy because the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of the citizens will be realized; there will be peace not only between God and man, but also between man and man, and between man and the animal world. And all these blessings will become possible because God himself will dwell in the midst of his people.

The second century B.C. literature retains many of these O.T. conceptions. The materialistic aspect of the blessings is highly elaborated. The members of the kingdom are to live for a thousand years and beget a thousand children; the restored fertility of the soil will be such that the yield of all fruits and grains will be ten thousand fold; every vine will have a thousand branches, every branch a thousand clusters, and every cluster a thousand grapes. Israel is at the center of the kingdom, with only very few Gentiles being admitted; even in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, where the salvation of the Gentile is clearly asserted, he is subordinate to Israel. Throughout the century the kingdom is expected to be eternal. The Messiah is absent, except as he may be seen in the person of a contemporary ruler, for instance, John Hyrcanus.

Two new features are introduced in this century: (1) In Enoch 90^{28f.} the old Temple is folded up and carried away with its pillars and its ornaments; then God brings a new and much larger Temple, with new pillars and ornaments, and sets it up on the old Temple site. (2) The second feature of great interest is furnished by the Book of Jubilees (ch. 23). The advent of the kingdom is preceded by a series of woes, or signs; then the kingdom comes in gradually, by a slow and general repentance of the Israelites. For the first time in Jewish literature the kingdom is represented as temporary, with the final Judgment coming at its close. This marks the first breakdown in the idea found throughout the O.T. and the earliest intertestamental literature of an eternal earthly kingdom of God. Undoubtedly, the change is due to the growing belief that the earth is no longer a fit place for an eternal kingdom. This temporary kingdom will experience a reign of peace and joy, for Satan is to be banished; there will be no old men, all will appear young and live for a thousand years. There are no indications as to the length of duration of this temporary kingdom. Following the final Judgment an eternal age will begin, but details of description are wanting.

The literature of the first century B.C. presents some additional changes in the conception of the kingdom. In Enoch 37-71 the kingdom is eternal, but its establishment is preceded by a complete transformation of heaven and earth. The members of the kingdom are the righteous Israelites, who are resurrected and given transformed bodies; they will live forever, growing and developing all the time. In Enoch 91f. the earthly kingdom is retained, but it is considered temporary; it is designated as the eighth week in the world's history, wherein the wicked are delivered over to the righteous; an idea which may be based on the announcement in Daniel regarding a preliminary judgment by the saints of the Most High. The Psalms of Solomon (ch. 17) furnish another example of a temporary kingdom conceived from a decidedly particularistic point of view. The hostile Gentiles are to be destroyed, those who repent are to be saved to perform the menial tasks of the kingdom. In the latter passage the Messiah first appears in connection with a temporary kingdom. Neither passage fixes the exact duration of the earthly kingdom. The final Judgment comes at the close of the temporary kingdom, and will be followed by an eternal age that will bring rewards to the righteous and punishments to the wicked.

More significant changes in the concepts of the kingdom are introduced in the literature of the first century A.D. The writer of the Assumption of Moses, a contemporary of Jesus, announces that the kingdom will be established without fail 1750 years after the death of Moses; its advent is to be preceded by a period of repentance and a series of woes or signs. The earthly kingdom, which is to be temporary, no longer claims supreme attention; the point of emphasis is shifting to the eternal, heavenly age of blessedness. There is no mention of a Messiah, God being the sole agent of punishment and judgment. 2 Enoch, in accordance with the idea of God creating the earth in six days and resting on the seventh day, arranges the entire history of the world in six periods of a thousand years each, giving a total of six thousand years; the seventh period of a thousand years will be a period of rest, which is the kingdom of God. In other words, we have here a temporary kingdom of one thousand years (33^{1f.}). At the close of the temporary kingdom there is to be an eighth period, with no limit in time, an eternal age. This is the only reference in the Jewish literature of the intertestamental period to a temporary earthly kingdom of one thousand years' duration. The origin of the conception may be traced to the idea that a day in the sight of the Lord is as a thousand years (2 Pet. 3⁸; cf. Psa. 90⁴.)

The books of 2 Baruch and 4 Ezra furnish other interesting ideas concerning the kingdom. 2 Baruch considers his own age as an age of corruption, to be followed by an eternal age of incorruption, the interval between the two being bridged by an earthly kingdom of temporary duration; which, however, is reckoned a part of the age of corruption. It is a period of triumph over the enemies of Israel; in a few instances the Messiah plays an active part in the punishments inflicted upon the latter. In one part of the book the earthly kingdom is abandoned altogether; the resurrection of the righteous is directly to the glories of the eternal age. The original portions of 4 Ezra (chs. 3-10) seem to abandon the age-long hope of Israel for a kingdom of God on this earth. The present age of corruption will be brought to an end by means of a great cataclysm, which is a part of God's predetermined plan for the world; the time of its coming is known to no one but God himself. It is useless for man or angel to make any effort to understand the end of the age. The editorial additions to these chapters present a different view: The end of the present age is announced by a period of woes or signs; then the Messiah will come; his advent will usher in a temporary kingdom of four hundred years; at the close of this kingdom all men, including the Messiah, will die and the earth revert to a period of silence for seven days; then the eternal and incorruptible age will appear. (The limitation of the temporary kingdom to four hundred years is intended to offset the four hundred years of the Egyptian bondage.)

WORK AND CHARACTER OF THE MESSIAH

In the O.T. the term "Messiah" is most commonly used of a contemporary or future king of Israel; once it is applied to a Persian ruler, namely, Cyrus. Whenever the term refers, as it often does, to an ideal king in the future, the latter is thought of as coming from the tribe of Judah and the dynasty of David; indeed, he is to be a second David; he will rule over the earthly kingdom of God; (but there are a number of passages describing the kingdom which make no mention of a Messianic ruler). As a representative of God he is endowed with superhuman powers (cf., especially, Isa. 9⁶, 7 11¹⁻⁵). For a fuller discussion of the entire subject, see the article, Israel's Messianic Hope, pp. 181-6.

The Messiah is rarely mentioned in the literature of the second century B.C. In Enoch 90 there is one reference to a Messiah, who is described as a human being coming from the nation Israel; he appears as a white bull, which is subsequently changed into a lamb with black horns (90^{37f.}); he does not come until after the final Judgment and is a purely passive figure. The only other references to a Messiah during the second century are in Jubilees and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. Jubilees 31^{18f.} refers to a Messiah from Judah; a contemporary ruler, John Hyrcanus, is to prepare the kingdom for this coming ruler; to the Messiah no special function is assigned.

The most important second century reference to a Messiah is found in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. The author evidently is a loyal supporter of the Maccabean dynasty, which traced its origin not to the tribe of Judah but to the tribe of Levi. The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs being written during the reign of John Hyrcanus, when the glory of the Maccabees was at its height, it is not strange that the author should connect the Messianic hope with John Hyrcanus and his predecessor, Simon. The Testaments, therefore, set aside the age-long hope of a Messiah springing from Judah and instead promise a Messiah of the tribe of Levi. The Testament of Levi (ch. 18) is a Messianic hymn in eulogy of John Hyrcanus (it is similar in part to Psa. 110, which is considered by many to be a hymn in praise of Simon Maccabeus), who is expected to be the founder of a Messianic dynasty from the priestly tribe of Levi. He is called Priest, Prophet, and King; he is to make war against the enemies of Israel, to oppose the power of Beliar and the demons, and to arise in the defense of the righteous; he is to act as a mediator to the Gentiles; he possesses meekness, righteousness and even freedom from sin; in the near future he is to open the gates of Paradise to the righteous, and to give them to eat of the Tree of Life. In the first century additions to the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, after the Maccabean leaders had broken with the Pharisees the hope of a Messiah springing from the tribe of Judah is revived. (Testament of Judah 24^{5f.}.)

The literature of the first century B.C. presents two of the most remarkable pictures of the Messiah. Enoch 37-71 presents the first description of a divine Messiah in the history of the Messianic hope. The Messiah is pre-existent, being in existence before the foundation of the world, and bears altogether divine and supernatural characteristics. He has four titles, Messiah, the Elect One, the Righteous One, and the Son of Man; all of which reappear in the N.T. His duties cover a wide range of activities: he is to play a prominent rôle in the final judgment, judging the kings and the mighty ones, the fallen angels and the wicked; he is to be the special defender and champion of the righteous; he possesses great power and great wisdom, which enable him to discern all the hidden and secret things of the world.

According to the Psalms of Solomon (17, 18) the Messiah is a human king from the tribe of Judah; in addition to Messiah he is called Son of David. His advent is to be preceded by great disasters, and it is known only to God himself; he is to be raised up by God and is to be known as his official representative. His mission is two-fold: (1) to destroy the hostile Gentiles and the sinners, i.e., the Romans and the Sadducees respectively; (2) to restore the dispersed tribes of Israel to Palestine. He is not a political and a warlike Messiah, for he relies on spiritual forces; holiness and freedom from sin are constantly stressed; he possesses great wisdom and a true sense of justice; his acts of judgment are always tempered with mercy. His subjects are called the sons of God.

The Messiah concepts of the first century A.D. reveal few changes. There is no Messiah in the Assumption of Moses, whose author is protesting against the political ambitions of the Pharisaic party; God alone avenges, judges, and rules his kingdom. A Messiah figure appears several times in the early sections of 2 Baruch. In one place he is revealed from heaven, following a series of Messianic woes or signs, and then returns to heaven. This implies that he was a divine or semi-divine being; no special function is assigned to him (293-301). In two other places he appears playing an active rôle in the punishment of the wicked (397f. 724f.); he personally convicts one of the Gentile leaders and puts him to death. In another place he gathers all the nations together in one great assize and kills all the hostile peoples that have oppressed Israel; the rest he spares. The Messiah is not mentioned in the late or pessimistic sections of 2 Baruch, nor in 2 Enoch.

The earliest sections of 4 Ezra contain no references to a Messiah; such references are found only in late passages and in editorial additions. As in 2 Baruch, the Messiah is revealed from heaven, but here he is accompanied by some immortal companions, most probably Enoch and Elijah. This heavenly or divine Messiah rules for the period of the temporary kingdom, a period of four hundred years; at its close he dies along with the rest of mankind (728f.). In 1232 is mentioned a Messiah who is pre-existent and of divine origin. (The latter part of the verse, which states that he will spring from the house of David, and thus implies an earthly Messiah, is probably a later addition.) The Man from the Sea Vision, the thirteenth chapter, presents a Messiah who is a divine being and uses certain supernatural means of destruction. His chief functions are to annihilate the hostile Gentiles, restore the lost tribes of Israel, and inaugurate a reign of peace. One other reference to a divine Messiah is found in 149, according to which Ezra takes up his final abode with the Son, the Messiah. Enoch is granted a similar privilege of transfer to one of the highest heavens (Enoch 701f.).

THE FUTURE LIFE

The Idea of Resurrection. The idea of resurrection cannot be treated apart from the question of life after death (see succeeding section). The prevailing view on life after death in the O.T. is that man after death enters Sheol, an underground compartment, far beyond the affairs of men and the control of God. There are no moral distinctions in Sheol, and man once there has no hope of escape. Beginning with the eighth-century prophets two developments in the general religious thinking of the Hebrews began to exert an influence on the thought concerning life after death: (1) The growth of monotheism was bound to influence the thought concerning the extent of the divine power. Could Sheol be outside of God's sphere? (2) The greater emphasis on individualism, beginning with Jeremiah and Ezekiel, brought to light troublesome inequalities of life; righteous men did not receive adequate reward in this life, and many wicked men did not receive their full share of punishment. Was there any time or place for the straightening out of these inequalities? If the God of the whole earth is a righteous God, must he not provide a way out of this difficulty?

There are few references to resurrection in the O.T. There are, however, some indications that, inspired by the problems referred to in the preceding paragraphs, some of the saints of Israel revolted against a life after death in which Sheol was the last word. They cried for escape from Sheol, so that their fellowship with Jehovah and the saints might continue without interruption (see especially Psa. 16, 17, 49, 73). In these passages the hope is not that the dead might be brought out of Sheol; but rather that the pious at the time of death might be taken to the dwelling place of God, without first entering Sheol. There are only two references to a resurrection of individuals: Isa. 26¹⁹—an apocalyptic section—speaks of the resurrection of pious Israelites, and Dan. 12², another apocalyptic passage, speaks of the resurrection of the Jewish martyrs and apostates, who will be raised so that they may receive adequate rewards and punishments. (Cf. p. 173.)

There are few references to resurrection in the entire body of intertestamental literature. Indeed, the references are so few that some students of the subject have raised the question as to whether the idea of a resurrection is an essentially Jewish product, or may not have been taken over from outsiders like the Persians. The earliest conceptions of individual resurrection expressed in the intertestamental literature are of a bodily resurrection. This idea of a bodily resurrection bears all the evidence of being indigenous to the Jewish mind. The chief motive for an escape from Sheol is a desire to return to earth and enjoy an uninterrupted communion with God and to take part in some of the physical joys and pleasures of the kingdom; also to witness the physical torments of the apostate Jews enduring punishment in the valley of Hinnom. To enter into all these experiences the body was necessary.

Practically all the references to resurrection in the literature of the second century B.C. speak of a resurrection of the body. Enoch 1-36 promises a bodily resurrection to all the righteous and some of the wicked in Israel. The righteous who are raised from the dead will share in the prosperity and glories of the kingdom of God, and at the same time they will have the satisfaction of witnessing the torments of the apostate Israelites in the valley of Hinnom or Gehenna. In Dan. 12² there is a bodily resurrection of some of the righteous and some of the wicked Israelites. The pre-eminently righteous are raised to receive some delayed rewards, and the pre-eminently wicked are raised to receive some of their long deserved punishments. According to Enoch 83-90 all the righteous Israelites will be raised; the wicked remain in Sheol. The late second-century books introduce some changes. Jubilees has a resurrection of the righteous spirits only. The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, a book with universalistic tendencies, announces that Israel and all mankind will be raised. The patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the twelve sons of Jacob are to be raised first, then the rest of mankind (Testament of Benjamin 10^{6f.}).

A variety of conception appears in the literature of the first century B.C. The first, carried over from the second century, looks for a bodily resurrection of the righteous Israelite only, a resurrection to eternal life in the kingdom of God (2 Maccabees). Another view finds expression in Enoch 91^{f.}, and the Psalms of Solomon, which promise a resurrection of the spirits of the righteous Israelites only. The Parables of Enoch 37-71 anticipate that all the righteous Israelites are to be raised and given transformed bodies, clothed in which they will enjoy eternal life in the new heaven and on the new earth. The wicked are raised to the final Judgment, which consigns them to eternal torture.

Similar diversity of opinion is found in the literature of the first century A.D.; sometimes one and the same book expresses more than one idea or gives other evidence of much uncertainty. The Assumption of Moses looks for a resurrection of the spirits of the righteous only, after the final Judgment. The righteous are then exalted to the heavens, whence they can look down and see the tortures of the wicked in Gehenna. 2 Enoch has no resurrection in a strict sense of the word, since the writer believes in the pre-existence of the soul. The righteous are gathered after the final Judgment and placed in the third heaven. According to 2 Baruch 30 only the righteous are raised; but according to 50^{f.} both the righteous and the wicked are raised in a bodily resurrection, so that the resurrected people will recognize one another. After the final Judgment the righteous will be transformed and will become increasingly beautiful, while the wicked will become more and more ugly. In the earliest sections of 4 Ezra, the writer sets forth the view that the body is corruptible, and that the material of which the body consists is annihilated at death. An obscure passage (8^{38f.}) seems to imply a resurrection of the righteous only at the time of death. The later redactions of 4 Ezra introduce the idea of a first and second resurrection. In the first resurrection, at the beginning of the temporary kingdom of four hundred years, the Messiah and his companions, Enoch and Elijah, will appear (7^{28f.}). Seven days after the close of the temporary kingdom there is to be a general bodily resurrection of all mankind, Israelite and Gentile, good and bad.

Life After Death. The O.T. idea of life after death is similar to that which is found among the Babylonians and other ancient peoples.

The final abode of departed men is Sheol, a dark and dismal subterranean cavern, a land of shades and a land of no return; social distinctions obtain, but there are no moral distinctions; nor is Sheol a place of reward or punishment, for rewards and punishments are meted out to men before they die. Men in Sheol are cut off from the world of the living and are beyond the control of God.

Much of this early view is carried over into the intertestamental literature. For instance, to the writer of Ecclesiasticus the only hope of man beyond this life was to leave behind him a good family name and a line of stalwart sons to perpetuate the family traditions. Sheol is the final abode of all men, a land of no reproaches, a land of no delight, and wholly apart from happenings on earth and from God. Some of the later additions to the book introduce into the idea of Sheol an element of punishment and moral distinction. Essentially the same view appears in Tobit, the Psalms of Solomon, 2 Baruch, etc.

The first evidence of the moralization of Sheol appears in Enoch 22, with its threefold division of Sheol. Two factors contributed to the creation of moral distinctions in Sheol: (1) the making of some provision for meting out reward and punishment after death; (2) the desire on the part of pious Israelites to be permitted after death to return to earth and share in a renewed communion with God and the fellowship of the restored nation. Two of the three divisions mentioned in Enoch 22 serve as intermediate abodes, one for the righteous Israelites, and one for those wicked Israelites who did not receive adequate punishment on earth. The third division serves as the final dwelling place of all the other wicked persons. The two groups in the intermediate abodes will remain there until they participate in the bodily resurrection that will bring them back to earth, in order that they may receive their rewards until then denied, or their deserved punishments. In some of the books Sheol becomes an intermediate state for all the Israelites; then after the resurrection and the final Judgment the wicked are returned to Sheol for eternal torment of fire, while the righteous are assigned to heaven. In still other writings Sheol becomes only a place of fire and torment, and the final abode for the wicked.

The concept of Gehenna is closely connected with the moralization of Sheol. The term "Gehenna" originally referred to the valley of Hinnom, located south of the walls of Jerusalem. In ancient times refuse was burned there, and later Moloch worship was practiced in that locality. Because of the uncleanness of the place and its heathen association it is used in the intertestamental literature as a place of uncleanness, horror and punishment. In Enoch it is the scene of the bodily and spiritual punishment of the apostate Jews, in the presence of the righteous. Later it becomes a place of spiritual punishment alone. When Sheol becomes a place of fire, Gehenna is no longer associated with a location on the surface of the earth, but becomes practically synonymous with Sheol or comes to denote the place of hottest fire in Sheol.

Not all punishment is confined to Sheol and Gehenna. There is mention of a place of punishment in the third heaven: the northern part is a terrible place of torture; the southern part, separated from the northern part by a gulf, is Paradise (see next paragraph). The fallen angels are confined and punished in one of the other heavens; Tartarus is an intermediate place of punishment for the faithless angels; while the Abyss of fire is their final place of punishment.

The introduction of the idea of reward and punishment following the resurrection and the transformation of Sheol into the final abode of the wicked necessitated the finding of a final dwelling place for the righteous. This place is called Paradise in the intertestamental literature. The term as applied to the Garden of Eden is not found in the O.T.; it first appears with this meaning in the LXX translation of the O.T. Paradise in this sense is used also in the intertestamental literature. Enoch visits Paradise (=Garden of Eden) in his travels in the east (32³); in other places Paradise is located in the north and in the northwest. These earthly locations of Paradise were soon abandoned. In some passages it is located in the third heaven (2 Enoch 81; cf. 2 Cor. 122¹); there is also some evidence that for a time it was associated with Sheol (Enoch 22, 4 Ezra 748-56; cf. 1 Pet. 3118¹). The place is pictured as a garden, which contains the Tree of Life. One of the chief functions of the Messiah will be to open Paradise to the righteous, and to give to them the privilege of eating from the Tree of Life. In some passages Paradise is mentioned as an intermediate place for the righteous, but in later literature it appears uniformly as the final abode of the righteous, where they enjoy an eternal life of joy, peace, and freedom from all the sorrows of earth.

The Jewish literature of the Dispersion presents some interesting points of contrast as compared with the Palestinian views of life after death. The Jews of the Dispersion, under the influence of the Greek idea of the immortality of the soul, practically omitted the time quality from their eschatology.

They saw little need for a final Judgment, for they thought of judgment as immediate and self-executing. The soul was pre-existent, living only for a short time in the body; the body was evil and proved a hindrance to the soul; death meant the immediate release of the soul from the evil body to eternal life; there was no need of an intermediate state or a resurrection. There seems to be a slight trace of this in Jubilees 23³¹, where the bodies of men rest and their spirits rise. In 2 Baruch there is an immediate transference of the resurrected righteous spirits to the new age, without any thought of a kingdom of God on earth; a fine example of the eschatology of the individual totally divorced from the eschatology of the nation. (See further, art., Backgrounds, pp. 843-7.)

Literature: Porter, Messages of the Apocalyptic Writers; Charles, A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life in Israel, Judaism and Christianity; Charles, Religious Development between the Old and the New Testaments; Walker, Teaching of Jesus and the Jewish Teaching of His Age; Leckie, World to Come and Final Destiny.

For notes and comments on the different books, consult The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the O.T. in English, edited by Charles.

III. COMMENTARY ON THE BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

GENESIS

BY PROFESSOR THEODORE H. ROBINSON

INTRODUCTION

Purpose and General Outline. Christ first, Christ last, Christ all in all—that is the Christian attitude. Yet Jesus did not come into the world as an isolated and wholly independent phenomenon. There is much in his outlook and teaching which has to be understood in the light of his direct antecedents. It was not for nothing that he was a Jew, and his followers have rightly accepted the Jewish Scriptures as an integral portion of their own Bible. While men may love to see in him the fulfillment of all truth, wherever found and however uttered, he is in a special sense the climax of Hebrew religion. Behind him lies a long history, the spiritual experience of his people, and we cannot be too thankful that this experience has found an enduring literary expression in our Bible. Without the O.T. Jesus would be unintelligible, for there we have an "introduction" which explains much that he never explained, because he could take it for granted. (See art., The Bible—a Library of Religion, p. 15; cf. p. 175.)

It is, then, only as the record of spiritual experience that we can rightly study the O.T. It is not the soul-history of an individual, though it contains many such histories, and the world could ill have dispensed with the record of the inner life of a Hosea, a Jeremiah, or a Job. But these are items or stages in the larger whole, which is the story of a great people, and of the way in which their unique religion prepared the way for one yet greater. In a real sense Jesus was the inheritor of the life of all who had gone before him, and we can trace in the religion of Israel the long slow growth of discovery and of revelation (two sides of the same process) which finally made him possible. Other races began as high as Israel did, or higher, but by the time Jesus came she occupied a religious position above any other that the world had yet known.

Just as the O.T. as a whole is the "introduction" to Jesus, so the book of Genesis is the "introduction" to the O.T. The story of Israel's nationality begins with the Exodus; the story of her religion with Sinai. Her first national act was the flight from Egypt, and it was at the sacred mountain that for the first time she came into contact as a nation with that God who was to be the fountain of her spiritual life (see Ex. 31³-22, notes). What is contained in the first book of the Bible is the story of the pre-Israelite world as conceived by the Hebrews.

The book falls into four divisions. The first tells the story of the world as a whole, tracing the record from the first appearance of man to the point at which a line of demarcation appears between the direct ancestors of Israel and those of other nations (chs. 1-11). Next we have an account of the oldest of the Patriarchs, Abraham, who is recognized as the ancestor not only of Israel but of other tribes and nations as well. This carries us from 12¹ to 25¹⁸. The third section (25¹⁹-36⁴³) tells the story of Jacob, and the last section (chs. 37-50) relates the history of Joseph, through whom the ancestors of Israel found their way to Goshen, and came into close contact with the Egyptian power.

Source Materials. Recognizing the broad aims which the writer—or, perhaps we should say, the compiler—of this book had before him, we must next ask ourselves whence he derived the information from which he constructed it. As soon as we look at the narratives we see that they come from many sources. There are traditions which have clearly come down from ages far older than Israel, snatches of song relating to peoples of whom all other traces have been lost, race memories enshrined in language which could not die. There are stories which are the common heritage of many peoples, finding parallels in the lore of other portions of the world, particularly of the ancient East, and it is significant to compare these with their foreign forms, and see how the spiritual genius of Israel modified, purified, and ennobled them. There are tales told age after age round the shepherds' watch-fires, sacred stories of the famous centers of worship, in which every visitor must have been instructed by the attendant priesthood, biographies of personified clans, through whose thin veil we can dimly trace the record of tribal history, genealogies such as are found elsewhere preserved in the tenacious memories of unlettered peoples, local traditions which explain how this or that spot came by its name and its importance. Every possible source of information has been ransacked, and the materials thus collected have been woven into a single whole, dominated by a single purpose, controlled by a single thought—the divine preparation for Israel.

A scientific study of these narratives shows that they fall into several well-marked groups. Two of these are similar to one another, and but for the fact that their narratives are sometimes interwoven with one another we might have remained oblivious to the distinction. (For a discussion of this interweaving and of the methods of analysis, the reader is referred to the article on The Pentateuch, pp. 134, and also to the chapter on "The Methods of Higher Criticism" in The People and the Book.) There are, however, some significant differences between stories derived from these two groups. One of them seems to show greater interest in southern Israel than in the north, and prefers to use the personal divine name "Jehovah"—hence it is commonly known as J. The other seems to have been current in the north—"Ephraim"—and, in Genesis, prefers the more general word for God—in Hebrew Elohim. This, therefore, is generally cited by the symbol E. It is often held that each group once formed an independent book; and if this opinion be correct, it is clear that the writers were drawing on material far older than their own day, sometimes older than Israel itself.

A third group stands widely apart from these two, and bears all the marks of coming from a different age. J and E, in the form in which they were embodied in Genesis, were practically contemporaries, reflecting the same general cycle of ideas and the same level of cultural and religious development. But this third class of passages differs widely from both. In Genesis it, like E, prefers to use the divine name Elohim instead of Yahweh (a word which appears in our versions as Jehovah or the LORD). But there is little else in which this type of passages resembles either of the others. The whole tone is loftier, and reflects the thought and feeling of a much more advanced age. The conception of God is less material and more spiritual, and while there is comparatively little narrative to be included under this head, what there is bears the impress of a very striking style. Genealogy is a favorite theme here, and, indeed, it might almost be said that in Genesis this group consists of genealogy, with an occasional narrative inserted. It is worth noting too that there is a fondness for exact figures, and that where events, as distinct from mere names, are recorded, they always have in them a legal element, and point to the establishment of some principle well recognized in the later Law. Passages of this class are commonly indicated by the letter P ("Priestly"), and are usually supposed to have been taken from a long comprehensive work, which included not only an outline history of Israel down to the end of the wanderings, but also the great mass of the Law as it appears in Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers. (There are, of course, other passages of various length which cannot be traced to these three clearly defined sources; some of them probably were derived from otherwise unknown sources, while others undoubtedly originated with the compiler.)

Use of the Material. We have next to notice the way in which these passages have been put together to produce the final form in which we have the book to-day. It is clear that the sections which are grouped under the letter P have been used as a kind of framework into which narratives belonging to the other two groups or derived from other sources have been fitted. For the most part, as has already been noted, this framework consists of genealogies with the bare mention of one or two outstanding events in the lives of the more important persons named. There are, however, some half a dozen more extended narratives with the characteristics of P, each of which is clearly introduced with a special purpose, to which the same treatment is given as to narratives derived from other groups. Each is inserted in its place in the life of the person to whom it refers. Usually the narratives are simply placed side by side, but where similar accounts are derived from different groups, they are woven together, sentences or paragraphs from the one being inserted alternately with those drawn from the other. It is usually a simple matter to disentangle them, for it is really through discrepancies in the passage that attention is called to its composite structure. The method of literary composition or compilation used is familiar to every student of ancient literature, especially of ancient Oriental literature. There are many other examples in the various types of O.T. literature. (See art., Pentateuch, p. 134, and introductions to other historical books of the O.T. in this Commentary.)

Permanent Value and Significance. Each of the two main sections of Genesis—that which contains the ancient general history (chs. 1–11), and that which contains the stories of the Hebrew patriarchs (chs. 12–50)—has its own value and significance.

(1) The Ancient General History. Much controversy has raged around the first eleven chapters of Genesis (see art., O.T. and Science, p. 126). Formerly they were accepted as an accurate account of creation and the early history of mankind. At the present time less emphasis is placed on historical accuracy and more on religious value. The position of modern scholars may be summarized as follows: If anyone is in search of accurate information regarding the age of the earth, or its relation to the sun, moon, or stars, or regarding the exact time or order in which plants and animals have appeared upon it, he should go to recent textbooks in astronomy, geology, paleontology and other sciences. It is not the purpose of the biblical writers to impart such instruction, or to enlarge the bounds of scientific knowledge. So far as the scientific or historical information furnished in these chapters is concerned, it is of little more value than the similar stories of other nations. And yet the student of these chapters can see a striking contrast between them and extra-biblical stories describing the same unknown ages handed down from pre-scientific centuries. Here comes to view the uniqueness of the Bible. The other traditions are of interest only as relics of a bygone past. Not so the biblical statements: they are and ever will be of inestimable value, not because of their scientific teaching, but because of the presence of sublime religious truth in the crude forms of primitive science. If anyone wishes to know what connection the world has with God, if he desires to discover some unifying principle, some illuminating purpose in the history of the earth, he may turn to these chapters as a safe and reliable guide.

(2) The Patriarchal Narratives. The experience of centuries furnishes abundant evidence that the patriarchal narratives are of inestimable value as means of impressing lessons of the reality and providence of God and of encouraging faith and confidence in him. Moreover, not one iota of their value for purposes of instruction in righteousness have these records lost because doubt has been cast on their absolute historical accuracy. "If," says Professor McFadyen, "it should be made highly probable that the stories were not strictly historical, what should we then have to say? . . . The religious truth to which they give vivid and immortal expression would remain the same. The story of Abraham would still illustrate the trials and rewards of faith. The story of Jacob would still illustrate the power of sin to haunt and determine a man's career, and the power of God to humble, discipline and purify a self-confident nature. The story of Joseph would still illustrate how fidelity amid temptation, wrong and sorrow is crowned at last with glory and honor" (O.T. Criticism and the Christian Church, p. 335, Charles Scribner's Sons, publishers.) This does not mean that these narratives are without historical worth; on the contrary, they are historical documents of immense value. Nevertheless, it may not be amiss to remind ourselves that the N.T. points the Christian reader to the O.T. not for instruction in ancient history but for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction which is in righteousness; and these records, whatever may be their historical shortcomings, are most assuredly profitable for all these purposes (2 Tim. 3:14-17).

Literature: Bennett, Genesis (New Century Bible); Driver, Genesis (Westminster Commentaries); Ryle, Genesis (Cambridge Bible); Skinner, Genesis (International Critical Commentary); Frazer, Folklore in the O.T.; Gunkel, The Legends of Genesis; Gordon, The Early Traditions of Genesis; Ryle, The Early Narratives of Genesis; Kent, Narratives of the Beginnings of Hebrew History (Students' Old Testament); Orr, The Problems of the O.T.; T. H. Robinson, Genesis in Colloquial Speech.

I. CHAPTERS 1¹ TO 11:26: EARLY DAYS

The first main division of the book of Genesis falls into five sections, each marked by a "genealogy." Twice the genealogy is accompanied by a longer narrative of events, one of which stands by itself, while the other has been incorporated with another account of the same event. The sections are: 1. The Beginning of Things (chs. 1-4). 2. Antediluvian Man (51-64). 3. The Flood (65-92). 4. Recovery of Man and Repopulation of the Earth (101-119). 5. The Ancestry of Abraham (11:10-26).

CHAPTERS 1 TO 4: THE BEGINNING OF THINGS

This section describes the creation of the world and the outstanding features of the life of the first human generation. It contains five narratives: (1) an account of creation, (2) a second account of creation, (3) man's temptation and fall, (4) Cain and Abel, (5) Lamech and his song.

CHAPTER I

The First Account of Creation. (From P; 11-24a.) It is impossible to read this narrative without being struck by its dignity and lofty tone. The whole is arranged under a series of days, and to each day are assigned portions of the universe. The events are fitted into a framework which consists of certain formulæ, repeated at the beginning and end of each separate act; throughout a definite and progressive order is observed. The theology is advanced; God needs no physical means or material agency; his word suffices. The whole narrative is an expression of the supreme truth that God is the author of the universe, expressed in a form suited to a people of high intelligence, developed culture, and lofty religious thinking.

The common mythology of the nearer East—which includes the land of Palestine—told of creation as the result of a divine victory over “Tiamat,” a chaos-monster who led the powers of darkness. Some such tale was current in ancient Israel, with Jehovah as the victorious hero-God (cf. Job 9:13 26:12, 13 Psa. 74:12-17 89:8-12, etc.). But even if the writer of this chapter had such a story in mind, we can see how the grosser elements have been purged away, and have left us with the noblest and most spiritual record of creation that any religion has offered the world.

Strictly speaking, there are only three acts of “creation.” The term is used to describe the introduction of an element which cannot be explained by what has gone before. The intermediate acts are in a sense “evolutionary,” i.e., the readjustment of material already present to form new combinations, and the word used to describe them is not “create,” but simply “make.”

1, 2. The “Creation” of “The Heavens and the Earth.” There is no order, no shape, no distinction between solid and liquid, nothing but a confused indiscriminate mixture, and, hovering above it as a bird over its nest, the Breath of God, already, it seems, personified. (See discussion of the Spirit on p. 176.)

3-5. Light. In formulæ which persist through the chapter, the “making” of light is described. It is, to the Hebrew mind, independent of luminaries, which are rather concentrated masses of the pervading substance; it stands in eternal contrast and opposition to the darkness.

6-8. The Firmament. The process continues with the making of a firmament—a plate of hard material, probably pictured as dome-shaped. This gives a needed point of departure, a fixed spot in the midst of the chaos from which a start can be made. This done, the organization of the universe can follow, and it occupies the second day. (For the ancient view of the world, see p. 126.)

9-13. The Earth and Vegetation. The third day is given to the “making” of the earth as man knows it. The account starts from the “firmament,” which is surrounded on all sides by the half-liquid, half-solid matter of the chaos. At the divine command this recedes from below the firmament, and an empty space (air and other gaseous substances are not recognized as material) is left under the dome. The pressure is so great that it separates the solid from the liquid elements, and the latter are collected to form the sea, while the former become the dry land. From the ground thus formed sprang the natural vegetable products of the soil, which, though not endowed with life as the Hebrews understood that term, yet grow and yield their fruits, and God sees that all is good.

14-19. Heavenly Luminaries. The sky above the completed earth is still empty, and the fourth day is occupied in the making of bright radiant objects. They are not merely celestial ornaments; their purpose is to indicate time. They mark day from night, but that is not all; they tell men when the seasons change, and when the festal occasions are due. These sacred times are older than man, and exist independently of him; when he is formed he must see that they are duly observed. The presence of these heavenly bodies will leave him without excuse, for they are good; they are all that man needs for this religious duty, and all that God intends.

20-23. Birds and Fish. This is as far as the products of matter can be carried, and in the account of the fifth day we meet once more with the word “create.” A new element has to be introduced—that of life. As we have already seen, vegetable life does not properly come under that head for the ancient East. In animal life we have a factor for which there is no existing basis in matter or in its products; God must step in and fashion something entirely new. So the waters swarm with life, manifested first in the creatures of the seas and oceans, then in the winged things that fly in the empty space between the earth and the heavens. And this time it is not enough that God should merely pronounce them good. He has a special relation to these beings in whom there is implanted a second grade of his creative power; he blesses them and bids them multiply. This is significant for the writer’s point of view. The reproduction of plants, their seed and fruit-production is automatic; that of the animal kingdom is due to conscious will, and needs both divine authority and divine command.

24-31. Land Animals and Man. To the sixth day are assigned the two final acts. The first of these is the production of the terrestrial animals, who are drawn from the earth as the fish have been drawn from the sea. Linked in a certain way with them, through the elements which compose his physical frame, comes man. God is represented as consulting (us—our) as to the formation of humanity, in language which suggests (though other explanations have been given) that we have here a relic of the old polytheistic phraseology which has escaped the careful expurgation of the writer. A further hint of a lower theological position has been seen by some in the repeated phrase in our image, in his image, in the image of God, which is thought to point to a time when men believed that God had a material frame like that which man possesses. Yet it is more probable that the expression in the image of God has no physical implications, but is meant to suggest that man differs from all the rest of the creation in the possession of self-conscious personality, in which he alone of all creatures resembles God. (See art., O.T. Conception of God, p. 158.)

In v. 27 for the third time we meet the word create. Again a new element has been introduced into the world, and previous acts of creation will not account for it. Man shares in the physical nature of the universe, and in the life found in fish and bird and beast. But these two factors alone will not account for him; he is created in the image of God, and, unlike any other being, has something possessed by the Creator and not merely by creation.

Man is thus the crown and supreme glory of the whole universe—just because he is greater than the universe. Physically feeble than many of the animals, he is yet their lord. We have a picture of a natural kingdom, with no internal warfare, but with a monarch. All live at peace with one another, since the vegetable world supplies all needed food. Over all, as God's vicegerent, stands the one being who really resembles his Maker—man.

CHAPTER II

1-4a. The Sabbath. The story of creation finds its climax in an item of ritual which was fundamental to the pious Jew. God's work has occupied him six "days," and he takes the seventh, the day of "cessation," for himself. There is thus a "tabu" on it; it is "holy," set apart from the affairs of ordinary life. Such a seventh-day festival seems to have been customary in Mesopotamia, and parallels observed in the O.T. and elsewhere have suggested that originally the "Sabbath" of the western Semites occurred not once a week but at the full moon only. The transference of the name to a weekly festival will then have taken place under Babylonian influence, possibly during the Exile. It may be well to insist once more that no one has ever supposed the narrative to be the free invention of the exilic or post-exilic period. It undoubtedly contains and is based on far older material, but this does not exclude the possibility that it was only at a comparatively late period that the form we have in our Bibles was attained.

A Second Account of Creation. (From J; 24b-25.) The J account of creation presents striking differences from P. There is no true cosmogony; except for the absence of rain (which is not mentioned in any J passage till the Flood), the world as we know it is assumed. The order of events is different; man is the first object created, woman the last, and her formation is due to man's spiritual need for companionship, not to the necessity for reproduction. There is some strange geography; the rivers Pishon (the Oxus?), Nile, Tigris, and Euphrates have a common source. The conception of Jehovah is extremely primitive. The story, with all its naïve beauty, is intended for an audience intellectually and spiritually immature.

4b-17. Man in the Garden of Eden. Jehovah, finding the clay moistened by the heavy mist, models a man. This might be done by any skilled potter, but Jehovah does more; he breathes into the figure, and so the man comes to life, not merely a toy, but a living soul. There is as yet no suitable home for him, but the need is met by the planting of a garden, whose trees are made to grow out of the ground. The garden is situated in Eden, to the east, and its produce includes trees good for food, ornamental plants, and two others with special qualities, the tree of knowledge and the tree of life.

In the garden the man is placed, with a double duty to perform. First, he has to be the servant of the ground, rendering to it those offices which it will naturally reward with its fruits; and, in the second place, he has to protect it against unnamed enemies. Finally the man may enjoy the fruits of his work; the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil alone is reserved. If man knew what was good for him—not necessarily morally good—he would be on a level with Jehovah. So the penalty for disobedience is instant death; the man will not be allowed to live out his natural term.

18-20. Creation of Animals. Jehovah is deeply concerned with the interests of his man, and observes his loneliness. But he does not know how the need is to be met, and, as a first experiment, constructs other beings in the same way as he had made the man—though it is not said that he breathed into them. In order to find out whether the experiment is successful, he brings the animals to the man. As each beast comes before him, he utters an exclamation, from which Jehovah judges whether the particular animal is suitable or not. Surely, among so many forms one at least will be satisfactory? As each beast appears, the man utters a sound, which becomes its name—a name is usually the first exclamation of the parent on seeing the newly born child; that is why so many Hebrew names are prayers—but though there is a large variety of exclamations, and, therefore, of names, the man says nothing to any of them which indicates that he has found what he needed.

21-25. Formation of Woman. The experiment has, therefore, failed, and Jehovah has recourse to a totally new method. He sends the man into a deep anæsthetic sleep, such as that which a divine power may always use when it seeks to work on man, and—though the man seems to know what is happening—without hurting him takes a rib from his side. This he “builds” up into a fresh shape, though he is first careful to close up the hole left in the man—he will not have his creature damaged. Then he brings the new object back to the man, and is greeted with an exclamation which shows that this time the experiment has been entirely successful. Classical English has no phrase which comes near to being an equivalent to the Hebrew idiom here used. “This is the stroke” would be a literal rendering, and we may compare slang expressions such as “to hit the nail on the head,” “this is absolutely it,” to convey to our minds something of the feeling which lies behind the Hebrew words. Thus the words put into Adam’s mouth by Milton: “. . . so absolute she seems, and in herself complete” (Paradise Lost, bk. viii, 547-8). Then follows the man’s reason: the new being is of his very substance. So the exclamation for her shall be Wo-man, for “from-man” was she taken. The narrator adds a note to the effect that this explains why men leave their parents but not their wives, why they make new homes for themselves with their wives. Finally it is noted that, in the absence of knowledge, there is no such thing as sex-consciousness in them (cf. 21-7, notes).

This is not history, nor is it science—it was never intended to be either. Some would call it folklore, and would point to many parallels in the early stories of other races. It—to repeat a principle which ought never to be forgotten—must be remembered that each age, each grade of development, has its own special method of instruction, and that to a comparatively unsophisticated people such a story as this is the best, perhaps the only, means of conveying Truth. It is of primary importance that even such people as those to whom this narrative was first addressed should realize the great fact that man owes to his God his own origin and also every benefit he possesses. It is instructive to compare this with similar stories elsewhere, and to appreciate the religious gulf which thus early separates Israel from other nations. If any insist on calling this folklore, let him do so in all reverence, remembering that it is consecrated folklore. (See further pp. 20, 226, 368b, and cf. Frazer, Folklore in O.T.)

CHAPTER III

Man’s Temptation and Fall. This is really the story of the way in which man lost his chance of immortality. A story with the same general purpose was current in Babylonia, though, as usual in such cases, the details are widely different from what we find here. The Mesopotamian tradition sent a man, in despair at the common lot of death, to seek for the fruit of immortality, and explained how he was cheated by one of the gods into eating the fruit of death.

1-7. Temptation by the Serpent. The crafty enemy is the snake. He is the cleverest of all the beasts that Jehovah made; he stands erect and speaks with a human voice. Clearly he is not such a snake as men knew in later days. Still less is he the devil (a conception arising in Israel centuries after this story reached its present form; see p. 205), though he tempts man to do evil.

The conversation between the snake and the woman suggests with extraordinary psychological fidelity the main features of normal temptation. There is first the doubt cast on God. The attitude of Jehovah is misrepresented, and the snake asks, “Has God set you in the midst of this lovely garden, and yet denied you all its advantages?” His question implies that none of the fruit is permitted to the pair who have to work so hard to produce and preserve it. This misrepresentation is corrected, and the next step is to say: “God has forbidden you this one tree because he is jealous. He is afraid that you may be as good and as great as he is.” The tempter next suggests the possibility of impunity. The terms of the divine command have implied that the tree is deadly poison; this, says the snake, is not true. On the contrary, it is a most valuable tree, and its virtues are more than medicinal. “To eat of it will raise you at once to the divine level, for all that you now lack is knowledge”—so he recommends the article which he wishes man to take. It may be remarked that there is nothing in the story as it stands which indicates that he is telling a lie, and we are free to suppose, if we wish, that he really stated the facts as they were known to him. Finally the desirability of the sin itself is emphasized, not only in the words of the snake but in the mind of the woman herself. Here, once again, we have an epitome of all temptation, and the woman falls. She takes some of the fruit, eats it, and gives it to her husband.

All that the snake has said comes true. They do not die, and they attain to knowledge. But, though clever, the snake is not as clever as Jehovah; though he knows a great deal, he does not know everything. He does not understand—at least he has not told the woman—what the first effect of the knowledge will be—a sex-consciousness which brings shame into the minds of the man and of the woman. It is to be noted that this is a peculiarly Semitic feeling. There are many races who have no objection to nakedness, because it does not awaken improper feelings in them, and evangelists as wise as Chalmers of New Guinea have not felt it necessary to insist on clothes as a necessary preliminary to a moral Christian life. But among Semitic peoples the attitude here represented is almost universal, and nudity is a terrible thing. Even the aprons of fig-leaves (which, perhaps, gave rise to the eastern tradition that the tree of knowledge was a fig-tree) do not give an adequate sense of protection in the presence of Jehovah.

8-21. Punishment for Disobedience. Jehovah delights to walk in the garden when the morning or evening breeze is blowing cool, and to enjoy the company and the conversation of his living toys. But now he cannot find them, and calls till they answer him. And though he is not omniscient, he is far wiser than the man or the snake, and he knows that this new shyness can have only one cause. The man's defense is not an attempt to blame the woman. He says, in effect, "You gave me the woman, so I supposed that anything she brought me had your sanction." If he blames anyone, it is Jehovah himself. But this explanation is not accepted; the woman is as free an agent as the man, and when Jehovah turns to her, she throws the final charge on the snake.

Judgment is then delivered. The snake is not even invited to make a defense, for his guilt is too obvious. He loses his erect posture, and is forbidden the vegetable food which he has hitherto shared with man and all other animals, and is condemned to eat earth. There is to be endless hostility between snakes and men, the one crushing the head of the other whenever opportunity arises, and the snake striking at the heel of man. Ancient zoology is often strange to us, and there is other evidence to show that the old Hebrew believed that earth was the normal food of snakes. It is certainly true that most snakebites are inflicted on the foot. Our narrative explains this as part of the "curse" or doom laid on the creature for having misled the woman.

The details of the woman's punishment are not certain, but it is clear that we have here also the explanation of familiar facts, which include the social inferiority of women as it appears in the East. There are references to the sex life, and, in particular, to the pains of childbirth, to which Hebrew women seem to have been more subject than others in the ancient world.

Jehovah then deals with the man. He too has to suffer, and the ground is placed under a curse which will react on him. He has always had to work, but his labors have hitherto been productive and comparatively painless. In future they will be exhausting and futile. It is not work that is the punishment, but the grim struggle against a hostile nature, which, unless he utterly spends himself, will give him only weeds instead of the plants he needs for food. At the close of the sentence the narrator appends two notes, one explaining the name the man gave to his wife and the other describing Jehovah's method of clothing the man and his wife. They are allowed to wear skins, though there is no hint as to the way in which these are procured. Probably neither the narrator nor his first hearers speculated as to whether any animals were killed, and, if not, whence the skins were derived.

22-24. Expulsion from the Garden. The snake's promises have thus been fulfilled, though with disastrous further consequences. The man has attained to knowledge, and he has not been immediately put to death. Yet death will one day be his portion, and he is condemned to a life of struggle. He has gained knowledge, but he has lost the friendship and confidence of his God. It would even seem that he has aroused Jehovah's fears, and there seems to be a real apprehension lest he should make use of his new powers still further. For in the garden there stands, not only the tree of knowledge, but also the tree of life; and if he once tastes of this he will be immortal, and the one divine prerogative that remains will be taken from Jehovah. So, in addition to the penalty already imposed, the guilty pair are driven out of the garden, and now he has to till the soil outside. Lest he should return Jehovah places a guard over the way. We often find in the ancient East figures of strange beings, half human and half animal, placed at the doors of palaces and of temples. It is clear that they represent guardian spirits, and, to judge from the description given by Ezekiel, and from other hints, they were known by the name of Cherub. Creatures of this kind are now stationed to the east of the garden, and (apparently in addition) a whirling sword of living flame keeps the way to the tree of life. Man has lost his last chance of immortality.

On the whole narrative one further remark may be made. We note a presentation of God and of his character, an ideal of religion, which are typical of a certain stage in the development of Israel, and, perhaps, of other nations as well. We see that Jehovah insists on his own superiority as compared with the man whom he has created. His only command is that the man shall not eat the fruit of the tree of knowledge, for to acquire what that food will give him will help to raise him to the level of God. When that command is broken a further danger is imminent, that the man will attain to immortality, and then there will be no difference at all in powers and in status between the Creator and the creature. This must be prevented at all costs, and the final act in the passage secures the permanent inferiority of man. Religion must consist in the reverent submission of the inferior to the superior, and in the recognition and maintenance of the supremacy of God over man. Friendship and affectionate association are certainly not excluded, but their basis must be the condescension of God and the humility of man. We shall meet with the same conception elsewhere in this book, and, indeed, it forms an outstanding feature of the religious thought of Israel throughout the history of the nation.

CHAPTER IV

1-16. Cain and Abel. The human race has now started on its career, and the more important conditions of life known in the early days of Israel have been explained. There are, however, further details which are to be traced back to the primitive world. There is, for instance, the distinction in the social order between the shepherd (usually a nomad) and the farmer, who must have a settled home. Further, there is need for an account of how crime, the wrong of man to man, first entered human life, and, it may be, it is felt that certain peculiarities of the life of two ancient tribes demand explanation. All these needs are met by the account of Cain, Abel, and Lamech, the first people to be mentioned after the initial pair. In all probability we are not intended to think of them as individuals primarily, though there are individual features in the story; they are types, and we may detect an element of tribal history. There is always antagonism between the nomad and the farmer, and the Kenites (cf. this name with Cain) formed a tribe in the early days of Israel (see 15¹⁸, 19, and cf. Num. 24²¹, 22).

Cain's name is connected with the word "gotten" (v. 1); though this is an assonance rather than a derivation. Next comes Abel, the shepherd, apparently younger than the farmer—not the order usually accepted by modern students of social history. The contrast between the two comes out when each brings an offering to Jehovah, who prefers the produce of the shepherd to that of the farmer. Cain is jealous, and, since the story seems to be set in a world already well populated, lures Abel into the open country and kills him. Abel's blood lies uncovered on the ground, and blood, as the chief seat of life in the body, is, to the Hebrew mind, almost personal. It cries aloud to Jehovah, that the demand of the blood-feud may be satisfied (see art., Bible Manners and Customs, p. 75), for Jehovah, the God of these two, is the guardian of their blood. Cain's denial of his crime is futile, for Jehovah has the evidence of the blood before him, and passes on to give sentence. It is worth noting that Jehovah does not impose an arbitrary penalty on Cain; he merely states the inevitable effect of his crime. The ground has been compelled to receive a draught of that which it loathes; therefore its anger is roused against the person who has forced this upon it, and it will no more co-operate with him in the work of agriculture. Cain can no longer remain on the "ground," and he must be a wanderer, without home and without kin.

The world, as we have noted, is thought of as already well filled with men and women, and an unprotected and isolated stranger with neither kindred nor God to avenge him has small chance of escaping disaster. Jehovah himself has no animus against Cain, and, in order to protect him while he is far away, he sets a mark on him. Here we pass at once into tribal history. Cain is no longer an individual, but a clan, whose members are distinguished by some special mark which they bear. Anyone who sees that mark knows that the man who carries it belongs to a fierce and terrible people. Normally, if a member of a tribe is killed, the survivors exact a life for a life, but for each man killed this tribe will demand seven lives from the tribe of the offender (v. 15). The story of this fierceness has been combined with the old story of the murder of Abel and its consequences, and the latter now explains the habits of this clan. So, though the Cainites no longer dwell in the land which Jehovah is thought to hold as his own, his power can still reach and avenge.

17-26. Lamech and His Song. V. 17 begins a short genealogy, which differs markedly from those so frequent in the group which we call

P. Its purpose seems to be to connect Cain with Lamech, and there is a note of the building of a city called Enoch, so named after a son of Cain. There seems to have been some error in the transmission of the text, and probably Enoch himself was the founder of the city in question. The genealogy is carried to a generation beyond Lamech, and gives the origin of the tent-dweller, the musician, and the smith—all, curiously enough, features of life found among the nomads. This serves to introduce the very ancient song of Lamech, clearly a tribal saying. The men of the tribe are represented as telling their wives how savagely they avenge injuries. For an actual wound they are ready to take the life of a man, and even for a blow they will kill a boy. They compare themselves with the tribe of Cain, and claim that they are ten times as bloodthirsty as that bloodthirsty tribe, demanding, not seven lives for one, but seventy (cf. Mt. 18²¹⁻²², notes).

The chapter and the section close with a note of the birth of Seth and of his son (vv. 25, 26). The latter is named Enosh—another word for “man”—and the remark is made that it was during his lifetime that the worship of Jehovah was first introduced.

CHAPTERS 5¹ TO 6⁴: ANTEDILUVIAN MAN

This section forms a link between the story of creation and the next important point, the Flood. It illustrates the desire of the historian to narrow the range of interest till it centers on the immediate ancestors of Israel. Following Adam, Noah is the outstanding character, and this passage explains his antecedents and the reasons for the Flood. It falls into two parts: (a) a genealogy, bridging the period from Adam to Noah (ch. 5); (b) the sons of God and the daughters of men (6¹⁻⁴).

CHAPTER V

The Genealogy. This (from P) traces man through Seth, the third son of Adam. The word, Adam, here for the first time used as a proper name, means in Hebrew “a human being,” or rather “humanity” as a species. In 12⁶ 25 and 5¹ it is clearly used in this general sense—elsewhere in these chapters it is used with the article, which should probably be inserted also in 3¹⁷.

It is interesting to compare this passage with the Cainite genealogy (J) in 4^{17f}. Here we have nine generations, there six. Omitting the first three names in ch. 5 we find that of the remainder two, Enoch and Lamech, are identical with names in ch. 4, while there are close similarities in the rest. It is difficult to escape the suggestion that we have two recensions of one and the same genealogy, diverging at an early period, and current in different circles, yet both springing from the same source.

The names in themselves convey very little. They have been compared to the traditional lists of Babylonian antediluvian kings, but while the names have much in common, reigns of enormous length are assigned to the Mesopotamian monarchs; and if the material goes back to a common source, the Hebrew writers have introduced significant changes. Methuselah is remembered as the man who lived longest on earth, and the figures suggest that in the end he perished in the Flood. Enoch alone stands out as a real personality, and of him we have the simple statement that he walked with God, and he was not, for God took him. His is by far the shortest life in the list, and the explanation of this fact is that he made himself the familiar companion of God, and that God conferred on him the gift of immortality, taking him to dwell with himself. It is natural enough that legends should have grown about his name, and he became in later Judaism the center of a large eschatological literature (see art., Intertestamental Literature, pp. 197-8.)

CHAPTER VI

1-4. The Sons of God and the Daughters of Men. In this passage we are introduced to a strange old story which has largely escaped the modifications which a later theology might have made. Many explanations have been given; the sons of God are sometimes interpreted as angels, who for the sin described were driven from their heavenly abode (see art., Intertestamental Religion, p. 204). Evidently we have here a narrative which originated in days so early that men still believed in the existence of a multitude of deities. Alongside of—almost compared with—the “gods” of vv. 2 and 4 we have Jehovah in v. 3, and we are led to suspect that he is still only one of a number of beings of the same order and species as himself, though he may be superior to the rest. The full significance of the name came much later (see Ex. 3¹³, 14, notes).

These other divine beings regard the daughters of men as suitable mates for themselves, and from their marriages spring the famous heroes and giants of whom ancient legend told. Jehovah, on the other hand, looks on them as his creatures, and sees to it that his Spirit, that power which at the first gave man life, shall not dwell for unlimited periods in man. To ancient Hebrew thought man was an animated body, and when the spirit was withdrawn, he ceased to live. That spirit had been bestowed by Jehovah; it was, as we have already noted, a power almost personal, and it could be recalled by him who had given it. A limit of a hundred and twenty years is fixed, that man may not live long enough to encroach on the prerogatives of his Maker.

CHAPTERS 65 TO 929: THE FLOOD

The story of a universal Flood which destroyed nearly every living thing is found in the folklore of many peoples. These traditions differ in details very widely, though occasionally we find resemblances which suggest a common origin. Whether all go back to a single catastrophe, or whether similar events took place in different parts of the world, is a question which must be left to the individual student for decision. The two traditions—taken from J and P—preserved here are not dissimilar, but are yet different enough to make it advisable to look at them separately. (This may be done more conveniently by disregarding the chapter divisions; the succeeding paragraphs, therefore, are based on chs. 6-9.)

5-22. See below under chs. 7-9.

CHAPTERS VII, VIII, IX

The Flood. Throughout the J story we note the naïve outlook of the narrator, and his very elementary theology. Jehovah is described in anthropomorphic terms: He shuts Noah into the ark and uses the natural rain, though in an unnatural quantity, to produce the catastrophe; he suspects he has made a mistake in creating man, and is so affected by the smell of sacrifice that he realizes that he has come near to making a greater mistake in destroying man. Yet there are signs of a high moral standard; it is because of man's wickedness that he punishes him, and it is Noah's high character which appeals to him, and induces him to warn and save him. It will be noted that he leaves Noah to find out by his own experiment when the earth is dry enough for him to come out of the ark. As subsidiary features we observe that the Flood lasts for less than seventy days, and that, as in the Abel story of ch. 4, the use of animal food is assumed.

In the P narrative we find ourselves in a different atmosphere, though the facts are the same: We have the same ethical basis for the action of God, and the same recognition of Noah's goodness—like Enoch, he "walked with God"; we have the exact details of the ark and the dates of the stages in the Flood itself.

The catastrophe is not produced simply by rain, but by a temporary collapse of the structure of the cosmos, through which water streams in above and below from the chaos outside (cf. p. 120). The conditions are maintained for a hundred and fifty days, and the whole duration of the Flood is at least a year. (For the distribution of the material among the two sources see Brightman, Sources of the Hexateuch, pp. 36-38; 215-218.)

The Survivors. Following the Flood the story of humanity begins anew. Just as the first human pair were ordered to increase and fill the earth, so the survivors of the Flood are instructed to repopulate it. The authority originally conferred over all the lower orders of being is confirmed, and one new element is introduced into life—the flesh of animals may in future be used as food. To this permission, however, a restriction is added. The sanctity of blood must be maintained, and in no circumstances whatever must it be eaten. The same principle will apply to man as to the beasts; whoever sheds the blood of another must submit to the law of blood-revenge, for the blood is a living, almost a personal entity, and will not be satisfied till it has been appeased by the blood of the slayer himself. And God proclaims himself its Vindicator against the aggression both of man and of beast.

The Rainbow. Lest man should have to live in constant dread of a repetition of the disaster which has thus ended the first age of his history, God grants a promise and a covenant: he will never again bring such a Flood over the earth. And as a sign, to reassure men when they are fearful in time of rain, he calls attention to the bow in the cloud. It is not suggested that there had been no rainbow before the Flood, but it is to have a new function in the life of the world, and men are to remember that He who set it there will keep his word (98-17).

Once again we have a story common in its broader outlines to many peoples. The forms in which it has come down to us clearly did not originate in Palestine, but in some country of wide level plains such as Mesopotamia, and the story which shows the closest resemblances is that which we know from Babylonian sources. But, again, the differences are more significant than the resemblances, for the old story is made to play a new part in the history alike of religion and of human development. It marks a fresh stage in that human order whose basis, to the mind of the writer, is the relation of man to God, and dwells not merely on the power of God, but also on his fidelity. Some would call this too folklore; if so, once more, it is consecrated folklore (cf. Frazer, Folklore in O.T.).

Noah's Drunkenness. This story (9:18-23) presents us with a new picture of Noah, the first cultivator of the vine and the first man to suffer from drunkenness. It also includes a very ancient curse on Canaan and a blessing on Japheth. These last two must be very ancient indeed, and belong to the early days of the Semitic race. The story of Noah is difficult to reconcile with the presentation given in the Flood narrative, and probably comes from a different cycle, though as it stands it belongs to the same general group of passages.

It seems that two different themes have been combined. In the first place we have the sin of Ham, and in the second the curse of Canaan. Though the latter is introduced as the son of Ham, yet the curse has every appearance of having been independent in origin of the preceding narrative, and of having sprung from the days when Israel was still struggling with the older inhabitants of the land. It is interesting to notice that Ham and Canaan were connected by ancient Israel, for the Canaanitish peoples were of true Semitic stock, and spoke Hebrew, a language akin to the Aramaic of the ancestors of Israel, while the other Hamitic peoples are all African. The connection of the two races may be due to the fact that Palestine was an Egyptian province at the time when Israel entered the land.

Noah's drunkenness, the mockery of Ham, and the modest piety of Shem and Japheth bring out strongly the Hebrew sense of shame. None but a drunken man would allow himself to be exposed, and the worst insult that one man could put on another was that which Ham offered his father (37, notes). The incident is, no doubt, due to very ancient tradition, and is used to introduce the curse on Canaan. With the latter are combined blessings on Shem and Japheth. The text seems to have been incorrectly transmitted in the former, and it has been suggested that it ran, "Bless, O Jehovah, the tents of Shem, and let Canaan be servant to him." The latter is a play on the name of Japheth.

CHAPTERS 10¹ TO 11⁹: RECOVERY OF MAN AND REPOPULATION OF THE EARTH

This section bridges the space between the two critical personalities, Noah and Abraham. It falls into two parts: (a) a genealogy which occupies ch. 10; (b) an account of the way in which differences in language arose (11¹⁻⁹).

CHAPTER X

The Descendants of Noah; Three Groups. The genealogy in ch. 10 is clearly composite, one element connecting itself with the type of genealogy we find in ch. 5 (P), the other, with its occasional personal notes, belonging to J. (See Brightman, op. cit.) Both seem to proceed on the same general principle—that of describing racial and geographical affinities as though they were family relationships. This was a familiar method in the ancient East, and even the Greeks used it in describing the main divisions of their people.

The arrangement in P is comparatively simple. There are three main groups of peoples, northern, southern, and eastern. The first are derived from Japheth, the second from Ham, and the third from Shem. Most of the names in the first group are familiar to us from other sources, and all except the Medes belong to Asia Minor or the Mediterranean coast lands. The geographical knowledge of the day evidently did not extend as far as continental European Greece, though the islands (v. 5) may include the Greek settlements in the Ægean. Most of the peoples in the second group also are referred to elsewhere in ancient records. They are not all African, for Seba was a district in southern Arabia and, as we have seen, Canaan is reckoned with Egypt. The third table includes the chief races of Mesopotamia, though it is curious to find that there is no mention of the Babylonians. Possibly the list was compiled at a time when Babylon was subject to Assyria and was not thought worthy of separate mention.

The other table of nations (in J) begins with the mention of Cush, who is not the descendant of Ham already mentioned, but the eponymous ancestor of an entirely different group, that of Mesopotamia. Notable among these names is that of Nimrod, who is not a people but an individual, regarded as the first man who attempted to form a great empire. No name resembling this has yet been found among early Mesopotamian monarchs, but the picture of the great king who was also a mighty hunter is one with which we are very familiar in Assyrian sculpture and records. The distribution of the "sons" of Egypt reflects the political situation of the second half of the second millennium B.C., with nominal Egyptian control over Palestine and Phœnicia, and with Hittites and Philistines in the country, though neither is dominant. The name "Shem" is here used simply to cover the descendants of Eber, the eponymous ancestor of the Hebrews (a much wider term than Israelite), and it is curious to note that most of the tribes under this head which can be identified at all seem to come from southern Arabia—in the other genealogy assigned to Ham.

CHAPTER XI

1-9. The Origin of Different Languages. It is always unintelligible to primitive peoples that there are differences in speech between the various tribes and nations, and many early peoples have stories which are intended to explain this fact. Israelite tradition connected the differences with the building of Babylon or of one of the great temple-towers or ziggurats, characteristic of Babylonian temples. The name "Babel" (of which "Babylon" is a later Greek form) means literally "gate of god," but is connected in this narrative with a Hebrew word bālal = "mix," "confuse." We may keep the assonance—though not the exact idea—by using the word "babble."

Mesopotamian theology held that the true home of the gods was in a mountain, far north of Babylonia, and to make a suitable home it was necessary to imitate this mountain home as far as possible. Hence the temples always had great towers, with successive stories of decreasing height. They were built, as the narrative correctly states, mainly of unburned bricks, though faced with harder material, for there is no building stone in southern Babylonia, and where mortar of any kind is needed bitumen is used. In the narrative we notice the naïve and elementary theology which we have observed elsewhere. The building of the tower is interpreted as an attempt to invade the sky, the home of Jehovah, though the reason is ostensibly that there may be a central rallying point for all mankind. Jehovah is alarmed at this invasion of his privileges; hence his action is a defense of his prerogatives.

We thus reach the end of the first epoch in the history of man, as conceived by the pious Israelite. The human race has been brought into being, in a world especially prepared, and the interest has gradually narrowed till it rests on a single family. One great critical event, the Flood, stands half-way down the story, and a minor occurrence, the building of Babel and the scattering of the nations, has been mentioned. All that has happened is the work of a single power; Jehovah has been preparing the way for his people. He made the world, he created man, he eliminated the hopelessly sinful, he scattered men throughout the world. In everything that has taken place his will has been manifest. Nothing has been without a reason. After long preparation the stage is now ready for his particular action upon those who are to be the ancestors of the Chosen People.

II. CHAPTERS 11¹⁰ TO 25¹⁸: ABRAHAM

10-26. Abraham's Ancestry Traced to Noah. This is a simple genealogy, in P's usual formulæ, bridging the period from Noah to Abraham.

27-32. The Genealogy of Terah. As it is to Abraham that later Israel looked as the real founder of the nation, this division of the book of Genesis properly gives his genealogy, taken from P, which explains how Abraham came to western Asia. His father, Terah, is represented as moving from southern Babylonia—from Ur of the Chaldees—at an advanced age, after one of his sons had died. Since it is expected that the son will survive the father, special note is taken of the fact that Haran dies in the presence (or sight) of his father, i.e., while his father was yet living (v. 28); Terah takes with him his remaining two sons, Nahor and Abram, and his grandson, Lot, son of the dead Haran. The names of the wives of Abram and Nahor are given, and it is observed that Sarai had borne Abram no son. The migration reaches Haran, an important center roughly midway between Mesopotamia and Palestine, and there the aged Terah dies.

CHAPTER XII

1-9. The Promise Made to Abram and His Journey to Palestine. The thread of 11²⁷⁻³² is continued in vv. 4b (from and Abram was . . .) and 5, inserted by the compiler in the main narrative, which clearly comes from the southern group of traditions. Except in v. 5 (which implies a fairly long residence in Haran) there is no mention of Abram's original home, and the southern tradition leaves us free to assume that his call came to him either in Ur or in Haran. But that is a minor detail and does not affect the main facts. Wherever he was at the time, Abram heard the voice of Jehovah, and received his promise of blessing. He will be so prosperous that when in after ages men wish to invoke the highest good for themselves or for one another they will say, "May you be blest as Abram was" (this is probably the meaning of v. 3b; cf. 26⁴ mg.).

With this promise, Abram moves westward till he reaches Palestine, and then turns southward through the country. Several places are mentioned where later tradition recorded his presence. One of these is in the Shechem district, and there Abram receives a theophany at the Terebinth of Divination, a sacred tree whose name was probably explained by the story. Here he builds an altar, and a second at some spot not closely specified between Bethel and Ai. We have thus two ancient sanctuaries whose foundation is carried back to Abram. Thence he continues his journey southward till he reaches the Negeb, the dry pasture-land to the south of Judah.

10-20. Abram in Egypt. Temporary migration to Egypt in time of famine was not infrequent in Palestine and northern Arabia, for Egypt was one of the most fruitful countries in the ancient world. It is, therefore, by no means unnatural to find Abram following the usual custom. We may be sure that the Israelite tradition loved to dwell on the physical beauty of its great ancestress, with the implication that she was unapproached by any of the Egyptian women. Abram himself does not appear in a favorable light, especially when contrasted with the mild and generous Egyptian king. Nothing is said as to the means whereby Pharaoh discovered the cause of the plagues, and it is significant that when the deceit is detected no harm befalls the deceiver. Judged by modern moral standards, Abram's conduct is indefensible, and the story helps us to realize how much men have learned in the succeeding centuries. To early Israel it was probably a source of glee that their forefather could so successfully hoodwink the mighty king of Egypt, and in the end make capital out of his very difficulties and dangers.

CHAPTER XIII

Abram Separates From Lot; Abram's Magnanimity. The narrative introduces us to the beauty and richness of the southern end of the Jordan Valley. It is possible that the writer means us to think that there is as yet no Dead Sea; it certainly is implied that the catastrophe which turned the district to the south of it into a barren desert has not yet taken place. Lot, given the choice by Abram, who is ready to surrender his rights rather than engage in strife, selects this as his home, though it brings him into contact with the city dwellers. To the wandering shepherd, the city often appears a nest of iniquity; and this is one of the many passages in J which glorify the moral value of pastoral life as compared with that of the settled community. There is a lofty hill near the site of the ancient Bethel from which a wide view can be obtained, and Abram is depicted as standing on its summit and seeing the country stretch away to the far horizon on every side. This, says Jehovah to him, is to be his possession, and, in the persons of his descendants—so numerous as to outnumber the grains of sand on the seashore—he is to be its owner. (See art., Land of Palestine, pp. 56-7.)

The passage sets before us Israel's ideal man, peaceful, generous, humble, receiving the ideal blessing, namely, the expansion of his own personality into a great nation and the ownership of wide, fruitful lands.

CHAPTER XIV

Abram and the Mesopotamian Rulers. Perhaps no narrative in the whole story of the Patriarchs has aroused more discussion than this. It comes from a source which is independent of the main groups of tradition represented elsewhere in the book, and links the life of Abram with the great world even more closely than the references to Egypt. The latter give us no direct indication as to the Pharaohs with whom Abram and his immediate descendants came into contact. In addition to the Mesopotamian kings, we hear of Melchizedek, king of Salem (vv. 18-20; cf. Heb. 5⁶⁻¹⁰, notes), but Abram's meeting with him is not necessarily a part of the original narrative; it is introduced most abruptly, and v. 21 follows naturally and immediately on v. 17.

The historical possibility of such an expedition has never been questioned, though certain details have been doubted; for instance (a) the exact line of march followed by the Mesopotamian kings, which took them through lands where the water supply is quite inadequate for any considerable armed force; (b) the names of the five Canaanite kings, which look like the inventions of a hostile narrator, since they all suggest wickedness and hatred; (c) the number of Abram's servants, which is identical with that which can be obtained by adding up the numerical values of the letters composing the name "Eliezer" (see 152, 3). The Melchizedek incident, also, has aroused some suspicion; but, as we have seen, it may have been a later insertion in the story.

The discoveries of the last half century have thrown a flood of light on early Mesopotamia, and it has been claimed in some quarters that the historical accuracy of this narrative has been fully substantiated by archaeological evidence. However, it may be stated clearly and emphatically, that not one of the points mentioned above has received the slightest support from any archaeological material that has come to light. Moreover, with reference to the events in which the Mesopotamian kings participated, archaeology goes no further than to reveal certain names which may be identical with at least some of the names given to the four kings. Thus Khammurabi of Babylon is possibly—even probably, though Assyriologists have not always agreed on this point—the original of Amraphel. A king of Earsa, a generation before Khammurabi, was called Warad-Sin, which name, owing to the peculiar script used in ancient Mesopotamia (cuneiform ideographic and syllabic writing) may have been equivalent to Eri-aku (= Arioch). Tidal has been identified with a certain Tud-khu-la, whose name appears as that of a contemporary (roughly) of Khammurabi, though he is nowhere described as a king. Goim may be a corrupt form of "Gutim," a geographical name of the period, or (with the meaning "nations") it may refer to hordes from the north, possibly the ancestors of the Medes. Finally Chedorloamer is probably a Hebrew way of writing the name "Kudur-lagamar," a perfectly good Elamite name, though it has not yet been identified for certain on any inscription. But the father of Warad-Sin was an Elamite king Kudurmabuk, which name contains the name of the same deity and is formed on the same general principle.

The style of the narrative is archaistic (rather than archaic) and suggests an imitation of ancient records. Obviously, the fact that the names of the persons mentioned are genuine does not certify the historicity of the events in which they are said to have played a part. In all probability, a comparatively late writer, finding an ancient tradition of a Mesopotamian raid into Palestine which took place not long before 2000 B.C., fitted it into the story of Abram, in order to show the valor and military prowess of his hero. We see Abram, not merely as the peaceful shepherd, but the man of action, faithful to the duties imposed by ties of kinship, bold, swift to move, generous and unselfish.

The interlude of Melchizedek is most significant, as it traces back the sanctity of Jerusalem (clearly the place indicated as Salem) to a very early period, and implies that even the earliest ancestor of Israel recognized this as the proper place at which tithes should be paid. In its present form, then, the story dates from a comparatively late period, when attempts were being made to insist on Jerusalem as the one legitimate sanctuary for all Israel, though we may safely assume that the narrative is based on ancient, possibly very ancient, tradition. It is noticeable that the divine name used is "El Elyon"—the Most High God; evidently, those responsible for the present form of the story are aware of the view that it was not till Israel reached Sinai that the name "Jehovah" was revealed (see Ex. 313-22, notes).

CHAPTER XV

The Covenant With Abram. It would appear that we have here an interweaving of two narratives, one of which is very incomplete. (This is suggested by the repetition of the same idea in vv. 2, 3, and by the fact that while v. 5 gives us a night scene, vv. 7-21 describe events which took place in the daytime, and ended only as darkness was falling.) According to one—the more fragmentary—Abram complains that in spite of the promises which have been made to him, he has no son to carry on his life and personality, and his successor must be a slave, one born to slavery in his own household. (So much seems to be clear, though the meaning of v. 2b is uncertain and its text doubtful.) The answer is that his descendants shall be as numerous as the stars (v. 5); in vv. 13-16 a brief account of their history up to the time of their actual occupation of the land is given.

The other narrative records a covenant made between Jehovah and Abram. Once more we meet with the naïve presentation and the anthropomorphic theology characteristic of other stories of this type (cf. 24b-25, notes). The covenant is ratified by means of a ceremony which is familiar to us also from other quarters: Certain victims are slain, and their bodies are cut into two parts across the middle; the parts are then placed on the ground, with a space between them; naturally vultures and kites come down on the carcasses, but Abram drives them away, till, toward evening, as the sun is about to set, he falls into that peculiar state into which God throws men when he wishes to act directly upon them (cf. 221 Job 613). Though the sun is not yet below the horizon, the world grows suddenly and mysteriously dark to his senses, and in the midst of the gloom he sees Jehovah, in the form of fire, passing between the pieces of the victim. Doubtless previously he himself had walked between them, for the essence of this form of covenant ritual lay in the fact that both parties walked between the pieces of the victim. Thus they both entered into it, became part of it, formed one continuous living entity with it, and therefore with one another. In the life taken from the slain creatures they found a unifying force which bound them to one another; and so, for the purposes of the covenant, they were no longer two separate entities, but one (cf. Heb. 613-20, notes). The terms to be observed by Abram are not stated, but the divine promise is clearly set forth; Abram, in the persons of his descendants, is to possess the whole of the land of Palestine.

CHAPTER XVI

Hagar and the Birth of Ishmael. This narrative is intended to illustrate the relationship between Israel and certain Bedouin tribes who went under the general name of Ishmael. The Arabs to this day believe themselves to be the descendants of Abram and Hagar. The characters are clearly brought out: Abram, kindly, patient and just, longing for a son, yet not suggesting means whereby he might obtain one; Sarai, the typical Oriental woman, unable to endure the disgrace of childlessness, and willing to bear a son by proxy, yet bitterly jealous and unreasonable when the desired event happens; Hagar, the slave, unable to behave modestly when she feels that she has risen above her mistress, and without strength of character to bear patiently her mistress' harshness; finally, Ishmael, the "wild ass of a man," the free, uncontrolled, swift, and unaccountable son of the desert, such as the Bedouin often are to this day.

There are other points of importance. For the first time we meet with a type of theophany through the angel of Jehovah. This seems in the first instance to have been simply another way of describing Jehovah himself, but there is beginning to arise a feeling that it is beneath his dignity to appear in all his fullness; consequently, the "angel" may be regarded as a subordinate manifestation, though not yet a distinct personality (cf. Ex. 13²¹, 22 14¹⁹, 20 33¹⁴, notes). We observe too that it is from the events recorded here that a certain well gets its name. As the text stands the whole name is not explained, but it is possible that the latter part of v. 13 should read I have seen a God and have survived after seeing him. If so, the word "survived" would give a clue to the element "Lahai." This, however, is pure conjecture, and it may well be that this part of the name of the well had no explanation at all in the original narrative.

CHAPTERS 17¹ TO 18¹⁵: GOD'S COVENANT WITH ABRAHAM, AND THE PROMISE OF ISAAC

This section includes two narratives, both promising Abraham—17⁵ records the change of the name from Abram to Abraham—a son. Both give an explanation of the name "Isaac," interpreting it as "laughter." This is more obvious in the former of the two, where Abraham is expressly told that the name is to be Isaac (17¹⁹); but it is equally clear from the other account that a reason for the name is being offered (18¹²).

CHAPTER XVII

Rite of Circumcision; Abraham to Have a Son. It will have been noticed that up to the present we have had only two extended narratives in the P group. One of these is the story of the creation and the other the story of the Flood. Each of them ends with the establishment of some feature of the ceremonial or religious life, creation culminating in the Sabbath, and the Flood in the permission to eat animal flesh, a permission which is connected with the prohibition of blood, and with the law of blood-revenge. This second narrative is concerned also with a "covenant," made by God with Noah, thus narrowing down, if we may use such a phrase to represent the view of the writer, the area of God's special interest to the sons of Noah. We notice the same general features here. We have a "covenant" made with Abraham (cf. the "covenant" in ch. 15), who is promised, not only that his posterity shall be very great, but also (when he suspects that the reference is to Ishmael) that a son will yet be born to Sarah, in spite of her apparently prohibitive age. The mention of Ishmael occasions the promise that he too will become a great nation, though, while the sons of the unborn child are to include kings, Ishmael's posterity will attain the rank only of princes. The superiority of Israel over Edom is thus doubly indicated by the higher title of its rulers and by its descent from the free wife, not from the slave (cf. Gal. 4²¹⁻³¹, notes).

Just as the covenant with Noah is confirmed by the rainbow, the covenant with Abram is attested by three new names. The first is that of God himself, who reveals his name as "El Shaddai" (God Almighty). The precise meaning of this term has not been ascertained, and it was not understood even by the Greek translators of the Pentateuch in the third century B.C. But it is clear that it involved the communication to Abram of some special character in God; for a name to the ancient Hebrew was never merely a name; it was an essential element in the personality of him who bore it, and the communication of a particular name by God indicated that in a special way he was to be known to the man or men to whom the communication was made (cf. Acts 23⁸, notes). Further, the name of Abram is to be Abraham—again a change whose significance is not clear. At the same time the woman, through whom El Shaddai will fulfill his part in the covenant, is called Sarah, instead of Sarai. Once more we have to confess that the difference between the two names is not clear. Either might mean "princess" in Hebrew, but, as the family is represented as coming from Mesopotamia, it is more likely that the Babylonian significance—"queen"—is intended.

All this is God's side of the covenant. On the human side a new rite—new at least to Abraham—is established, that of circumcision. This was practiced by the Egyptians (and many other African peoples), and, in historic times, by all the nations round Israel except the Philistines. But it was not a Mesopotamian custom, and its institution here marks a clear and definite break with the past. Abraham, here as in all else the faithful worshiper, loses not a single day in fulfilling his part in the covenant; and we are allowed to suspect that it is as a result of this that Isaac, the first person to be born under the covenant, comes into being.

Thus is inaugurated a new stage in the history which the priestly writer has set himself to trace. The first is indicated by the creation, the second begins when humanity, purged of its wicked elements, makes a fresh start with Noah; here we have the further revelation signalized by circumcision and the new name, El Shaddai. The fourth is yet to come, and in Ex. 63 for El Shaddai is substituted the "final" name for Israel's God, YAHWEH, and in the covenant made through Moses, the true founder of the nation, the writer finds the completion of revelation as he understands it, and the goal toward which his history leads (cf. Ex. 313-22, notes).

CHAPTER XVIII

1-15. The Promise of a Son again Repeated to Abraham. This second narrative of the promise of Isaac exhibits all the characteristics which we have learned to associate with J. Abraham is still under the terebinth at Mamre (cf. 1318), near Hebron. Revelation comes to him through a theophany; though it is noticeable that Jehovah does not come alone, and we may have here a relic of ancient polytheistic views which has been overlooked by the writer of the narrative. (Other explanations of the three persons have, of course, been given by both Jewish and Christian theologians.) We see Jehovah appearing as an ordinary traveler, and accepting the rich hospitality of a generous sheikh. No serious conversation is attempted till the visitors are served, and the courtesy of Abraham is carried to such lengths that he ministers to his guests in person, instead of committing the task to one of his numerous slaves. We have too the picture of Sarah, like a true Oriental woman, concealing herself from the visitors for whom she has cooked food, yet listening to what is being said, and ashamed of the laughter which has been forced from her by the suggestion that these two old people are to have a son born to them. But we have also a very important note—perhaps the climax of the whole passage—in v. 14; nothing is too hard for Jehovah. As sole Lord of creation he could do as he pleased; it was he who had made natural laws, and therefore he could "suspend" them.

CHAPTERS 1816 TO 1938: THE DESTRUCTION OF SODOM AND THE ESCAPE OF LOT

Narratives which deal with Lot form no part of the more or less continuous story of the ancestors of Israel proper, and are digressions which explain the relation of Ammon and Moab to Israel. The narrative falls into four sections: (a) 1816-33, the conversation between Jehovah and Abraham; (b) 191-14, Lot's entertainment of the divine messengers; (c) 1915-29, the escape of Lot; (d) 1930-38, the ancestry of Moab and Ammon.

16-33. Jehovah and Abraham. The aim of this section is to magnify the hero-ancestor of Israel. To the ancient mind God is always terrible; it is Jesus who alone has fully delivered the religious spirit from the dread of the "numinous." How great, then, must he be who not only dares to meet Jehovah face to face and to argue with him, but also succeeds in obtaining his request! We are already far on the way which led to the prophetic designation of Abraham as the "friend," the "lover" of Jehovah (2 Chr. 207 Isa. 418). Further, we should note that Abraham's whole appeal is based on the assumption of the supremely moral character of Jehovah (v. 25). Here again we have a link with the teaching of the great prophets, and find an illustration of one of the fundamental distinctions between the faith of Israel and that of all other peoples of the ancient world.

CHAPTER XIX

1-14. The Sin of the Men of Sodom. There is hardly any passage in which the fundamental contrast between the good man and the wicked is more strongly brought out than it is here. On the one hand we have the Sodomites, first of all, presented as failing in the elementary duties of hospitality, and leaving them to a comparative stranger to perform (vv. 1, 2). Then we have them shown as given to that loathsome vice which owes its name to their behavior, and prepared to go to any length to gratify their lust (v. 5). Over against them stands Lot, fulfilling the duties of a host, and pressing on the strangers the courtesy which at first they are politely reluctant to accept (vv. 2, 3). Finally he feels so strongly the claims of his position as a host that he is prepared to make a sacrifice almost incredible in a Hebrew hero, and offer his own daughters to save his guests from indignity (v. 8). Once more we notice the stress laid in the patriarchal stories on the virtue of hospitality as one of the first and most exacting of all human duties. This is further illustrated by the fact that Lot's behavior meets with immediate reward; he is warned of the impending fate of Sodom, and given an opportunity of saving not only himself, but also any who are connected with him. Yet even his sons-in-law are men of Sodom, and he alone is righteous (v. 14).

15-29. Sodom and Gomorrah Destroyed; Escape of Lot. Since Lot's descendants were later located to the east of the Dead Sea, not to the south, it is sometimes supposed that the original story did not mention Zoar, and that vv. 17-22 are a later addition intended to explain how this little town continued to exist in the region of the catastrophe. Whatever one may think regarding details, it is clear that some tremendous event must have occurred in the Dead Sea region which later generations never forgot. V. 25 suggests a double tradition, for the word overthrow suggests an earthquake. Some have thought of an explosion of bitumen wells, others of a volcanic eruption. But whatever the physical cause, the moral and religious lesson remains unaffected. The sin of the cities meets with divine vengeance, while Lot's righteousness secures his safety in the midst of a disaster so great that in far-away Hebron Abraham can see the signs of it.

30-38. The Origin of the Moabites and Ammonites. These verses have been interpreted as a bitter sneer at Moab and Ammon. But it is possible that we have here a relic of a tradition which made the disaster universal, as was the Flood. In that case Lot's daughters must be regarded as heroines who adopted desperate measures to repopulate the earth.

CHAPTER XX

Abraham and Abimelech. This story (E) has parallels in chs. 12 and 26; each of the three narratives having its own characteristics. Even though Abimelech has done no intentional wrong, he and his realm are made to suffer. But God intervenes to prevent the worst happening, and warns the king of Gerar (between Beersheba and Kadesh) of the wrong he has nearly committed. God is interested in preventing sin, especially when it might defile or endanger the race which he has chosen as his own.

Abraham appears in a somewhat better light than in ch. 12. His lie about Sarah is not so direct a lie; it is true that they agree to conceal the fact that she is his wife, but at the same time the actual statement that they make is not false—she is, in a sense, his sister (v. 12). Further, Abraham, in spite of his cowardice, is represented as being a religious hero. He is great in the sight of God, and his prayer will avail for the healing of Abimelech.

Abimelech himself is favorably presented. Though he has sinned—or nearly sinned—in act, his conscience is clear, and he is prepared to make what restitution is possible, compensating both Sarah and Abraham. There is a touch of sarcasm in the way in which he insists on the brother-sister relation of Abraham and Sarah in making his expiatory gift. Unlike Pharaoh, he is magnanimous enough not to send Abraham away, but invites him to make his home where he will in his land.

CHAPTER XXI

1-21. The Birth of Isaac and the Expulsion of Ishmael. In the opening verses, describing the birth of Isaac, we have all three groups of narrative represented. E supplies only v. 6a. Since this single sentence taken from E is obviously a fragment of the tradition, it will be enough to note that it simply records a reason for Isaac's name—Sarah finds such joy in the event that she says "God has made laughter for me," i.e., "God has made me laugh."

P's stately, though summary narrative resumes the story of ch. 17; it records the fulfillment of God's promise, the naming of the child in accordance with the command given in 17¹⁰, and his circumcision in accordance with the command recorded in 17¹².

J's narrative gives yet another explanation of the name of Isaac, and since this type of passage has already explained the word in 18¹², we may have here a later addition to the original J. Sarah gives her son his name because everybody will laugh at her for becoming a mother at such an age (cf. note above on v. 6a, which gives E's explanation of the name).

The continuation of the story in vv. 8-21 comes entirely from E, and is to some extent parallel with J's narrative in ch. 16. There is, of course, no discrepancy between the two stories, for J deals with the period before the birth of Ishmael. In both stories Sarah is represented as the rather small-minded, jealous woman. At the weaning-festival she sees Ishmael playing with her son (so probably the original text of v. 9) and is filled with anger at the thought that there is someone who may claim a share in the inheritance. In contrast to ch. 16, this passage represents Abraham as unwilling to accede to his wife's demand until he is directly ordered to do so by God himself.

The suffering and despair of the child and his mother are finely depicted. He is still small; the language of the passage implies that Hagar carried him until she was compelled to lay him under a bush. Especially touching is the mother's dread of seeing her child die. But her tenderness is matched only by that of God himself. He hears the cry and rescues the little one, showing Hagar where water may be found. It may well be that originally this story explained the name Ishmael = "God hears"; these words are at all events the key to the whole narrative. It is just because God hears the cry of the sufferer at the last extremity that Ishmael grew up to be the founder of the archer tribe that in after years bore his name (v. 20).

22-34. Abraham and Abimelech. This narrative is clearly composite, giving two reasons for the name Beersheba, the one being that current in the north—"the well of the oath"; the other that peculiar to J—"the well of the seven."

E's story connects with ch. 20. We are to suppose that, according to that group of narratives, the birth of Isaac and the expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael took place in Gerar. Curiously enough Gerar seems to be placed in v. 32 in Philistia. This is in any case an anachronism, for there were no Philistines in Canaan for centuries after the time of Abraham. The kindness and forbearance which Abimelech has shown to Abraham are not wholly disinterested, for the latter is very prosperous, and Abimelech and his chief captain Phicol (a name referable to none of the known languages of Canaan) seek to make a formal treaty with him. This is done by the exchange of gifts and by the oath of a covenant.

J assigns a different motive for the agreement. There has been a dispute over the ownership of certain wells. To settle the matter Abraham, who has failed to get satisfaction in answer to his complaints, sends seven sheep to Abimelech. By accepting them the latter acknowledges the giver's right to the wells in question, and they thus receive the name by which they are ever after known.

CHAPTER XXII

1-19. The Sacrifice of Isaac. This very familiar narrative is to be attributed in the main to E, though there is some ground for regarding vv. 15-19 as an appendix by a later editor. The story is told with matchless art, and with a masterly reticence which enables us to understand and interpret the feelings of the actors in spite of the fact that these are never mentioned. There are several points which need to be considered.

The first of these is the original significance of the story in its primitive form. No place named Moriah is known to us (2 Chr. 31 is probably based on a late and erroneous interpretation), but some scholars, finding a clue in v. 14, identify the spot with a certain Jeriel mentioned in 1 Chr. 72. It is supposed that there was here an ancient sanctuary at which the first-born sons were commonly offered, and that this passage (in its original form) offered an explanation of the practice. Later Hebrew feeling modified the earliest tradition by the introduction of the surrogate. Others have thought this to be an explanation of the practice of substituting animals for the human victims, human sacrifice being common among Semitic peoples and others (cf. 2 Kings 327). In favor of this view it may be pointed out that Abraham is certainly represented as believing that God might legitimately make such a demand of him, though fuller light must show that such an impulse must come from another source.

In the second place we have to note the use made of the old story by the writer. It is a test of Abraham's faith, and as such has been universally recognized. He can trust God, however strange his command may seem to be; the appendix recognizes that such confidence will meet with its reward in the reaffirmation of the divine promise (cf. Rom. 4, notes).

But there is yet a further significance to the narrative. As with the story in ch. 20, we have the picture of the divine plan surviving apparent difficulties. God's purpose is again on the verge of being finally frustrated, this time by the death of the person through whom its fulfillment is to be secured, but he finds again a way of escape, and triumphs over the obstacle. It is as though he were offering to man a supreme gift which is always imperiled but never destroyed—and he himself would not have it otherwise.

20-24. An Aramæan Genealogy. This is, apparently, from J, and is an account of the relation between Israel and the Aramæan tribes to the northeast of Palestine. It is necessary from the narrator's point of view, in order to explain events which are to be recorded later in the story of Jacob.

CHAPTER XXIII

The Death of Sarah and the Purchase of the Cave of Machpelah. It seems that this whole narrative comes from priestly sources; it was introduced to give an account of the way in which the first plot of ground passed into the possession of Israel. There is a stately courtesy about the narrative, which reflects the later view of the patriarchal life. Abraham has but his tent, and seeks a permanent resting place for his dead. In lordly fashion Ephron, who is not approached directly—another Oriental trait—offers not only the cave but also the whole field in which it is, for nothing. At the same time he mentions a very high price, which he regards as a trifle, and Abraham pays without a trace of that haggling which is the universal accompaniment of business in the East. So Abraham's first foothold in the home of his posterity is won through his bereavement.

CHAPTER XXIV

The Marriage of Isaac. The story as it has come down to us is essentially in a form current in the south, therefore J. But there are various slight divergences in the narrative which make us suspect we have here represented a double tradition, and that elements of both have been interwoven to produce the present narrative, though any detailed analysis must be uncertain. The narrative is a perfect specimen of the story-teller's art. We have the old father, at the point of death (he is clearly dead by the time the caravan returns), anxious above all things for the purity of the blood of his descendants, and refusing to allow it to be contaminated by intermarriage with the settled inhabitants of the land. There is the faithful and pious slave, concerned only to do the will of his master, and recognizing the divine aid which is granted to him.

On the other hand, there are the Aramæans, an interesting family: of the parents little is said; but they recognize that since Jehovah has so clearly shown his will, the matter is out of their hands. Yet they press on the slave an extensive hospitality, which he refuses only on the ground that it might be a betrayal of that divine grace which has so consistently been shown to him. At the same time (and this is one of the discrepancies in the narrative) Rebekah is left to make a perfectly free choice. Her decision is in full accord with her general character, and she is pictured as an ideal figure of Oriental girlhood, modest, kindly, generous, and pious. Her brother Laban is already displaying features which manifest themselves even more strongly in later life (see chs. 29–31). What convinces him is neither the demand of kinship nor the will of God, but the sight of the costly jewels on his sister's arm. Finally we have the presentation—lightly drawn as are all the personal references to Isaac—of the young bridegroom, whose mother's death, years before, has left a gap in his life which is only filled when another woman comes to enter into a yet closer and dearer relationship. It only remains to add that in v. 60 the narrator has included a bridal blessing which may go back to a very ancient time.

CHAPTER XXV

1–6. The Children of Keturah. This is apparently from J, and is intended to state the connection between Israel and certain tribes of the eastern and southern wilderness which Israel regarded as somewhat distantly related. The best known of these is Midian, for the Asshurites mentioned here are clearly not to be identified with the Assyrians, in spite of the similarity in name. By describing these tribes as descended from a secondary wife, the Israelite historian suggested that while the kinship was admitted, these others stood on a lower level. The same point is brought out by the statement that Abraham dismissed the sons of the concubines (probably including Ishmael) with gifts, that they might not in any way interfere with Isaac, the legitimate son of the promise.

7–11. Death and Burial of Abraham. This is clearly from P. We notice that there is apparently no hint of the expulsion of Ishmael or of the birth of other sons. Isaac and his half-brother seem to be living together, at least till the death of their father, and to unite in paying him the last rites due to the dead.

12–18. The Genealogy of Ishmael. This genealogy rounds off the story of Abraham, by tracing, as far as is necessary from the point of view of the writer, the other branch of Abraham's family. This done, the narrative can now concentrate on Isaac and his children.

19–34. See below.

III. CHAPTERS 25¹⁹ TO 36⁴³: JACOB

This section of the book of Genesis falls into three parts, illustrating (a) the relations between Jacob and his brother Esau (25¹⁹–27⁴⁶); (b) the relations between Jacob and Laban (28¹–32³); and (c) the narratives of Jacob's residence in Canaan, leading up to the fourth section of the book, the story of Joseph. There are a few obtrusive incidents and passages, of which the most noticeable is ch. 26, which deals with the fortunes of Isaac, and strongly recalls incidents recorded of the life of Abraham. The three main types of narrative—southern, northern, and priestly—still appear, though there is very little priestly narrative, those parts of the section being mainly confined to lists of names.

CHAPTERS 25¹⁹ TO 27⁴⁶: JACOB AND ESAU

There are two main incidents, the exchange of the birthright and the theft of the blessing, designed to explain two facts, the hostility of the semi-nomad or even semi-Bedouin people of Edom to Israel, and the fact that the former was, throughout a great part of the monarchic period, subject to the latter. There is a suggestion, borne out by occasional references, that originally Edom was the stronger of the two. In exilic and post-exilic times Israel developed a bitter and vindictive hatred of Edom, which goes back to the part played by the southern people in the sack of Jerusalem, 586 B.C. (See the commentary on Obadiah.) Our present narratives took form some centuries before this event, and show no signs of its effect on the mind of Israel.

19-28. The Birth of Isaac's Sons. The two boys are more than mere individuals; they are types of humanity, and the rivalry between the two is foreshadowed even before they are born, in the oracle granted to their anxious mother. The narrative explains their names: Jacob is connected with a noun meaning "heel," from which is derived a verb meaning "trip up," "overreach." Esau is often known by two other names, and, curiously enough, it is these that are alluded to here, Edom, meaning "red," and Seir, meaning "hairy." There is also an indication of the sociological contrast between them: Esau is the typical Bedouin chief, a hunter who has no property beyond his weapons, and lives on wild game, besides (presumably) what he can gain by plundering his neighbors. Jacob, on the other hand, is "civilized"—that is why his mother likes him more than his brother—the typical nomad shepherd, who has a tent and flocks of his own, and so he stands for the higher, more developed social order (v. 27). In a sense the rivalry between the brothers is the conflict between the two levels of culture.

29-34. Jacob Gains the Coveted Birthright. We have here an explanation of the fact that, though Edom came to its national heritage earlier than Israel, it nevertheless had to take second place. The narrative furnishes at the same time an extraordinarily valuable character sketch of the two chief actors. On the one hand, the hunter, failing in his quest, finds the man of higher culture stewing a lentil porridge, and, knowing nothing of civilized cookery, he simply cries out for some of the "red stuff" to stay his hunger. On the other hand stands the more sophisticated man—clever or cunning according to the point of view from which he is regarded—who sees his chance of attaining supremacy and takes it.

We need not doubt that to the early tellers and hearers of this story Jacob's craftiness and address were a matter for pride. This was the way in which the "smart" Israelite might be expected to get the better of the "dull" Edomite.

CHAPTER XXVI

Isaac Among the Philistines. This narrative may have stood originally before 25²¹. Of the three patriarchs, Isaac is by far the least clearly drawn. In this, the only narrative in which he appears as the chief actor, we have little more than a reflection of events which occurred in the life of his father. There are slight differences, indicating a more developed attitude toward life and religion. Gerar is now definitely a Philistine city. Rebekah is not actually taken into the royal harem; the deceit is discovered (and by purely human means, not by divine revelation) in time to prevent matters going thus far (cf. ch. 20).

Vv. 17-22 give an account of strife over water, recalling 21²⁵. Vv. 23-33 give a description of the naming of Beersheba, which is parallel to the E element in 21²²⁻³³, though some of the details are different. We may conjecture that the same story was told about both Abraham and Isaac, but that it was applied by E to Abraham and by J to Isaac.

V. 34 is P's notice of the marriages of Esau, and prepares the way for its account of the departure of Jacob in 27⁴⁶.

CHAPTER XXVII

Jacob Steals Esau's Blessing. Except for the last verse (P), this narrative is a closely woven composition taken from J and E. The separation of the two is not easy. (For a possible division of the chapter between the two sources, see T. H. Robinson, Genesis in Colloquial Speech, pp. 31f. and 61f.)

Exactitude in the critical analysis of this chapter matters the less since the essence of both narratives is the same. In both we have the foolish and deceitful mother, the cunning and treacherous son, the blind old father, and the vigorous but simple-minded victim. The full extent of the harm done, however, is only revealed in E, when, in answer to the pressure of his unfortunate son, Isaac at length speaks. But, being in that prophetic mood which, to the Hebrew mind, so often immediately precedes death, he is unable wholly to control his language, and the words he actually utters are a ghastly parody of the blessing he has pronounced on Jacob. The keen edge of the oracle lies in the double meaning of a preposition, unfortunately misunderstood by many translators, ancient and modern. It may be partitive in sense, and is so used in the blessing of Jacob—some of the dew of the heavens, and some of the fat of the land (v. 28). But it may also be privative, and bears this sinister meaning in the words spoken to Esau—far from the fat of the land . . . and far from the dew of the heavens (v. 39). So it comes to pass that with almost identical words Jacob is blessed and Esau cursed. Small wonder that both Rebekah and Jacob knew there was reason to fear the rage of Esau. But, as Rebekah sees (this point is from J alone), her elder son is incapable of sustained purpose, even in his wrath (v. 45), and she is confident that the lapse of time will wipe out from his mind the memory of the wrong he has suffered at his brother's hands.

Jacob's action (and Rebekah's) is morally indefensible. The words of the dying father especially, when his spirit is fortified by his favorite meal, will have a validity of their own, a real value and force as active and efficient agents whose strength will not be exhausted by the passage of time. To some extent the words are independent of the speaker; he can control them partially in the act of utterance, but when once they have passed his lips they are entirely independent of his will; he can neither retract them nor modify their application. He did not mean to bless Jacob; but when once the fateful syllables have been pronounced he is helpless.

All the actors in the story know this, and the two conspirators are prepared to go to any lengths to secure for Jacob the desired victory. Yet the story is told without a hint of disapproval, and, as in the birthright story, there may be even a suppressed delight in the cunning of the ancestor of the nation, who thus cleverly built up for all time the prosperity of his descendants and their superiority to their southern neighbors. Not the least valuable element in Scripture is the way in which it shows the growth of the moral and religious sense, preserving for us the obsolete, the inadequate, the false, that we may contrast with these things the growth of the permanent, the perfect, the true (cf. Mt. 5:17-48, and art., The Divine Element in the Bible, p. 26).

this section explains the connection between Israel and Syria. Again emphasis is laid on the superiority and cleverness of the former, though it may be well to note that these qualities are illustrated not by deliberate deceit of the rival, but by Jacob's success in meeting and overcoming the attempts of Laban to get the better of his younger relative.

CHAPTER XXVIII

1-9. Occasion of Jacob's Journey to Pad-dan Aram. These verses (from the source P) contain the account, from the priestly point of view, of the reasons which sent Jacob to Pad-dan Aram. Just as the holy race must not be contaminated at its source by admixture of Canaanite blood through Isaac's marriage (ch. 24), so Jacob in turn must avoid repeating the offense of his brother (26^{34-27⁴⁶}), and must seek a wife from among the kinsfolk of his mother. It is noticeable that P ignores the hostility between Jacob and Esau, that he does not suggest that Jacob had anything to fear by remaining in Palestine, and that the only mention of a blessing given to Jacob is the natural dismissal of the son by a father. The immediate effect on Esau is noted: he does not feel anger against Jacob, but tries to put right what is wrong in the eyes of his parents, and takes a wife from the subordinate kinsmen of his family, i.e., from the tribe of Ishmael. There may have been a tradition of an Ishmaelite element in the Edomite blood.

10-22. Jacob's Vision at Bethel. The remainder of the chapter is a combination of elements drawn from both J and E. While differing characteristically in details (cf. vv. 10, 13-16, 19, with the rest of the section), the two narratives tell substantially the same story, and describe the first great critical experience in the religious life of Jacob. He comes into direct touch with his God, for the first time, and unexpectedly. As special revelations have been made to his grandfather (15¹⁻¹⁷, notes) and to his father (26¹⁻⁵, notes), so he himself learns from the mouth of Jehovah that he is in the direct line of promise. At the very moment in which he leaves the land promised to his posterity, he is assured of his return under divine protection, and of the fulfillment of the will of God through him.

Both forms of the story probably represent a sacred narrative told at Bethel, explaining the presence of a particularly holy sanctuary there, and giving the reason for one of its cultic objects, the sacred pillar. It is noticeable that E records the establishment of this emblem and the adoration paid at it without

CHAPTERS 28¹ TO 32³: JACOB AND LABAN

The scene is now transferred to northern Mesopotamia, a district called by J Haran, by E the land of the sons of the East, and by P Paddan Aram. Just as the last division of the Jacob stories has thrown back into the past the relations between Israel and Edom, the least sense of wrong, though later Israel held these pillars to be idolatrous, and condemned worship there (2 Kings 23¹⁴). To those who paid their vows on this spot in later days it was enough that God had shown himself there. True, he could be everywhere, but there were special places in which he dwelt, and these could be made known only through his willing appearance to his worshippers. Jacob's dream convinces him that this is one of the homes of God—probably in the earliest forms of the story the home of an "El," or spirit—for in early days men often believed that unseen beings dwelt in such objects—and it therefore becomes holy for all the generations that follow him. It would seem too that E, at any rate, traces back to the very beginning of the sanctuary the custom of offering tithes there (cf., e.g., Amos 4⁴).

CHAPTER XXIX

1-30. Jacob's Two Marriages. Scholars recognize here a double thread, but the disentanglement of the two elements is difficult and the result hardly certain. The analysis is not a matter of great importance, as there are no serious differences of presentation between the two narratives.

A passage like this enables us to see the ideal man as conceived by Israel in the days of the early monarchy. Evidently the moral standard was not as high as that of prophetic and post-prophetic Israel; nevertheless, in his dealings with Laban, Jacob appears in a less unfavorable light than in his triumphs over Esau. And we can readily imagine how early Israel loved to dwell on the skill with which their ancestor met the crafty Aramæan and defeated him with his own weapons.

There is, of course, more than this in the story. The abnormal physical strength of Jacob, aroused by the appearance of his cousin, is emphasized by his ability to do a piece of work which usually demanded the united efforts of all the shepherds of the district (vv. 9-11). We are inclined to take his part when we see how his love for Rachel allows Laban to drive a hard bargain with him. We sympathize too, when, at the end of the seven years of service, the wrong woman is palmed off on him, with the excuse that custom (attested by the practice of other peoples) demands that the elder shall be married before the younger. A new agreement is made and he receives Rachel as soon as the wedding of Leah is over, and faithfully spends the next seven years paying the service which is the purchase price for what he has already received. We are constrained to admire the fidelity which kept him to the terms of his bargain.

31-35. See under 30¹⁻²⁴.

CHAPTER XXX

1-24. Jacob's Children. Here must be considered also 29³¹⁻³⁵, which narrates the birth of four sons of Leah. J and E must have had very similar records here, for the narrative draws on both types of story.

This narrative introduces us to the traditional tribes of Israel. They undergo slight modifications later, but even here we have the main outline of the national groups. How are we to interpret this story? Undoubtedly ancient tradition told of incidents in the personal life of Jacob; but at the same time there is much to be said for the view that the chapter presents tribal history in the form of personal biography. Like the ancient Greeks, the Israelites felt themselves to be of common stock, though of different tribes, and they explained this fact by saying that they were all descended from a common father, though by different mothers. The description of Bilhah and Zilpah as slaves suggests that the tribes originating with them were subordinate to the Rachel and the Leah tribes respectively. We have thus a people produced by the amalgamation of two main groups of tribes, which had, presumably, achieved some kind of unity within themselves at an earlier period. These included: (a) Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun, with the subject clans of Gad and Asher; (b) Joseph (and, later, Benjamin), with the subject clans of Dan and Naphtali. A further point of speculative interest is raised by the two mother-names. The fact that Leah probably means "wild cow," and Rachel certainly means "sheep," has led to the suggestion that the two names indicate a totemistic stage in the development of Israelite life. The theory, while attractive, is weakened by the complete absence of a similar explanation for the names Bilhah and Zilpah.

25-43. Jacob Acquires the Flocks of Laban. Once more a composite narrative. In some parts, however, J and E are so closely interwoven that the two strands cannot be separated. Again, both narratives tell the same story, though with different details.

At last the long years of service are over. Women and children are negotiable property rather than independent human beings, and through all this time, though Jacob has had the use of them, they have belonged to Laban. Now the full price is paid, and they pass legally into the possession of the younger man. He has been so good a servant that his father-in-law is reluctant to let him go, and is prepared to pay him high wages to keep him. But the situation is not what it was fourteen or seven years earlier. Romance is over; the way is cleared for business. It is no longer Jacob but Laban who is the suppliant, and who has to accept the terms offered to him.

While both original forms of the story make Jacob offer conditions which seem unusually favorable to Laban, the two differ in details. In E Jacob simply separates the colored animals, far less numerous than the plain white sheep or the plain black goats, and forms herds of his own. His property will then grow simply by natural increase, though it seems that Jacob took measures to maintain the variegated coloring. In J, on the other hand, the conditions appear still harder for the herdsman. Laban himself goes through the herds, removes all the abnormally colored animals, and sends them three days' journey away from the main flocks, putting them in charge of his own sons. There can, then, be no risk of interbreeding between the two sets. Jacob remains with the flocks of plain animals, which it is still his duty to tend, and his pay is to consist in any abnormally colored specimens that may be born from them. Clearly, there is no reason why Laban should suspect that the bargain will deprive him of many of the young lambs.

But Jacob is a skilled and crafty breeder, and he has means whereby he can produce the abnormal forms when he pleases. It is said that his methods were often practiced in the ancient East, and they may well have been familiar to the shepherd audiences to whom these stories were told in ancient times. Thus he can increase his flock almost at will, and is careful to apply his methods only to the stronger animals. In the end the flock of Laban, in spite of his precautions, is the smaller and the weaker; Jacob has, by perfectly fair means (at least to the ancient mind—he had kept to the letter of his bond), justified his name and "overreached" his would-be clever rival.

CHAPTER XXXI

The Parting of Jacob and Laban. (Continued in 32¹⁻³.) All three of the groups of tradition found in Genesis are represented in the passage, though P is confined to v. 18, and even there the first few words belong to the narrative of the preceding verse. Analysis as between E and J is not very easy. The entire narrative falls into five sections, the fifth being 32¹⁻³.

1-16. Jacob Consults His Wives. Each source gives a divine and a human impulse to Jacob's departure. The latter in J is the complaint of Laban's sons, who see the whole of their patrimony being absorbed by their crafty cousin; in E it is the displeasure of Laban himself, who realizes that his trickery has turned against his own interests. His behavior has alienated the affection and confidence of his own daughters, who feel that he has treated them like foreign slaves, not like members of his own family, and they are prepared to cast in their lot with their husband. Jacob is further impelled to flee by the direct command of the Deity who has appeared to him twenty years before, and still watches over him for good. Having enriched himself in Aramæan territory, he must now return to the land promised to his posterity.

17-25. Jacob's Flight and Laban's Pursuit. Jacob "steals Laban's heart," i.e., cheats him, by taking advantage of his absence—incidentally, we notice how wealthy Laban still is, since his flocks graze over so wide an area. Rachel has something of the quality of her father and of her husband, and takes the family god, the Teraphim, with her. This seems to have been an image in human form, possibly representing the family "genius," and may be a relic of primitive ancestor worship. It is noticeable that the writer (the Teraphim incident is peculiar to E) has no word of blame for Rachel, either because of her dishonesty or, still more surprising, because she is apparently addicted to idolatry. Even in David's house Teraphim were found at a much later time (1 Sam. 19^{13, 16}). Moving slowly with his flocks, Jacob crosses the Euphrates and marches toward Canaan. Laban is three days' journey away, but the news is carried; and so much swifter is he that in seven days he overtakes the caravan in Mount Gilead, i.e., in territory which afterward belonged to Israel on the east of Jordan. The sequel leads us to suspect that Jacob is still only on the border of this land. We note that the divine protection is still with Jacob, and shows itself in a dream which forbids Laban to interfere with his nephew.

26-43. The Argument. The prohibition against "saying anything good or bad" (v. 24) to Jacob is not taken too literally by Laban, though he is clearly at a disadvantage when arguing with Jacob. Indeed, of the three charges he brings against Jacob—stealing his daughters (v. 26), leaving without notice (v. 27) and stealing his god (v. 30)—the last is the only one which would provide Laban with a real excuse for action, and Rachel's "cleverness" puts her father in the wrong here. Then it is Jacob's turn, and while his language is probably a little exaggerated (e.g., v. 41b), there is no doubt that he has a grievance. His is the complaint of the faithful and honest servant who is accused of stealing, and his concern is to show that he has been honest. Indeed, he has been more than honest, for he has not even claimed his due. The ancient rule, reflected in the life of later Israel, was that a shepherd was responsible for any animal which was lost, but if it were taken by a beast of prey, then he was free from blame and his employer had to bear the loss. Only he must produce a portion of the carcass as evidence (Ex. 22¹³; cf. Amos 3¹²). Jacob has not even availed himself of his right to this protection; he has been the model of a faithful, indeed, of a generous servant.

44-55. The Covenant at Gilead. Neither Jacob nor Laban is alone; each is the leader of a clan, and it is clear that we are reading the story of the way in which a boundary between two tribes came to be established. It seems that there are two traditions, one explaining Mizpah, the other Gilead. The first is based on the word meaning "watch"; instead of being a simple watchtower, this Mizpah (and there were many of them) has become the residence of a spirit, or perhaps even the Spirit itself, which will "watch" over the two parties and see that they keep their bargain, even when they cannot keep one another under observation. The other tradition traces the name Gilead back to a heap of stones—again, probably, though less certainly, the home of a spirit—which marks the frontier between the Hebrew and the Aramaean peoples. The name is given both in Aramaic and in Hebrew. The treaty is solemnized by a common meal in which both tribes share; afterward Laban takes his departure for his own land.

CHAPTER XXXII

1-3. Meeting with the Angelic Hosts. The origin of the name Mahanaïm, which means "two hosts." The verses serve as a transition to the next section of the Jacob stories.

CHAPTERS 32^a to 36⁴³: JACOB'S RETURN TO CANAAN

This section falls into two divisions; the first, ending with 33²⁰, describes further incidents on the journey; the second records events which took place after his arrival.

4-22. Jacob's Preparations for Meeting Esau. The analysis is simple; vv. 4-14a belong to J, with perhaps a later addition in the prayer of Jacob (vv. 10-13), the rest to E. The main outline was probably common to both. Twenty years have passed since Jacob fled from his brother's just anger. But Jacob has not forgotten the facts, and he fears that Esau also will remember. In J he tries to secure comparative safety by dividing his property; in E he prepares a present which is intended to illustrate at once his own prosperity and his desire to atone for the old wrong. This is sent forward, and, apparently, Jacob remains on the northern bank of the Jabbok.

23-33. Penuel. J and E seem here to be intimately interwoven, and analysis is rather difficult. But the main outline of the narrative is quite clear.

The passage explains several names. There is first the new name of Jacob himself, who is hereafter to be known as Israel (v. 28). Secondly, we have the origin of the name of the place (v. 30). Possibly also the name of the river itself, Jabbok (the modern Wadi Zerka), is to be connected with the unusual Hebrew word employed for wrestling. There is also the explanation of a "tabu" on the eating of a certain joint.

The earliest tradition probably represented Jacob as met at the river brink by the spirit of the stream, who seeks to prevent him from crossing. Such beings can move only at night, lest they be seen by men, and Jacob first discovers the identity of his antagonist near the dawn, when his demand to be let go becomes insistent. Jacob then uses his opportunity to secure a blessing, and, in one version of the story certainly, probably in both, his name is changed to Israel.

This ancient tradition has been used by the sacred writer to describe the second great spiritual crisis in the life of Jacob. The first was on his outward journey, when, alone, without friends or property, he found himself all unaware at the very house of God (28¹⁰⁻²²). Now he has wealth, family, friends, but, nevertheless, he is menaced with danger from his brother. A still more terrible peril unexpectedly confronts him, and, though he does not come through unscathed, he yet wins something which will secure him against the thing he most fears, and assure him the final success which he seeks. Whether he recognizes in his opponent the God of Bethel or not, he can go on his way to meet his brother in the assurance that he is under divine protection, with the divine blessing and with the new God-given name. The kind of power that met him twenty years before, as he left the land, meets him again on its threshold as he returns to it.

CHAPTER XXXIII

Jacob Re-enters Canaan. The main portion of the narrative seems to be J, with phrases and sentences from E. The mention of Paddan Aram in v. 18 is probably due to a note extracted from P.

It is clear that Jacob is not wholly reassured by his precautions. But Esau is not the same man that he was twenty years before. There seems to be no trace of malice in him, and he is presented as a noble chief of Bedouin, with a generous heart and a strong sense of family duty. His affectionate greeting of Jacob and his refusal to accept the present offered till he is pressed, together with his own statement that he too is a man of substance, offer a very different picture from that which might have been expected.

Yet Jacob does not wholly trust his brother. He insists on his accepting one of the two divisions of his property. This is not the "present" of 32¹⁴⁻²², for that does not appear in J's narrative; it is, rather, one of the two companies into which Jacob had divided all his wealth (32⁷, 8). This will prevent Esau from carrying out any hostile design he may cherish. To this gift Jacob adds the most obsequious form of greeting, that offered by the subject to the sovereign, and he is followed in this by his wives and children. In the arrangement Jacob shows his fear. He goes first himself, but brings the others in the inverse order of their value to him, those whom he loves least coming first. Finally, he refuses the escort Esau offers him, and promises to follow leisurely to the south. But as soon as Esau and his men are gone, Jacob settles down for a time at Succoth, on the east of Jordan, and makes that for a time his home. It is noticeable that J does not make Jacob cross the Jordan at all, whilst E places him in the district of Shechem at once, and there he actually buys a field (v. 19). Finally he performs the ritual which leads to the establishment of a sanctuary there.

CHAPTER XXXIV

The Outrage on Dinah and the Sack of Shechem. A double thread (indicated in the following analysis as I and II) can clearly be traced through this chapter, though in places disentanglement is uncertain. The chief points of difference between the two: (a) in II the conditions on which Dinah may be married to Shechem are not stated, while in I circumcision is demanded, and, indeed, furnished an opportunity for the massacre; (b) in I Dinah is allowed to return to her father's house after the seduction, while in II she is kept in the city till taken thence by her brothers; (c) in I Jacob's sons generally slaughter the Shechemites, in II the deed is done by Simeon and Levi alone. The provenance of the two narratives is a little difficult to determine. It is possible that we have here two independent narratives, neither belonging to the main line of one of the great traditions, but emanating from the same general circles as J and E.

On the whole we may best interpret the chapter—whose salient features are the same in both recensions—as a piece of tribal history. We are still somewhat uncertain as to the exact details of the conquest of Canaan in later times by Israel, and it is possible that we have here an early tribal victory thrown back by tradition into the patriarchal period. Both Simeon and Levi disappeared early from among the territorial tribes of Israel, and their submergence may be due to acts of ruthless cruelty such as this. Apart from the fact that the ancestors of Israel are normally represented as peaceful shepherds, the narrative brings out once more some of the characteristics attributed to them all, but particularly to Jacob. We have especially the very high value set on female chastity, and the craft (particularly evident in the element classed as I) shown in overcoming those who have wronged or who would wrong Israel and his family. There may have been also in early days a glow of satisfaction felt when the tale of the conquest of a great Canaanite city was told, but to us the story is mean and repulsive; even the rebuke of the old father is based not on the moral aspects of the case, but on the danger to which it exposes him and his.

CHAPTER XXXV

1-15. Jacob's Return to Bethel. It is not impossible that the compiler of this story means us to suppose that the command to leave Shechem and go up into the hills to Bethel was in part due to the tragedy of Shechem. This, however, does not seem to have been in the thought of the original narrators of the story, to whom the completion of the cultic apparatus at Bethel is the important matter. We observe again that in E Jacob is more than the father of a wandering family; he is the head of a clan, and in that capacity orders all the strange gods to be removed (v. 2), thus anticipating the first of the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20³). The strange gods may be taken to be the family deities and other gods whom the individual tribes worshiped before their amalgamation into Israel, and it is possible that we have once more a Mosaic regulation thrown back into the patriarchal age. Be that as it may, it is clear that to the mind of E the God of Bethel will tolerate no rival near his shrine.

P gives another of the series of divine blessings which began with the creation of man. There is an obvious reference to 12⁸ in v. 11, and it is possible that we have here accounts of two incidents which the priestly writer originally intended to be kept separate, one contained in vv. 9, 10, the other in vv. 11–13. The first of these, indicating Jacob's change of name, takes in P the place of the Penuel incident in JE (cf. 32²⁹).

E adds a note of the death and burial of Deborah, Rachel's foster-mother (v. 8), probably for the purpose of explaining the sanctity of the terebinth (oak) mentioned. It is doubtful that there is any connection with the "palm-tree of Deborah" mentioned in Judg. 45.

16–20. The Birth of Benjamin and the Death of Rachel. The tragedy of this record (which is E throughout) appears not only in the facts themselves but in the names given to the child. The name is the parent's first exclamation on seeing the child (cf. note on 21⁹), and since the name given by the mother is inauspicious, the father changes it. The fact that Benjamin is born in Palestine may mean that this tribe had no traditions carrying it back to the nomad stage.

* 21, 22a. Reuben's Crime. A part of J. Another reference is made in the blessing of Jacob (49⁴), and, as in the account of the ancestry of Moab and Ammon, there may be some ancient slur cast on the character of the tribe of Reuben. The sentence is broken off suddenly; it may once have stood at the head of the short poem on Reuben now preserved in ch. 49.

22b–26. A List of the Sons of Jacob. A priestly summary of the ancestors of the twelve tribes.

27–29. The Death of Isaac. Also from P. The patriarchal home is still at Mamre, where the family tomb is situated (cf. 23¹⁷). P ignores any disagreements or differences between Jacob and Esau, and represents them as burying their father together. Similarly, he has taken no notice of the separation of Isaac and Ishmael (cf. 25⁹).

CHAPTER XXXVI

An Edomite Genealogy. The general style of the passage suggests P, but there are several features which make it unlikely that it comes from the main thread of that document. In particular the names of Esau's wives do not wholly agree with those given in 26³⁴, 35 28⁹. There are also doublets within the passage (especially in vv. 9–14, 15–19) which suggest a combination of different sources.

The chapter is a summary history of Edom down to the time of the establishment of the Hebrew monarchy. It falls into no less than eight sections.

1–5. These verses are intended to indicate that there were at least four racial elements in the later people of Edom, one closely related to the Aramæan ancestry of Israel, one Canaanite, a third derived from the aboriginal inhabitants of the southern hills (Horites), and a fourth from a Bedouin tribe connected, but more remotely than Esau himself, with Israel. 6–8. The migration which resulted in the settlement of Edom in the south. The writer ignores the rivalry between Israel and Esau, and assumes that the migration was due to economic causes like those which led to the separation of Abraham and Lot. It will be noted that in v. 8 "Edom" is used as an alternative name for the tribal ancestor, Esau. 9–14. Edom is here used for the whole nation, and the interrelation of the Edomite tribes is traced through the sons of Esau. 15–19. Largely a repetition of the preceding, except that the sons of Esau are no longer personified tribes, but rather individual chiefs of the tribes that bore their names. 20–28. A list of Horite clans, evidently unified with Edom in later times. 29, 30. A list of Horite chieftains bearing to some extent the same relation to vv. 20–28 as vv. 15–19 do to vv. 9–14. 31–39. A list of Edomite kings. It is clear that though Israel claimed superiority over Edom, it was recognized that the latter had been the first to attain to an organized constitution. The same belief is expressed in the stories of the birth and of the birthright (25^{24–34}), and in that of the stolen blessing (ch. 27). 40–43. Another list of chieftains of Edomite clans, whose names seem to be taken almost indiscriminately from the preceding; Oholibamah, for instance, is now a chief, not a wife of Esau.

In general it may be pointed out that many of the names are common to Palestine and the surrounding districts. The name "Hadaḏ," for instance, appears more than once, and is that of an Aramæan deity; other names also may be divine names. But, apart from the single mention of an Edomite victory over Midian in v. 35, the chapter throws comparatively little light on the early history of Edom.

IV. CHAPTERS 37¹ TO 50²⁶: JOSEPH

The last division of the book of Genesis contains an account of Joseph, explaining how Israel came to be in Egypt. It contains twelve sections, of which two (chs. 38 and 49), which do not deal primarily with Joseph, must be regarded as digressions. All three of the main sources are represented, P, as usual, being little more than a summary framework. J and E are sometimes closely interwoven, but the analysis is usually fairly easy. The stories are rather different in type from many in the earlier divisions of the book; there is little that explains names or customs, and, apart from chs. 38 and 49, practically no tribal history. There seems to be a fairly accurate acquaintance with matters Egyptian, particularly in the E sections, though it is the Egypt of the tenth and ninth centuries, not that of the patriarchal age, with which the writers are familiar.

A judgment as to the historical value of the division must depend to some extent on the view held of the Exodus. We cannot question the historicity of that event; for without it it is impossible to explain the dominating influence of the tradition on the thought of later Israel. The people—or at least some of them—must have found their way into Egyptian territory, and the migration which led them there is involved in the story of Joseph. Joseph may safely be accepted as an actual person, under whose leadership or influence the tribes settled in the Goshen area.

It seems fairly clear that this immigration must have taken place during what we know as the Hyksos period, when Egypt was dominated by shepherd kings who came from the northeast. There are those who hold that the story of the Exodus is the Hebrew account of the expulsion of the Hyksos (about 1600 to 1550 B.C.). Those who favor this view (which, however, is far from being certain) are inclined to see in the story of Joseph an account of the entry of the Hyksos into Egypt. It is more probable, however, that the Hyksos were in the country at the time and that the Pharaoh who exalted Joseph was one of the earlier Hyksos kings. The required date (about 1750 B.C.) would not be seriously out of harmony with the synchronism which places Abraham in the age of Khammurabi. (See art., History of Hebrew People, pp. 60-1; cf. intro. to Exodus, section on "Contemporary History," p. 250.)

CHAPTER XXXVII

Joseph and His Brethren. Apart from vv. 1, 2, which seem to form P's introduction to the whole division, this chapter is a combination of J and E. The sources are easy to separate. Each story forms an almost continuous narrative, and though the main fact is the same, the details are different and, sometimes, inconsistent. In J the jealousy of the brothers is due to the father's favoritism, in E to Joseph's own dreams, and to the conceit which is supposed to have produced them. In J it is Judah who saves Joseph, by proposing to sell him to an Ishmaelite caravan which all the brothers see as they eat; in E it is Reuben who saves him by persuading them to put him into a dry pit, and he is terribly distressed when he finds the boy gone. In E it is Midianites, not Ishmaelites, who have drawn the lad out of the pit, and they have not been seen by any of the brothers. Finally, according to J, the brothers prove Joseph's fate by bringing the blood-stained coat; in E they simply tell their father that he has been devoured.

In the combined story which we now have before us, the interest centers on Joseph's weaknesses. He is his father's favorite, wears a long-sleeved coat, showing that he is to be a "gentleman" and do no work (cf. the garment worn by the princess Tamar, 2 Sam. 13¹⁸). He is also a concealed tale-bearer, and the result is what might be expected. The brothers—especially the sons of the slave wives—are not good men, and they will certainly take every possible chance of vengeance. It is only the compassion of an elder brother that saves the boy from immediate death, and even then his lot is not much better. While the sequel shows Joseph to be a fine character in many ways, these early failings are there, and meet with their inevitable reward.

CHAPTER XXXVIII

Judah and Tamar. This unpleasant story appears to come from southern Israel, and is, therefore, to be connected with J. But it is clearly not in the direct line of even the southern tradition, and may be regarded as an isolated narrative introduced in order to explain certain facts.

We note, then, first of all, that Judah is no longer in the same social group as his brothers, and, it would seem, is permanently settled in the land. This accounts for the practically complete separation of Judah from the rest of Israel throughout the early period of the conquest, a separation which was ended only in the time of David (2 Sam. 21¹¹). We also observe that this story implies a large admixture of Canaanite blood in Judah; the clans which survived have a Canaanite ancestress. The sin of Er is not mentioned, but the details given of Onan suggest that possibly the original story ascribed to the elder brother a similar offense. In that case we may have here a relic of a belief in a demon who haunted the marriage chamber, such as forms the motif of the Book of Tobit. Naturally the Israelite writers have substituted Jehovah, to whom they ascribed all superhuman action. The narrative certainly shows that the law of levirate marriage (cf. Deut. 25^{5f.}) is based on primitive custom; and it presents Tamar as a clever and praiseworthy woman, who succeeds, at risk to herself, in fulfilling her responsibilities to her dead husband.

CHAPTERS XXXIX, XL

Joseph as a Slave in Egypt. The two narratives of ch. 37 are continued here; in the main ch. 39 belongs to J and ch. 40 to E, though in each there may be words and phrases taken from the other source. The last verse of ch. 37, in fact, belongs rather to this section, for it forms the beginning of E's account of Joseph's adventures in Egypt, and it seems probable that the words in 39¹, "Potiphar, Pharaoh's eunuch, the chief of the executioners," have been introduced from 37³⁶ and are no part of the original narrative here.

In fact, in J's story Joseph's master is not a eunuch, nor is he necessarily a royal official. He is simply an Egyptian gentleman, who buys the Canaanite slave. The story has numerous parallels elsewhere, but is of particular significance in Joseph's career. It shows that the divine favor which has given him his high position in his master's house is due to his character, and, though tried so terribly, he proves worthy of the trust placed in him by God and man. Even when punishment falls upon him for the very crime he has refused to commit, his spirit is unbroken and his character again wins him favor and responsibility. Everyone who meets him reacts favorably to him; his master, his mistress—though her favor is disastrous—the jailer, all find him reliable and successful in all that he undertakes, and when distinguished prisoners join him he soon wins their confidence too. The earlier weaknesses in his character are being purged away by what he endures.

In E the person who buys Joseph from the Midianites is a eunuch, Potiphar, the chief executioner. As in the other narrative, Joseph finds favor in his master's sight and is made his personal servant (39^{4a}). In this form of the story there is no general state prison; the officials under suspicion (probably of having tried to poison the king) are shut up in the house of the chief executioner, Joseph's master. They are great men, and may be restored to favor; moreover, there may be a risk in allowing them to be waited on by an inferior person, who may be bribed to help them escape; so the chief executioner places them under the care of his own confidential attendant (40⁴). The telling and interpreting of the dreams follow; the importance of the dream is a characteristic feature of E. The power of interpretation is a special divine gift, and is a further mark of the favor God has bestowed on this wonderful youth. The final evidence is offered when the fate foretold to each actually befalls him.

CHAPTER XLI

Joseph's Elevation. The main source for the story as we have it now is E; but numerous excerpts from J are also found. The notice of Joseph's age in v. 46 is probably derived from P. It may be doubted whether the dreams were mentioned at all in J, and possibly Joseph appeared in that narrative merely as one who could foretell the future. Egyptian literature contains several examples of "prophecies" uttered before kings; however, those which have survived are usually more like Jewish apocalypse than Hebrew prophecy. (See art., Intertestamental Literature, pp. 189, 190.)

The chapter falls into three parts: (a) Pharaoh's perplexity (vv. 1-13); (b) Joseph's solution (vv. 14-36); (c) Joseph's appointment (vv. 37-57). The first and last serve to emphasize the importance of the second. Joseph succeeded where Pharaoh and his wise men failed; and so greatly were all affected both by his understanding of the dream and by the wisdom of the measures he suggested that everyone felt that he was the proper person to carry out his own ideas. The sudden elevation and the autocratic power of the king, together with the authority conferred on the favorite, are characteristic features of Oriental stories. Here, however, the stress is laid throughout on the genuinely religious significance of the events described. It is because God is with Joseph, and because in all his conduct in Egypt he has shown himself worthy of the divine support that honor and power are bestowed on him. Even the heathen Egyptian recognizes that the secret of Joseph's power lies here, and we have to read the story as testimony to the superiority of Israel's faith over even the great religion of Egypt. (For a parallel, see Dan. 328-30 625-27.)

CHAPTER XLII

The First Meeting Between Joseph and His Brothers. This chapter is almost entirely E, though it is clear that there are occasional phrases drawn from J, e.g., vv. 2, 5, 7, 9b-11a, 27, 28, 38. There are references in ch. 43 which show that in outline J had a similar story, though there were differences in point of detail.

Joseph has achieved a great triumph in being raised to the position he holds in Egypt, but that triumph is not complete till he has exercised that lordship over his brothers which his boyish dreams have promised him. The opportunity comes when they are driven to buy corn in Egypt, which from very ancient times was a storehouse of food for the civilized world. Now at last Joseph can take his revenge, and the first element in it is his refusal to believe in the good faith of his brothers. They recognize that the treatment they receive is a just punishment for that which they gave to Joseph years ago, but they cannot, in the nature of the case, fathom Joseph's further motives. He is actuated by love of Benjamin even more than by the desire for vengeance, and longs, first to assure himself of the safety of the boy, and, secondly, to see him once more. These ends he secures (after giving them all a serious alarm) by keeping Simeon while the rest are sent home. He seems to have chosen Simeon because he was the second in age; and he had not forgotten how the eldest, Reuben, had befriended him. Finally, terror is instilled into the brothers by the discovery that their money has been returned to them. This is placed by J at the first halt on the journey (v. 27); by E on their reaching their home (v. 35)—striking evidence of two narratives—and must have seemed to them either a piece of magic or an attempt to prove them thieves. Their difficulties are, throughout, increased by the fact that they have to speak through an interpreter—the only place in the patriarchal stories in which differences of language are recognized (v. 23).

The full result of this terror is only evident when the brothers reach their father. The sequel to E's story has not been preserved, except in fragments, but it is clear that an immediate return with Benjamin is contemplated in order to release Simeon, and that Jacob's natural objection is overcome only when Reuben gives his own children as hostages (v. 37). Once more, as in ch. 37, a prominent part is played by Reuben, and this suggests that these stories took shape among the shepherd community to the east of Jordan at a comparatively early date, when the tribe of Reuben (which disappeared soon after the conquest of Canaan) still held a leading position in Israel.

CHAPTER XLIII

The Second Meeting Between Joseph and His Brothers. The passage is almost entirely J; to E belongs only the note in v. 23, which tells of the release of Simeon.

As in E, so in J, the brothers have been harshly treated by the Egyptian Grand Vizier. But he does not seem to have detained any of them; rather he has dismissed them all, with the order that they shall not return at all unless they bring Benjamin with them. The question, therefore, does not arise till the stocks of food brought from Egypt are exhausted, and it is only when they are bidden to return for more that Judah tells his father of the conditions laid down by Joseph. From the dialogue which follows it appears that the brothers had not volunteered information about their family, but had given it under cross-examination (v. 7). It is Judah, not Reuben, who overcomes the reluctance of his father (in J called usually Israel rather than Jacob; cf. v. 6 with 421).

Joseph keeps his word—to all appearance. The strangers have satisfied the test imposed upon them, and they are liberally received. Their fears that this may be a trap are lulled by Joseph's steward (vv. 18–25), and though Joseph, as an Egyptian, cannot eat at the same table as they do, lavish hospitality is shown to them, especially to Benjamin (v. 34), while further evidence of Joseph's extraordinary powers is shown in his correct arrangement of his visitors according to age (v. 33).

CHAPTER XLIV

Joseph's Cup Found in Benjamin's Sack; Judah's Intercession. (Still from J.) The brothers' difficulties, however, are not yet over; indeed, they have not yet reached their height. Joseph is a magician, and one of his instruments, a magic cup, is secreted in Benjamin's sack (v. 2). Discovery and accusation naturally follow, and Judah, Benjamin's protector, makes a noble speech pleading for the lad. Joseph is satisfied at last. Just as his own sufferings have purified and ennobled his own character, so he finds at last that his brothers are not bad men at heart. They still care for their old father, and are still ready to make sacrifices for their youngest brother. He has achieved all that he had hoped by his tests; the brothers have learned their lesson, and the way is open for the dénouement.

CHAPTER XLV

1–24. Joseph Reveals Himself to His Brothers. The account chiefly used here is that of E, but J also has made some contributions. Vv. 1–15 form the climax of the whole Joseph story, for they narrate the reunion of the family, at length freed from the petty jealousies and the selfish passions which had manifested themselves in younger days. Great wrongs have been done and great sufferings have been endured. But all this is now past; peace, safety, and prosperity have been fully attained. What we see more than anything else is the working out of a divine plan. Human nature, even human sin, cannot interfere with the gracious and kindly purpose of a friendly God, who cares, not for his chosen people alone, but for others also. Egypt has been saved from starvation as well as the family of Joseph, and the king of the country gladly recognizes the obligations which he and his people owe to Joseph (vv. 16-24). For his sake these shepherds are welcomed, in spite of the normal Egyptian antipathy to the Asiatic nomad, and a suitable home is found for them. Thus we come to understand the full value of the man with whom God lives, and whom he favors. As the chief instrument in effecting the divine purpose, Joseph has not merely attained to wealth, influence and authority himself, he has also saved Egypt and established his own family in a place of safety.

25-28. See under chs. 46, 47.

CHAPTERS XLVI, XLVII

Jacob's Migration to Egypt. This narrative extends from 45²⁵ to 47¹². The former of the two sections taken from P (46⁶⁻²⁷) is a normal priestly list of the persons—all, presumably, heads of clans—who came into Egypt with Jacob, and thus gives an account of the extent of the "nation" at this stage. 47⁵⁻¹¹ is almost, so to speak, the formal charter of occupation granted by Pharaoh to Jacob and to his descendants; but we notice that, while the king makes the grant of land, Jacob takes the position of the superior, and bestows his blessing on Pharaoh.

The combined narrative JE gives a detailed account of the journey, the meeting of the old father with his long-lost son, and the reception accorded to the newcomers by Pharaoh. With its freshness and its psychological insight, the passage offers a solution of two problems. One of these is peculiar to J, the other to E. In J Pharaoh has known, as far as we are told, nothing of the coming of Joseph's family, and the latter thinks it best to see them safely established in Goshen before presenting them to the king (46³¹). Then, in 47¹⁻⁵, when it is too late for Pharaoh to interfere, Joseph brings him the news. It is graciously received, though Pharaoh, bearing his subjects' prejudices in mind, assigns to the newcomers a district on the northeastern frontier, removed from the center of Egyptian life. At the same time he offers to give royal appointments to any of Joseph's brothers who seem fit for them. This difficulty, that of their reception by Pharaoh, is safely met.

The other problem is peculiar to E, and is not so much stated as assumed. Canaan is the promised land; is Jacob justified in leaving it? Still more, is he justified in leaving it for Egypt? The answer comes to him when he reaches the home of his father at Beersheba (46²⁻⁴). There, at the ancestral sanctuary, he receives a divine revelation which assures him that the God of his father will not desert him; consequently, he may go into Egypt with safety to himself and to his descendants. Thus early we find traces of a conception of a God who is not limited to a single locality or to a few, but who can make his presence felt at any spot on earth's surface. These stories took shape far back in the past, centuries before the time of the great prophets; and yet we can detect the germs of a doctrine which led Israel, in the end, to the conviction that there was but One, the Living and True God.

Joseph Secures the Land of Egypt for the King. (47¹³⁻²⁶.) This section comes from J. It is an explanation of the Egyptian system of land tenure, which is entirely different from that of Israel. In Palestine men held their land freehold, except insofar as the later law recognized that they were tenants of Jehovah (Lev. 25²³). In Egypt, on the other hand, all land was the property of the sovereign, at least from the eighteenth dynasty onward. We may not approve of Joseph's action, as judged by modern social standards, but it is clear that Israel took a pride in him as the founder of one of the peculiar institutions of Egypt.

For vv. 27-31, see under ch. 48.

CHAPTER XLVIII

Jacob's Last Days. All three accounts, J, E and P, contain the blessing of the sons of Jacob. That of P is almost in the form of a will, in which the patriarch devises his property to his children, and makes special provision for Ephraim and Manasseh as separate tribes.

This is less explicitly stated in J and E. In the former narrative, Jacob makes Joseph swear to bury him in the ancestral grave at Machpelah (47²⁹⁻³¹). There seems to be some special symbolism in Jacob's bowing over the head of his bed (it may be remarked in passing that the quotation in Heb. 11²¹, "worshiped, leaning on his staff," not "his bed," involves a different vocalization of the same Hebrew consonants that we have in the traditional text here—matteh for mitteh). In both these narratives of the blessing of the sons of Joseph, Jacob deliberately puts Ephraim before Manasseh. In the period of the Judges it seems that the latter was the stronger branch, but throughout the monarchy the relative positions were reversed, and Ephraim was the more prominent. This fact is explained in this passage as due to the fateful words of the dying Jacob. V. 22 seems to be an isolated utterance, representing a tradition which ignored the residence of Israel in Egypt, and suggesting a story of conquest which has otherwise disappeared, unless there be reminiscences of it in ch. 34.

CHAPTER XLIX

1-28a. The Blessing of Jacob. This is a very ancient poem in which are gathered together short characterizations of the various tribes. It is interesting to compare it with the blessing of Moses in Deut. 33. It seems to be the earlier of the two, and we notice that Joseph is still undivided, that Simeon and Reuben still appear as important tribes, and that Levi is a secular, not a priestly clan. The poem has been very carefully studied, and there is reason to suppose that it has a fairly long literary history.

(a) Reuben (vv. 3, 4), though the first-born, with natural rights of superiority, has sacrificed these things. The reference to 35²² is obvious.

(b) Simeon and Levi (vv. 5-7) are linked together as cruel and passionate men, to whom such a crime as that described in ch. 34 would be only natural. They are deficient in ordinary humanity, and love only to give pain; when they are in a bad temper they are dangerous murderers, and even when they are in a gracious mood the best that can be expected of them is that they should mutilate cattle.

(c) Judah (vv. 8-12) dwells in a land rich in vines and pasturage, and is powerful in war. The disappearance of the three senior tribes leaves the fourth dominant and royal, and there may even be some primitive Messianic reference in the mysterious phrase till Shiloh come. (For a detailed discussion see modern commentaries on the book of Genesis.)

(d) Zebulun (v. 13) is not described; his geographical position, near Phœnicia, alone is given.

(e) Issachar (vv. 14, 15) is a tribe with a slight sense of the value of freedom, who, in order to secure material ease and comfort, is prepared to surrender the rights of liberty.

(f) Dan (vv. 16, 17) appears to be still in his original home in the southwest, lying across the great caravan road, where he can fall suddenly on travelers from an ambush.

(V. 18 forms no essential part of the poem, unless it be intended to mark a rest in the middle of it. As Simeon and Levi are grouped together, there are only eleven of these irregular stanzas, six before and five after this division.)

(g) Gad (v. 19), on the east of Jordan, is exposed especially to raids from the desert, but the Bedouin who make the attempt are in danger of suffering vigorous reprisals.

(h) Asher (v. 20) is noted for the richness and delicacy of his living.

(i) Naphthali (v. 21) is noble, free, adventurous, swift, and is noted for the beauty of his youth.

(j) Joseph (vv. 22-26) receives the most striking blessing of all, with the possible exception of Judah. Certain parallels are to be found in Deut. 33^{13, 16}. He is exposed to danger, but will triumph over it all, and on him are showered the concentrated blessings of heaven and earth, farm and home, past and present. It is clear that at the time when the poem reached its present form Judah and Joseph divide between them the supremacy of the nation.

(k) Benjamin (v. 27) is described as a ravenous wolf greedily devouring his prey.

28b-33. See under ch. 50.

CHAPTER L

1-21. Death and Burial of Jacob. (Including 49^{28b-33}.) The patriarch's bones must not be allowed to rest on foreign soil. In P Jacob arranges to be buried in the ancestral cave at Machpelah (49³⁰), and his wishes are carried out. But in J (what remains of E makes no mention of the burial of Jacob) the instruction is less definite (v. 5), and, as a matter of fact, after the due embalming the interment takes place on the east of Jordan, the last rites being performed in the presence of a great company of Egyptians, officials and others, who make an expedition for the purpose. Thus the name Abel Mizraim ("mourning of Egypt") is explained (v. 11).

Even the years they have spent in Egypt and the kindness they have received have not wholly obliterated from the minds of Joseph's brothers the wrong that they did him in his boyhood, and a narrative due to E records their anxiety. But once more the nobility and piety of Joseph's character are manifested. He realizes the fact that all history is the working out of a divine plan (v. 20), and that it is not for him to entertain thoughts of vengeance against the brothers whose misdeeds, under divine guidance, have led to such magnificent results. On the contrary, his kindness and his help will remain in no wise abated through the death of his father; his forgiveness is complete.

22-26. The Death of Joseph. Except possibly for v. 22, the whole of this passage is from E.

To the ancient Hebrew mind, no man could be called happy till he was dead, and till the seal had been set on his prosperity by long life and a peaceful end. So the story of the magnanimous hero is imperfect till the last record has been made and he lays down the tasks of life in a good old age, seeing his posterity well established, with the assurance, so far as any man can have it, of a continuance of his name and blood on earth. Yet he knows that this is not the final resting-place for his people. Like his immediate ancestors he looks on Canaan alone as the true home for Israel, and he anticipates the time, still centuries distant, when Israel shall take possession of its inheritance. So the book closes with the intimation that its story is one of preparation, and that completion is possible only in God's good time—it is but a book of Genesis.

EXODUS

BY PROFESSOR J. F. McLAUGHLIN

INTRODUCTION

Period Covered. The book of Genesis brings the history of the ancestors of the Hebrew people down to the settlement of the family of Jacob in Egypt and the death of Joseph. Exodus continues the history to the departure of Israel from Egypt and the encampment at Sinai under the leadership of Moses. It covers, therefore, very briefly the period of sojourn in Egypt, gives an account of the oppression under which the people of Israel suffered toward the end of this period, then tells at much greater length the story of the birth and early life of Moses, his long residence in Arabia, his call to be the deliverer of his people, his return to Egypt and interviews with the Egyptian king, and his leading of the people out into the freedom and adventure of the wilderness. In the second half of the book is given an account of the encampment at Mount Sinai, the revelation of God in the mountain, the preparation of the first codes of law and the organization of a system of government, and the establishment of the religion and worship of Jehovah on a firm basis by a covenant bond, an organized priesthood, and a tent sanctuary or tabernacle.

Contents. The contents of the book may be conveniently arranged and remembered as follows:

I. To Sinai. 1. Oppression of Israel, birth, early life, and flight of Moses to Arabia, chs. 1, 2.

2. The call of Moses, his interviews with Pharaoh, the ten plagues, and the departure from Egypt, chs. 3-13.

3. The crossing of the Red Sea and the wilderness journey as far as Mount Sinai, 14-19.

II. At Sinai. 1. Events at Sinai and the giving of the law, 19²-24¹⁸ and chs. 32-34.

2. The priesthood and the sanctuary, chs. 25-31 and 35-40.

The following passages should be noted as having peculiar interest and value:

The vision and call of Moses at Horeb, 31-41⁷.

The plagues of Egypt, chs. 7-11.

The institution and law of the Passover, 12-13¹⁶.

The song of Moses, 151-21.

The decalogue and book of the covenant, chs. 20-23; cf. 24⁷.

The worship of the golden calf, ch. 32.

Name. The name of the book, Exodus, is the Latinized form of the Greek word exodos, which means "outgoing" or "departure." The word is so used in the Greek translation of the LXX, 19¹, and in the title of the book in that version. The form of the word in our English version is the same as that in the Latin Vulgate. The Hebrew title is simply the first three words of the first chapter, "And these are the names."

Structure. The literary structure of this book is similar to that of Genesis, Numbers, and Joshua, and can be seen to have, in certain features, a close relationship to Leviticus and to Deuteronomy. Two histories have been intricately woven together, the older of the two compiled, it is believed, by prophets of the age of Isaiah from still older written documents of their time, and the other, somewhat later, by devout men of the priestly order. The editors, or compilers, who carefully put these histories together in their earlier and later form, appear sometimes to have added brief notes or comments of their own, intended to convey an exhortation or to impress the moral and religious lesson of the passage. Extremely interesting attempts have been made by modern scholars to analyze the contents of Exodus, as of the other books above mentioned, so as to indicate the source or sources from which each portion of the book is taken. These will be shown at length in any good recent commentary, as, e.g., in the Cambridge Bible, the Century Bible, and the Westminster series. Reference will be made here, in our commentary, to such analysis where it seems necessary to make clear the meaning of a passage. (See art., Pentateuch, pp. 136-9.)

Authorship. In the N.T. and in early Jewish and Christian literature the books of the Pentateuch are commonly referred to as the book, or books, of Moses. Quotations in the Gospels from these books, especially from the laws contained in them, are usually introduced by the words "Moses said," or "Moses commanded." No doubt it was then the common belief that Moses was the author of the laws, but the naming of the books after him may simply mean that he is the chief person in them, just as the books of Joshua and Samuel are named after the great men whose words and deeds they record. It is not a proof of authorship. A Jewish tradition preserved in the Talmud states that "Moses wrote his own book," but evidence of the truth of this statement is lacking. The Pentateuch is written about Moses, not by Moses. (The article on the Pentateuch, p. 134, deals more in detail with the authorship of this and the other books of the Pentateuch.)

Nevertheless it is historically probable—and there is some evidence—that Moses did leave behind written memorials, including laws, and statistical and other records, and sayings or speeches which may have been written down and preserved with care by those who were associated with him. See, e.g., Ex. 17¹⁴ 24⁷ Num. 33² Deut. 31⁹, 24-26, and compare 1 Sam. 10²⁵. This being admitted, we can readily understand that much, perhaps all, of such first-rate historical material, along with oral traditions handed down from the times of Moses, genealogical and family records, and priestly records, would be preserved in the early histories which have been woven into the structure of the Pentateuch.

Historical Value. We may confidently say, therefore, of the book of Exodus, as an important part of this composite work, that it has high historical value. Put into its present form by prophetic and priestly writers of a much later time, it contains much that was handed down to them from the past. Their interest was, no doubt, chiefly to promote true religion and the observance of the ancient sacred Law, but they desired for this very purpose to preserve the memory of the great deliverance which God had wrought for them from the bondage of Egypt, and of the great and heroic figure of the man whom God had raised up to be their leader and their lawgiver.

Religious Value. The book has also a very high religious value. It seeks to show, in every part, the divine interest in human affairs, God's watchful care over an oppressed and enslaved people and his rebuke of their oppressor, his guiding and sustaining hand, his judgments tempered by mercy. It identifies the laws of Jehovah, Israel's God, with the fundamental principles of justice, and sets forth high ideals of individual moral conduct and of public service. It reveals a God mighty to bring salvation to his people, their true King and Lord, not enthroned on high above them but dwelling with them, sharing their life, fighting their battles, and through his chosen and inspired servant administering their laws.

The great influence which this book has had upon the religious thought and life of Jew and Christian alike is manifest both in the many references to it in the O.T. and the N.T., and in the frequent use of its narratives and laws in the literature of Christian nations. For a very few examples see the historical Psalms 78, 105, 106, 114, and such passages as Psa. 68⁷, 8 77¹³⁻²⁰ and 103⁶, 7; also Isa. 43¹⁶⁻¹⁹ 51¹⁰ Jn. 6³¹ Acts 7²⁰⁻⁴⁴ 13¹⁷ 1 Cor. 10¹⁻⁵ Heb. 11²³⁻²⁹. See also Milton's Paradise Lost, bk. xii, 155-244; Keble, The Burning Bush, Song of the Manna-Gatherers, and Moses on Sinai; Trench, Moses and Jehro; George Herbert, Aaron; Cowley, The Destroying Angel; Cecil Frances Alexander, The Red Sea, and The Camp at Elim; Moore, The Song of Miriam; Scott, The March of Israel; Bonar, Marah and Elim; Clough, Moses Hidden in the Cloud; Plumptre, With Open Face Beholding. (See The Poet's Bible, edited by W. Garrett Horder).

Contemporary History. It is said in Ex. 11¹ that when Pharaoh subjected the people of Israel to forced labor they built for him "store cities, Pithom and Raameses." Now, the story of the oppression in Exodus makes it clear that the Israelites labored in the vicinity of their own homes, and it might therefore be expected that the site of these store cities would be found in or near the land of Goshen in which they were settled. This land, which was almost certainly in the north-eastern part of Egypt bordering upon Arabia, is called in Gen. 47¹¹ "the land of Rameses," and, according to Ex. 12³⁷, it was from Rameses that the Israelites set out upon their journey to the Arabian wilderness. The names "Raameses" and "Rameses" are clearly identical. The spelling in English corresponds to a slight difference in the vowels of the Hebrew word. In 1883 a well-known French explorer, M. Naville, excavated a mound of ancient ruins about sixty miles northeast of Cairo, where there is still a statue of Rameses II, a great king of the nineteenth Egyptian dynasty, seated between statues of the two solar deities Ra and Tum. Here he found inscriptions which seemed to show unmistakably that the ancient name of the place was Pi-Tum, or "house of Tum," a name which is without doubt the same as the Pithom of Exodus. The ruins show it to have been a city about two hundred and twenty yards square, inclosed by immense brick walls, and containing many chambers built of brick which were probably used for the storing of grain. The inscriptions show that the city was built, or rebuilt, by Rameses II (cir. 1300-1234 B.C.), and would, therefore, point to him as the Pharaoh who oppressed Israel. The site of the other store city, called after the king's own name, has not been identified with any certainty, but it was probably in the same region, and may have been the place of the king's residence, where he could easily be approached by the representatives of Israel. Professor Flinders Petrie claims to have discovered the site of Raameses at a place about eight miles west of Pithom, where there is a temple of Rameses II and part of the tomb of an official who was over storehouses of Syrian produce. The identification both of Pithom and Raameses has been disputed in favor of other localities in the northeastern parts of Egypt by recent writers. (See Gardiner in Journal of Egyptian Archaeology, vols. v. and vi, and Peet, Egypt and the O.T.) The Pharaoh of the Exodus must, therefore, have been one of the immediate successors of Rameses II, probably Merenptah, who reigned from about 1234 to 1214 B.C. (See Ex. 223 419; Breasted puts the date of his accession about nine years later.) In his reign the power of Egypt, which had for three centuries extended over the nearer parts of Asia, began to decline, and it became possible for the Hebrews to escape from Egypt into parts of Asia free from Egyptian domination. An inscription dating from the king's fifth year mentions a victory over Libyan invaders from the west, peace with the Hittites of Syria, the suppression of revolt in Canaan, and the annihilation of Israel (Ysir-aal). The last statement may simply be the record which the king chose to make of his dealing with the enslaved people who had escaped from his kingdom. (See art., The O.T. in the Light of Archaeology, pp. 116-7.)

There is, however, another possible view of the date of the Exodus, supported by the statement made in 1 Kings 6¹, that Solomon began to build the Temple in Jerusalem in the four hundred and eightieth year after the coming out of Egypt. The date of the beginning of Solomon's reign has been fixed approximately at 970 B.C. The Temple was begun in his fourth year, i.e., in 966 B.C. Adding to that 480 we get the year 1446 as the date of the Exodus. At that time the reigning king in Egypt was Amenhotep (Amenophis) II, who succeeded the great Thothmes III (1503-1449 B.C.), who had raised Egypt to its highest point of imperial power and had carried Egyptian arms as far as the Euphrates. The predecessor of Thothmes III was the great queen Hatshepsut, daughter of Thothmes I, who has been supposed by many writers to have been the princess who rescued the child Moses and adopted him. Interest in her has been revived by the claim recently made by a German scholar that he had deciphered and translated certain strange non-Egyptian inscriptions occurring in the peninsula of Sinai on rock tablets and statues. In one of these he finds what he thinks to be letters indicating the name of Moses, who writes that the queen Hatshepsut had been friendly to him, had drawn him out of the Nile, and had made him ruler of a temple in Sinai. The claim of this scholar to have read and translated these curious inscriptions accurately is based largely on guesswork and still awaits verification. We cannot, with our present knowledge of them, assert either that they were written by Moses or that they make any reference to him. There is this further difficulty to be met, that if Moses lived in the fifteenth century B.C., and if the departure from Egypt and the settlement in Palestine took place toward the end of that century, then for four hundred years and more, down to the reign of Solomon, Hebrew history makes no reference to Egypt and gives no slightest hint of the numerous warlike campaigns in Palestine and Syria carried on during those centuries by the great kings of the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth dynasties. The claims, however, of the earlier date, supported by 1 Kings 6¹, cannot be lightly set aside. This date is supported also by certain of the Tel-el-Amarna tablets, which contain correspondence of Egyptian governors of Canaanite towns, including Jerusalem, dating from about the year 1400 B.C., imploring help against invading hordes called Khabiri, which some modern scholars would identify with the Hebrew invaders under Joshua. (See art., History of Hebrew and Jewish People, p. 63.)

In the present state of our knowledge we cannot decide with any degree of certainty between the earlier, fifteenth-century date, and the later, thirteenth-century date. Both present difficulties, and neither can be shown to be in perfect agreement with the biblical narrative. We shall look hopefully for further light upon this problem which may come to us from new discoveries, such as are being constantly made by the indefatigable zeal of archaeologists and explorers in the seemingly exhaustless mines of Egyptian antiquity.

Literature: Commentaries on Exodus by Driver (Cambridge Bible); Bennett (Century Bible); McNeile (Westminster Commentary); Chadwick (The Expositor's Bible). On the critical and historical questions: Breasted, History of Egypt; Kent, Israel's Laws and Legal Precedents; Wade, O.T. History; Foakes-Jackson, Biblical History of the Hebrews; Bacon, Triple Tradition of the Exodus; Shaw, The Tabernacle: Its History and Structure; Palmer, The Desert of the Exodus; Petrie, Researches in Sinai (chapters by C. T. Currelly). See also literature cited above under section on "Religious Value," p. 250.

CHAPTER I

1-7. Introductory Statement. The writer prefaces the history with a general statement regarding the settlement of Israel in Egypt and the sojourn there. The latter part of v. 1 should be rendered, "who came each man and his household with Jacob." Compare the list of names of Jacob's sons and grandsons in Gen. 46⁸⁻²⁷, where the total of seventy is made up by including Jacob himself and Joseph with his two sons. The LXX counts seventy-five, perhaps including the grandsons and great-grandsons of Joseph named in Num. 26²⁸⁻³⁷. Cf. Deut. 10²² and Acts 7¹⁴. The passage in Acts is evidently based upon the LXX.

The story of Joseph's death and burial in Egypt has been told in Gen. 50²²⁻²⁶. There it is also related that he predicted the return at some future time from Egypt to Palestine, and that he made the Israelite people promise on oath that they would then bring his body to be buried in the land of his fathers. The period of the sojourn of Israel in Egypt, during which they multiplied and waxed exceeding mighty, is given as four hundred and thirty years, 12^{40, 41} (cf. Gal. 3¹⁷), and as four hundred years, Gen. 15¹³ (cf. Acts 7⁶). The land which was filled with them was that part of Egypt called in Gen. 45¹⁰ and other passages "the land of Goshen," and in Gen. 47¹¹ "the land of Rameses." It seems to have been in the eastern part of the Delta.

8-22. The Oppression. A new king (v. 8), in all probability, implies a new dynasty. If, as is commonly believed, the king who made Joseph his prime minister was one of the Hyksos, or Shepherd Kings, invaders from Asia who held sway in Egypt, with their capital at Zoan (or Tanis) in the northeastern part of the Delta, the new king may have belonged to the eighteenth native Egyptian dynasty, by whom the Hyksos invaders were expelled from Egypt about 1580 B.C., or to the nineteenth dynasty founded about 1328 B.C. If the Exodus took place in the reign of Merenptah (1234-1214 B.C.), the king here mentioned must have been his predecessor, Rameses II. The favor shown the Hebrew settlers by the Hyksos kings, who were themselves, like the Hebrews, of an Asiatic race, was not continued by the native Egyptian kings who followed them. They may have feared another Asiatic invasion, and that the Hebrews, whose territory was on the frontier, would take sides with their enemies.

Accordingly the Egyptians imposed upon them forced labor on the king's buildings and other public works. Doubtful of the loyalty of the Hebrews, they nevertheless did not want to lose them from the country, and so reduced them to a condition of slavery. Many of the great public works of Egypt, as of other ancient countries under despotic rule, were built in this way by the forced labor of slaves, or even of the common people of the country themselves.

The name Pharaoh is a compound of two Egyptian words which mean "Great House," and is used here as a title of the king, and not as his personal name. It is remarkable that the personal name is not given here as in the references to Egyptian kings in later centuries (1 Kings 14²⁵ 2 Kings 17⁴ 19⁹ 23²⁹ 2 Chr. 14⁹). This may be due to the fact that the history in its present form was not written until three hundred or more years later, when the personal names were not known.

The store cities (v. 11) were built for the storing of provisions against a period of famine, or of supplies for the army in time of war, or possibly also as convenient centers for trade (cf. 1 Kings 9¹⁹ 2 Chr. 17¹²). Pithom is mentioned by the Greek historian Herodotus (fifth century B.C.) as on the canal made by Necho (610-594 B.C.) to connect the Nile with the Red Sea, a canal which had been begun by Rameses II, and was finally completed by the Persian ruler Darius. The site of Raamses (or Rameses) has not been certainly identified but it must have been in the same region, in the eastern Delta, where we know Rameses II to have carried on many building enterprises. (See also intro., section on "Contemporary History," p. 250.)

They were grieved (v. 12). The Hebrew word means both dread and dislike. They became alarmed and dreaded the growth of their Israelite neighbors. The same word is rendered "was distressed" in Num. 22³, and "abhor" in Isa. 7¹⁶. The word rendered rigor (vv. 13, 14) is comparatively rare. It contains the idea of crushing force. The mortar was the black mud of the Nile or its canals, which was mixed with fragments of pottery. For the making of brick this mud was sometimes mixed with sand, and, to give it greater coherence, with chopped straw and chaff. In a semi-liquid state it was poured into molds and afterward dried in the sun. Such bricks were used both in Babylonia and Egypt for all kinds of buildings. The service in the field would include irrigation work of all kinds, the construction of dams and canals and the laborious lifting of water from the river or pools to the higher levels.

The Hebrew midwives refused to obey the king's inhuman command, and, it is said, as a reward for their piety God made them houses, (v. 21), i.e., families who perpetuated their names in times long after. It is thus that their names are remembered and recorded here. Since only two of these women are mentioned it is evident that the Hebrew community cannot have been very large.

CHAPTER II

VERSES 1-22: BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE OF MOSES; HIS FLIGHT TO MIDIAN

1-4. Birth of Moses. The father of Moses was a man of the house of Levi, i.e., of the clan, or family group, which claimed Levi, third son of Jacob, as its ancestor. His mother was a daughter of Levi, or perhaps more correctly, as in the LXX, "one of the daughters of Levi." Like her husband, she was a member of the Levite clan, not literally a daughter of Jacob's son. Compare the name daughters of Israel given to the Hebrew women in Judg. 11⁴⁰; daughters of Canaan, Gen. 28⁸; and daughters of Judah, Psa. 48¹¹. But see also 61⁴⁻²⁰ Num. 26⁵⁷⁻⁵⁹ (cf. 1 Chr. 23⁶⁻¹³), in which Amram, Moses' father, is said to be a grandson of Levi, and Jochebed, his wife, to be his father's sister, and so a daughter of Levi. If, however, there really was this close relationship between the patriarch Levi, who went down into Egypt with his father Jacob, and Moses, it is difficult to account for the four hundred years, or four hundred and thirty years (Gen. 15¹³ Ex. 12^{40, 41}) of the Egyptian sojourn.

The narrative here is concerned chiefly with Moses and he alone is mentioned (v. 2), but we learn further on that he had an older sister, Miriam (v. 4, 15²⁰ Num. 26⁵⁹), and an older brother Aaron (77). For the goodly appearance of the child Moses see also Acts 7²⁰ and Heb. 11²³.

The ark of bulrushes was made of the long stems of the Nile rush or papyrus, woven or bound tightly together and plastered with bitumen (rendered here slime) and pitch to make it water-tight. The pith of the stems of the same plant was cut into strips which, laid side by side and crossed at right angles with a second layer of the same, then glued together in sheets of convenient size, made a sort of paper used in Egypt and other neighboring countries as writing material. It had many other uses, such as for mats, sails, cloth, and baskets. The ark was, no doubt, shaped like a small boat. Such light boats are mentioned in Job 9²⁶ and Isa. 18². A story has been found of an ancient Babylonian king, Sargon I, who was born in secret, committed to the river by his mother in a basket of rushes, and found and reared by one who used the river water to irrigate his fields.

5-10. Adoption by Pharaoh's Daughter. The daughter of Pharaoh is called by Josephus Thermouthis, and by Eusebius Merris. An inscription of the reign of Rameses II says that he had sixty sons and fifty-nine daughters. Among the names of his daughters there is one Meri, who may be the princess of our story. Knowing of the king's cruel edict, and her womanly compassion being aroused by the pitiful cry of the child, she adopted him, and by the ready wit of Miriam he was given to his own mother to nurse. As Moses grew from childhood to manhood he had, therefore, the double advantage of a knowledge of his own home and his own people, and of such education as the court and palace of an Egyptian king could afford. The story assumes that the king had a residence in or near the place where Moses was born and, therefore, in the Eastern Delta, and this seems to be confirmed by the discovery of many evidences of the presence of nineteenth-dynasty kings in that region.

The name Moses is pronounced in Hebrew Mōsheh and is the participle of a verb which means "draw." See Psa. 18¹⁶, where there may be a reference to the deliverance of Moses. The word, however, is rare in Hebrew, and it has been supposed that it may have been originally an Egyptian word, which suggested the meaning "draw" only by its similarity in sound to the Hebrew word. If this be true, its original meaning may have been "son," or "child" (Egyptian mes, or mesu; see p. 62a). Driver (Commentary, p. 11) suggests most, "born."

11-15. Flight to Midian. The story told in vv. 11-15 throws light on the character of Moses in his earlier years. Though adopted by a princess and educated in the palace, he is not forgetful of his own people and of their burdens. In his interference on behalf of one who was being abused by an Egyptian he shows a rash and hasty temper, in marked contrast to the patience, forbearance, and self-control of later years. Two incidents, however, of those years of leadership in Israel show the same hot temper blazing forth under great provocation (see 32¹⁹⁻²² Num. 20¹⁻¹³).

Josephus, the Jewish historian of the time of Christ, tells another story to the effect that Moses attained a high command in the Egyptian army and led a successful expedition against the Ethiopians, in which he won the daughter of the Ethiopian king as his wife, and that, as a consequence, Pharaoh was jealous of his success and sought to kill him (Antiquities, bk. ii, chs. 10, 11; cf. Num. 12¹).

The land of Midian (Vulgate, Madian) lay to the eastward of Egypt, across the Asiatic boundary. Its exact location is now unknown. If the traditional placing of Mount Sinai (=Horeb) in the southern part of the Sinaitic peninsula be correct, then we would look for the land of Midian in the same region, probably on the western side of the Gulf of Akaba, the northeastern arm of the Red Sea. Ptolemy, a celebrated Egyptian writer on astronomy and geography of the second century A.D., and Arabian writers mention a place called Modiana, or Madyan, east of the gulf of Akaba. In the O.T. Midian appears in the neighborhood of Moab and Edom (Gen. 36³⁵ Num. 22⁴ 25¹⁶⁻¹⁸), and along with Amalekites and "children of the east," invading Israel from the east (Judg. 6-8). The Midianites are represented as, like the Hebrews, descended from Abraham (Gen. 25²), and so closely related to them. They were sent away by Abraham "eastward, unto the east country" (Gen. 25⁶). They are represented as caravan traders (Gen. 37²⁸ Isa. 60⁶), as shepherds (here), and as enemies of Israel (Num. 25¹⁶⁻¹⁸ 31¹⁻¹² Judg. 6-8). As a nomadic Arabian people they may have had several branches, and may have had more than one home in the northwestern Arabian wilderness.

16-22. With the Priest of Midian. The priest of Midian was, no doubt, the chief priest of the tribe and a person of importance. He may have been the guardian of the local shrine or sanctuary. In ch. 18 he appears to be a worshiper of Jehovah. His daughters cared for the flocks of sheep, according to a custom which still exists in the peninsula of Sinai. The name given to the priest in v. 18, Reuel (LXX Raguel), appears again in Num. 10²⁹. In ch. 3 and elsewhere he is called Jethro. (Cf. Judg. 1¹⁶ 4¹¹.) He may have actually had two names, or the difference in names may be due to difference in tradition. He appreciates the kindness of the stranger to his daughters and offers him the ready hospitality of the highborn Arab. The daughters called Moses an Egyptian because his clothes, and possibly his language, were Egyptian. The name Zipporah, which is feminine in form, means "bird," and Gershom (LXX Gersam) "a sojourner there."

CHAPTERS 22³ TO 41⁷: VISION AND CALL OF MOSES

The cry of the people suffering a cruel bondage in Egypt reached the ear of God, and he raised up for them a deliverer. Moses, whose birth, education, and experience in the Arabian wilderness qualified him in an exceptional way for the task, was the man chosen. In a vision in the sacred mountain of Horeb God appeared to him, and revealed a new name by which he was henceforth to be known in Israel. In response to Moses' reluctant pleas and excuses he gives assurances and signs of his unfailing presence and help.

23-25. Israel's Cry of Distress. The king of Egypt, if we accept the later date of the Exodus, was Rameses II, who began the oppression and enslavement of Israel. He died about 1234 B.C. The writer of this history is assured of God's interest in the affairs of men, and that their sufferings do not go unnoticed by him. God heard, he remembered his covenant, he saw, and he took knowledge. For the covenant with Abraham see Gen. 15 and 17.

CHAPTER III

The story of Moses' vision at Horeb, in chs. 3 and 4, is drawn almost entirely from the Prophetic History Book, the oldest of the sources of the Pentateuch. It contains a remarkable and exceedingly valuable interpretation of Moses' religious experience and of the significance of the divine Name revealed to him.

1-3. The Burning Bush. The back of the wilderness, where the vision occurred, was, according to the usage of the language, the western part. If we accept the ordinary and traditional view that Horeb was in the southern part of the peninsula of Sinai, then the region referred to will be the country west of the Gulf of Akaba, in which there are several mountains from 6,500 to 8,500 feet in height. The farthest east of these, called by the Arabs Jebel Musa, or "the mount of Moses," is the one commonly identified with Mount Horeb.

It must be remembered, however, that there are strong reasons for believing that Mount Horeb was much farther north. For example, the place called Meribah, where Moses smote the rock and obtained a supply of water (17¹⁻⁷), is placed in the corresponding story in Num. 20¹⁻¹³ at or near Kadesh (see map), and yet the rock is described as "the rock in Horeb" (17⁶; cf. Num. 27¹⁴ Deut. 32⁵¹). If Horeb and Sinai are identified, or if they belong to the same range or group of mountains, there is additional reason for believing it to be near Kadesh. In Num. 10¹² the first stopping place in the march of the Israelites from Sinai is the wilderness of Paran, and from this wilderness of Paran Moses sent the spies (Num. 13³) northward into Canaan, who returned to him to Kadesh (Num. 13²⁶). In Num. 20¹⁶ Kadesh is said to be on the border of Edom.

In Deut. 33² Sinai seems to be identified with Seir, the name given to the mountains of Edom (cf. Judg. 54, 5 Hab. 33). As against this view and in favor of the traditional site in the peninsula must be mentioned the fact that in the list of the journeys of the Israelites in Num. 33, there are twenty stations between Sinai and Kadesh, and that, in Deut. 12, it is said that "It is eleven days' journey from Horeb by the way of mount Seir to Kadesh," and that it is through a "great and terrible wilderness." (See McNeile, Exodus, pp. cii-cvi, who endeavors to prove that Horeb and Sinai are not identical, the former being east of the gulf of Akabah, and the latter near Kadesh on the western border of Edom. The exact position of the sacred mountain of Moses' vision is still an open question. An extremely interesting and full discussion of the subject will be found in Driver, Exodus, pp. 177-191.)

Here, as in a number of other passages, the angel of the Lord represents the Lord himself (v. 2; cf. vv. 4, 6). In Isa. 63⁹ it is "the angel of his presence" (cf. 232²⁰⁻²³ 323⁴ 331⁴ Mal. 3¹). The mountain is called the mountain of God, perhaps because it was already held by the Midianites to be a sacred place, an ancient sanctuary. It may have been, therefore, that Moses, the shepherd, approached the place in a spirit of reverence and worship, and so was prepared in mind and heart for the vision which came to him there. There he saw a great sight, a bush which burned with fire, and the bush was not consumed. It is, perhaps, useless to try to explain just what Moses saw, or to find any phenomenon of nature which might have assumed this strange and startling appearance. No doubt nature does, at times, clothe herself in flaming colors. Whittier, with this experience of Moses in mind, has written of one who saw God in the "miracle of autumn," when

"All the woods with many-colored flame
Of splendor, making summer's greenness tame, Burned, unconsumed; a voice without a sound Spake to him from each kindled bush around,
And made the strange new landscape holy ground."

Every one will be familiar too with Elizabeth Barrett Browning's lines:

"Earth's crammed with heaven,
And every common bush afire with God;
But only he who sees takes off his shoes."

4-12. Call and Commission. There is no vision and no glory to him who does not see.

Whatever the explanation, the fact remains of a profound experience of the Spirit, a real coming face to face with God (Deut. 34¹⁰). It is certain that Moses, during his banishment, had pondered much upon the affliction of his brethren in Egypt; and that the question how or by what means they might be delivered had often occurred to him. Now the call of duty comes home to him. It is the voice of God. He is the man divinely chosen for the task. The God of Horeb is the God of his fathers; it is therefore no strange voice that speaks. There is a new and significant name, but the same God.

The removing of the sandals and the hiding of the face by Moses are tokens of reverence. The Samaritans to this day remove their shoes at their sanctuary on Mount Gerizim, and the Mohammedans at the door of the mosque.

I am come down to deliver (v. 8). That is God's word of assurance and of promise. Moses is the chosen instrument of his will and purpose, but God himself is the deliverer. See the spirited poetic description of God's work on behalf of Israel in Psa. 105²⁶⁻⁴⁵.

The description of the land of Canaan, the home of their fathers, in v. 8 (cf. v. 17), is repeated from Gen. 15¹⁸⁻²¹, and appears again in 13⁵ 33², 3 Lev. 20²⁴ Num. 13²⁷⁻²⁹ 14⁷ Deut. 26⁹⁻¹⁵ Jer. 11⁵ 32²² Ezek. 20⁶ (cf. Deut. 8⁷⁻⁹). The terms Canaanite, and sometimes Amorite, are used in a general way for the native inhabitants of Canaan. Where there is a distinction the Canaanites appear to be regarded as inhabitants of the coast lands and the Jordan Valley, and the Amorites of the higher lands both east and west of Jordan. The Hittite was representative of a great nation whose proper home was much farther north, in Syria and Asia Minor, but of which some settlements existed in Palestine from the days of Abraham (Gen. 23⁵, "the children of Heth"; cf. Num. 13²⁹). The Perizzite, a people of central Palestine, are supposed by some to have been simple peasantry, country-folk, living in unwall'd villages (cf. Deut. 35 1 Sam. 6¹⁸). The Hivite and the Jebusite were comparatively unimportant peoples of central Palestine, the latter of whom maintained themselves in Jerusalem until the reign of David.

Moses said unto God, Who am I? (V. 11.) His humility and his shrinking from so great a task, together with distrust of his own powers, are not altogether to his discredit. Compare Jeremiah's self-distrust in the presence of God's call (Jer. 16), and the modest protest of Gideon (Judg. 6¹⁵). The answer of God to Moses, as to Gideon and to Jeremiah, is Certainly I will be with thee. The God who dwells in the flaming bush upon the mountain-side is also the God of human life. He will be with the man he has chosen, and he will dwell in the midst of the community of his people. The token suggested to Moses is to be a proof that he is really sent by God. We can imagine that it would make a strong appeal to his mind. If he can succeed in bringing the people of Israel out of Egypt, he will lead them to this very mountain, to this place now doubly sacred to him, and here he and they will worship God together. That will, indeed, be a proof of the reality and truth of the vision.

13-22. Jehovah, the God of Israel. Four apparently serious difficulties present themselves to the mind of Moses. The first (vv. 11, 12) is his fear that he is not the right person to undertake the task, that he has not the ability to perform it. This fear is removed by the promise of God's ever-present help. The second difficulty (vv. 13-22) is his fear that the people will not believe that it was really the God of their fathers who had spoken to him. Those were days of the worship of many gods. The Israelites were surrounded on every side by Egyptian temples and altars. No doubt the wilderness to which Moses had fled had its gods also—so they would naturally think. Much depended upon the name, the personal name, of the deity with whom he had held communion. What is his name? they will be sure to ask. What shall I say?

The answer to Moses' question (v. 14) contains either a new name, or a new interpretation of an old name of God already known to Moses. The latter seems to be the more likely explanation of it. The words I am that I am are evidently intended as an interpretation of the name "Jehovah," which was pronounced in Hebrew Yahweh. According to the popular etymology of this passage the Hebrew word was understood to be the third person singular masculine of the imperfect tense of the verb "to be" in its older form (found in a few instances in the Hebrew text and common in Aramaic), meaning "He is," or "He will be"; or, if regarded as derived from the causative stem of the verb, "He causes to be." The divine voice says "I am," Moses interprets "He is." There is some reason to believe that the name was known before this revelation of its meaning to Moses. If Professor Hubert Grimme's recent attempts to translate certain obscure inscriptions found in the peninsula of Sinai can be relied upon (see intro., p. 251) there was a temple there to Yahu (= Yahweh) in the fifteenth century B.C. The name may have been used by the Midianites with whom Moses was living. In passages of Genesis drawn from one of the early prophetic historians of Israel it is represented as freely used by the patriarchs. It is true that, in another account of this vision (62-9), the statement is made that by the name "Jehovah" (= Yahweh) God was not known to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and was made known first to Moses, but this is quite evidently drawn from another source, and may be an inference from the story in ch. 3.

There is no doubt that the name, whatever its original meaning and use may have been, came to designate for Moses and for Israel the living, self-existent God, the One who is and will be, and who has within himself the exhaustless resources of being. He is not defined by one event, or by one circumstance, or by the experience of one age or nation, but is ceaselessly renewing the revelation of himself in the world of nature and in human history. His being is expressed in action. He will be with his people, guide, counselor, warrior, lawgiver, and mighty deliverer. See Psa. 68⁴ 89⁸ (where the name is contracted to Jah, more correctly, Yah, or the word may represent an earlier form of the divine name) Jn. 8⁵⁸ Heb. 138 Rev. 14 4⁸.

It should be explained here that, in the Authorized Version and in the English Revised Version the name is most commonly translated "Lord." The American Revised Version prefers to use the form "Jehovah." This form has resulted from a curious mistake made by a mediæval Christian scholar, who, in endeavoring to read and translate the Hebrew text, combined the consonants of the divine name with the vowels of another word (Adonai = Lord) which was commonly substituted for it by Jewish readers.

The request which is to be made of Pharaoh (v. 18) is, no doubt, intended to be preliminary to further demands. The Egyptian king will realize that if the enslaved people are allowed to escape into the freedom of the wilderness they will not return. He will, of course, be unwilling, and his refusal will be by a mighty hand (v. 19), i.e., accompanied by the exercise of compelling force. But it will be better to adopt here the reading of the LXX, "except by a mighty hand," i.e., by the compelling power of the hand of God (so also v. 20, 61 139 321, and frequently in Deuteronomy and elsewhere).

The request is that they may be permitted to go a certain distance into the eastern wilderness to offer sacrifice and to hold a feast (51) unto their God. This may have been intended as the revival of an ancient spring festival, neglected during the sojourn in Egypt, in which the first fruits of the harvest and the firstlings of flock and herd were offered in sacrifice, a festival afterward associated with the Passover and made to commemorate the deliverance from Egypt (see 13:11-16 Lev. 23:9-14 Deut. 16:1-8).

The people are to be instructed, when permission is given them to go, to ask presents of their Egyptian neighbors, and so to spoil the Egyptians (v. 22). The asking and giving of presents was a frequent incident marking the interchange of courtesies as well as of diplomatic missions in those days (cf. Job 6:22). The apocryphal book of Wisdom (10:17) interprets this, perhaps quite rightly, by saying that thus wisdom "rendered to the righteous a reward of their labors."

CHAPTER IV

1-9. Confirmatory Signs and Promises. Moses' third difficulty (cf. 3:13-22) lies in his fear that the people will not believe him nor listen to him when he comes to them with his message from God. His fear is met by signs which will be convincing, namely, the rod changed to a serpent, the leprous hand infected and then healed, and the water become blood. In ch. 7 we are told that when Moses exhibited these signs in the presence of Pharaoh the magicians of Egypt did likewise with their enchantments, and Pharaoh was unconvinced.

The insertion of parentheses in vv. 4 and 7 appears to be quite unnecessary, and is not required by the sense. There does seem, however, to be an omission at the beginning of v. 5, which should, perhaps, be directly connected with vv. 8, 9, and be preceded by some such words as "And the Lord said unto him, Do this," etc.

10-17. Moses' Reluctance Overcome. The fourth objection of Moses (v. 10; cf. 3:13-22) is that he is not eloquent, in Hebrew "not a man of words." The answer which he receives is that the God who made man's mouth will be with him and will teach him what to say. This assurance was abundantly fulfilled in the experience of Moses, who "was mighty in his words and works" (Acts 7:22). If the speeches attributed to him in Deuteronomy were his own words, and not an exposition of his teaching by later writers, we would indeed have to believe him to have been a speaker of notable eloquence and power.

Moses finally yields, but with apparent unwillingness, to the call of God (v. 13), and is now promised that Aaron, his brother, who can speak well (v. 14), will be associated with him. It may be noted in passing that the description of Aaron as the Levite makes it quite clear that this story was not written by Moses himself, but by others about him long afterward, when it was necessary to explain who Aaron was in this place where his name is first mentioned (cf. 6:20 7:1, 2). Aaron, Moses is told, is coming to meet him (see vv. 27, 28). He is to be Moses' spokesman unto the people, but the supreme authority is to rest with Moses, who is to be to him as God.

CHAPTERS 4:18 TO 5:23; MOSES RETURNS TO EGYPT; PETITIONS PHARAOH IN VAIN

18-31. The Return of Moses to Egypt. According to the patriarchal custom which prevailed in Arabia, Jethro was head of the family group or clan into which Moses had entered by marriage. Moses now asks and receives his permission to return to Egypt. The abrupt introduction of another command of God in v. 19 is one more indication of the fact that the narrative is compiled from different older sources. There is close connection here with 22:3a. Note the difference, however, between the reference to Moses' son in v. 25 (cf. 2:22), and the plural "sons" in v. 20 (cf. 18:1-5), still another indication of the composite character of the narrative.

Moses is bidden to present himself on his return to Pharaoh and to demand the release of his people, but is warned of the hardness of Pharaoh's heart (cf. 7:13, 22, etc.). That which we might regard as the natural and inevitable result of Pharaoh's cruelty and perverseness is here said to be the act of God (cf. Rom. 9:17, 18, notes).

Israel is my son, my firstborn (v. 22). God is thus declared to be the father of his people, and the close relationship which this represents is often assumed both in the O.T. and N.T. See Isa. 63:16 Jer. 31:9, 20 Hos. 11:1. The threat in v. 23 anticipates the tenth and last of the plagues (11:4-6).

The curious story told in v. 24 can only be understood as coming from a great antiquity and as representing an early and very primitive way of thinking. Moses is taken seriously ill at the lodging-place. His illness is attributed to the anger of God against him because he has neglected the sacred duty of circumcision in the case of his son. It is not to be inferred that it was neglected in his own case (Driver, Exodus, p. 33), which not only would be most unlikely, but is excluded by the statement of Josh. 5:4, 5. It was a custom, however, which was probably not practiced by the Midianites among whom he had been living, and seems to have been now reluctantly performed by his wife as, to her mind and to his, the only means of turning aside the anger of God and saving his life. So, when God let him alone, i.e., ceased to afflict him with sickness, she declared him to be a bridegroom of blood, saved to her by the blood of her son. According to the story in Genesis (17¹⁰⁻¹⁴), the custom was introduced in the time of Abraham, and became a sign of the covenant bond between Jehovah and his people. It is known to have been practiced also by the neighboring and closely related peoples of Edom, Moab, and Ammon, by some Arabian tribes, and by Egyptians at least as early as the age of Moses. It can readily be understood that Moses, returning to Egypt to face the elders of his own people as their divinely appointed leader, might have been seriously disturbed in his mind by the neglect to circumcise his son and by the effect which this might have upon their minds and so upon the success of his mission. It is quite possible, also, that the apparent disagreement between Moses and his wife, which is suggested by this incident, led to her being sent back to her father, while Moses went on with his brother to Egypt (see 182).

Aaron, Moses' brother (v. 27), henceforth occupies a large place in the history of the Exodus; and, in the organization of the nation which takes place at Sinai, becomes the religious head, the chief priest, of Israel, as Moses becomes its lawgiver and judge, the authority of Moses being, however, always recognized as supreme (see 281-3).

CHAPTER V

1-9. Moses' Petition and Pharaoh's Refusal. The word rendered feast (v. 1) means both a pilgrimage and a sacred festival. It is identical with the word still used by Arabs and Egyptians to describe the pilgrimage to Mecca. The request of Moses and Aaron is that the people be permitted to make pilgrimage to some shrine or sanctuary in the wilderness. Perhaps Horeb was the place which they had in mind, although it was distant much more than three days' journey. Pharaoh does not recognize the Lord (in Hebrew Jehovah) as having anything to do with him. His question is contemptuous: Who is Jehovah, that I should hearken to his voice? The events which followed humbled that false pride (see 88, 28 928 1016, 17).

The visit of Moses and Aaron to the elders of Israel had become known (429-31), and the people, in the natural excitement at the hope of deliverance thus awakened in their hearts, had relaxed their diligence in labor upon Pharaoh's works. The king lays the blame upon Moses and Aaron. He determines to increase the burden of toil and commands, Let heavier work be laid upon the men that they may labor therein (v. 9). Straw had formerly been supplied to the men who made bricks of the Nile clay, but it will be supplied no longer; yet the full tale of the bricks will be required as before. The straw was useful in binding the clay more firmly together and so making a better and more durable brick, but brick seems often to have been made without it. The hardship of the new orders was increased by the demand that the full number of bricks should be made each day, so that it was not possible to concentrate upon the gathering of stubble one day with the hope of doubling the number the next (v. 13)—a good example of unreasoning, inhuman tyranny and cruelty.

10-19. Increased Burdens. The taskmasters of Pharaoh had appointed officers of the Hebrews themselves, whom they had set over the labor gangs, and whom they held responsible for the full quantity of work assigned. It was they, therefore, who were beaten, and who brought their complaint to Pharaoh. In v. 16 we should read in the last clause, with the LXX, "and thou shalt be guilty of sin [or a wrong] against thy people."

20-23. Discouragement and Complaints. (See 61.) Returning from their unsatisfactory interview with Pharaoh, and seeing themselves to be indeed in evil case, the officers, in their turn, bitterly accuse Moses and Aaron of being the cause of all their trouble. The net result of this first move toward deliverance was to sink the people into a deeper bondage and a blacker despair. They say to Moses, "You have brought us into exceedingly bad odor with Pharaoh and his officers, giving them an opportunity and an excuse to destroy us" (v. 20).

It was the habit of Moses, in the simplicity and purity of his faith, to turn to his God, whose promise at Horeb (312) he never forgot. See also 612, 30 174 3211-13 Deut. 926-29, etc. The answer to his prayer here lies in the power of God, in the strong hand by which the Lord will compel Pharaoh to let Israel go. In the calamities which came thick and fast upon Egypt in that tragic year he was to see the exercise of the compelling power of that strong hand (cf. 319 notes, 133).

CHAPTERS 61 TO 77: A SECOND ACCOUNT OF MOSES' VISION AND CALL

We have here (omitting 614-27) a second and shorter account of the experiences in Arabia and Egypt which led Moses to take up the great task of Israel's deliverance. This may fairly be regarded as taken by the compilers of the history from a different source, most probably from the Priestly History Book from which we have also 6¹⁴⁻²⁷ 78-¹¹ 121-²⁸, and many other passages of a similar character. The portions of the book of Genesis which appear to be taken from this same source do not use the name "Jehovah," so this writer is quite consistent in his statement that the name was now revealed for the first time to Moses. In 31⁴ (see notes) there seems to be rather a new significance attached to an old and already known name.

CHAPTER VI

1-8. Call and Commission. In the Hebrew El Shaddai = "God Almighty," we have another of the very old Semitic names of God. El occurs frequently in the O.T., both alone and in compounds such as Bethel, "house of God," Elijah, "my God is Jehovah," etc., and in the titles "Most High God" (Gen. 14¹⁸), "Everlasting God" (Gen. 21³³), "Jealous God" (Ex. 20⁵), etc. The combination El Shaddai, or Shaddai alone, is found in many passages, as, e.g., Gen. 17¹ 28³ Num. 24⁴, 16, etc. The original or root meaning of the words is unknown. (Cf., however, the larger commentaries.)

The covenant (v. 4) with Abraham is made the starting point of all Israel's religious history. As developed in the teachings of priest and prophet it has become one of the most fruitful of all religious ideas. The Hebrew word means a "bond," and is used to signify an agreement freely entered into between men, and here between man and God, and confirmed by solemn oaths and engagements. Freely undertaken by both parties it becomes the most binding of all obligations, the fulfillment of its terms being a proof of honor and of fidelity. In the sphere of religion it represents man and God as thus bound together by mutual ties of faithfulness and high responsibility and honor, there resting upon the man who enters into it the same moral obligation to keep his oath and promise as upon the God he serves. In this passage the covenant with the patriarchs is recalled, with the assurance that it stands firm in the faithfulness of God and will surely be fulfilled. See, e.g., Gen. 15¹³⁻²¹ 17¹⁻⁹. Its fulfillment involves deliverance of Israel from Egypt and restoration to the land of their fathers, a task to which Jehovah will now set his hand. Jehovah will redeem his people from their bondage. The covenant made with their fathers he will renew with them as a nation, they to be his people and he to be their God (vv. 6-9). It is thus that Jehovah first of all earns and receives his title of Redeemer (cf. 15¹³ Psa. 74² 77¹⁵ 78³⁵ 106¹⁰ Isa. 41¹⁴ 43¹⁴ 54⁵). The lifting up of the hand (v. 8; cf. A.S.V. "sware," and mg.) signifies the oath by which he had bound himself in covenant bond.

9-13, 28-30. The People's Unbelief and Moses' Hesitation to Approach Pharaoh. The expression uncircumcised lips is apparently Moses' way of saying that he has not the gift of eloquent speech (as in 41⁰). Evidently, circumcision meant consecration of the body and its life to God, and such consecration would be regarded, ideally at least, as fitting the man for God's service. Moses feels his unfitness in this regard. (See notes on ch. 3.)

14-27. The Tribe and Family of Moses. These verses evidently contain part of a genealogical record of the sons of Jacob. The writer's purpose is, however, to show the descent and kindred of Moses and Aaron, and so he limits himself, from v. 16 onward, to the tribe of Levi. Cf. 12 Gen. 35²³⁻²⁶ 46⁸⁻²⁷ Num. 26⁵⁻⁶². The term fathers' houses means "family groups," or "clans." The Syriac version adds, in v. 20, "and Miriam."

28-30. See under vv. 9-13.

CHAPTER VII

1-7. Commission of Moses and Aaron. The answer of God to Moses' confession of unfitness is, as in 41⁴⁻¹⁶, the choice of Aaron to be his spokesman. The Hebrew word here rendered prophet (v. 1) means "spokesman." Just as the prophet speaks the words which he receives from God, so will Aaron speak for Moses.

God will harden Pharaoh's heart, thus not only punishing him by increasing hardness of heart for his crime against Israel, but providing an opportunity to show his signs and wonders in Egypt and thus to convince the Egyptians that he is indeed the sovereign Lord. Such a conception would have been impossible if at this early time Jehovah had been thought of as a God of righteousness and holiness. (See notes on chs. 4, 5.)

CHAPTERS 78 TO 110: THE SIGNS AND PLAGUES

The plagues which visited the Egyptians during the greater part of a year after the refusal of Pharaoh to let Israel go are ascribed by the narrative to the direct working of the mighty hand of God on behalf of his oppressed people. At the same time it is made quite clear that they were natural phenomena, familiar to the people of Egypt, but extraordinary in intensity and violence and in their destructive effects. The writers (for we have here as in the earlier chapters material drawn from two or more sources) see the divine energy expressing itself in these events and using them both to achieve the deliverance of Israel and to make God's power known in Egypt and throughout the world (74, 5 810 144, 18 Psa. 7714, 15). They have the merit of seeing God not only in the extraordinary and supernatural but also in the natural, bending nature to his will, making the forces of nature obey him, and using them both for the good of his people and the discomfiture of their enemies.

CHAPTER VIII

Ten plagues are mentioned here, but in the two great historical poems, Psa. 78 and 105, only eight. It is possible that in two instances the story has been duplicated. The lice (or, rather, mosquitoes or sand flies) of 816-19 may be the same as the swarms of flies of 820-32 (cf. Psa. 7845 10531), and the murrain (or pestilence) of 91-7 and boils of 98-12 may also be identical (cf. Psa. 7850).

8-13. The Sign of Aaron's Rod. The rod when first mentioned was in the hand of Moses (41-4). It was used by him to convince the elders of Israel of his divine commission. Now, in the interviews with Pharaoh it is borne by Aaron. There is no parallel in magical arts to this turning of a rod into a serpent. But snake-charmers in the East do, even in the present day, by a sort of hypnotism, render snakes rigid so that they can be held in the hand as rods. This may have been what Pharaoh's wise men did.

14-25. The First Plague: Water Turned to Blood. Apparently, Pharaoh was accustomed at certain times to go to the river, perhaps for some religious ceremony. There Moses and Aaron met him (v. 20). The rod was lifted up and the waters of the river were turned to blood. We are told by those familiar with Egypt that each year, when the Nile begins to rise in flood, toward the end of June, the water becomes discolored, partly from decaying vegetable matter and partly from a reddish marl brought down from the mountains of Abyssinia. It is first green, then red, and at this stage the river is called by the natives the Red Nile. But the Red Nile water is not unwholesome, and does not cause the fish in the river to die. It is evident, therefore, that there was something quite unusual and extraordinary in this seven days' plague. For another instance of water appearing like blood see 2 Kings 322, 23; cf. Psa. 7844 10529. The magicians of Egypt produced the same change in some small body of water, or perhaps in vessels filled with water from the wells (v. 24).

In v. 17 the abrupt change from the words spoken by the Lord in the first part of the verse to the words of Moses in the second part is most likely to be accounted for by the method of the author or compiler, who pieces together his narrative from the different sources. Thus v. 17a is from one source and v. 17b from another.

1-15. The Second Plague: Frogs. If it may be supposed that the discoloration and corruption of the river water was due to the presence of great quantities of decaying vegetable matter swept down from its southern sources by the Nile flood, this condition would be favorable to the multiplication of frogs. And so the frogs came up and covered the land of Egypt. They entered the houses, and the earthenware stoves or ovens, and the shallow wooden kneading troughs. The magicians, also, by some clever trick, were able to produce frogs where there had been none. But Pharaoh was sufficiently impressed to send for Moses and Aaron and to beg them to intreat the Lord that he take away the frogs. This is a decided change from the contemptuous pride with which he greeted them at their first interview (51, 2).

The words of Moses in v. 9 are usually understood as a polite way of saying to the king, "Let the honor be yours of appointing the time." The Hebrew text, however, suggests the idea of a boast on the part of Pharaoh, and the meaning intended may rather be, "Have your boast that you have gotten the better of me in this matter: against what time?" etc. Moses reads truly the falsehood in Pharaoh's promise (v. 8), but nevertheless yields to his request. He is willing that this time the king may boast to his princes and people that he has outwitted the insistent and troublesome Hebrew. At the same time he would give him unmistakable evidence that there is none like unto the Lord (v. 10). In v. 12b we should render (as in mg.) "as he had appointed (or promised) unto Pharaoh."

16-19. The Third Plague: Lice. The Hebrew word here rendered lice more probably denotes "gnats" or "mosquitoes" (Isa. 516 mg.), which are abundant in Egypt. The ancient versions interpret both ways, some as lice and some as gnats. The fact that they attacked both man and beast is in favor of the latter meaning. While the Nile is in flood, especially in the autumn, they rise in swarms from the flooded rice-fields and "the air is sometimes darkened with them. Their sting occasions swelling and irritation." (See Driver, Exodus, p. 65. He adds, "The gnats in Egypt often look like clouds of dust.") Here the magicians of Egypt scored their first failure (vv. 18, 19), and said unto Pharaoh, This is the finger of God.

20-32. The Fourth Plague: Swarms of Flies. This plague, as previously suggested, may be identical with the preceding, the story of it having been drawn from two different sources. In that case the swarms of flies will have been the stinging gnats or mosquitoes. From these the Hebrews in their settlements in the land of Goshen are to be free. Pharaoh yields this time so far as to permit the Hebrews to keep their feast and offer their sacrifice within the land which they occupied in Egypt. The answer of Moses is to this effect: "The Egyptians are our near neighbors. Our customs of sacrifice would be exceedingly offensive to them." The reason for this statement lies in the fact that certain animals which the Hebrews were accustomed to offer in sacrifice were held sacred by the Egyptians, such as the cow, which was sacred to Isis, the bull to Apis, the sheep at Thebes, etc. Pharaoh goes still further and permits them to go into the wilderness, but not far away; but, when the plague is removed, he hardens his heart again and withdraws his permission. As Moses plainly said, he dealt deceitfully (v. 29).

CHAPTER IX

1-12. The Fifth and Sixth Plagues: Murrain and Boils. The very grievous murrain (in Hebrew, literally "a very heavy plague, or pestilence") and the boils represent diseases of men and cattle, the nature of which is quite unknown to us. The second is described as a boil breaking forth with blains, or pustules, i.e., distributing itself in painful blisters or ulcers. The LXX rendering suggests smallpox. The furnace (v. 8) "was a kiln for baking pottery or burning lime."

13-35. The Seventh Plague: Hail. In v. 14 the phrase upon thine heart means simply "upon thyself." The Hebrew word for heart has frequently this meaning (cf. Gen. 82¹). The words I had put forth my hand (v. 15) are hypothetical. The Lord would have done this and Pharaoh would have been cut off, but God had kept him alive for this very purpose—to show him his power, and that his name might be declared throughout all the earth (v. 16; cf. Rom. 9¹⁷). God is not thus regarded as unjust, as dooming a man to destruction or using him in an arbitrary way, but, rather, as overruling even human perversity, which brings punishment upon itself, for the accomplishment of his beneficent purposes.

Hail storms are rare in Egypt, and when they do occur it is usually in January. That is the month here indicated by the statement that the barley was in the ear, and the flax was balled (or in bud), and the wheat and the spelt . . . were not grown up (vv. 31, 32). It is evident that not all the cattle of Egypt had died (v. 6), or that fresh herds had been found, for Moses warns Pharaoh to provide for their safety.

There was fire mingled with the hail (v. 24), literally "fire taking itself in the midst of the hail." The reference is, no doubt, to incessantly recurring flashes of lightning (see mg.). Pharaoh was evidently alarmed by the awful spectacle of the storm and the destruction which it caused, but he was in no sense penitent. His confession of sin in v. 27 does not ring true.

Barley was very commonly grown in ancient Egypt, and from it was made a coarse kind of bread. The barley harvest began early in March. The flax in Egypt flowers in February. Spelt is a kind of grain much like wheat. It is known to have been used in Egypt. Jerome renders the Hebrew word here by the Latin for velch, and that may be correct.

Moses' expectation that Pharaoh and his servants would not yet fear the Lord God, and so cease their stubborn opposition to his will, was fulfilled in the end by another refusal (vv. 30, 35).

CHAPTER X

1-20. The Eighth Plague: Swarms of Locusts. We have here again (vv. 1, 2) the declaration that God is making an example of Pharaoh, in particular that the people of Israel may know and may tell their children that he is indeed their Lord, the one God whom alone they are to worship and serve. The pronoun thou (v. 2) is used not of Moses only but of all Israel (cf. Deut. 49). The words what things I have wrought (v. 2) should be rendered (as in mg.) "how I have mocked the Egyptians," but this sounds harsh to our ears. It is difficult for us, from the Christian point of view, to think of God as mocking, or, literally, making a toy or plaything of a people, diverting himself by their sufferings. The O.T. writers, who in this way endeavor to interpret for us the mind of God, had still much to learn.

For a description of the locust swarms which are common in the East, and occasionally visit Egypt, see Driver, Joel (pp. 37-39, 48-53, 87-91). Travelers tell of seeing the locusts brought up by a southwest wind from the Libyan desert, and in another instance from the east, and driven back into the desert when the wind changed. For the devastation wrought by them see Joel 14-20 22-10 (notes). Pharaoh gives only a partial consent. The men may go, but not the women and children. His words in v. 10 are ironical. Moffatt renders, "Well, said the Pharaoh, may the Eternal be with you if ever I let you and your little ones go. Let you go? Plainly you are out for some mischief. No, no!" This time, in the sequel (vv. 16, 17), Pharaoh seems to be really humbled, but when the plague was gone he refused again to let Israel go.

21-29. The Ninth Plague: Thick Darkness. The darkness which may be felt was, in all probability, produced by a sand-storm, such as occurs frequently in the months of March and April. During a period of fifty days a scorching hot wind from the desert is liable to blow in over the cultivated lands of Egypt, for two or three days at a time, bearing such quantities of fine sand and dust that the air is darkened. The darkness has been compared to that caused by a London fog. The wind is said to travel sometimes in a narrow zone leaving the air clear on either side of the storm. There is a remarkable description of the terrors of this night of darkness in Wisdom 17. Another account of the final interview of Moses with Pharaoh (vv. 28, 29) occurs in 114-8. This latter passage, however, may have originally followed the closing verses of ch. 10 in the narrative from which it was taken.

CHAPTER XI

The Tenth and Last Plague: Death of the First-born. Ch. 11 contains the announcement of the plague; the execution of the threat is recorded in 1229-36. This time, it is said, Pharaoh will not only give consent but will be so eager to get rid of the Israelite people that he will thrust them out. But before they go they will ask and receive presents of their Egyptian neighbors (cf. 321, 22 notes, 1235, 36). The fact that this was possible, and that the Lord gave the people favor in the sight of the Egyptians, shows that the relations between the two peoples were not unfriendly. The fault must have lain with the king and his counselors, yet the people suffered for the crimes of their rulers.

The last and most dreadful plague was that which carried off the first-born of Egypt (cf. 423). The story contains a reminiscence of some terrible plague which afflicted Egypt, and which was regarded by the Israelites as a just punishment for the slaughter of their infant sons by Pharaoh and for his holding them in a cruel bondage.

The mill (v. 5) consisted of two round stones, probably held together by a sort of spindle, the upper one of which was rotated upon the lower. The corn which was to be ground was poured in through a hole in the upper stone, and the work was usually done by the women.

CHAPTERS 121-28 + 1243 TO 1316: THE PASSOVER AND PASSOVER LAWS

It is evident to the reader that the laws contained in these chapters cannot have been framed and given to the people by Moses at the time of their hasty departure from Egypt. They are, rather, intended to provide for the celebration of this event in subsequent years. The instructions given in 1221-28 are in part appropriate to the occasion, but not the elaborate regulations of 121-20 and 1243-49. Moreover, we have in ch. 13 the law governing the feast of unleavened bread and the sacrifice of the first-born. The presence of these laws illustrates the method of the author, or compiler, of this history. Not only does he bring together the various narratives which were in existence in his time, but he adds also individual laws or groups of laws in connection with the events which produced them, or which they were intended to commemorate, even though the formulation or codification of these laws as he gives them did not take place until long afterward. For other Passover and related laws in the Pentateuch see 23¹⁵ 34¹⁸ Deut. 161-8 Lev. 23⁵-14 Num. 92, 3 2816-25.

CHAPTER XII

1-20. Institution of the Feasts of Passover and of Unleavened Bread. This month (v. 2) was the month Abib (134), i.e., the month of the green ear. The Hebrew month was regulated by the phases of the moon, and Abib, which was in later times called by the Babylonian name Nisan (Neh. 21 Esth. 37), came in the latter part of March and first part of April, the middle of this month corresponding closely to our Easter. (See art., Time, Money, etc., p. 77b.) The Hebrews had two methods of reckoning the year. According to one, which is still in use by the Jews, the year began in the autumn; according to the other, which is here used, in the spring. This latter method prevailed after the Babylonian Exile. In this month Abib, in Palestine, the barley was beginning to ripen, and the barley harvest began. (See further notes under vv. 21-36.)

21-36. The First Passover Celebrated. The first Passover celebrated by Moses and the Israelite people is described here (cf. vv. 43-51). A lamb or kid is taken from the flock and killed and its blood is smeared with a bunch of hyssop on the lintel and side posts of the door. When the Lord passes through the land to smite the Egyptians with a deadly plague he will see and pass over the houses of the Israelites which are so marked, and will not suffer the destroyer to come in (v. 23). It is significant that the word Passover is used here (v. 21) as though it were an institution already known. It is, indeed, quite possible that it was an ancient spring festival, associated with the offering of the firstlings of the flock and the firstfruits of the harvest. The smearing of the blood of the animal thus offered upon the lintel and door posts may have been regarded as a means of securing divine protection from plague or any kind of injury. This may have been the feast, long neglected by the Israelites in Egypt, which they now asked Pharaoh to permit them to celebrate in their own way in a wilderness pilgrimage to some sacred spot. Forever afterward, therefore, it was associated in their minds with the deliverance from Egypt. For a full discussion of the whole subject see McNeile, Exodus, pp. 62–68.

The Hebrew word translated "Passover" comes from the same root as the verb rendered "pass over" (vv. 13 and 23). In the ritual of the later age, as prescribed here in vv. 1–20, it is joined with the eating of unleavened bread (Hebrew mazzoth), and this custom may also have marked the older festival.

The fathers' houses (v. 3) were the family groups or clans. In later usage ten persons was the minimum number to join in the celebration. The animal chosen must be perfect, as in the regulations for animal sacrifice in Lev. 22:17–25 (cf. Mal. 1:8, 13). The prohibition of leaven may have been due to the fact that it was associated in the minds of the people with corruption or decay (cf. Lev. 24:5 6:14–18 7:11, 12 Num. 6:13–21, etc.). As made by modern Jews for the Passover the unleavened cakes are round, about twelve inches in diameter, and a quarter of an inch thick. In Deut. 16:3 they are called "bread of affliction," and below, in v. 39, the explanation is offered, not that the law required their use, but that they were thrust out of Egypt, and could not tarry, neither had they prepared for themselves any victual, and, therefore, they baked unleavened cakes of the dough which they brought with them.

37–42. The Departure. The exact sites of Rameses (=Raamses, 111) and of Succoth are unknown, but the former has been located with some degree of certainty in the Wādy Tumilat, a strip of cultivated land extending from the Delta to Lake Timsah, northeast of Cairo, through which in ancient times a branch of the Nile flowed into a northern extension of the gulf of Suez. Succoth was probably about ten miles farther east, close to or perhaps identical with Pithom (111; see intro., section on "Contemporary History," p. 250.) The number of six hundred thousand men, besides children, presents a real difficulty (cf. 38:26 Num. 14:6, 47 44:8 26:51, 62). Counting women and children there would be at least from one to two millions. Added to these we are told was a mixed multitude, and flocks, and herds, even very much cattle. In four generations (Gen. 15:16), or even in four hundred or four hundred and thirty years (Gen. 15:13 Ex. 12:40), seventy persons (15) could not have increased to so many. Besides, the movement of such an immense host would have been very slow, and it would have been impossible, unless miraculously supplied, to find food in the wilderness for them all. It may, however, have happened that this account, written some hundreds of years later, was based upon an older reckoning by families, in which the Hebrew word here translated "thousand" was used in the sense of "family," or "clan" (as, e.g. in Judg. 6:15 1 Sam. 10:19 23:23). The original reckoning, then, would have been six hundred families, which is a quite possible number. (See Flinders Petrie, Researches in Sinai, pp. 207–217.) This explanation is attractive but does not quite explain the fact that men only are counted, while the family or clan would have included all its members. The mixed company must have included Egyptians, and other co-laborers, who may have intermarried with them and now sought with them this way to freedom.

For the period of sojourn in Egypt see introduction, under "Contemporary History." The night of watching (v. 42 mg.) and the day of moving were indeed memorable in the history of Israel, to be much observed in annual festival even down to the present day.

43–51. The Passover Forbidden to Aliens. (Cf. notes under vv. 21–36.)

The application of the words of v. 46b (cf. Psa. 34:20) to Christ (Jn. 19:36) reminds us that in the symbolism of the N.T. our Lord has become the paschal (passover) Lamb slain for the world's redemption.

CHAPTER XIII

1–16. Consecration of the First-born: Feast of Unleavened Bread. (Cf. notes under 12:21–36.) For the dedication of the first-born to the Lord (v. 1) see more fully Num. 3:11–13, 40–45 18:15–18. The injunctions of vv. 9, 16, were taken literally by Jews of the later ages, and strips of parchment with passages from the Pentateuch written upon them (such as vv. 9, 16, Deut. 6:8 and 11:13), inclosed in little leather cases, were worn upon the forehead and upon the arm, a custom which is still continued by devout Jews at morning prayer.

17–22. Early Wanderings of the Fugitives. The way of the land of the Philistines was, of course, the shorter way, following the sea shore, to Palestine. It is quite certain, from mention of them in Genesis (21:32–34 26:1–18), that Philistines were already settled in the southwest of Palestine. They had come originally from Crete (probably same as Caphtor, Amos 97 Jer. 47⁴), and were followed by others in the reign of Rameses III, after the Exodus. This road was, no doubt, strongly guarded by frontier garrisons of Egyptian troops past whom the Israelites would have had to fight their way. They were not yet ready for war.

The Red Sea is in Hebrew "Sea of Reeds"; the body of water here referred to was most likely a fresh-water lake to the north of the Gulf of Suez, perhaps Lake Timsah, surrounded by reedy marshes, and connected in ancient times with the gulf by a shallow channel. The exact route taken is, however, a matter of conjecture. For v. 19 cf. Gen. 50²⁵ Josh. 24³².

The pillar of cloud which guided them represented to them the presence of God. By night it was a pillar of fire. Cf. 34⁵, "The Lord descended in the cloud." An ancient custom, still in use by Arabian caravans, of carrying braziers with burning wood at the head of a marching company has been cited as a possible explanation of the phenomenon. If so, it was no doubt given a religious significance, and was regarded as an altar fire symbolizing the divine presence. See Sir Walter Scott's hymn, "The March of Israel."

CHAPTERS 14¹ TO 15²¹: CROSSING THE RED SEA; THE SONG OF DELIVERANCE

By whatever means the people succeeded in crossing "the Red Sea" (13¹⁸, notes) and escaping the pursuing Egyptians, the remarkable song in which they celebrated the deliverance bespeaks their confidence that they were under divine protection.

CHAPTER XIV

1-9. Pursuit by the Egyptians. The places named in v. 2 are unknown to us, and the place where the Israelites approached the sea is likewise unknown. It should be remembered that the term "sea" is applied in the Bible to a lake or river as well as to the larger body of salt water (cf. Num. 34¹¹ Isa. 18² 19⁵ Nah. 3⁸, etc.). It is possible, therefore, that one of the lakes in the Isthmus of Suez may be intended, preferably Lake Timsah, or the Bitter Lakes (see map), which may, at that time, have been connected with each other and with the gulf to the south. It is inconceivable that Moses should have led the people to an impassable sea, trusting in a miracle for deliverance. Much more likely is it that, having turned back from the more direct and more frequently traveled road to Palestine, he followed another road by way of these lakes to a place where he expected to be able to cross, perhaps by a shallow ford. The name "Migdol," which probably means "tower," may designate a frontier post of the Egyptian army guarding this "way of the wilderness" (13¹⁸). This way, apparently, offered a more favorable opportunity than the other of escape from pursuit and recapture by the Egyptian army. The Egyptian war chariot carried two men, one driving and the other, the captain, fighting with bow or spear, and shield.

10-20. The People's Murmurings and Jehovah's Promise to Moses. Moses had here another experience (cf. 520, 21) of the ungrateful murmuring of the people against him whenever they were confronted by danger or suffering from the hardships of the way (cf. 16³ 17³ Num. 114-6 143, etc.). Over against this craven fear stands in bright relief the courage and faith of their great leader. Fear ye not, he said, stand still and see the salvation of the Lord (v. 13). The command is issued, not to turn back or to yield, but to go forward (v. 15). There is a time for prayer and a time for action. The time for action has come.

During the night the angel of God, no doubt representing the Lord himself in the pillar of cloud, removed and went behind the Israelite host. The joining of two older narratives is evident here (v. 19), in one of which the divine protector is the angel of God, and in the other the Lord in a pillar of cloud (13²¹, 22). V. 20 is explained, in part at least, by Josh. 24⁷, "He put darkness between you and the Egyptians." It is suggested by the Hebrew text that the cloud presented a dark side to the Egyptians, but lighted up the night on the side of Israel.

21-31. Crossing of the Red Sea. Throughout the night a strong east wind (which may have been from the southeast) drove back the waters. If the passage was made at the southeastern end of the Bitter Lakes, this can easily be understood. In the Gulf of Suez an east wind would have the opposite effect (see map). There may have confronted them an arm, or channel, of the lakes, fordable at low water. Such was the force of the wind that the bed of the channel at the ford was laid bare, while the deeper waters on either side were as walls to the people as they crossed over, preventing a flank attack upon them from either side.

The Egyptian army followed when there was light enough to see. The morning watch, with the Hebrews, was from two to six o'clock. Then the Lord looked forth, perhaps in flashes of lightning from the cloud. The discom-future of the Egyptians was his doing. He bound (v. 25, mg. as in LXX, not "took off") their chariot wheels, which sank and stuck fast in the muddy bottom. There may have been a change of wind which brought the waters back in flood (15¹⁰). According to Psa. 77¹⁷⁻¹⁹ there were torrents of rain with thunder and lightnings. And the Lord shook off (v. 27, mg., for "overthrew") the Egyptians in the midst of the sea (cf. 15¹ Psa. 136¹³⁻¹⁵). See also Deut. 11⁴ Psa. 78⁵³ Heb. 11²⁹.

This signal deliverance from their dreaded foe convinced the people of Israel that Jehovah was indeed the God of their fathers and mightier than the gods of Egypt (15² Psa. 106⁷⁻¹²), and confirmed them in the recognition of Moses as their appointed leader and the true servant of God. It became to them the assurance and promise of deliverance in every trouble which came upon them in after years (cf. Isa. 43¹, 2, 16-19 51⁹⁻¹¹).

CHAPTER XV

1-21. The Song of Deliverance. The song is undoubtedly one of the finest passages of Hebrew literature. It is poetry of a high order. It breathes the very spirit of the time, the exultant joy of the multitude escaped from a hated bondage, the sea between them and their enemies. It declares their new-found faith and confidence in Jehovah, their God and their fathers' God, whose power is manifest in the overthrow of the Egyptian host which they had thought invincible.

The original song seems to have ended with v. 11. What follows is in a more reflective and reminiscent tone, and presupposes the passing through Edom and Moab and the conquest of and settlement in Canaan. This latter section we may believe to have been added by a poet of a later age. The first part can hardly have been other than a contemporary production, expressing the triumphant joy of victory. The style and language may fairly be regarded as marking an early date. (For a different view see McNeile, Exodus, pp. 88, 89.)

In v. 1 no doubt by the horse and his rider is meant the horse and the charioteer. These first lines formed the refrain, perhaps appended to each stanza of the poem (v. 21). In v. 2 (Hebrew) we have the shorter form for "Jehovah," namely Jah, better, Yah, an evidence in support of the view that the true pronunciation of the longer name in Hebrew was Yahweh (31³⁻²², notes). The word salvation means here "deliverance," and has reference to the deliverance from the Egyptians. For the conception of the Lord as a man of war see Josh. 5¹³⁻¹⁵ and Psa. 24⁸. The language of v. 8 is of course, the figurative language of poetry, with which the Oriental mind is well acquainted.

In v. 13 the Lord is declared to have led the people to his holy habitation, i.e., to Canaan, or possibly to Zion, if this part of the song was written in or after the time of David and Solomon (cf. 2 Sam. 15²⁵). The fear which took hold of the peoples mentioned (vv. 14-16) must have been the result of the conquest of eastern Palestine by Israel and the subsequent victories in western Palestine. The references in v. 17 seem clearly to be to Mount Zion and the Temple. Miriam may have been regarded as a prophetess because of her gift of song. She may herself have been the author of the original of this song. Her timbrel, or tabret, was a metal or wooden ring over which a skin was tightly drawn, which was held in one hand and beaten by the other.

CHAPTERS 15²² TO 18²⁷: THE JOURNEY TO SINAI

If the traditional site of Sinai be accepted, the direction after the crossing of the sea will have been southeastward, parallel to the eastern shore of the Gulf of Suez for some seventy or eighty miles, then eastward into the heart of the peninsula. If, on the other hand, with some recent authorities, we locate Sinai near the head of the gulf of Akaba, or farther north on the border of Edom, the direction will have been generally eastward.

22-27. From the Red Sea to Elim. The wilderness of Shur is apparently the same as "the wilderness of Etham" (Num. 33⁸). Where mentioned in Gen. 16⁷ 20¹ 25¹⁸ 1 Sam. 15⁷ 27⁸ it is described as south of Palestine and "in front of" or "before," i.e., east of Egypt. Marah cannot now be identified, but two places on the road to Sinai have been suggested, one about ten miles southeast of Suez and the other about fifty miles, where there are springs of bitter or brackish water. The Hebrew word Marah means bitter (Ruth 1²⁰). It is possible that Moses while living in the wilderness may have learned of a tree whose fruit, leaves, or bark had power to sweeten such water, and de Lesseps is quoted as saying that a species of barberry is so used, but this is not certainly known. What the statute and ordinance mentioned in v. 25 was is not stated, but it is evidently intended by the writer to show that Moses began here the proper organization and regulation of the life of the people, which he completed at Sinai.

The name Elim (v. 27) means "terebinths." The place has been identified, though not certainly, with a charming oasis about half way to Sinai, but it may have been much farther north. Others identify it with Eloth, at the head of the eastern gulf.

CHAPTER XVI

Sending of Quails and Manna. The wilderness of Sin (v. 1, 17¹), like the other places mentioned, cannot be certainly placed. It bears a name which indicates proximity to Sinai, the two names being probably from the same root word (the name of the Babylonian moon-god Sin).

The providing of food for so large a company in that comparatively barren wilderness must have been a serious problem. The people begin to feel the pangs of hunger and as usual put the blame upon their leaders (vv. 2, 3). The promise of bread from heaven is directly related here to the observance of the Sabbath day. The bountiful gift of food is to be made a test and a means of discipline, that the people may learn obedience to the law of God (v. 4). The promise, At even then ye shall know . . . and in the morning then ye shall see, is explained by vv. 12-14. The quails came in the evening, and the manna with the dew in the morning, both as evidence of God's care and manifestation of his glory. The words looked toward the wilderness (v. 10) are hard to understand, for the wilderness was about them on every side. It may be understood, however, that the pillar of cloud remained outside the camp, so that looking toward it means looking out from the camp circle or inclosure. Just what the people saw we do not know, but it may have been the gleam of fire through the cloud.

Quails, or partridges, are said to be common in the Sinaitic peninsula. In spring they move northward in great numbers, flying low, and when they drop exhausted to the ground can be easily caught. They now provided meat for the hungry wanderers. In the morning they found the manna. They had never seen it before and they said, What is it? The question in Hebrew is man-hu (the form man = "what," is Aramaic rather than Hebrew), which may also be rendered, "It is man." If the latter rendering be accepted, the Hebrews would have used an Egyptian word man, meaning "sap" or "gum" from trees. Our word manna is taken from the Greek rendering of Num. 11⁶, etc. The description of it in v. 14 is supplemented in v. 31 and Num. 117-9. Just what it was we do not know. No entirely satisfactory account of it as a natural product of that region has been given. The sweet juice of the Tarfa tree (a species of tamarisk) has been suggested. Exuding from the trunk and branches by night in summer, it forms "small round white grains, which partly adhere to the twigs of the trees, and partly drop to the ground. In the early morning it is of the consistency of wax, but the sun's rays soon melt it" (Driver, Exodus, pp. 153, 154). The Arabs gather and use it, calling it manna, but the quantity found is very small, and could not ordinarily provide food for many people. The writers of this history can only account for it as the gift of God, who thus provides for the wants of his people (see Psa. 78²³⁻²⁵ 105⁴⁰).

The omer (v. 16), a measure of quantity, is described as the tenth part of an ephah (v. 36), i.e., about six and one half pints (see art., Time, Money, etc., p. 79).

It is evident from ch. 16 that the Sabbath, or seventh day of the week, was already regarded as a holy day to be strictly observed (cf. Gen. 22.³ Ex. 20⁸⁻¹¹ 31¹²⁻¹⁷ 34²¹, etc.).

Aaron's pot of manna was to be laid up before the Testimony (vv. 33, 34), i.e., in the sanctuary, which was not yet built, before the ark, or sacred box, which was to hold the tables of stone upon which the Ten Commandments were written. These Commandments (20¹⁻¹⁷) are frequently called the Testimony (25¹⁶, 21 27²¹ 31¹⁸ 32¹⁵, etc.), or Witness, bearing witness as they did both to the divine law given through Moses and the covenant engagement which was based upon it (24⁷, 8).

CHAPTER XVII

1-7. Water From the Rock at Rephidim. The location of Rephidim is unknown. The joining of two narratives is illustrated very clearly in vv. 1-3, where the central facts—no water and the complaint of the people—are twice told. The name Massah, in Hebrew, means "tempting" or "proving"; Meribah means "striving," or "strife" (v. 7 mg.). A similar story is told in Num. 20¹⁻¹³, which is, quite possibly, a duplicate of this. If so it is probable that the event is out of its proper place here and belongs rather to the sojourn at Kadesh. This, again, seems to point to Horeb as being near Kadesh (v. 6; cf. Num. 27¹⁴). It is, of course, not impossible that two different places, for a similar reason, received the name Meribah. A legend in the Targum of Onkelos (cf. p. 106a) relates that the waters of the well of Beer (Num. 21¹⁶⁻¹⁸) followed the Israelites in their subsequent journeys, and this is used in 1 Cor. 10⁴ with a reference to the smiting of the rock. The story here and in Num. 20 may refer to the finding and opening up of a new well.

8-16. War With Amalek. Amalek, an Arabian tribe, is mentioned in other passages as inhabiting the country south of Palestine and near Kadesh (Num. 13²⁹ 14²⁵, 43, 45 1 Sam. 15⁶, 7; cf. Gen. 147). Hence the Amalekites seem to be out of place here, so far south, in the Sinaitic peninsula; and this may be further evidence that Horeb, which Moses was now approaching, was in the region of Kadesh. Joshua appears here for the first time and is leader of the armed forces of Israel (vv. 8, 9). In 33¹¹ he is said to have been Moses' minister, and a young man. Forty years later he succeeded Moses as ruler of Israel. It may be that this narrative, like the preceding, properly belongs to a much later period of the wilderness wandering. Hur is mentioned again in 24¹⁴ as a man of rank and standing in Israel. Josephus says that he was Miriam's husband. Moses is represented here as an aged man, not participating in the battle, but with his two friends remaining upon a hill overlooking the field, in an attitude of prayer. The crime of Amalek against Israel is more fully described in Deut. 25¹⁷⁻¹⁹. They had hung upon the flank and rear of Israel's march, cutting off stragglers and those who were feeble, faint, and weary (cf. Num. 24²⁰ 1 Sam. 15², 3).

The art of writing (v. 14) was well known in Egypt in Moses' time, and had been practiced there for many centuries. There is no doubt, therefore, that Moses and others of the Israelites may have learned to write. The oldest Hebrew writings actually known to us, however, belong to the tenth and ninth centuries B.C. The altar (v. 15) was, no doubt, built of stones of that place, for the offering to God of a sacrifice of thanksgiving. The name given it means "Jehovah is my banner" (R.V. mg.). The form of the oath in v. 16 is remarkable and, probably, very ancient. It is, literally, "A hand upon the throne of Jah," and should be translated, "I swear by the throne of Jehovah." The speaker is Moses (see R.V. mg.). The lifting up of the hand in making an oath was a common custom (68 Gen. 14²² Num. 14³⁰ Ps. 106²⁶).

CHAPTER XVIII

1-12. Visit of Jethro. The visit of Jethro to Moses took place where he was encamped at the Mount of God, i.e., at Horeb. According to 17⁶ Moses was already at Horeb, but in 19¹ the Israelites are said to have come to Sinai, which, whether rightly or not, has been commonly identified with Horeb. The order of events is not clear, but the explanation lies in the effort of the authors to combine older narratives. Moses' wife Zipporah evidently had been sent back to Midian, perhaps after the disagreement at the inn (42⁴⁻²⁶). She now comes to Moses with her father and two sons. For the name Gershom see on 22². Eliezer means "My God is a help." Jethro acts as mediator in reuniting the divided family, and receives a cordial and affectionate welcome. Jethro recognizes the greatness of Jehovah and the great things he has done for Israel. He was, most probably, already a worshiper of Jehovah (cf. v. 12).

Some words have been lost from the latter part of v. 11, and the meaning is not clear. It may be that v. 10b, which is omitted in the LXX, should properly come at the end of v. 11, which would then read, "For in their proud dealing against them he delivered the people from under the hand of the Egyptians."

13-27. Appointment of Judges. The scene described in vv. 13ff. is of extraordinary interest as showing us quite clearly in what way some of the laws of Israel were made. The decisions of Moses, and no doubt of other judges after him, were remembered, and, in important cases, written down. Moses' judgments were received as the statutes of God and his laws. The people come unto me, he said, to inquire of God. He believed that he was as truly inspired and instructed of God while sitting in the seat of judgment with the people thronging about him as when alone in meditation and prayer in the mountain (19³, 20). Of the two classes of laws, the words (20¹), or divine commandments, were the product of those days of retirement and communion with God in the mountain (31¹⁸), and the judgments (21¹), mostly in hypothetical form, were such decisions of Moses and other great judges of subsequent times as are here referred to.

Jethro counsels Moses that the task which he has undertaken is too great for one man. Under so heavy a burden he will wear out his strength. He advises the appointment of others to share the burden with him, and gives a memorable definition of the sort of men who should be chosen, able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating unjust gain (v. 21). Happy indeed the people ruled by such men! The people are to be divided into thousands, probably family groups rather than exact numbers (12³⁷⁻⁴², notes), and these subdivided into lesser groups, each of which will have its own magistrate or ruler, and will be responsible for good order within its own ranks. The ideal here presented is a worthy one, even though it may never have been fully realized. Moses was to retain the supreme authority, and to his court was to come every great matter (v. 22).

CHAPTERS 19¹ TO 20²¹: THE THEOPHANY ON MOUNT SINAI; THE DECALOGUE

The arrival at Sinai was followed by God's self-revelation to Moses, in the course of which Moses is said to have received "the Ten Commandments." For the relation between the Decalogue and other ancient codes, see art., Legal and Historical Literature, p. 145, and cf. notes on Deut. 66-21.

CHAPTER XIX

1. Arrival at Sinai. In the third month Israel came into the wilderness of Sinai. Assuming that the traditional location of Mount Sinai is correct, there is still some doubt as to which of two mountains was the one before which Israel camped. The choice seems to lie between Serbal and Musa, the latter in the center of the wedge-shaped mass of mountains in the heart of the peninsula. At the foot of this latter mountain is situated the convent of Saint Catharine, built originally in the sixth century A.D., and occupied by monks of the Greek Church. This site is the one which is most favored in Jewish and Christian tradition, and the surroundings of it would have been most suitable for a large encampment.

2-6. Moses and Jehovah in the Mount. Moses is said to have gone up into the mountain several times, sometimes alone and sometimes in company with others (vv. 3, 20, 249, 13-18 344). There may have been some sacred shrine which he visited there, perhaps the very place where he had the vision of the burning bush, and had been assured by God that he would return with the people of Israel to this mountain (312). In any case his purpose was primarily communion with God.

In language of profound significance and great beauty Jehovah declares (vv. 3-6) he had chosen Israel both that they might be in a peculiar sense his people, a peculiar treasure, and that they might render a high service to humanity as a kingdom of priests, ministering in holy things. The fundamental conception here is that God chooses and calls an individual nation, as he chooses and calls an individual man, not only to special privilege but also to special service (cf. Isa. 42¹⁻⁴ 491-6, and notes on Rom. 9-11.) All are his, but there are special gifts and ministries. God reveals himself and accomplishes his purposes of good through and by means of human agencies. The mention of the covenant (v. 5) anticipates the account of the national covenant in 24³⁻⁸. As a kingdom of priests they will have the right both of knowledge of and direct approach to God on their own behalf and on behalf of others (for an interpretation of the function of the priesthood see Mal. 24-7, notes). And as an holy nation they will be set apart in a very special way for the service of God.

7-25. Jehovah's Appearance to the People. In v. 8 the people, anticipating further revelation to them of God's will through Moses, promise obedience (cf. 243-7). The command to sanctify them (v. 10) must have involved some ritual of purification, perhaps washing their bodies as well as their garments (cf. Gen. 35^{2, 3}). The bounds set for the people were, no doubt, marks of some sort about the base of the mountain, over which they must not pass, for the whole mountain is now regarded as a sacred place, not to be entered upon but with the utmost reverence and only by those whose duty it is to draw near to God on their behalf. A new conception of the way of approach to God arose in the teaching of the later prophets and in the N.T. (cf. Isa. 55^{1-3, 6, 7} Heb. 12¹⁸⁻²⁴). The trumpet of the earlier times was a ram's horn; later it was made of metal. When the hour for the solemn religious service comes the trumpet will sound the warning, the people will come up to the mountain but will not pass the barrier into the forbidden area.

The divine appearance on the mountain was in cloud and storm. From ancient times the thunder was spoken of by the Hebrews as the voice of Jehovah, and the lightning as his messenger, or as his flaming dart (v. 19, Psa. 81⁷; cf. Psa. 29). For other descriptions of this revelation of God in storm cloud, lightning and thunder, see Deut. 4¹⁰⁻¹² 33² Judg. 54, 5 Neh. 9¹³.

CHAPTER XX

1-17. The Decalogue. The Decalogue (or Ten Commandments) appears again, with slight differences, in Deut. 56-21 (notes). It has been commonly regarded as the gift of God, through Moses, to the Israelite people. The doubt regarding Mosaic authorship, which is entertained by some, rests chiefly upon the second commandment (vv. 4-6). It is difficult to explain why, if Moses forbade the making of images, he himself should have made a serpent image, which afterward became an object of worship (Num. 219 2 Kings 184), and why images seem to have been generally in use as sacred objects down to the time of the Exile six hundred years later (Judg. 824-27 171-5 1 Sam. 1913-16 1 Kings 1223-30 Hos. 34, etc.). It is possible that this commandment and others have undergone some change under the influence of the teaching of the prophets who denounced image worship, but the substance of these laws, dealing with simple and fundamental religious duties and human relationships, may very well have been the work of Moses. The belief that they were spoken by God rightly put emphasis upon their authoritative character and universal application.

The first commandment (v. 3) does not deny the existence of other gods, but declares that for Israel there is only one, that is Jehovah (cf. Deut. 5⁷ 6⁴ 2 Kings 17³⁵, 36 Jer. 25⁶). The full monotheistic conception of God came later (Isa. 43¹⁰⁻¹³ Jer. 10¹⁻¹⁶).

The second commandment (vv. 4-6) prohibits the making of images, evidently as objects of reverence or worship, for Jehovah is a jealous God and will have no rival in the affections of his people (cf. 34¹²⁻¹⁷ Lev. 26¹ Deut. 4¹⁵⁻²⁴). It is not easy for us to recognize the truth which lies in the words, visiting the iniquities of the fathers upon the children, but the actual facts of human life, consonant with the laws of nature, show that children do suffer for the sins of their parents. And these laws of nature are the laws of God. The complementary truth of individual responsibility is presented in Jer. 31²⁹, 30 Ezek. 18.

The third commandment (v. 7) does not forbid the taking of an oath, but false swearing, and the light, irreverent, or insincere use of the name of God. Ordinary profane language is forbidden, even that which veils the name of God under apparently meaningless imitations of it (Lev. 19¹²; cf. Mt. 5³³⁻³⁷).

The fourth commandment (vv. 8-11) enjoins the observance of the Sabbath as an holy day and a day of rest. There is a reference in v. 11 to the story of creation (Gen. 1¹⁻²³) where the work of God is presented, under the figure of the days of the week, as proceeding by orderly stages to completion and rest. The reason for the observance of the Sabbath, in the parallel passage in Deut. 5¹²⁻¹⁵, is simply that working people may rest (cf. 31¹²⁻¹⁷ Lev. 19³⁰ Isa. 58¹³, 14 Jer. 17¹⁹⁻²⁷). The word Sabbath is taken directly from the Hebrew and means "rest" or "ceasing from labor." (For a discussion of the origin of the Sabbath see McNeile, Exodus, pp. 121-123, and Driver's art., "Sabbath," in Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible.)

The fifth commandment (v. 12) is called by Paul "the first commandment with promise" (Eph. 6², 3). See also Lev. 19³ Deut. 5¹⁶ Mt. 15³⁻⁶ Ecclus. 31¹⁻⁶.

The sixth to the ninth commandments (vv. 13-16) are directed against the crimes of murder, adultery, theft, and falsehood in witness-bearing.

The tenth commandment (v. 17) forbids both the entertainment of covetous desire and the acts of cheating, violence, and oppression which spring from it (cf. Mic. 2¹, 2). The story of Ahab's covetous desire for the vineyard of Naboth and the crime to which it led furnishes an example (1 Kings 21¹⁻¹⁶). Compare our Lord's teaching in Lk. 12¹⁵⁻²¹.

18-21. Terror of the People. The story of the theophany upon Mount Sinai, begun in ch. 19, is completed here, with special mention of the fear with which the people looked upon the sublime spectacle of the cloud-encompassed mountain and the thunderings and the lightnings of the storm. They appealed to Moses to be their mediator and to bring to them the words of God.

22-26. For notes on this section, see below. "The Book of the Covenant," under (1) Religious Worship, etc.

CHAPTERS XXI, XXII, XXIII

THE BOOK OF THE COVENANT (see also 20²²⁻²⁶)

The collection of laws which we have in 20²²⁻²³ 23³³ is, along with the Decalogue and some other fragments of legislation (such as 34¹⁷⁻²⁶), the oldest Hebrew code which we possess. Next in order of time, and most closely related to it, is the code in Deut. 12-26 (see notes), and, latest of all, the laws contained in the books of Leviticus and Numbers. A careful comparison of these codes, in their general features and in detail, will provide convincing evidence that they have not all come from one hand, nor are they the product of one age. Even in the collection before us are found some laws suitable only to an agricultural people in a settled and cultivated land, and having no value for the people under Moses in the tent life of the wilderness (cf. 22⁵⁻⁸ 23¹⁰⁻¹⁶). The strong probability is that to the laws left by Moses were added from time to time laws made by other judges, or decisions of the courts in famous cases, all of which are grouped together here in a code which fairly represents the ordered life of the people in the period of the judges and early monarchy (see art., Legal and Historical Literature, p. 145).

The laws cover (1) the ordering of worship and other religious observances (20²³⁻²⁶ 22²⁰, 23-31 23¹⁰⁻¹⁹); (2) the rights of slaves and strangers, kindness to the widow, the orphan, and the poor, and even to an enemy, and the impartial administration of justice (21²⁻¹¹ 22²¹⁻²⁷ 23¹⁻⁹); and (3) penalties for crimes against life and property, and other offenses (21¹²⁻³⁶ 22¹⁻¹⁹).

(1) Religious Worship, etc. (A topical treatment of the several sections of the Book of the Covenant, involving a disregard of the chapter divisions, is followed in this exposition.)

It will be observed that this code begins with certain regulations regarding the place of worship (20²³⁻²⁶), and that the code in Deuteronomy begins with the same subject (Deut. 12), as also an ancient priestly code found in Lev. 17-26 (see notes; cf. 17¹⁻⁹). It is here forbidden to make images of or to worship other gods. It is ordered that wherever there is a signal manifestation of the divine presence and power, as in deliverance from famine or plague, victory over enemies, or even an abundant harvest (20²⁴), there the people shall build an altar to their God and offer to him their sacrifices. The altar must be of earth or of unhewn stone. In this latter requirement and the reason given for it (20²⁵) one may see the primitive character of the law (cf. Deut. 27⁵⁻⁷ Josh. 8³¹). It is not easy to understand, however, how the altar for the tabernacle (27¹⁻⁸), or the altar for Ezekiel's plan of the new Temple (Ezek. 43¹³⁻¹⁷), could have been made without tools; Ezekiel's altar also was to have steps. In this oldest law of the altar nothing is said of the priest. There was as yet no priestly order; every Israelite might approach the altar, or build an altar for himself, and offer his sacrifice to God. Compare the law in Deut. 12⁸⁻¹⁴, where it is commanded that there shall be only one central sanctuary and altar for all Israel. The custom recognized here, however, prevailed throughout all the earlier period of the history down to the reign of Josiah (639-608 B.C.), and altars were multiplied in every part of the country.

The law forbade under the most severe penalties the worship of any other god. Anyone guilty of such an offense was put under the ban, and so given over to destruction (22²⁰). He could no longer have any part or lot with the people (cf. Num. 25²⁻⁸). It is forbidden to revile God (not the judges, as in mg. of 22²⁸), and to curse a ruler (cf. Lev. 25¹⁵ Acts 23⁵).

The first-fruits of the threshing-floor and of the wine-press, and the first-born of man and beast are to be given to God (22²⁹, 30). But the first-born sons were to be redeemed (cf. 13², 13, 15 Num. 344-51 18¹⁵, 16). A sabbatic year is enjoined (23^{10, 11}), when they enter upon the cultivated lands of Palestine, and in that year the produce of the land is to be for the poor (cf. Lev. 25¹⁻⁷). A comparison of Lev. 26^{34, 35} with 2 Chr. 36²¹ would seem to indicate that before the Exile this law was not observed.

There are to be three sacred festivals in each year (23¹⁴⁻¹⁷). The first is called by what was probably its original name, the feast of unleavened bread, later known as the Passover.

It is to be celebrated in the month Abib (cf. 13⁴, and notes on 12¹⁻³⁶). The second is the feast of harvest, or feast of weeks (34²²), seven weeks and a day later (hence known to us by the Greek word Pentecost, which means "fifty"). The third is the feast of ingathering (23¹⁶), or feast of tabernacles (Deut. 16¹³), in the seventh month (Sept.-Oct.), at the end of the year. The year is here the old economic year (see note on 12²). The festival in this month celebrated the final ingathering of the produce of the year, corn and wine and oil, and also commemorated the period of dwelling in tents in the wilderness. For a fuller account of these feasts see Lev. 23⁴⁻²¹, 33-44 Deut. 16¹⁻¹⁷, and notes there.

According to 23¹⁸ leavened bread was not to be offered upon the altar. The prohibition applies generally, but has special relation to what was known as the meal offering (Lev. 21¹⁶ 6¹⁷). There may have been in the fermentation produced by the leaven the suggestion of taint or decay, and so of unfitness for use as an offering to the Lord. The fat of the feast (23¹⁸), i.e., the fat portions which are to be burned on the altar (Lev. 33-5), is not to be left over till morning, but all burned up on the same day. If left over, it might become stale or tainted. The best of the first ripe fruits is to be brought as an offering to the sanctuary (cf. 22²⁹). The last injunction in 23¹⁹ may perhaps have reference to some ancient superstition.

(2) Slaves, strangers, widows, and the poor. The law does not sanction slavery but attempts to regulate it. The Hebrew slave (21²⁻¹¹) may be held for six years only. Compare the further humane provisions of the parallel law in Deut. 15¹²⁻¹⁸, and the fact that the right of freedom which is denied to the woman slave in Exodus (21⁷) is granted in Deuteronomy (15¹⁷). In the later Levitical legislation it is forbidden to hold a Hebrew as a slave; he may serve only as a hired servant (Lev. 25^{39, 40}). The word God in this passage (21⁶) cannot properly mean judges (as in R.V. mg.). The meaning must be that the slave is taken to the local sanctuary, or to the sanctuary in his master's house, if there be one (see Judg. 17⁵), and there, as in the presence of God, marked slave for life.

Justice to the stranger, the widow, and the orphan (22²¹⁻²⁷), is commanded, and kindness to and consideration for the poor. The words not as a creditor (22²⁵) are significant. Not as a creditor but as a friend, a neighbor, a brother.

The law makes strict provision for the administration of justice (23¹⁻⁹). It is forbidden to take up and carry about a false report, to follow the crowd in doing evil, and to bear witness in a cause favored by the crowd which is clearly unjust. Even an enemy must be dealt with fairly (23⁴, 5). He who has the responsibility of bearing witness or exercising judgment must not take a bribe.

(3) Crimes against life and property. A distinction is made in the code between willful murder and accidental killing. Of the latter it is said, in the language of that day, but God deliver him into his hand, literally, "make to fall to his hand." In such a case there will be appointed a place of refuge to which the killer may flee, and where he will be assured of a fair trial. In the wilderness, and in the early years in Palestine, while there was no assured and strong government, the relatives of the slain man took upon themselves the execution of vengeance upon the slayer, and that often without inquiry or trial. For the appointment of cities of refuge see Num. 35⁹⁻³⁴ and Deut. 19¹⁻¹³. In some instances the sanctuary or altar was regarded as an asylum; but for the willful murderer that was not to avail (21¹⁴).

21²³⁻²⁵ contains what has been called the lex talionis, or law of retaliation. Since the law is general, and refers to injuries which might be inflicted in a variety of ways, it is clear that it is not here in its proper place. The first part of 21²³ may have originally been followed by words defining the penalty in that case. The more general law may originally have followed 21¹⁸, 19. Compare Deut. 19¹⁶⁻²¹ and Lev. 24¹⁹, 20.

The principle of ransom, or redemption price, is recognized in 21³⁰⁻³². But in the case of a slave, who is regarded as his master's property, the price of the slave must be paid, thirty shekels of silver, a shekel being worth about sixty-six cents.

Crimes of theft, or burglary, are severely dealt with, and the penalties are heavy. For damage willfully or carelessly done restitution must be made (22⁵, 6). Where there is suspicion of theft, or wrongful possession of the property of another, but no clear evidence, the parties are brought to the sanctuary, and in the presence of God, and of the appointed judge or judges, an oath of the Lord is taken (22¹¹). The final decision, no doubt, rested with the judge, but was held to be, as in Moses' court (18¹⁵, 16), the decision of God (22⁷⁻¹³).

For the amount of the dowry (22¹⁶, 17), see Deut. 22²⁸, 29. The daughter is regarded as her father's property.

The law on the whole maintains a high standard of justice. It endeavors to preserve the purity and simplicity of the primitive religion and of religious practices. It enjoins kindness and consideration for the rights and well-being of others in all the relationships of life. Especially does it require just and considerate treatment of the stranger, for, it is said, Ye know the heart of a stranger, seeing ye were strangers in the land of Egypt (23⁹). Even the lex talionis marked a distinct advance upon the current code of the wilderness, in which trifling offenses or injuries often led to prolonged feuds and much loss of life. It strictly limited the penalty which might be exacted to an equivalent for the injury. Above all, the supreme value of the law lay in its identification of justice and righteousness, both in the individual and in the common life, with the will of a righteous God.

There follows (23²⁰⁻³³) an earnest and impressive exhortation to obedience, accompanied by promises of divine leading and blessing, and of victorious entry into and possession of the land of their fathers. The angel of God, in whom God himself is present (32³⁴ 33¹⁴ Isa. 63⁹), will go before them, a stern but faithful monitor and guide. They must not forsake Jehovah for the false gods of the Canaanites, but must break down their altars. The pillars (23²⁴), which they are ordered to destroy, were large stones set up beside or near the altar, sometimes several in a row, and perhaps regarded as in some sort the dwelling place of the deity. They were used in the earlier time at the altars of Jehovah (24⁴), but were forbidden by the later law codes because of their heathen associations (Deut. 16²² Mic. 5¹³). The promise that the Lord will drive their enemies out of the land promised them not in one year, but by little and little (23²⁹, 30), is in harmony with the account of the conquest given in Judg. 1-3 (but cf. intro. to Joshua, p. 346.)

CHAPTER XXIV

The National Covenant. There is a break here in the continuity of the story, for, according to 20²¹, Moses was in the mountain holding communion with God, while here (v. 1) he is hidden with others to come up unto the Lord. Then, in vv. 3-8, he is represented as telling the people the laws contained in the preceding chapters and securing their promise of obedience. The sequel to vv. 1, 2 follows in vv. 9-11. This is but another evidence of the composite character of the book.

Of the company which is called up into the mountain, Nadab and Abihu are the sons of Aaron, and the elders represent the people. The vision which they saw (vv. 9-11) was perhaps the glory of a sapphire-blue sky, swept clear of the clouds which had enveloped the mountain during the storm. In this they saw, with renewed spiritual understanding, the majesty and glory of the God of Israel (cf. Gen. 32³⁰, 31 Ex. 33²⁰⁻²³ Psa. 191). In spite of the injunction of 19²¹⁻²⁴, forbidding the people to come up into the mountain, these nobles of Israel who came up with Moses saw the vision and were not harmed (v. 11).

On the basis of the laws which he now presents to the people, Moses brings them into covenant bond with Jehovah. They promise to obey the laws as the very words of God (vv. 3, 7), and they receive in return the assured promises of God (23²⁰⁻³³). For this reason the code of chs. 20—23 is called here the book of the covenant (24⁷). The laws are described as the words, i.e., specific divine commandments (as the Decalogue and most of ch. 23), and the judgments (v. 3) or decisions of the court (usually in hypothetical form, like most of chs. 21, 22). This code is said to have been written by Moses, and was handed down to subsequent ages under his name and authority. Thus his name came to be inseparably associated with Israel's laws, and the later codes of Deuteronomy and Leviticus were also ascribed to him. The covenant was ratified by sacrifice and by the sprinkling of blood upon the altar and upon the people, thus signifying their union in this bond with their God (v. 8; cf. Psa. 50⁵).

The tables of stone (v. 12) are frequently mentioned in the following chapters and in the book of Deuteronomy. They are generally believed to have had inscribed upon them the Ten Commandments, but that is not certain. See also 31¹⁸ 32^{15, 16}. Joshua is described here as Moses' minister (cf. 33¹¹ Num. 11²⁸ Josh. 1¹). On this occasion (v. 13), apparently, he accompanies Moses into the mountain and the elders are left, with Aaron and Hur, in charge of the camp.

CHAPTERS 25 TO 27: THE SANCTUARY AND ITS FURNISHING

There is to be a tent-dwelling for Jehovah in the camp of Israel. The Lord's commandment to Israel is, Let them make me a sanctuary, that I may dwell among them (25⁸). This sanctuary is to be both Jehovah's dwelling and a place of meeting, where he will meet with those who come to seek him, in thanksgiving, in prayer, or in penitence. Moreover, it is to contain the tables of stone upon which are written the Commandments, a perpetual testimony to the covenant bond between Jehovah and Israel, and to Jehovah's claim upon Israel's obedience under the terms of that bond. Hence it is called the tabernacle, or dwelling, the tent of meeting (27²¹ 33⁷), and the tent, or tabernacle, of the testimony (38²¹ Num. 17⁷). The oldest account of it is to be found in 33⁷⁻¹¹. There it is described as pitched without the camp, afar off from the camp, and was under the constant care of Joshua (cf. references to it in Num. 11, 12 and Deut. 31). The account given of it here is later and from a priestly source, and there is reason to believe that it is to some extent idealized. Moses is represented as receiving the pattern of the tent-sanctuary and of its furnishings, with instructions regarding the making of it and them, in the mount from God (25^{9, 40}). Compare the description of Solomon's Temple in 1 Kings 6, 7, and 2 Chr. 3, 4; see notes there.

CHAPTER XXV

1-9. Offerings for the Sanctuary. There was first the collecting of material for the sanctuary, and the people were invited to make an offering. There were gold, and silver, and brass for the vessels, for the gilding of the ark and its covering, for the candlestick, for chains, and rings, and hooks, and many other uses. There were blue, and purple, and scarlet stuff, and fine linen (not cotton, v. 4 mg.) for the curtains, fabric of goats' hair for a first covering over the curtains, and skins for a second and third covering. What the sealskins were we do not know, but the word used may be Egyptian and mean simply "leather." Acacia wood was required for the framework, and precious stones for adornment of the priests' garments.

10-22. The Ark. The chief and most sacred part of the furnishing of the sanctuary was the ark. A simple box, or chest, it represented the actual dwelling place of Jehovah, in the innermost and most holy part of the tent-sanctuary. Since a cubit measure is about eighteen inches in length it will be easy to reckon its dimensions. There was to be a crown, probably a molding, round about the cover, and rings upon the feet which supported it, through which staves, or rather poles, would be thrust with which to carry it. The testimony, i.e., the tables of stone containing the Commandments, was to be put into it. The covering of the ark, a slab of pure gold, is here called the mercy-seat. The Hebrew word means "place of propitiation." This covering became to ancient Israel most sacred. Over it, though invisible, was the very presence and dwelling of God, called by the Jews in later times the Shekinah (i.e., "the Dwelling"). The making of the cherubim, angelic winged figures (vv. 18-20), shows clearly that the second commandment (20⁴⁻⁶) was not understood as prohibiting all images, but only those which were made objects of worship.

23-30. The Table of Shewbread. The table was to be of the same length and height as the ark, and was to bear the dishes upon which the loaves of bread were to be brought in, and cups, or flagons, for the wine. The shew-bread, or Presence-bread, was bread placed, so to speak, in the presence of Jehovah (cf. Num. 47 1 Sam. 21⁶) and for his use. It may have come to represent the hospitality of Jehovah, in whose tent the table was always spread and the fire always burning.

31-40. The Candlestick. More correctly, "the lampstand"; it had six branches bending outward and upward from a central stem. Upon this central stem and on the six branches seven lamps were to be placed, to be cared for and kept burning by the priests (27²⁰, 21). The branches were each tipped with a cup, consisting of knop, or knob, and flower, i.e., calyx and corolla, like an almond blossom. Vv. 34, 35 are not very clear, but may mean that the three pairs of branches left the central stem at three successive levels, and that there were four of these cup-shaped blossoms in the central stem, two above and two below the branches, and one under each point of junction of the branches with the central stem. The talent of pure gold, of which the candlestick was to be made, is estimated as about ninety-six pounds avoirdupois, worth upwards of twenty-five thousand dollars.

CHAPTER XXVI

The Tabernacle. The sanctuary is to be thirty cubits long and ten cubits wide (forty-five by fifteen feet), and ten cubits (fifteen feet) high. There were to be two rooms, the outer or holy place, thirty by fifteen feet, and the inner shrine, separated from it by curtains, fifteen by fifteen feet and fifteen feet in height, a perfect cube. Compare the dimensions of Solomon's Temple (1 Kings 6^{1, 2}), which were twice those of the tabernacle.

The solid structure was to be made of upright wooden frames fitting into bases or pedestals of silver, and connected at the top, middle and bottom by cross rails or bars (vv. 15-27; for fuller detailed description see Driver, Exodus, pp. 285-289, and Kennedy's art., "Tabernacle," with illustration, in Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible). The word boards is to be understood as used of such frames, each consisting of two upright pieces (here called tenons) joined at the top, middle, and bottom, by short crosspieces. Twenty such frames, with their cross-bars, would form the solid structure on the south side and twenty on the north, and six at the western end, with double frames at the corners (vv. 23, 24).

CHAPTER XXVII

1-8. The Altar. The altar of burnt-offering had to be of light construction so that it might be carried from place to place. It is described as a hollow frame of acacia wood, overlaid with brass (or, rather, bronze), and at each corner a brazen horn. A ledge surrounded it, half-way up, upon which the officiating priest might stand, and this was supported by a network of brass. This is, of course, very different from the altar prescribed in 20²⁴⁻²⁶, which might have been quickly built anywhere, and just how it was to be used for a burnt-offering we do not know.

9-19. The Court. Round about the tabernacle was to be a great court one hundred cubits in length from east to west and fifty cubits wide, completely surrounded and shut in by curtains of fine linen. The altar of burnt-offering was centrally placed in the eastern part. The tabernacle itself was in the western part, its door facing to the east.

20, 21. An Unfailing Light. A short paragraph prescribes the care of the lamp (cf. 25³¹) by the priests in the Holy Place, and provides for a supply of pure olive oil beaten for the light.

CHAPTERS 28 AND 29: PRIESTHOOD AND SACRIFICE

Aaron and his four sons are designated as priests. The names of the sons are given in 1 Chr. 24^{1, 2}. The need of a priesthood in such a community was very great. The people were ignorant and needed instruction. It was important that the exercises of worship should be conducted with dignity and kept free from the taint of idolatry and from cruel and immoral practices. A well-trained and high-minded priesthood could render this service. The priests cared for the altar, instructed the people in religious and moral duties, conducted the regular services of worship, and often acted as judges, alone or in association with the appointed judges of the civil courts. See, for an account of the service rendered by a true priestly class, Mal. 2⁴⁻⁷, notes.

CHAPTER XXVIII

Description of the Garments of the Priests. The priest must be clothed in garments befitting his high office. Wise-hearted workmen are needed to make such garments (vv. 2, 3; cf. 31¹⁻¹¹), for glory and for beauty. The breastplate (v. 15) was more probably a pocket or pouch of some sort in which were to be put the two precious stones (v. 30) which were used for casting the sacred lot. The ephod was probably some sort of tightly fitting garment, a kind of waistcoat, or, perhaps, apron, supported by two shoulder pieces, like suspenders, and to it the pouch, or pocket above mentioned, was probably attached (cf. 1 Sam. 14^{18, 19}, R.V. mg.). The word ouches (vv. 11, 13) might be rendered "flagree settings," or "rosettes." The LXX has "little shields." The breastplate (or, rather, pouch) of judgment (v. 15) was so called because of its use when the priest consulted the oracle of God, by means of the sacred lot, on matters which were brought before him for decision (vv. 29, 30; cf. 1 Sam. 14⁴¹ R.V. mg., 28⁶). This custom of trying to obtain guidance from God by casting a lot belongs to the earliest times and to a very primitive kind of thinking. In later times more spiritual conceptions of religion were introduced by the teaching of the prophets and it fell into disuse. The term ephod seems to be used in a different sense, perhaps of a plated image, in Judg. 8²⁷ 17⁵ 18¹⁴⁻²⁰. A very similar Hebrew word, from the same root, is used of the gold casing or plating of an image in Isa. 30²². What the Urim and the Thummim (v. 30) were is not certainly known. The words are plurals in the Hebrew language and may be used as abstract or intensive nouns, meaning "light" and "perfection," or "beauty." They may have been names given to small carved objects, or precious stones used in casting the lot, one of which would give a favorable, or affirmative, and the other an unfavorable, or negative answer to the question asked (cf. 1 Sam. 23²⁻⁴, 6-12).

The engraving upon the gold plate to be worn upon the front of the high priest's miter (vv. 36, 37) was a continual reminder of the holiness of the priest's office. He was set apart and solemnly ordained and consecrated (v. 41) to the service of God on behalf of and as the representative of the people. In that capacity he, so to speak, took upon himself the sin of the people (v. 29), in any error or neglect of their religious duties, making sacrifice and confession on their behalf, and seeking for them forgiveness from God.

CHAPTER XXIX

The Consecration of the Priests. An elaborate ceremonial is prescribed for the consecration of Aaron and his sons and their successors in the priesthood. It consists of washing, clothing, and anointing the priest, the offering of a bullock and two rams in sacrifice at the altar, and the waving to and fro before the altar of certain portions of the second sacrificed ram with bread, all of which are then burned upon the altar, and, finally, the setting apart, after lifting up and waving before the altar, of portions of the meat as the priests' due, to be eaten by them at a sacrificial meal at the door of the tent sanctuary. Compare Lev. 8, where the ritual of consecration here commanded is described as performed in detail. For the washing (v. 4) a laver of brass was to be provided in the court of the sanctuary (30¹⁷⁻²¹). A specially prepared fragrant oil was to be provided for the anointing (30²²⁻³³; cf. Psa. 133²), a symbol of unity and of joy as well as of consecration. The word consecrate (v. 9) means literally "to fill the hand," and probably refers to placing in the hand of the priest something which is a symbol of his office, as in our day when the bishop or presiding minister places a Bible in the hands of the newly ordained candidate, saying, "Take thou authority to preach the word of God," etc. (cf. 32²⁹ Judg. 17^{5, 12} 1 Kings 13³³). The sacrifice of the bullock is described as a sin-offering (v. 14; cf. Lev. 4), and was intended as a propitiatory gift to God bearing the earnest prayer of the offerers for the forgiving and cleansing grace of God, that the place (Ezek. 43¹⁸⁻²⁷ 45¹⁸⁻²⁰) or person (as here) consecrated may be regarded as free from sin and pure in his sight. The first ram was offered as a whole burnt-offering, and was intended as a gift to God, signifying the recognition of his sovereignty and the giving to him of the life in whole-hearted loyalty and obedience (cf. Lev. 8¹⁸⁻²¹, Psa. 51^{16, 17}). The second ram was the ram of consecration (v. 22). Its blood, which in the ritual represented life, was touched to ear, hand, and foot (v. 20), that the whole body in all its members might be consecrated. Here Moses performs an essential part of the ceremony (v. 24) which in some way seems to have symbolized the installation of the priest in his office.

A provision is added (vv. 38-42) for the daily ritual of worship by sacrifice at the sanctuary, morning and evening, through future generations. The chapter concludes with gracious assurances and promises. The sanctuary and the priestly ministry will be honored and blessed by God, and there he will meet and dwell with his people (vv. 43-46). These verses form a fitting conclusion to the body of instructions in chs. 25-29, and show the depth of religious feeling and the real and sincere faith which found expression in its elaborate detail.

CHAPTERS 30 AND 31: ADDED INSTRUCTIONS REGARDING SANCTUARY AND SABBATH

Further, and perhaps later, instructions are here given regarding the furnishing and maintenance of the sanctuary. The instructions reflect the usages of a later age.

CHAPTER XXX

1-10. The Altar of Incense. Nothing is said, in the previous chapters, of an altar of incense, and in Lev. 16, in the ritual of the day of atonement, it is not mentioned, but censers are to be used for the burning of incense (cf. Num. 16). There seems to have been no second altar in Solomon's Temple (1 Kings 6, 7), nor in Ezekiel's plan of the ideal Temple of the future (Ezek. 41f.). In the post-exilic Temple there was an altar of incense, called in 1 Macc. 121 "the golden altar" (cf. Heb. 94). The strange incense, which is here forbidden (v. 9), was that which was not made according to the prescription (vv. 34-38). The true incense, compounded of fragrant oils, resins, and gums, with salt, when burned made a fragrant smoke, appropriate and beautiful symbol of the prayers of the people (cf. Rev. 58, notes).

11-16. The Atonement Money. A tax is to be imposed upon the people to provide for the upkeep of the sanctuary and its services, the people to be required to give every man a ransom for his soul unto the Lord. The silver shekel is believed to have weighed a little more than an English half-crown (see p. 79a). Compare the Temple tax of later times (Mt. 1724-27, notes). In this simple way the law recognized the duty of every man to discharge his debt to his God and to support the services of worship.

17-21. The Brazen Laver. The laver was made from the polished metal mirrors, given as their contribution by "the serving women who served at the door of the tent of meeting" (388). Compare the ten lavers of Solomon's Temple (1 Kings 738, 39). It was an admirable provision to secure cleanliness at all times on the part of those who ministered in the sanctuary.

22-33. The Anointing Oil. The holy anointing oil was to be prepared by mixing olive oil with liquid myrrh (probably a sort of fragrant syrup now called "balsam of Mecca"), cinnamon, sweet cane (Jer. 620), and cassia (inner bark of a species of cinnamon tree; cf. Psa. 458). The hin measure (cf. 2940) was equal to about one and one third gallons (see p. 79b).

34-38. The Incense. See notes on vv. 1-10.

CHAPTER XXXI

1-11. Bezalel and Oholiab. Two skilled workmen are named who are to do the work, or to superintend the work, of construction. They are declared to be filled with the spirit of God, in wisdom, and in understanding, and in all manner of workmanship. It is freely recognized that God chooses and inspires the workman, qualifying him for his high and honorable task, as surely as he chooses the priest, the prophet, or the king. The gifts and operations of his Spirit are very widely bestowed. The Spirit of God, in the O.T., is regarded as the divine energy working in nature and in human life, creating, reviving, instructing, and giving special and extraordinary power to men called to special and important tasks (cf. Gen. 12 4138 Num. 1117, 25-29 Deut. 349 Judg. 310 1 Sam. 1010 116; notes on 1 Cor. 124-31; also art., Religion of Israel, p. 176a.)

12-17. Sabbath Observance. For the instructions regarding observance of the sabbath day see notes on 208-11 Deut. 512-15; cf. Jer. 1719-27 Isa. 5813, 14.

18. The Two Tables. The tables of the testimony, containing the ten commandments, have been already referred to in 2412 and 2516 (cf. 3215, 16 3429 Deut. 910). As to the statement, written with the finger of God, may we not understand it to mean that God was the source and author of these laws, but that he used human agency, both the voice and the hand of Moses, in delivering them to the people?

CHAPTERS 32 TO 34: THE WORSHIP OF THE GOLDEN CALF AND EVENTS FOLLOWING

CHAPTER XXXII

The Making of the Calf; the Punishment.

According to the exceedingly interesting story here told, Moses was so long away from the people, communing with God in the mountain (2418), that they grew weary of waiting. Many of them, it appears, in spite of the evidence given them in Egypt, at the Red Sea, on the journey, and at Sinai, were not convinced of the reality of Jehovah, in whose name Moses had come to them. They remembered the images of the gods in Egypt, and had, probably, often been present at the elaborate and highly sensuous ceremonial of their worship, but they had no image by which to make Jehovah real and visible, and the ritual of his worship was slow in taking shape. No doubt, too, they longed for the joyous excitement of the feast which accompanied the sacrifice, and the riot of singing and dancing that usually followed (cf. Judg. 2119-21). Therefore they persuaded Aaron to make them an image, apparently an image of Jehovah in the form of a young bull, like the images Jeroboam set up long afterward at Bethel and at Dan (1 Kings 1228-33).

Aaron yielded to their request, and made the image of wood overlaid with gold, and then proclaimed a feast. This was in full celebration when Moses came down from the mountain bearing the tablets of stone inscribed with the commandments of God. The anger of Moses, the breaking of the tablets, and his intercession for the people are vividly pictured. The riotous outbreak developed quickly into open revolt against Moses and against Jehovah whom he professed to represent. The Levites, members of his own tribe, rallied about him. A sharp conflict ensued in which many were slain, greatly to Moses' distress, who again sought the Lord in agonizing prayer. He confesses the people's sin, pleads for their forgiveness, and, if God is not willing to forgive, that he may perish with them. The character of Moses shines out very brightly throughout. Intensely in earnest, utterly unselfish, loyal to his God, striving to save the people committed to his care from the gross idolatry of their Canaanite and Arabian neighbors, into which they were now in danger of falling, with all its moral uncleanness and degradation, he is the ideal statesman as well as prophet, a true man of God.

In his prayer (vv. 11-13) Moses seems even more zealous for the honor of God than for the deliverance of the people. On the other hand, in vv. 31, 32 the emphasis appears to be on the deliverance of the people (cf. Num. 14¹³⁻¹⁹). For the sworn promise to the patriarchs (v. 13) see Gen. 22¹⁶⁻¹⁸. The broken tables (v. 19) were later replaced (34¹⁻⁴, 28, 29). Aaron's apology (vv. 22-24) is evidently a quite insincere attempt to evade responsibility. A frank and manly confession of guilt would have been much more to his credit.

The meaning of v. 25 is obscure, but the following verses make it clear that there were already two parties in the camp, those who were for Moses and those who were against him. The latter seem to have been ready to reject the worship of Jehovah as well as the authority of Moses. Aaron had let them loose in their revelry, but it is quite wrong to say that he was their leader. If that had been the case, the hand of Moses and the armed Levites, men of his own tribe, would have been against him. Guilty as he was in the first instance, he was now on Moses' side, and his action had been intended to bring the intoxicated revelers into derision with those who had risen up against them. The situation was so serious that Moses felt compelled to rally the Levites to his defense, together with all who stood for Jehovah and his laws. Following the LXX we should read in v. 29, "Ye have consecrated yourselves (literally, filled your hands) this day unto Jehovah, every man against his son and against his brother, so that he may bestow a blessing upon you" (see 29⁹, notes). It is too much to read into the figurative language used here of warfare a consecration to the priesthood (so Moffatt's translation), though that may have been anticipated in the promised blessing (cf. Deut. 33⁹⁻¹¹). An entirely different reason is given for the consecration of the Levites in Num. 85-22. Just how Moses hoped to make atonement for the people's sin is not clear (v. 30); it may have been by the offer of his own life in their stead. The Hebrew word thus rendered means, literally, to cover, and so to put out of sight, the sin.

The conception of a book of life (v. 32) is apparently taken from the custom of keeping a register of the citizens of a community (cf. Psa. 69²⁸ Isa. 43 Jer. 22³⁰ Ezek. 13⁹; notes on Rev. 35¹³⁸, etc.). Moses' prayer is, therefore, simply that he may die for or with the people he has led (cf. Num. 11¹⁵).

CHAPTER XXXIII

Jehovah's Anger Turned by Moses' Prayer.

In ch. 33 there is an account of further communion of Moses with God, interrupted by vv. 7-11, which describe the placing and using of the sacred tent. V. 2, it will be seen, breaks the connection of vv. 1 and 3, and anticipates the promise of v. 14, for the angel everywhere represents the divine presence (see 23^{20, 21} 32³⁴). Here Jehovah is represented as refusing to go farther with this stubborn people (vv. 3-5). The people, in token of penitence and grief, remove their ornaments. Then Moses intercedes for them again (vv. 12, 13), and receives in reply the gracious assurance that God will go with them. Without that assurance he would desire to go no farther but to remain at Sinai, where they already had the evidence of his presence and power. Better the Sinai wilderness with God, than the land flowing with milk and honey without him.

Moses makes another request. Wonderful as his experiences of the divine voice and presence had been, he was human enough to have his seasons of doubt and perplexity. He begs that he may see the glory of God, that he may have a convincing and satisfying vision of him (v. 18). But the full glory of the face of God is ever beyond the reach of human understanding. So Zophar declared in the drama of Job (117-9; cf. Jn. 148). Moses may not see God's face, but his goodness, his grace, his mercy, he may see and know, as men saw that glory in the incarnation of our Lord. He will be as one of whose passing by he has a glimpse, but whose face is not revealed. One can hardly imagine a more explicit declaration, in parable form, of the incompleteness and limitations of human knowledge, even of the knowledge of truly inspired men (cf. 1 Kings 19¹⁻¹⁸ 1 Cor. 13⁸⁻¹⁰).

The tent of vv. 7-11 is perhaps an earlier and simpler form of the sanctuary than that described in ch. 26. This is called the tent of meeting, because it represents the dwelling-place of God, the appointed place where a man may bring his gifts and his prayers to God (29⁴²). It was to be pitched without the camp, afar off, and cared for by Joshua, unlike the great tabernacle, which was to be "in the midst of the camps," and cared for by the Levites whose tents were to be pitched round about it (see Num. 14⁷⁻⁵³ 21⁷).

CHAPTER XXXIV

Renewal of the Two Tables; Sundry Laws.

Again Moses is summoned to the mount of God (vv. 1-3) and is bidden to hew and bring with him two tables of stone like unto the first which he had broken (cf. Deut. 10¹⁻⁵). The revelation to him then of the character and attributes of God reaches one of the highest points in religious experience. The name "Jehovah" (see 31³⁻²², notes) takes on a still richer and loftier meaning. In it divine compassion and grace, longsuffering, mercy, and truth are the accompaniments of justice. He is a God who forgives, and yet does not leave unpunished, in whom "mercy and truth are met together" (Psa. 85¹⁰; cf. Num. 14¹⁸ 2 Chr. 30⁹ Neh. 9¹⁷, 31 Psa. 86¹⁵ 103⁸ 145⁸ Jer. 32¹⁸ Joel 2¹³ Jonah 4² Nah. 1³; also arts., O.T. Conception of God, p. 162, Religion of Israel, p. 174). The covenant bond, broken by the sin of the people, is renewed, with a repetition of the divine promises and a restatement of the law in very simple form. Again the people are warned against the seductive influences of Canaanite idolatry, in which lies their greatest danger. The Canaanite altars, with their stone pillars, and their wooden posts, Asherim (perhaps originally trees, or trunks of trees), are to be destroyed. The worship of such false gods is described as a whoring, for Jehovah has espoused his people, he is their true husband, and he is a jealous God.

There are close resemblances between the short code of laws contained here in vv. 10-28, and some of the laws of chs. 13 and 20-23, so close as to suggest a common original. What their history is and how to account for the differences and different setting we do not know. Compare, e.g., vv. 14, 17 with 20³⁻⁶ 23¹³; vv. 18, 19 with 13¹⁻⁷, 11-15; v. 21 with 20⁸ 23¹²; vv. 22, 23 with 23¹⁶, 17; vv. 25, 26 with 23¹⁸, 19. It is possible that this short code, with the Ten Commandments, may be, or approximate very closely to, the original of the Book of the Covenant (24⁷), of which chs. 20-23 are a later expansion. Throughout this entire history we must recognize the fact that it is compiled from older documents, legal and historical, and that the extracts used are often fitted very loosely together (see art., Legal and Historical Literature, p. 145; art., Pentateuch, pp. 136-7.)

The shining of Moses' face was a reflection of the Divine Presence. Cf. the interpretation put upon this story by Paul in 2 Cor. 3⁷⁻¹⁸ and 4³⁻⁶. So did men see with a brighter radiance "the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."

CHAPTERS XXXV-XL

THE BUILDING OF THE SANCTUARY

These chapters repeat almost word for word chs. 25-31, and tell in detail how the instructions there given to Moses were carried out. There are some unimportant differences in the order of contents and concluding statements which tell of the dedication of the sanctuary and its occupation by the divine glory. Compare the description of Solomon's Temple in 1 Kings 6-8, 2 Chr. 3-6, notes, and of the ideal Temple in Ezek. 40-48, notes.

This section of the book begins with a repetition of the law of Sabbath observance (35¹⁻³). 35³ has a parallel in 16²³.

A very fine picture is presented in 35²⁰⁻²⁹ and 36²⁻⁷ of the liberality of the people, who not only brought more than was required for the service of the work, but offered of their labor freely as well. So the people were restrained from bringing.

There is no parallel in the earlier chapters for 38²¹⁻³¹. An account is given of the amount of gold and silver and brass used in the construction of the sanctuary, an almost incredible total for a people so situated, the value of which in modern reckoning would amount to upward of four hundred thousand dollars.

When the work was finished (40³³), the cloud, in which God is represented as accompanying Israel, covered the tent of meeting, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle (40³⁴; cf. 16¹⁰). In what form the glory appeared we do not know, but the words evidently convey the fact of some real and profound experience of the Divine Presence (cf. 1 Kings 8¹⁰, 11 2 Chr. 5¹¹⁻¹⁴). Thus was fulfilled the promise of 29⁴³⁻⁴⁵, and thus is the Lord represented as taking up his permanent abode with his people.

LEVITICUS

By PROFESSOR CHRISTOPHER R. NORTH

INTRODUCTION

Title and Contents. The title "Leviticus" is derived from the Greek version of the O.T. (LXX), and means "that which relates to the Levites." Since, however, the Levites are mentioned only in 25^{32, 33}, it is necessary to give to the term a somewhat different emphasis from that which strictly attaches to it. All priests were Levites, but not all Levites were priests; and even a hurried reading of the book is sufficient to show that the laws contained in it have a much closer relation to the duties of the priests than to those of the Levites. The term "Leviticus" is, therefore, to be understood in a sense similar to that in the phrase "the Levitical priesthood" of Heb. 7¹¹.

The contents of the book fall into five well-defined sections: (1) Chs. 1-7, The Laws of Sacrifice; (2) Chs. 8-10, The Consecration of the Priests; (3) Chs. 11-15, The Laws relating to Uncleaness, with which may be taken ch. 16, The Ritual of the Day of Atonement; (4) Chs. 17-26, The Law of Holiness; (5) Ch. 27, An Appendix on the Commutation of Vows and Tithes.

Sources and Date. The critical problems presented by the book are comparatively simple. The contents belong as a whole to that great body of material in the Hexateuch known as the Priestly Code (P), for the date and character of which see the article The Pentateuch—Its Origin and Development (pp. 138f.). An exception may be made for the Law of Holiness (ch. 17-26), which embodies the priestly ideal in the earlier stages of its development. The distinctive features of the Law of Holiness are indicated in the introduction to chs. 17-26.

It will appear from the foregoing that the book is really a post-exilic compilation. This does not mean, however, that it contains nothing but post-exilic materials. Every present has strong links with the past, and no system, whether of social ethics, or of civil government, or of religion, can expect to obtain a firm hold on the allegiance of men if it breaks entirely with the past. In the book of Leviticus we see the Jewish sacrificial system in what is very nearly its latest stage of development. But embedded in the laws are many customs and precepts of Mosaic or even pre-Mosaic antiquity. It is, of course, not always possible to disengage these from their context, but in the following notes an attempt has been made to indicate the most obvious of them.

Historical Value of the Book. The book contains a maximum of precept and a minimum of action. And since the passages containing the latter were written many centuries after the events described, it is impossible to insist on their literal historicity. It would, however, be a serious mistake to think of the book as destitute of historical value. Every piece of literature is historically valuable insofar as it reflects the ideas and practices of the age when it was written. Leviticus is of inestimable value to the historian because it mirrors so faithfully the ecclesiastical system of Judaism in the otherwise little documented post-exilic period. (See further intro. to Ezra-Nehemiah, p. 454.) The "tent of meeting" and its sacrifices are an ideal projection into the past of the daily Temple ritual that lasted until after the time of Jesus. The study of Leviticus is, therefore, a valuable aid to the understanding of a not unimportant element in the background of the life of our Lord.

Religious Value of the Book. If it be true that Psalms is the most frequently read, it is perhaps equally true that Leviticus is the least read book in the O.T. Even for the Jews most of its laws have been a dead letter since the destruction of the Temple, and it is doubtful whether they would reinstitute the sacrificial system even if they had the opportunity. The Christian thinks of Leviticus as containing a larger proportion of those things which are done away in Christ than any other book in the O.T. And yet, paradoxical as it may seem, neither Leviticus nor the Psalms can be properly understood apart from the other. At least the student of the Jewish background of Christianity must know both, for the reason that they were held in equal veneration by Jewish piety in the time of our Lord. The Psalter was the prayerbook of the Temple; Leviticus provided the rubrics. This will be appreciated if vv. 16f. of Psa. 51 are compared with the later addition in v. 19: it is evident that a psalm which in its original form had no place at all for sacrifice has been adapted to the sacrificial ideal. The opinion is growing that the origin of a large number of psalms is to be sought in the Temple worship. It was Zacharias, a priest, who composed the Benedictus (Lk. 167-79), and Simeon, a devout frequenter of the Temple, who uttered the Nunc Dimittis (Lk. 225-32). These considerations should at least commend Leviticus to the sympathy of Christian readers.

Literature: Commentaries in English by Kennedy, Leviticus (Century Bible); Chapman and Streane, Leviticus (Cambridge Bible); Driver and White, Leviticus (Sacred Books of the O.T.); Lofthouse, Leviticus (Peake's Commentary); in German by Baentsch and Bertholet. Other literature: Gray, Sacrifice in the O.T.; W. Robertson Smith, The Religion of the Semites (2nd edit.); articles on "Sacrifice," and on "Cleanness and Uncleanness" in Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible and in the Encyclopaedia Biblica.

CHAPTERS 1 TO 7: THE LAWS OF SACRIFICE

There are two main divisions to this section: (1) 11-67—regulations for the proper observance of the five orders of sacrifices, namely, Burnt-offering (ch. 1), Meal-offering (ch. 2), Peace-offering (ch. 3), Sin-offering (41-513), Guilt-offering (514-67). These regulations are mainly addressed to the people (12 42). (2) 68-738—details of procedure mainly for the guidance of the priests (69, 25).

CHAPTER I

THE BURNT-OFFERING

1, 2. Introduction to the Whole Section.

The laws are said to have been delivered to Moses out of the tent of meeting. This was properly the covering of the tabernacle (Ex. 3511), but in the Priestly Code the tent of meeting and the tabernacle are usually synonymous. For description of the tabernacle and its coverings see on Ex. 26. It was not a place for congregational worship (the A.V. tabernacle of the congregation is incorrect), but a place where Jehovah met with Moses, and through him revealed the Law.

The general term oblation, covering all kinds of sacrifice, is korban (cf. Mk. 711, notes). It means literally "something brought near," in the Bible always of a gift to God. Note that only domestic animals are admissible as sacrifices. Certain other animals might be eaten (Deut. 1222), but their use as food had no religious significance.

3-17. Procedure for the Burnt-Offering. For additional details see 68-13. The word translated burnt-offering (olah) means literally "that which ascends," either to the altar, or from the altar in sacrificial smoke. The special feature of the burnt-offering was that no part of the victim was consumed by the worshiper. Burnt-offerings might be either (1) public, or (2) offered by private individuals. For the occasions when burnt-offerings were made on behalf of the community see Ex. 2938-42 Num. 28, 29. These included the daily burnt-offerings, together with additional offerings on the Sabbath, at new moon, and at various annual feasts. An individual might offer a burnt-sacrifice at any time, whether in fulfillment of a vow, or as a spontaneous recognition of God's goodness to him (2218 Num. 153). The present passage seems primarily to have in mind the offerings of individuals. The victim might be taken from cattle (vv. 3-9), or from the flock (vv. 10-13), according to the means or discretion of the offerer. A further inexpensive option was provided for the very poor, who might bring one or more turtle-doves or young pigeons (vv. 14-17; cf. 128 Lk. 224). This concession seems to be an afterthought, since birds are not mentioned in v. 2.

The ritual for sheep and goats is the same as for cattle. Sheep or goats are equally eligible, a poor man's goat being as acceptable as a richer man's sheep. Any animal offered must be a male without blemish. For list of disqualifying blemishes see 2219-24. The donor was to lay (literally "lean" or "press," and compare the vivid picture presented by the word in Amos 519) his hand upon the animal, probably in token of dedication. The idea that it dies in his stead cannot be sustained. Even though the offering is said to make "expiation" (so render for atonement in v. 4; cf. Gray, Sacrifice in the O.T., p. 74), the O.T. contains no theory of how this is effected. The conception of sacrifice uppermost in the O.T. is that it was a gift to God, who accepted the gift as expiation (so Gray, op. cit., frequently). The animal is slain and dismembered by the offerer. This is done before Jehovah, or as v. 11 explains, close by the altar, on its north side. The blood, which everywhere in the O.T. is thought to be of peculiar sanctity, is received into a vessel by the priest, who "dashes" (the word is different from the "sprinkle" of 46) it against the four sides of the altar. The various parts of the animal are arranged on the altar, special mention being made of the intestinal fat, which was considered a great delicacy, to be offered always to God; and never to be eaten by man. A relic of the old idea of sacrifice as the food of the gods is preserved in v. 9b; cf. the Babylonian story of the Deluge, where the gods smell the sweet savor, and hover over the sacrificer. We gather from 7⁸ that the skin of the offering was the perquisite of the officiating priest. That the ritual preserves ancient custom may be judged from v. 7, where fire is to be kindled on the altar as occasion required. Contrast the (apparently) later regulation of 6¹³, which requires that the altar fire shall never go out.

The ritual for birds (vv. 14-17) necessarily differs somewhat from the preceding. These are too small to be dismembered. The head is to be pinched, without being severed from the body (cf. 5⁸).

CHAPTER II

THE MEAL-OFFERING

(For additional details see 6¹⁴⁻²³ Num. 15¹⁻¹⁶.)

1-3. Materials and General Procedure. The word translated meal-offering (Hebrew min-châh) means literally a "gift." Unlike korban (cf. 1¹) it may be used of a present from one man to another (Gen. 32¹³); or of tribute from a conquered foe (2 Sam. 8⁶). In early times as a gift to God it was applied to both vegetable and animal offerings (Gen. 4^{3, 4}). In the Priestly Code it is used only of cereal offerings, usually the accompaniment of a flesh offering (7¹¹⁻²¹ Num. 15) — to eat flesh alone would be barbarous—but here, it would seem, independently.

The materials for the offering consisted of finely milled flour, olive oil, and frankincense. For the quantities prescribed when accompanying the several flesh offerings see Num. 15. The regulation flour is described as luxurious food (Ezek. 16¹³), used in kings' households (1 Kings 4²²), and set before honored guests (Gen. 18⁶). Oil served the same purpose as butter with us. Salt was added as a condiment (v. 13). To eat a man's salt was to accept his hospitality, and as his guest to be under his protection. Hence the phrase "the salt of the covenant of thy God" (v. 13). Frankincense (the English word means "pure incense") was a fragrant resin, and non-edible. The priest was to take a handful of the flour and oil, together with all the frankincense, and burn it upon the altar. The portion so burned is called a "memorial offering" (so translate in vv. 2, 9, 16). The meaning of the term is obscure, but the intention probably is that the memorial offering would serve to bring the offerer to the favorable remembrance of the Deity. What was left over, i.e., the larger part of the ingredients, went to the priests. It was most holy, and as such might be eaten only by males of the priestly families, and by them always within the sanctuary precincts (6¹⁶⁻¹⁸). Certain other priestly dues were merely "holy", and might be eaten by other members of the priests' households (10¹⁴; cf. 10¹⁰⁻¹³).

4-13. Further Details Concerning the Cooking of the Meal-Offering. Leaven and honey, being fermentative, may not be used in any offering destined for the altar. (In domestic cooking honey served for sugar—Ex. 16³¹). Salt, on the other hand, is a preservative as well as condiment (cf. notes on v. 1). The flour and oil might be baked in the oven, or pastry fashion on a griddle (v. 5, cf. mg.), or boiled in a saucepan (the proper translation in v. 7.).

14-16. Meal-Offering of Firstfruits. There is here no time for milling the corn, which is therefore roasted, or presented in the form of crushed groats.

CHAPTER III

THE PEACE-OFFERING

(For additional details see 7¹¹⁻²¹, 28-34 22²¹⁻²⁴.)

The translation thank-offerings of the A.S.V. (v. 1, mg.) is unsatisfactory, since it applies to one only of three varieties of peace-offering, namely: thank-offerings, votive-offerings, and freewill-offerings (cf. 7¹¹⁻¹³, 16 22²¹). The Hebrew term (shelem) has generally been understood to denote an offering that has the effect of establishing harmonious and peaceful relations with the Deity. The etymology of the word, however, is equally consistent with the translation "recompense-offering," i.e., payment for benefits received, or expected. Thank-offerings and votive-offerings appear to be of this nature, and Prov. 7¹⁴ strongly supports this interpretation.

In early times we read of peace-offerings on occasions of national rejoicing (e.g., 2 Sam. 6¹⁷). But the only public peace-offerings prescribed in the later sacrificial system are at Pentecost (23¹⁹), and in connection with the consecration of priests (9⁴). With these exceptions the peace-offering was a private and family sacrifice. Flesh was not a daily article of diet among the Hebrews, but a treat reserved for special occasions. There is no doubt that in ancient times all killing of domestic animals for food was sacrificial, i.e., the occasion for a peace-offering. When at the end of the seventh century B.C. sacrifice was confined to Jerusalem, some relaxation of this rule was necessary (Deut. 12¹⁵).

Materials and General Procedure. Peace-offerings might be made of cattle (vv. 1-5), or of sheep (vv. 6-11), or of goats (vv. 12-17). Females as well as males might be offered (contrast the burnt-offering, ch. 1).

Normally, the animal must be without blemish (vv. 1, 6), but an exception was allowed for freewill-offerings (22²³), which were in a sense offerings of supererogation. Much of the procedure was the same as for the burnt-offering, but since it was an offering of less sanctity than the burnt-offering, the victim was not slain by the altar (v. 2; cf. 15, 11). The choicest internal fats, together with, in the case of sheep, the fat tail, were burned on the altar as a sweet savor to Jehovah (vv. 5, 9f., 16). By the expression the caul upon the liver (vv. 4, 10, 15) is usually understood the caudate lobe. When it is said in v. 17 that no fat is to be eaten, the reference is to the internal fats specified in the preceding; the prohibition does not apply to muscular fat. After the removal of the fats the breast and the right thigh went to the priests (7³¹⁻³⁴). The remainder of the flesh was consumed by the offerer and his friends.

CHAPTERS 4¹ TO 5¹³: THE SIN-OFFERING

(For additional details see 624-30 Num. 1522-31.)

CHAPTER IV

1, 2. Definition. The primary purpose of the sin-offering was to make expiation for sins committed in ignorance. It is to be remembered that primitive morality takes little account of motives, but only of actions and their results. When right conduct consists in not disobeying commandments, it is easy to err, especially when the commandments are numerous and predominantly ceremonial. A man must needs have all his wits about him to keep the Law entire. Hence the anxiety of the psalmist (Psa. 19¹²) that he might be cleared from hidden faults, by which are meant not sins that he kept secret from others, but faults hidden from himself. When such "errors" were discovered expiation was provided by the sin-offering. For sin as we understand it, intentional and "presumptuous" sin (Psa. 19¹³), there was no remission by sacrifice (Num. 15³⁰, 31 Heb. 1026-31).

In addition to serving the purpose indicated above, sin-offerings also figured in the high priestly consecration ceremonies (ch. 8), and were required from persons emerging from certain states of uncleanness, e.g., child-birth (12⁶), and leprosy (14¹⁹). The value of the animal offered, likewise the manipulation of the offering, depended upon the rank of the offender.

3-12. For the High Priest. If the high priest commits an unintentional transgression, the whole community will incur guilt, since he acts as their representative. To remove this, nothing less than a young bullock, obviously without blemish, will suffice. The high priest presses (see on 14) his hand on the head of the victim, and he himself as the offerer slays it. Before pouring out the blood at the base of the altar of burnt-offering he takes some of it into the sanctuary, sprinkles it (the translation here is correct) on the curtain separating the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies, and smears it upon the projections at the corners of the altar of incense. (For description of the incense altar, which was inside the sanctuary, see Ex. 30¹⁻¹⁰.) The internal fats of the bullock, specified as for peace-offerings (vv. 8f.; cf. 33^f.), are burned upon the altar of burnt-offering. The remainder of the carcass, including even the skin, is burned, not upon the altar, but in the place where the ashes from the altar are cast (vv. 11, 12). No part is available for human consumption, nor for priestly profit.

13-21. For the Whole Community. The victim and the procedure are the same. The elders, as the responsible heads of the community, lay hands on the victim. The offering makes expiation (v. 20; see on 14) and the people are forgiven.

22-26. For a Ruler, or Secular Chief. The offering is an unblemished he-goat. Any priest may officiate (v. 25; contrast v. 16). None of the blood is taken into the sanctuary, but the procedure differs from that for peace-offerings and burnt-offerings in that some of the blood is smeared on the projections of the altar of burnt-offering. The fats are burned as before. The remainder of the carcass is not burned; it is the due of the officiating priest (62⁶), and belongs to the class of "most holy" things (see on 21-3).

27-35. For a Layman. The procedure is the same as for a ruler, but a she-goat or a she-lamb suffices for victim.

CHAPTER V

1-6. Examples of Sins that Require the Sin (or Guilt?) Offering. These verses appear to break the connection between 4³⁵ and 5⁷, which follow one another naturally, 5⁷⁻¹³ providing for the man who cannot afford the lamb required in 4³²⁻³⁵. They also present two further difficulties: (1) the sin described in v. 1 can hardly be called a sin of ignorance; (2) according to the R.V. of v. 6a (cf. A.S.V.) they appear to relate not to sin-offerings but to guilt-offerings, dealt with in 5¹⁴⁻⁶⁷. With regard to the second of these difficulties, the first of the two translations of the R.V. ing., for his guilt, is barely possible, but it is not the natural and obvious translation. The most likely solution of the difficulty is that these verses come from a source other than that from which the rest of the chapters in which they are embedded are derived, a source that did not differentiate clearly between sin-offerings and guilt-offerings (note both terms in v. 6).

The first example (v. 1) is that of the man who remains silent when evidence has been called for under an adjuration or a curse (cf. Judg. 17² Prov. 29²⁴). Such evidence may be either at first hand (whether he hath seen), or at second hand (or known). The second example (vv. 2, 3) is that of the man who touches the carcass of an unclean animal (see ch. 11), or a person in a state of uncleanness (see ch. 12-15). The third (v. 4) is that of the man who takes a rash oath. The word translated swear rashly is used only twice outside this passage, in Prov. 12¹⁸, and of Moses in Psa. 106³³ (cf. Num. 20¹⁰).

7-13. Sin-Offerings of the Poor. In v. 7a R.V. has guilt-offering (cf. A.S.V.) as in v. 6a (see preceding paragraph). The explanation, however, is somewhat different from that suggested there. The LXX reads he shall bring for his sin that he hath sinned, from which it is probable that the Hebrew originally read "sin-offering," not guilt-offering. However this may be, that the paragraph refers to sin-offerings is clear from vv. 7b, 8f., 11f. The consideration of guilt-offerings proper is deferred until v. 14.

These verses provide that if a man from whom a sin-offering is due is too poor to provide the goat or lamb, he may bring two turtle-doves, or young pigeons, one for a sin-offering, and the other for a burnt-offering. After the blood had been drained from the first, its flesh was presumably eaten by the priest. The second was burned according to rule (cf. 14-17). If a man could not even afford birds, he might bring fine flour (about 7 pints), without oil or frankincense. Of this a handful was burned on the altar; the rest went to the priest (cf. 21-3, notes).

CHAPTERS 514 TO 67: THE GUILT-OFFERING

(For additional details see 71-7 Num. 55-8.)

It has already been noted (see on 51-6) that sin and guilt offerings are sometimes not clearly differentiated. They are admittedly similar (cf. 77), and in the present passage the situation contemplated in 517 seems nowise different from that demanding a sin-offering. The word for guilt-offering (asham) is used in 1 Sam. 63-5 of the golden tumors and mice sent by the Philistines with the returning ark, and in 2 Kings 1216, somewhat similarly, of money payments to the Temple treasury. These usages are akin to the provision in the present section, where the principle of the guilt-offering consists in the payment of dues withheld from God (514-19), or man (61-7), together with a compensatory fine.

14-19. Guilt-Offering for Dues Withheld From God. If a man inadvertently neglects to render at the appointed time what is due from him to the sanctuary, he must, on discovering his error, make it good, adding a fifth by way of interest. In addition to this he must present a ram, the value of which, to be estimated by the priest, must be in shekels, i.e., it must be worth at least two shekels. Two shekels would be about $1.40, but their purchasing power today would be much greater. For the disposal of the ram see 71-7.

CHAPTER VI

1-7. Guilt-Offering for Dues Withheld from Man. The unneighborly acts specified may best be indicated by a paraphrase translation of vv. 2f.: "If a man sins and commits a breach of faith against Jehovah by acting dishonestly toward his neighbor; whether by neglecting to return at the due time that which his neighbor has deposited with him for safe custody, or as security; or by obtaining something from his neighbor by violence or extortion; or by finding something belonging to another, and then swearing it is not in his possession—." Nothing is said of the case being brought into court. (The translation of v. 5c is too definite, the Hebrew being simply "in the day of his guilt.") The requirement of the guilt-offering was for the man whose conscience prompted him to make voluntary restitution. He was to restore to the person he had wronged the property, plus one fifth of its value, and in addition he was to present a ram to the sanctuary. If the matter went into court, the consequences for the offender were more serious (see Ex. 22).

CHAPTERS 68 TO 738:

SUPPLEMENTARY REGULATIONS FOR THE GUIDANCE OF PRIESTS

Many of the details here given have been mentioned in the preceding expositions. Only those that are new need be specially mentioned in the following comments, and the reader is referred back to the foregoing chapters.

8-13. The Burnt-Offering. Cf. ch. 1. Unlike ch. 1, which has primarily in mind the offerings of individuals, these verses contemplate the public burnt-offerings presented daily. The conduct of the priest was, of course, the same for both classes. Private offerings were slain by the offerer (15); public offerings were probably slain by priests and Levites (cf. 2 Chr. 29³⁴ 35^{9f.}). For the garments worn by officiating priests see Ex. 28⁴⁰⁻⁴³. These had to be changed when the sacred precincts were left. For the contagion of holiness that necessitated this, see on vv. 27f.

14-18. The Meal-Offering. Cf. ch. 2. This passage also has in mind the public meal-offerings accompanying the daily and other burnt-offerings (Ex. 29⁴⁰, 41 Num. 28⁵, etc.). The procedure is as in ch. 2.

19-23. Meal-Offering of the High Priest. This is described in v. 20 both as a consecration offering and as a daily offering (perpetually). The second of these is attested by Ecclus. 45¹⁴ and Josephus. With regard to the first, the words in the day when he is anointed are probably a gloss in this context, though a consecration meal-offering was made in later times (cf. Ex. 29²).

24-30. The Sin-Offering. Cf. 41-51³. This, like the burnt-offering, was slain close by the altar. The higher grades of sin-offering were not eaten (v. 30; cf. 41-21). The flesh of the lower grades (42²⁻³⁵ 57-10) was consumed by the priests, and was most holy (see on 21-3). It must not be eaten outside the sanctuary area, for holiness was contagious, and if laymen were infected by it the consequences might be serious. God might break out, as he did upon Uzzah (2 Sam. 6^{6f.}). Men thought of holiness as physical before they thought of it as moral. It had affinities with uncleanness in that both were "taboo," i.e., withdrawn from the sphere of common usage (see art., Bible Manners and Customs, p. 74a). Thus when the later Jews wished to say of the O.T. that it was canonical, they said it "defiled the hands," i.e., certain illustrations were necessary after handling it. The "holiness" of a brazen vessel could be purged away by scouring. But an earthen vessel must be broken after use, since the holiness of the sin-offering, getting into its more or less porous texture, could not be entirely gotten out.

CHAPTER VII

1-7. The Guilt-Offering. Cf. 51⁴⁻⁶⁷. This is most holy (see on 21-3 and 62⁴⁻³⁰). The place of slaughter and the manipulation of the blood are as for the burnt-offering (cf. on 11¹, and read dash for sprinkle). The fats are burned as in the peace-offering. The flesh goes to the priest.

8-10. The Priests' Share of Burnt-Offerings and Meal-Offerings. For v. 9 cf. 24-7.

11-21. The Peace-Offering. Cf. vv. 28-34, and ch. 3. There are three varieties, namely, thank-offerings, votive-offerings, and freewill-offerings. The flesh would naturally be eaten with bread. The meal-offering to accompany thank-offerings is prescribed, and consists of three varieties of unleavened, together with leavened bread. It does not appear that any of the bread was destined for the altar (the leavened portion would be ineligible for that purpose, see 21¹), but one cake of each of the four varieties went as a heave-offering to the officiating priest, to be eaten with his portion of the flesh. The Hebrew word translated heave-offering (terûmâh) contains no suggestion of throwing. It simply means what is "lifted up" from the whole as the priest's portion. The flesh of thank-offerings must be eaten on the day of offering (v. 15; cf. 22²⁹, 30), but an extension of one day was allowed for votive-offerings and freewill-offerings (v. 16; cf. 19⁶). Care must be taken to keep the flesh from all contact with uncleanness. The penalty for neglect of this requirement is extreme—that soul shall be cut off from his people (cf. Gen. 17¹⁴ Ex. 12¹⁵, etc.). What this involves is not stated. The contexts in which the phrase occurs do not suggest judicial procedure and capital punishment. Nor are we to think of anything quite so formal as excommunication. Probably what is meant is that the offender was left to the judgment of God, with the expectation that he would come to an untimely end (cf. 17¹⁰ 20³).

22-27. Prohibition of Fat and Blood. Cf. 31⁷ 17¹⁰⁻¹⁶. By fat here is meant the internal fat specified in ch. 3 for burning on the altar. To eat the fat of non-sacrificial animals was not interdicted, provided they complied with the laws of cleanness (ch. 11). But the blood must first be drained off, since it is pre-eminently the seat of life (Gen. 9⁴), and as such belongs to God. The fat of domestic animals might be put to human uses, provided they had not been sacrificially slaughtered; but it might never be eaten.

28-34. The Priests' Share of Peace-Offerings. This consists of the breast and the right thigh (not shoulder as in R.V. mg.). The heave thigh (see on vv. 11-21 for the meaning of the term) goes to the priest who conducts the sacrifice. The breast was "waved" in the direction of the altar in token of dedication to God, and then back again in token that God had bestowed it upon the priests. It went to the common priestly store. (Cf. the greed of Eli's sons, 2 Sam. 21¹²⁻¹⁷.)

35-38. Concluding Summary. These verses look back to the regulations of 68-73⁴. At the beginning of v. 35 read portion with R.V. mg.

CHAPTERS 8 TO 10: THE CONSECRATION OF AARON AND HIS SONS, AND THEIR ASSUMPTION OF OFFICE

CHAPTER VIII

THE CONSECRATION

The chapter is practically a repetition of Ex. 29, and tells how the instructions there given to Moses were carried out. For the details the reader is referred to the notes on Ex. 29.

1-5. Preliminaries. Cf. Ex. 29:1-3.

6-13. The Washing, Clothing, and Anointing. Cf. Ex. 29:4-9. For the various items in the priestly vestments see on Ex. 28. The Urim and Thummim (mg. reading, The Rights and the Perfections) are not mentioned in Ex. 29, but they are included in the catalogue of Ex. 28. They were probably stones for casting sacred lots (see on 1 Sam. 14:41). Nothing is said in Ex. 29 of the anointing of the tabernacle and its furniture, but cf. Ex. 30:26f. For the laver (v. 11) see Ex. 30:18.

Note that Aaron alone is anointed, not his sons (cf. 10:7, where all the priests appear to be anointed). This anointing, and the garments he wears, constitute him a person of kingly rank. In post-exilic times, when the monarchy no longer existed, the high priest exercised civil as well as ecclesiastical authority.

14-17. The Sin-Offering. Cf. Ex. 29:10-14. Moses acts as priest, and Aaron, as the offerer, slays the bullock. For the procedure cf. 43:12, noting that here nothing is said of the blood being taken inside the sanctuary. This is an installation-offering, not a sin-offering for inadvencement.

18-21. The Burnt-Offering. Cf. Ex. 29:15-18, and for the ritual ch. 1.

22-32. The Installation-Offering. Cf. Ex. 29:19-34. The Hebrew word translated consecration in vv. 22, 28f., 31, is literally "fillings," and finds its explanation in v. 33b, where the Hebrew reads "he shall fill your hand seven days" (cf. R.V. mg.). To fill a person's hands was a technical term meaning to install him in office (cf. Judg. 17:5, mg., notes). Accordingly, Moses takes certain parts of the offering, and before burning them on the altar puts them upon the hands of Aaron and his sons, and waves them (v. 27; cf. on 7:28-34). It is this contact with the holy flesh, and its reception on the altar from their hands, which gives the priests their peculiar standing. To make the consecration more complete some of the blood of the ram is applied to the right ears, thumbs, and great toes of Aaron and his sons (vv. 23-27). The point is not so much that ears, hands, and feet are especially consecrated, as that the whole body is consecrated by the application of the blood to these extremities. Even the garments of the priests are sprinkled with a mixture of blood and oil (v. 30; cf. Ex. 29:21).

With these differences the installation-offering resembles an ordinary peace-offering. The fats are burned on the altar. With them goes the right thigh, which, though belonging in theory to Jehovah, was ordinarily waved back to the priests. But at present it is not their due, since they have not as yet officiated. Moses as the officiant receives the breast as his portion. (Note that in 7:31f. the individual priest receives the thigh, and the priests as a whole the breast. Here the intention seems the other way about, and the accounts must embody different traditions). The rest of the flesh is boiled and eaten by the priests (v. 31), as it would be ordinarily by those who offered a peace-offering.

33-36. The Foregoing Ceremonies to be Repeated Daily for Seven Days. During this time the priests are to keep within the sanctuary inclosure. For the reason for this see on 6:24-30.

CHAPTER IX

THE PRIESTS ASSUME OFFICE

On the eighth day Aaron, now fully consecrated, conducts special inaugural sacrifices, assisted by his sons.

1-7. Preparations. These consist of materials for (1) a sin-offering and a burnt-offering on behalf of the priests (in v. 7 for the people read for thy house, with LXX); (2) a sin-offering, burnt-offering, peace-offering, and meal-offering on behalf of the people. The victims for the burnt-offering are said to be of the first year. This has generally been understood to mean "less than a year old," but Gray is inclined to think it means "of a full year old" (Sacrifice in the O.T., pp. 348-351; cf. A.S.V., v. 3).

8-14. Offerings for the Priests: (1) The Sin-Offering (vv. 8-11). The ritual is similar to that in 8:14-17. (2) The Burnt-Offering (vv. 12-14). Cf. 8:18-21, and for the ritual see on ch. 1.

15-21. Offerings for the People. (1) The Sin-Offering (v. 15). The phrase as the first refers to vv. 8-11. (2) The Burnt-Offering (v. 16). For the ordinance see on ch. 1. (3) The Meal-Offering (v. 17). See on ch. 2. The portion not burned was later consumed by the priests (10:12). The last clause of the verse is unintelligible and probably a gloss. (4) The Peace-offering (vv. 18-21). For the ritual see ch. 3 and 7:28-34, and for the consumption of the priests' portions, 10¹⁴. Nothing is said of any share for the people.

22-24. The Pronouncement of the Blessing and the Revelation of the Divine Glory. Aaron pronounces a blessing from the altar. The words of the benediction are not given, but were perhaps as in Num. 6²³⁻²⁶. He then comes down (the altar was three cubits high, Ex. 27¹), and enters with Moses into the shrine. When they come forth they together bless the people, and the glory of Jehovah is visibly seen as fire descending upon the altar. For the association of the divine glory with fire see Ex. 24¹⁷. It was generally hidden from mortal sight by the pillar of cloud. Other examples of the spontaneous consumption of sacrifices by fire are related in Judg. 6²¹ 1 Kings 18³⁸ 1 Chr. 21²⁶ 2 Chr. 7¹. The shout of the people (v. 24b) is not a panic-stricken woe but a ringing cry of joy. The word is that translated "sing" in Isa. 42¹¹. Exultation and reverence go together: "They gave a ringing cry, and fell on their faces."

CHAPTER X

This chapter is of the nature of an appendix to the two preceding, and is designed to show that the ministrations of the priests are to be conducted with scrupulous regard for the proprieties of worship.

1-7. The Sin of Nadab and Abihu. These were the eldest sons of Aaron (Ex. 6²³). Together with their father, and Eleazar and Ithamar their brothers, they had just been consecrated (Ex. 28¹). They now offered strange fire, and were immediately consumed by fire from Jehovah (cf. 9²⁴). What is meant by offering strange fire is not certain. Perhaps they had not taken fire from the appointed place, i.e., the altar (16¹² Num. 16⁴⁶); or perhaps the incense was not according to the proper receipt (Ex. 30^{34f.}). Others suppose that by the word "fire" in v. 1b should be understood fire-offering, and that Nadab and Abihu had presumed to offer an unauthorized sacrifice. Their father and brothers were forbidden to mourn for them. For the expressions used cf. 13⁴⁵ 21¹⁰ Ezek. 24¹⁷. The hair was unloosed by removing the turban; which explains the reading of the versions noted in the mg. What is intended is not that the surviving priests shall stifle their natural affection, and by remaining impassive show their disapprobation of the action of their dead kinsmen. But if they mourn, they will be temporarily unclean (Hos. 9⁴ Deut. 26¹⁴), and so incompetent to minister (21¹⁻²⁴, where, however, the strict rule applies only to the high priest). That the occasion calls for mourning is recognized, but it is the people who must mourn (v. 6b), and lest the surviving priests should contract uncleanness by touching the corpses (Num. 19¹¹), these are to be removed by Aaron's cousins (v. 4), who are unconsecrated, and may therefore contract uncleanness without detriment to the community.

8-11. Alcohol Forbidden to the Priests While Officiating. Cf. Ezek. 44²¹. For vv. 10, 11, cf. Ezek. 22²⁶ 44²³. Common was the opposite of holy, unclean of clean. For the difference between holiness and uncleanness see introduction to chs. 11-15. It is quite certain that priests were teachers of ritual before they had the monopoly of sacrifice, and the function is still part of their duty.

12-15. Laws Governing the Consumption of Priestly Dues. It is sufficient to refer to the notes on 21-3 624-30 728-34.

16-20. A Passage Relating to the Consumption of Sin-Offerings by the Priests. It will be remembered that when the blood of a sin-offering had been taken inside the shrine, as in 41-21, the flesh was not eaten by the priests, but burnt outside the sacred enclosure. When there was no special blood rite, as in 422-35, the flesh was eaten by the priests (624-26). The sin-offering referred to in the present passage is that described in 9¹⁵. No blood had been taken into the sanctuary, and Moses was surprised that its flesh had not been eaten, but burned. He therefore remonstrates with Eleazar and Ithamar. Aaron explains that the reason for departure from the ordinary procedure is that the untoward happening to his eldest sons rendered such a course unpropitious; whereupon Moses expresses himself content. The story is a strange one. We may perhaps infer from it that priests sometimes hesitated to eat the flesh of sin-offerings, and that the story was designed to show that such eating was, in the absence of special circumstances, quite in order.

CHAPTERS 11 TO 15: LAWS RELATING TO UNCLEANNESS

It has been stated (on 624-30) that holiness was in early times thought of as physical, and that it had affinities with uncleanness in that both were "taboo"; further (on 108-11) that the opposite of the holy was the common, and of unclean the clean. The difference between holy and unclean would seem to be that the holy was what it was because it had been brought into contact with the holiness of God, the fount and origin of all holiness; while the unclean was what it was by reason of an inherent quality, usually of a demonic character. While the ideas contained in the following chapters are intensely interesting in themselves, it must be frankly recognized that they are not in harmony with Christian ideas. Nevertheless the attempt to understand them should give us an intelligent sympathy with the human race, whereof we all are members, in its upward struggle toward the light, and enable us to realize from what a bondage we have been delivered by Christ (Mk. 7:1-23). In their present form the laws are late. But the ideas underlying them go back to primitive Semitic religion, and are therefore far earlier than Moses. The best treatment of the whole subject will be found in Robertson Smith's The Religion of the Semites, and in the article by Peake on "Uncleanness" in Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible, vol. iv. (See also art., Legal and Historical Literature, pp. 145-7.)

CHAPTER XI

Clean and Unclean Animals. Cf. Deut. 14:1-21. The origin of the distinction between clean and unclean was not hygienic, but religious. This statement is not invalidated by the fact that those peoples would tend to survive whose ritual was in accordance with hygienic principles.

1-8. Mammals. Many considerations might lead to an animal being pronounced unclean in the first instance. Foremost among these would be association with foreign cult (cf. 1 Cor. 8). (The reason why we do not eat horseflesh is not that it is really more revolting than other flesh, but that the heathen Saxons regarded it as sacred to Odin, and it was therefore forbidden to them when they became Christians, to avoid any danger of compromise with the old ideas). This principle will account for several items in the chapter; e.g., swine (v. 7; cf. Isa. 65:4 66:17, and note that excavations at Gezer prove that swine were sacrificed by the pre-Semitic inhabitants of the place); the mouse (v. 29; cf. Isa. 66:17); the camel (Robertson Smith, op. cit., p. 283); the hare (v. 6; ibid., p. 382). The law that an animal to be eaten must be cloven-footed and chew the cud is an attempt to generalize from immemorial custom in particular instances. This is borne out by the fact that the rockbadger (v. 5, mg.) and hare are not really ruminants, though the movement of their jaws makes them appear so.

9-12. Fish. The law seems formulated to exclude eels, probably on account of their resemblance to serpents, which were credited with demonic powers (cf. Gen. 3:1f.).

13-19. Birds. These fall into two main classes: (1) carrion birds and birds of prey, whose food consisted of blood (cf. 7:26); (2) birds inhabiting wastes, and therefore associated with demons (cf. Psa. 102:6 Isa. 34:11-15).

20-23. Winged Insects. Here, perhaps, physical revulsion may be a deciding factor. Four species of locusts are allowed (cf. Mt. 23:34, although it is more likely that the "locusts" eaten by John the Baptist were the pods of the carob bean, the "husks" eaten by the prodigal son—Lk. 15:16, mg.).

24-47. Carnivora, Reptiles, etc.; Uncleanness by Contact With Carcasses; Conclusion. The section is miscellaneous, and difficult to systematize. Further prohibitions relate to carnivora (v. 27; see above on birds), and to creeping things, whether rodents, reptiles or vermin.

Contact with the carcass of an unclean animal produces uncleanness in a mild form (vv. 24, 27, 31). The same applies to a clean animal that dies of itself (v. 39). If the carcass is carried, the measure of uncleanness is greater, and necessitates washing (vv. 25, 28, 40). A clean animal may not be eaten unless killed for the purpose, though we should judge that the very mild penalty was not intended to act as an absolute deterrent. If a carcass comes into contact with any domestic utensil, the utensil must be washed, or, if of earthenware, broken (vv. 33, 35; cf. 6:28). If it falls into a fountain or cistern, uncleanness does not result except to the vessel in which it is removed. Presumably the solution of uncleanness is so diluted as to be negligible; or is it a prudential consideration? Moisture will render seed permeable to uncleanness; but if the seed be dry, it is immune (v. 38).

In these regulations we see the beginnings of that casuistry for which Judaism later became a byword (Mk. 7:1-23, notes).

CHAPTER XII

Uncleanness After Childbirth. After the birth of a boy the mother is unclean for forty days in all; for a girl the period is twice as long. Note the almost sacred number forty, and its multiple. A boy is to be circumcised on the eighth day. At the close of the total period of uncleanness the mother is required to present a burnt-offering and a sin-offering. Provision was made to bring the requirements of the law within the means of the poor. The mother of Jesus was glad to avail herself of this concession (cf. Lk. 22:1-39, the best biblical commentary on this chapter).

To us it seems strange that the sacred function of motherhood should require to be expiated by a sin-offering. Nor is there any obvious reason why the period of uncleanness should be twice as long for a girl as for a boy. Once more the original motives underlying the laws were not hygienic, but religious. Primitive peoples universally associate the processes of generation and birth with the mysterious and uncanny, and a woman in childbirth is commonly supposed to be surrounded by demonic influences. These influences are often thought to be more potent when a girl is born than when the child is a boy; hence the longer period of uncleanness. It is not necessary to suppose that the Jews in later times had any conscious remembrance of the original motives underlying the laws of this chapter, but they still observed the forms. And it helps us to appreciate the completeness with which our Lord identified himself with men (Heb. 2:17) when we reflect that he fulfilled in his own experience ideas so primitive as these (Lk. 22:1-24).

CHAPTER XIII

Leprosy: Its Diagnosis. (On the whole subject see the articles on "Leprosy" in Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible and the Encyclopædia Biblica, by Macalister and Creighton respectively.)

That the Hebrew word translated leprosy has a wide range of meaning is evident from the fact that a garment (13:47-59) or a house (14:33-53) may be "leprous." They are leprous not because they are worn, or inhabited, by leprous persons; they are leprous in themselves. Not only is the application of the word "leprosy" in this chapter very wide, but it has even been doubted whether true leprosy (elephantiasis graecorum) is contemplated at all. The symptoms described are nowhere those which are most obvious to the beholder in a case of true leprosy, and it is generally agreed that the disease described in vv. 29-37 is nothing more serious than ringworm. At the same time there is little doubt that true leprosy was known in Palestine in O.T. times, and if known it would hardly be excluded from the catalogue. It further seems clear from the at first sight rather puzzling enactment of vv. 12f. that the leprosy that makes a man unclean is of a more or less malignant character. These verses exempt from uncleanness the man who is suffering from what appears to be psoriasis, a non-contagious and curable skin disease. We shall probably be right if we think of "leprosy" in the Bible as covering a variety of skin diseases, including true leprosy. The reason why the characteristics of the latter are not more obvious to the reader is that the symptoms described are those of the disease in its earlier stages, before its more repulsive manifestations have had time to develop. It should be added that the identifications of most of the "leprosies" described are obscure, even to medical experts.

1-44. In Human Beings. The general principle is that the disease must be more than skin deep, and accompanied by discoloration of the hair. In doubtful cases two periods of quarantine may be necessary, of seven days each.

45, 46. Conduct of a Leper. He is to be habited as a mourner (cf. 10⁶ 21¹⁰ Ezek. 24:17 Mic. 3:7); to dwell apart from his fellows (cf. 2 Kings 7:3 15⁵ Lk. 17:12); and to advertise his whereabouts to all who pass by crying, Unclean, unclean. Like the pariah in India, he was untouchable. Contrast with the attitude of the Law that of Jesus, who, being besought to speak the word of healing, did not forbear to touch the suppliant (Mk. 14:0f.).

47-59. "Leprosy" in Garments. The description points to some kind of mildew or to moth. For the now almost obsolete use of the word fretting (v. 51) cf. the Prayer Book version of Psa. 39:11, "like as it were a moth fretting a garment." The process of inspection, with its two periods of quarantine, is similar to that for human beings. Note the effort to avoid destroying the garment (especially v. 56). A suspected garment would usually be an old one, but clothes were precious (cf. Ex. 22:26f. and notes on Amos 2:6-8).

CHAPTER XIV

Leprosy: Its Purification. The whole ceremony consists of two well-defined parts, described in vv. 2-8a and 8b-20 (or 21-32) respectively. That the first rite is complete in itself seems clear from the closing words and he shall be clean, and it is probable that in early times it alone sufficed. The setting free of the bird is a survival of the extremely ancient idea of the transference of uncleanness to animals. This part of the ritual should be compared with the likewise ancient ceremony of the goat for Azazel on the Day of Atonement (16:20-22). Other details, the running water, and the cedar wood, scarlet, and hyssop (vv. 4-6) figure in the ceremony of the red heifer (Num. 19), which also embodies antique ritual. The second series of rites (8b-20 or 21-32) has all the appearance of being a later approximation to the normal types of sacrifice.

1-8a. Initial Rite. A candidate for purification must apply to the priest; and if the priest is satisfied that he is healed, he is to take two clean birds, together with cedar wood, scarlet cloth, and hyssop. Cedar and hyssop are contrasted in 1 Kings 43³ as extremes of greatness and smallness. Hyssop was used for sprinkling (Ex. 12²²), and was symbolical of cleansing (Psa. 51⁷). Both it and the cedar were aromatic. They were tied together by means of the scarlet cloth. One of the birds was to be killed and its blood drained into an earthen vessel containing water from a running stream. The priest sprinkled the candidate for purification with the blood and water, and after immersing the living bird set it free. The cleansed man then washed his clothes and his person, and shaved his hair. (Hair was frequently regarded as a source of pollution, perhaps with good reason! Cf. Robertson Smith, Religion of the Semites, 2nd edit., p. 333, note 5.)

8b-20. Additional Rites on the Eighth Day. These included the following offerings: (1) a guilt-offering (vv. 12-18), consisting of a he-lamb and oil (one log=a pint); (2) a sin-offering, a ewe-lamb (v. 19); (3) a burnt-offering and meal-offering, consisting of a he-lamb and three-tenths of an ephah of flour (about twenty pints) respectively (see p. 79). For the procedure for the several offerings see the relevant sections of chs. 1-7. Note, however, that the guilt-offering here differs in several respects from the normal described in 51⁴⁻⁶⁷. It is not, like an ordinary guilt-offering, a payment for a due withheld from God. The victim is a he-lamb, not the usual ram. Contrary to the usual practice, the whole is "waved" (v. 12; see notes on 728-34). Finally, the anointing of the patient's extremities with blood (v. 14) is a feature peculiar to this and the priestly consecration ceremonies (823f.).

21-32. Concession to Poverty. Birds are allowed for the sin-offering and burnt-offering, and one third only of the quantity of flour. The materials and procedure for the guilt-offering in no wise differ from the preceding. Evidently, it was the most important rite in the series.

33-53. "Leprosy" in Houses. The description points to some kind of fungoid growth. It was evidently not contagious in the modern sense, since, if the house were emptied before the official sentence of uncleanness was pronounced by the priest, the furniture was not affected. If the trouble were persistent, the house was condemned. The purification rite for a house restored to cleanness is similar to that in vv. 4-7.

54-57. Summary Conclusion. The verses look back to the regulations of chs. 13, 14.

CHAPTER XV

Issues. The affections described in vv. 2-15 and 25-30 are abnormal. The first of these may be gonorrhoea, but that is not certain. It is not known whether the Hebrews were acquainted with venereal disease, though a few passages like Prov. 511-22 723-26 may have such a reference. The sin-offering required is of the smallest (vv. 14, 15), as in vv. 25-30, where there is no suggestion of unchastity (cf. Mk. 525-33). Even if the first paragraph does refer to venereal disease, therefore, it would seem that the chapter does not intend to stigmatize any of the conditions described as due to "sin" in our sense of the word. The original idea underlying the laws is similar to that indicated in the notes on ch. 12, namely, that sexual functions are mysterious, and must therefore be surrounded by powerful taboos. If the chapter be read with this consideration in mind, its contents will be sufficiently clear.

There is every reason to believe that those who gave to the laws their present form were aware of their hygienic value. But it should be recognized that the motives underlying them were in the first instance religious, not hygienic. When we first grasp this principle we may be surprised to find that the hygienic value of the laws is so extraordinarily high. The conclusion forced upon us by the study of this and the foregoing chapters is that, on the whole, true religion is sound hygiene, and that in the days before man began to concern himself with hygiene for its own sake, God in his wisdom safeguarded health by teaching men right religion. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge."

CHAPTER XVI

The Day of Atonement. Among the Jews of N.T. times this was simply called "the Day" (cf. Acts 27⁹), and was the most important event in the calendar. It is therefore surprising to find that there is no reference to it in the historical books of the O.T. It is briefly mentioned in 2327-32 25⁹ Ex. 30¹⁰ and Num. 297-10, but nowhere in the O.T. do we read of any actual occasion when it was observed. Since the date was the tenth of the seventh month (our September-October—see p. 77) we should expect some mention of it between Neh. 773b and 91, which gives an account of solemn ceremonies in the seventh month, perhaps of the year 397 B.C. But there is none. The conclusion seems inevitable, that the Day of Atonement was the latest development in the O.T. economy of sacrifice. This does not mean that it was wholly an innovation. There is not the least doubt that that part of the ceremonies which describes the transference of the sins of the community to the "goat for Azazel" is a survival of extremely ancient practice (cf. intro. to ch. 14). The elaborate rites of "the Day," therefore, embodying as they do the slow development of centuries, are the best that the old dispensation could afford to take away sins. If the blood of bullocks and he-goats could have sufficed, there would here have been ample sufficiency. Contrast the efficacy of the sacrifice offered by Christ (Heb. 9, notes).

1-10. Preparations. Aaron is not to enter the Holy of Holies whenever he will, but once a year only (vv. 2, 34; cf. Heb. 97). For the veil see on Ex. 2631^f, and for the mercy seat, Ex. 2517^f. The clothes worn by the high priest are not the regal vestments of ch. 8 but the unpretentious linen garments described in Ex. 2837-42. For himself he is to take a young bullock for a sin-offering (cf. 41-21), and a ram for a burnt-offering; for the people two he-goats for a sin-offering, and a ram for a burnt-offering. On the goats lots are to be cast, one for Jehovah, and the other for Azazel. The translation dismissal in the R.V. mg. here (cf. removal in A.S.V. mg.) is inadmissible, being based on a false etymology. What the word meant is unknown, but it should be retained as the proper name of a wilderness demon. There is no doubt that the earliest imagination pictured Azazel as real (cf. 177). In the apocryphal book of Enoch (second century B.C.) imagination runs riot about him, and he is said to have been the leader of the fallen angels who contracted unions with the daughters of men (Gen. 61-4), and to him all sin is ascribed. (See art., Intertestamental Literature, p. 197b.)

11-14. Slaughter of the Priests' Sin-Offering; The High Priest Enters the Veil. Before the blood can safely be brought within the veil, the mercy seat of the divine presence must be obscured by a cloud of incense. The blood of the bullock is then sprinkled on the mercy seat. This was the only occasion in the year when this was done. The blood of an ordinary sin-offering for the high priest was brought no further than to the curtain that separated the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies (46).

15-17. Slaughter of the People's Sin-Offering. The application of the blood is as in vv. 11-14. Being in the center of a sinful community, the sanctuary contracts defilement, and must therefore be "unsinned."

18, 19. Cleansing of the Altar of Burnt Offering. This was done with the blood of both sin-offerings.

20-22. The Scape-Goat. The sins of the people are now transferred to the goat for Azazel, which is then led into the wilderness. Whether the priestly editors who gave final form to the ceremonies thought of the act as anything more than symbolical it is hard to say. We need not credit them with the riotous imagination of the Book of Enoch. But no doubt among the common people the old ideas persisted.

23-28. Completion of the Offerings. This is in accordance with the usual regulations for sin-offerings and guilt-offerings, special care being taken to insulate both the "holiness" of the high priest, and the "uncleanness" of those who have been charged with the more menial services of the day.

29-34. Concluding Notices. The date of the ceremony is to be the tenth of the seventh month of the ecclesiastical year (September-October). (Note that this was the first month of the civil year; see art., Time, Money, etc., p. 77). The day is to be a fast day, and a day of complete cessation from work, alike for the Jewish born and for the resident alien. For the phrase afflict your souls, i.e., to fast, see Psa. 3513 Isa. 583. It will be remembered (see on ch. 4) that sins committed in ignorance were expiated by the regular sin-offerings. There might, however, be sins of ignorance committed during the year and still undiscovered by the offender. These were supposed to be covered by the ceremonies of the Day of Atonement.

CHAPTERS 17 TO 26: THE LAW OF HOLINESS

These chapters have for the past fifty years been generally recognized as coming from another, and earlier, source than the main body of the Priestly Code. They are known as the Law of Holiness, and denoted by the symbol H. They embody a collection of miscellaneous laws, beginning, as in the Book of the Covenant (Ex. 2022-2333) and the Code of Deuteronomy (Deut. 12-26, 28), with laws on sacrifice (ch. 17), and concluding with an exhortation (ch. 26). See further on the Law of Holiness the articles, The Pentateuch, p. 139, and The Legal and Historical Literature, p. 146, and cf. the introduction to Ezra-Nehemiah and to Ezekiel.

Many of the laws are very ancient, and not all of them are from the same source. Thus many of the precepts concerning prohibited degrees in ch. 18 are repeated in slightly different form in ch. 20. The laws appear to have been gathered together just prior to the Exile or during the early exilic period. (Ch. 26 appears to have the Exile in mind, but the period between 597 and 586 B.C. would offer a possible date for this chapter.)

The Deuteronomic law of the one sanctuary is also the law of H (at least in the present form of 17:1-9), and there are affinities with Ezekiel which point to borrowing one way or the other. Some suppose that H depends on Ezekiel, but the more general opinion is that Ezekiel was acquainted with H.

The original body of laws constituting H was worked over by a writer of the Priestly School; e.g., most of the introductions to chapters are from P. Although in many respects the viewpoints of H and P are the same, differences are still discernible, e.g.;

(1) In H the festivals still have a close relationship to agriculture (cf. ch. 23). In P this relationship is lost sight of, and the great days of the calendar are rather occasions fixed arbitrarily for religious observance.

(2) H makes no distinction, as do Ezekiel and P, between priests and Levites. (Levites are only mentioned in 25:32-34, which is universally regarded as later than the main body of H; cf. intro., section on "Title and Contents.")

(3) In H the high priest is still first among equals (21:10). In P he belongs to a separate order: Aaron is in a class by himself, and the other priests are his sons. (The expression "sons of Aaron" used of the priests in the introductions to chapters in H is from the later priestly redactor.)

The dominant note in H is that of the holiness of Jehovah. Israel is to be holy because Jehovah is holy (19:2). In ch. 19 we have ancient Israelitish ethics at its best, and the whole is a noble attempt to blend ceremonial with moral holiness. The concluding exhortation (ch. 26) is as fine as anything of its kind in the O.T.

CHAPTER XVII

LAWS OF SACRIFICE. (Cf. Deut. 12)

1-9. Slaughter of Domestic Animals. Such slaughter is treated as sacrificial, and for this reason it must be performed at the central sanctuary. The passage refers primarily to peace-offerings; see therefore on ch. 3. In the earliest Law (Ex. 20:24, from the Book of the Covenant; see p. 146) sacrifice was permitted in any place where Jehovah revealed himself. This would regularize such sacrifices as those of Gideon (Judg. 6:11-24) and Manoah (Judg. 13). But the terms of the law were wide, and experience showed that they were open to serious abuses (Hos. 4:13, 14). To those who were jealous for the purity of religion many sacrifices seemed nothing better than a propitiation of demons (v. 7, R.V. mg., satyrs; cf. Isa. 13:21), as, indeed, they half consciously may have been. Hence the law that all sacrifice must be at an officially recognized sanctuary. This was perhaps the original form of the law in this paragraph (the words camp and tent of meeting look like an expansion of P). Deuteronomy (seventh century) went further, and required that all sacrifice should be at the central sanctuary, i.e., Jerusalem (Deut. 12), and with this the present passage in its expanded form agrees (see notes on 2 Kings 22, 23).

From this point of view an irregular sacrifice is tantamount to murder (v. 4), a taking away of life (cf. v. 11) which belongs only to God. For the phrase he shall be cut off (vv. 4, 9) see on 7:20. The law is binding alike upon native Israelites and resident aliens (vv. 8-16), who, dwelling in Jehovah's land, would naturally, according to the ideas of those times, conform to the worship of Jehovah (cf. Ruth 1:16).

10-12. Prohibition of Blood. Cf. 3:17 7:26. The soul (so v. 11, mg.) of any creature was thought of as quasi-physical, and as identical with the blood (cf. v. 14, Gen. 9:4). Insofar as sacrifice made expiation, therefore, it was by virtue of the blood-soul that was in it.

13-16. Application of the Blood-Prohibition to Non-Sacrificial Animals. These might be eaten, provided they were "clean," but the blood prohibition applies also to them. Their blood must be poured out (cf. Deut. 12:16), and covered with dust (cf. Ezek. 24:7). The reason for the prohibition in v. 15 is that the blood has not been drained off. In the Book of the Covenant such flesh must be given to the dogs (Ex. 22:31). In Deut. 14:21 it may be given to the resident alien, or sold to a foreigner. The present passage seems almost to invite the poorer Israelite to eat it, provided he is prepared to contract a slight measure of uncleanness (cf. 11:40). Evidently, the blood-taboo was beginning to lose something of its terror.

CHAPTER XVIII

FORBIDDEN DEGREES OF MARRIAGE (Cf. 20:11-21)

What is forbidden in this chapter is not occasional incestuous relations, which are, of course, included in the general commandment against adultery and fornication, but marriage. The phrase "to uncover the nakedness of" means to marry.

1-5. Introduction. A warning not to conform to heathen practices, whether of Egypt or of the pre-Israelitish inhabitants of Canaan. Note the thrice repeated I am Jehovah (R.V. the Lord). The phrase is characteristic of the Law of Holiness, in which it occurs some fifty times.

6-19. Table of Prohibited Degrees. The general principle governing the prohibitions is that of blood relationship. The degrees within which marriage is allowed are much the same as in Christendom to-day. It may, however, be noted that nothing appears to forbid the marriage of uncle and niece. Relationship in law is regarded as the same as actual blood relationship. This is because man and wife are "one flesh" (Gen. 224). Any approach to a father's wife is therefore an atrocious insult to the father himself (vv. 7, 8; cf. Gen. 920-27). In several particulars the laws show an advance upon early Hebrew practice. Thus v. 8 implicitly condemns the ancient Oriental custom whereby a king made good his succession by succeeding to his father's harem (cf. 2 Sam. 16²¹, 22 1 Kings 22²). Marriage with a half-sister, once legitimate (Gen. 20¹² 2 Sam. 13¹³), is forbidden by vv. 9, 11. The law of v. 16, if strictly enforced, would forbid "levirate" marriage (Deut. 25⁵⁻¹⁰). It does not, however, appear to have supplanted ancient custom (see Gen. 38, Ruth 1¹; and cf. Mt. 22 23-28). It should be noted that v. 18 does not forbid marriage with a deceased wife's sister, but only with a second sister during the lifetime of the first. This is an advance on the custom that permitted such marriages as those of Jacob with both Leah and Rachel. Polygamy is recognized, but experience showed that it was productive of much domestic unhappiness (cf. 1 Sam. 1⁶, where the word for "rival" is from the same root as that in v. 18 here), and it gradually died out. The antagonism would be all the more marked if the rival wives were sisters (cf. Gen. 30¹⁵).

19-23. Other Sexual Enormities. For these verses see marginal references. For the Molech worship condemned in v. 21 see on 20¹⁻⁵, where the subject is treated more fully. It is perhaps included here in accordance with the prophetic habit of branding heathenish practices as adultery, i.e., unfaithfulness to Jehovah, the divine Husband of the nation (cf. notes on Ezek. 23, 24, Hos. 1-3).

24-30. Concluding Exhortation. Note the past tenses in vv. 27, 28, 30 (in the Hebrew also in vv. 25, 26). The standpoint is unconsciously that of the period following the conquest, a minor confirmation of the critical theory of the origin of the Pentateuch.

CHAPTER XIX

This chapter contains a variety of precepts, and no arrangement by paragraphs is very satisfactory. Practically every commandment in the Decalogue is touched upon, and the whole is important as showing how the commandments were interpreted when the Law of Holiness was formulated. The conception of holiness is for the most part distinctly ethical, and shows unmistakable influence of the moral enthusiasm of the prophets.

1, 2. Israel to Be Holy Because Jehovah Is Holy. This motive should be compared with that of Deuteronomy, which requires Israel to love Jehovah because he first loved his people by delivering them from the bondage of Egypt (cf. especially Deut. 6).

3, 4. A Summary of the First, Second, Fourth, and Fifth Commandments. The order is reverse from that in Ex. 20. Idols are things of nought (mg.), "inanities," a contemptuous epithet first applied to them, so far as we know, by Isaiah (Isa. 2⁸ in Hebrew). For molten gods, at one time distinguished from carved or graven images, cf. Ex. 34¹⁷. In later times the term "graven" included both molten (i.e., metal) and carved (i.e., wooden) images (Isa. 40^{19, 20}).

5-8. Consumption of Peace-Offerings. Cf. 7¹⁵⁻¹⁸ 22³⁰.

9-18. Exhortations to Humanity and Justice. For vv. 9, 10, cf. 23²² Deut. 24¹⁹⁻²². The widespread custom of leaving the corners of a field unreaped goes back to remote antiquity. The original motive appears to have been to propitiate the corn spirits, who would otherwise forsake the field. For this a humanitarian motive has been substituted. The injunction not to show favoritism to the poor (v. 15) has only one parallel in the O.T., in Ex. 23³, and there the reading is questionable. By v. 16b is meant giving false witness against a man on trial for his life, or, worse still, bringing a capital charge against him falsely. V. 17 shows a fine appreciation of the inwardness of the sixth commandment (cf. Mt. 5^{21, 22} 1 John 3¹⁵); the man who sees his neighbor doing wrong, and fails to rebuke him, makes the wrong his own. The words "Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy" (Mt. 5⁴³) are a later casuistical interpretation of the fine precept in v. 18. The second half is not a quotation from the O.T., but is arrived at by placing undue emphasis on "neighbor" instead of on "love." Jesus showed the true spirit of the Law by widening the content of the word "neighbor" (Lk. 10²⁹⁻³⁷).

19-25. Hybrids Forbidden, Trees to Be "Circumcised." For the law against hybrids cf. Deut. 22⁹. There is evidence that cloth mixtures had associations with magic, which would explain the prohibition of v. 19b. Perhaps the command in v. 19a is a later argument from analogy (the Deuteronomic parallel is different); at any rate, mules were common in Palestine (2 Sam. 13²⁹ 1 Kings 10²⁵, etc.). V. 20 comes strangely here. The woman in the case is a slave concubine. If she were put to death, it would be her master's loss; for a similar motive cf. Ex. 21²⁰. Vv. 23-25 require that for three years the fruit of newly planted trees is to be treated as "uncircumcised," i.e., unclean, and therefore not to be eaten. In the fourth year it is to be wholly given over as a sacred due. Thereafter it becomes the property of the owner. Here again the original motive for not eating the fruit of the early years was probably to propitiate the fertility spirits (cf. notes on v. 9).

26-37. Miscellaneous Precepts. Most of these have parallels elsewhere, and the marginal references should be consulted. The practices condemned in vv. 27, 28, are very ancient, and belong to the vague border line between religion and magic. Peoples of the lower culture almost universally think of the spirits of the dead as frequenting their former haunts. They are besides endowed with supernatural powers, and as spirits are capricious these powers may be used to hurt the living. The mutilations, cuttings of the hair and beard, and tattoo marks referred to were attempts on the part of the living to make themselves unrecognizable by the dead. They are accordingly condemned as heathenish and magical. V. 29 is probably directed against sacred prostitution (2 Kings 23⁷; cf. on Hos. 4¹⁴). Excavations at Gezer show that the command in vv. 35, 36, was by no means unnecessary. Most weights found there are either below or over standard. It must have been common to keep two sets of weights, one for buying, and the other for selling.

CHAPTER XX

1-9. Molech Worship, Etc. Cf. 18²¹. The distinctive feature of the Molech cult was the passing of children, usually firstborn, through fire (18²¹ 2 Kings 23¹⁰ Jer. 32³⁵; cf. Deut. 18¹⁰ 2 Kings 16³ 21⁶ Mic. 6⁷, etc.). The rite appears to have become frequent from the eighth century B.C. onward, when the precarious political situation of the Hebrews inclined them to pessimism. The center of the cult was the valley of Hinnom (Hebrew, Ge-Hinnôm), south of Jerusalem, which thereby obtained such an evil reputation that Gehenna, the place of torment, was called after it. The identification of Molech is not certain. The original pronunciation of the name was certainly Melek, the Hebrew word for "king." One passage (1 Kings 11⁵⁻⁷) seems to identify him with Milcom, the god of the Ammonites. But probably in the popular imagination Melek was none other than Jehovah himself (cf. Jer. 7³¹ Mic. 6⁷). The penalty for Molech worship was death by stoning; i.e., the act of killing and responsibility for it were to be shared by the whole community. If the people refused to accept their responsibility, Jehovah himself would see that justice was done against the offender (vv. 5, 6; see on 7²⁰). Cursing of parents is also a capital crime (v. 9), and those who carry out the sentence are to be beyond the operation of the law of blood revenge. That is the meaning of the phrase his blood shall be upon him.

10-21. Penalties for Sexual Enormities. Every verse in this paragraph finds a parallel in 186-23, where, however, the emphasis is slightly different. In ch. 18 certain marriage unions are forbidden; here penalties are assigned for what may be only occasional incestuous relations. Where the manner of death is not prescribed we may suppose it to be by stoning (cf. Jn. 8⁵).

22-26. Concluding Exhortation. Israel is to observe distinctions between clean and unclean because Jehovah, the uniquely holy, has separated her from other peoples. There was no intention on the part of those who formulated the laws of Leviticus to emphasize ritual to the exclusion of morality. They intended ritual purity to be the outward and visible sign of an inward moral holiness. Wherever this is done there is a risk of formality and externalism; but the perversions of the scribes and Pharisees were no part of the intention of the original authors.

27. Cf. 19³¹. The verse seems out of place, and should probably follow v. 6.

CHAPTERS 21 AND 22: REGULATIONS CONCERNING PRIESTS AND THEIR DUTIES

These two chapters are mainly concerned with the priests, and especially with the conditions under which they may minister. The second half of ch. 22 prescribes the conditions of soundness required of any animal proposed for sacrifice.

CHAPTER XXI

1-9. Regulations for Ordinary Priests. No priest may officiate while in a state of ceremonial impurity. And since to have contact with a corpse is to contract impurity (Num. 19¹¹, etc.), the occasions on which a priest may mourn must be reduced to a minimum. He may mourn for his immediate relatives, including an unmarried sister. But for a married sister he may not mourn (v. 4; this verse in R.V. and A.S.V. follows the accepted Masoretic text; read instead, "He shall not contract uncleanness for a sister married to a husband, to profane himself"); that must be done by her husband. Mourning customs having magical associations (v. 5; cf. 1927, 28) are naturally forbidden to a priest. He must not marry a harlot, nor a woman sexually dishonored, nor one who has been divorced. And if his daughter becomes a harlot, she is to be burned. In a word, a priest must do all in his power to preserve the holiness vested in him. For the original significance of the phrase the bread of their God (vv. 6, 8) see the explanation of 19.

10-15. Regulations for the High Priest. For the conception of the high priest's office indicated by v. 10 see introduction to chs. 17-26. Uncleanness by mourning is forbidden him altogether. For the outward signs of mourning in v. 10b cf. 106 1345 Ezek. 24¹⁷, and for their original heathenish significance see on 1926-37. The high priest must not only live within the sacred inclosure (cf. 107); he must never go outside it. To do so would be to bring the holiness of God into contact with all manner of defilement. He is not even allowed to marry a widow, but must confine his choice of wife to a virgin of his own people, i.e., probably, but not certainly, of one of the priestly families.

16-24. Bodily Defects That Disqualify a Priest. A priest who is physically disqualified may not conduct a sacrifice, but by virtue of his birth he is allowed an equal share with his brethren of all the sacred dues. For the distinction between the holy and the most holy see on 21-3. The sanity of the Levitical arrangements as a whole is remarkable. The Hebrews saw no virtue in extreme asceticism and mutilation, and not even the high priest was required to be celibate.

CHAPTER XXII

1-9. Conditions on Which Priests May Eat the Sacred Dues. The physical disabilities of the preceding paragraph are permanent, but do not disqualify from participation in the dues; the conditions named in the present paragraph are temporary only, but disqualify so long as they last. The reading that they separate themselves (v. 2) is perplexing, since there is no doubt that the priests were permitted to eat the flesh of sacrifices. It is true that in Zech. 7³ the word translated "separate" must be understood of fasting. But here the sense is fundamentally weakened, and what is intended must be that the priests are to exercise caution in eating the sacred dues. The priest who eats them while ceremonially unclean is to be cut off (see on 7²⁰). The uncleannesses specified have been fully treated in the notes on chs. 11, 13, and 15. In v. 4b the reading of the R.V. text should be followed, not of the mg.; any thing will of course include any person.

10-16. Members of a Priest's Family and the Sacred Dues. The stranger in vv. 10, 12f. is not the usual gêr, or resident alien (17⁸ and frequently in O.T.). The word is zar, and by it is to be understood a layman; see Num. 15¹, where that is quite evidently the meaning. Neither is the sojourner in v. 10 the more or less permanently resident gêr, but a temporary guest. A hired servant is not a member of the household; he receives wages, and provides for himself. A slave receives his sustenance from his master, though he would naturally eat only of the "holy," not of the "most holy" things (see on 21-3). By such as are born in his house are meant the children of a purchased slave. A priest's daughter married to a layman ceases to be a member of the household, but she may return if she is widowed, or divorced, and have no child. (A woman might be divorced at her husband's pleasure, and no suspicion of unchastity would attach to her; otherwise she would be treated as in 20¹⁰.) A widow with children is still maintained by her husband's family, and the children of a divorcée are in the custody of the father. For v. 14 see the section on guilt-offerings (514-16), where, however, the law seems much more fully developed.

17-25. Sacrificial Victims Must be Sound. Only burnt-offerings and peace-offerings are mentioned. The ritual of sin-offerings and guilt-offerings was not fully developed until the Exile, i.e., after the Law of Holiness was written. For burnt-offerings, only males are allowed (v. 19; cf. 1³); for peace-offerings male or female (36). With one exception, namely, for freewill-offerings, which were offerings of supererogation, victims must be without blemish. A list of blemishes is given in vv. 22f. Castration disqualifies even for freewill-offerings (v. 24 reading as R.V. mg.). This rule would, in a country where slaughter was generally sacrificial, tend to discourage the operation altogether (so R.V. text). The laws apply not only to animals bred by the Hebrews themselves, but also to those acquired from foreigners.

26-33. Supplementary Rules and Concluding Exhortation. For v. 27 cf. Ex. 22³⁰, where, however, the rule applies especially to firstborn animals. V. 28 may be compared with Deut. 22⁶, and perhaps also with Ex. 23^{19b} and parallels. The thank-offering appears here to be thought of as a separate order of sacrifice. It is not mentioned in v. 21, but contrast 7^{11f}, where it is included in the category of peace-offerings. This is another indication that the laws of sacrifice were the result of a long process of growth.

CHAPTER XXIII

THE SACRED FESTIVALS

In this and the two following chapters the original nucleus of the Law of Holiness appears to have been much expanded by P; see intro. to chs. 17–26. The sources of the several sections are indicated by the appropriate symbols, H and P. In those that belong to H the old time relationship of the festivals to the land and to agriculture is still evident. In the priestly sections, written in Babylonia during the Exile, this has naturally become obscured.

1-3. The Sabbath. (P.) Cf. Ex. 20⁸⁻¹¹. It would not be possible for the whole population to attend a holy convocation weekly at the Temple. The phrase refers to synagogue worship, which was a recognized institution before the close of the O.T. period (cf. Psa. 74⁸ R.V. text).

4-8. The Passover and Unleavened Cakes. (P.) Cf. Ex. 12; Deut. 16¹⁻⁸. This is to be kept on the 14th of the first month of the ecclesiastical year, i.e., Nisan (March-April). For the phrase between the two evenings in the R.V. mg. of v. 5 cf. the English word "twilight" (twin-light), which is similar in origin and meaning. The Passover was probably a pre-Mosaic lambing festival. In the period following the Conquest it became associated with the agricultural festival of unleavened cakes, or firstfruits of the barley harvest, with which it nearly coincided in point of time; so v. 6 here.

9-14. Firstfruits. (Mainly H.) The ceremony here described has no parallel in the O.T., and is obviously very primitive. It directs that before anything of the harvest is consumed a sheaf of corn shall be presented at the (local) sanctuary. This was part of the ritual of the festival of unleavened cakes already mentioned in v. 6. The original motive for eating the first corn without leaven was probably that the harvesting operations allowed no time for elaborate cooking. In early times the beginning of harvest would vary in different parts of the country, but from v. 11b it would appear that it was customary to commence on the first day of a week. When later the date became fixed the Sabbath was that after the Passover. The meal-offering to accompany the burnt-offering was about seven quarts, and the drink-offering about three pints.

15-22. The Festival of "Weeks," or Pentecost. (Mainly H.) This marked the close of the wheat harvest, and fell fifty days after the festival of Firstfruits; hence the later name "Pentecost" (Greek fiftieth). Elaborate offerings are prescribed, for the manipulation of which see the appropriate sections in chs. 1-7. The meal-offering, intended for the priest (v. 20), and not for the altar, may now be baked with leaven, since the need for hurried preparation is past. V. 21 is from P. For v. 22 see on 19⁹⁻¹⁸.

23-25. The Festival of Trumpets. (P.) In early times the Hebrew year began in the autumn (see on Ex. 23¹⁶ 34²²), as the Jewish civil year still does (see art., Time, Money, etc., p. 77). The festival of Trumpets, which fell, according to the later reckoning, on the first of the seventh month of the ecclesiastical year, was reminiscent of the earlier calendar, and marked the beginning of the civil year. It was to be marked by complete cessation from secular work, together with synagogue attendance (see on vv. 1-3).

26-32. The Day of Atonement. (P.) See on ch. 16.

33-44. The Festival of "Booths." (Vv. 33-38, P; 39-43, H.) In Ex. 23¹⁶ 34²² this is called the festival of Ingathering. It was the final harvest home of fruit, vintage, and olives (v. 39, and cf. Deut. 16¹³), and was happily observed at full moon in the seventh month, Tishri (September-October). It was originally, quite naturally, a time of rejoicing, as the verses assigned to H still testify, when the whole population lived for a week in the open, sheltered only by temporary booths of palm branches, etc. (The R.V. feast of tabernacles in v. 34 gives a wrong impression of these structures, the more so as the Hebrew word is the same as that rendered booths in vv. 42f.). Already in H the occasion was solemnized as a remembrance of the deliverance from Egypt. In the solemn legislation of P (vv. 33-36) the originally festive character of the week has been modified with a thoroughness that testifies to the impression made on the conscience of the Jews by the bitter experience of exile.

CHAPTER XXIV

1-4. The Sanctuary Lamp. (P.) Cf. Ex. 27^{20f}. For the seven-branched candlestick, or, better, "lampstand," see Ex. 25³¹⁻⁴⁰. It was made of pure gold; hence the term pure lampstand. It was to be fed with the finest beaten olive oil, and tended by the high priest himself.

5-9. The Shewbread. (P.) For the pure table, overlaid with pure gold (cf. above), see Ex. 25²³⁻³⁰. The institution of the shewbread goes back to early times (cf. 1 Sam. 21¹⁻⁶), and has its parallel, even to the number twelve of the loaves, in Babylonian ritual. Early imagination would think of the loaves as food for the gods (see 1⁹), but in the present passage they are a "memorial-offering" (see on 21-3), and the number twelve is doubtless symbolical of the number of the tribes of Israel.

10-23. Blasphemy a Capital Crime: The "Lex Talionis." Of this paragraph vv. 15-22 exhibit the characteristics of H. Vv. 15, 16, ordain that blasphemy is to be treated as a capital crime. This law has been expanded by P in vv. 10-14, 23, who embodies it in a concrete precedent. A half-born Israelite, offspring of a forbidden marriage (Deut. 7³), has blasphemed the Name. He is taken outside the camp, as far as possible from the center of the divine holiness, and stoned (see on 201-9 for the significance of this). This is the only passage in the O.T. where the Name (i.e., of Jehovah) is synonymous with Jehovah himself. In post-biblical times the Jews had such an extreme reverence for the divine name that they ceased to utter it, and even its pronunciation was forgotten; cf. Mk. 14⁶¹, where the high priest says to Jesus, "Art thou the Christ, the son of the Blessed?" One of the commonest substitutes was "the Name."

In vv. 17-22 is a statement of the "Lex talionis," or Law of Retaliation, the principle of "an eye for an eye," etc. (cf. Ex. 21²³⁻²⁵). This rough-and-ready principle of justice is from the Christian standpoint rightly condemned (Mt. 5³⁸). Jesus taught that men were to forgive until seventy times and seven (Mt. 18²², notes), a measure of forgiveness exactly proportioned to Lamech's measure of vengeance (Gen. 4²⁴). Rightly understood, then, even the lex talionis once acted as a check upon primitive savagery, and helped to conserve some kind of law and order in the "times of ignorance." On the whole, it helped to make life and property safe until the time when men could appreciate a higher law.

CHAPTER XXV

THE SABBATH YEAR AND THE YEAR OF JUBILEE

1-7, 17-22. The Sabbath Year. (H.) Every seventh year the land is to lie fallow. Mention is made of a fallow year in Ex. 23^{10f.}, where the motive assigned is a humanitarian one. There is no reason to suppose that in early times this law was observed simultaneously throughout the whole land, though that appears to be the intention here, at least in vv. 20-22. The humanitarian motive is not primary here as it is in the Exodus passage. The reason is rather that the land may keep a sabbath unto Jehovah, an approximation to the idea underlying Gen. 22^{f.} (P), where the Sabbath is no longer an institution made for man, but is given a cosmic significance. It is difficult to resolve the apparent contradiction between vv. 5 and 6. Either v. 6 must be a later addition to mitigate the harshness of v. 5, or we are to take it to mean that while reaping was forbidden, the self-sown produce of the land might be gathered as occasion required. Any fear of scarcity is allayed in vv. 20-22, where promise is given of an enormous harvest in the sixth year.

The Year of Jubilee. (Vv. 8-16, 23-55). The groundwork of the section is from P, who has, however, taken up and welded into his own legislation portions of the Law of Holiness. These latter may be identified by their concern for the welfare of the poor (e.g., vv. 35-40a). That the Jubilee law embodies a high ideal needs no showing, but even the Jews are fain to admit that its provisions were never very thoroughly carried out.

8-16, 23. The Main Provisions. The English word "Jubilee" is derived from the Hebrew jôbêl, meaning "ram's horn" (i.e., "trumpet"). The year is so called because it was to be announced by trumpet blast on the Day of Atonement. The main provisions of the Jubilee are three, and are operative at the end of every fiftieth year: (1) An additional Sabbath year is to be kept, v. 11; (2) all slaves are to be liberated, v. 10; (3) all leases are to expire, vv. 10, 13. The reason for this last provision is that the freehold of the land belongs to Jehovah, and not to any man. No lease may therefore extend beyond the next Jubilee, and the purchase price of any holding must be calculated on this basis, since it is only so many years' crops that are sold, and not the land itself (vv. 15f.).

24-28. Reclamation of Land Sold on Lease. Land sold on lease may be reclaimed by the owner at any time, provided that either he or his kinsfolk have the means to compensate the lessee. Such a provision would make leasehold very insecure. But if it discouraged "big business," it made impossible the expropriation of the small holder and the accumulation of the land into a few large estates. It is assumed that nothing but need will induce a man to sell his possession, and then only so much of it as will bring him deliverance from financial straits.

29-34. Urban Property. The freehold of a house in a walled city may be transferred (vv. 29f.); but a house in an unwalled village is to be reckoned as part of the adjoining farm (v. 31). In the Levitical cities the right of repurchase is retained (v. 32), and the property returns to the freeholder at the next Jubilee

(v. 33, reading if one of the Levites redeem not, after the Vulgate; cf. mg.). The reason is not that the Levites are privileged, but that, having no individual landed estates, they must be allowed the right of repurchase on what property they have, namely, houses. This is not contradicted by v. 34, where by suburbs (mg. pasture lands) is meant commonlands, which no individual has the right to sell.

35-38. "Usury" Forbidden. (H.) By usury is meant "interest," no matter at how low a rate. Such situations as arise in modern business are not contemplated. The text is concerned with money lent to a fellow countryman in temporary need, not with loans for commercial purposes. Therefore no interest is to be charged (cf. Ex. 22²⁵ Deut. 23¹⁹). Deut. 23²⁰ permits the taking of interest from a foreigner, whereby Shylock may justify himself.

39-46. Only Foreigners to Be Enslaved. A comparison with the earlier legislation of Ex. 21²⁻⁶ Deut. 15¹²⁻¹⁸ is instructive. A man may still sell himself to a fellow Israelite. But instead of being put to the work of a slave he is to be treated as a hired servant. What he gains in status he loses by being kept until the next Jubilee, instead of being released in the seventh year, as in Exodus-Deuteronomy. Only Jehovah has full slave rights over Hebrews (v. 42). Therefore a Hebrew, if he requires slaves in the true sense, must obtain them of foreigners (vv. 44-46).

47-55. Repurchase of Hebrews Enslaved to Resident Aliens. If a Hebrew sells himself to a resident alien, his freedom may be repurchased at any time by any member of his family; or he may, if circumstances permit, repurchase it himself. The price of his freedom depends on the number of years to the next Jubilee, when he becomes free automatically.

CHAPTER XXVI

HORTATORY CONCLUSION TO THE LAW OF HOLINESS

As an example of impassioned eloquence, rising sometimes to the level of poetry (v. 36) this chapter is unsurpassed by anything of its kind in the O.T. It should be compared with Ex. 23²⁰⁻³³, the conclusion to the Book of the Covenant, and with Deut. 28, the conclusion to the Laws of Deuteronomy. The latter parallel is especially close, since both exhortations contrast the blessings of obedience with the curses of disobedience, and in both the curses are described at greater length than the blessings. Further, a study of the marginal references will reveal many similarities of thought and expression to Ezekiel. The concluding verses show that the possibility, if not the actuality of exile, was very real to the imagination of the writer. These facts make it probable that the chapter was written some time during the first half of the sixth century B.C.

1, 2. Idolatry Forbidden. For idols and graven images see on 19⁴. A pillar (mg. obelisk, Hebrew massēbhāh) was a standing stone. Every "high place" was furnished with one or more of these, and many have been uncovered by modern excavation.

3-13. Blessings of Obedience. These strike the modern reader as very materialistic. It must be remembered, however, that the conception of a blessed future life was foreign to the thought of the ancient Hebrews. Moreover, the religious unit was the nation, not the individual. With such limitations upon its exercise the goodness of God could hardly show itself in any other way than that described. The more spiritually minded would value material blessings not so much for their own sake, but as evidences of the divine pleasure. (See art., Religion of Israel, pp. 174-5.)

14-45. Curses of Disobedience. These, like the blessings, are materialistically conceived, and for the same reason. The horrors of siege and deportation are vividly pictured in vv. 27-39. The measure of punishment is to be seven times proportioned to the transgression (vv. 18, 21, 24, 28). This suggests that the chapter was written not later than the early years of the Exile. At the close of the Exile, when the lessons of that catastrophe had been learned, it was thought sufficient that Israel should have received double for all her sins (Isa. 40²). In vv. 40-45 the thought passes beyond the proximate calamities to a subsequent repentance, confession, and restoration. The order of the whole section is as it should be, and shows a fine appreciation of moral values.

26. Bread is the staff, i.e., support of life; cf. Ps. 105¹⁶ Isa. 3¹ Ezek. 4¹⁶. The meaning is that ten families will have to subsist on the rations of one. 30. Sun-images, better "sun-pillars," associated with the Phœnician sun-god Baal-Hammān; cf. 2 Chr. 14⁵, Isa. 17⁸ etc. 34. Literally, "the land shall pay off her sabbaths." Evidently, the law of the Sabbath year was not kept, but accounts would be settled when the land perforce lay uncultivated because of the people's absence.

46. Final Subscription to the Law of Holiness. The words suggest that the Law of Holiness existed as a separate unit before being embodied in Leviticus. (See intro. to chs. 17-26.)

CHAPTER XXVII

THE COMMUTATION OF VOWS AND TITHES

A Late Appendix. This chapter provides that votive-offerings and tithes may be commuted for a money payment. In post-exilic times the maintenance of the Temple was extremely costly, and the priests would be glad to receive "cash down" rather than promises which sometimes might not be due for payment until some time in the indefinite future. The businesslike character of the chapter betokens a late date, as does also the assumption of the Jubilee legislation (vv. 17-25).

1-8. Persons. In early times we read of the votive-offerings of Jephthah's daughter, who was actually sacrificed (Judg. 11³⁰⁻⁴⁰), and of Samuel, whose life was spent in the service of the sanctuary (1 Sam. 1¹¹⁻²⁸). To later reflection the former would be barbarous, the latter impossible, since no non-Levite could by any means enter the ranks of the priesthood. A money payment, therefore, offered a satisfactory settlement, and was determined according to the value of the labor of the person vowed. A shekel was the equivalent of about sixty-six cents, though its purchasing power would be several times greater.

9-13. Animals. A sacrificial animal once vowed becomes "holy," and therefore inalienable from the purpose for which it is assigned. An unclean animal must be sold and its price paid to the Temple treasury. If the offerer wishes to reclaim it, he must pay its value and one-fifth additional.

14, 15. Houses. The principle is the same as for unclean animals.

16-25. Land. The procedure here is complicated by the Jubilee year (ch. 25). The value of a field depends upon the amount of seed required for sowing it. A homer, approximately eleven bushels, would be sufficient for sowing about four acres. The price is calculated at a shekel per sowing of a homer per annum for fifty years. If the transaction falls between two Jubilees a reduction is made according to the number of years to the next Jubilee. This settles the matter if the man who makes the vow is only a leaseholder (vv. 22f.). A freeholder must pay an additional twenty per cent, otherwise the field will become ecclesiastical property at the next Jubilee (vv. 19f.).

26, 27. Firstlings. Firstlings of sacrificial animals are Jehovah's in any case (Ex. 13², etc.), and are therefore outside the scope of the commutation law. The rule for firstlings of unclean animals is as in vv. 11f.

28, 29. The "Ban." For the ancient Semitic institution of the ban, or devoted thing, see notes on Deut. 2³⁴ Josh. 7, 1 Sam. 15. The custom was extremely barbarous, and we read nothing of its being put into operation after the days of Samuel. The law in v. 28 here refers to objects privately banned. V. 29, if of anything more than antiquarian interest, must refer to those who have been condemned for capital crimes.

30-33. Tithes. For the law of tithes see Deut. 14²²⁻²⁹ Num. 18²¹⁻³². A tithe on cattle is a large demand, and is mentioned only here and in 2 Chr. 31⁶. For whatsoever passeth under the rod, i.e., of the teller, cf. Psa. 23⁴ Ezek. 20³⁷ Jer. 33¹³. If a man wishes to commute the tithe in kind for a money payment, he may do so as in other cases by adding one-fifth to the value. The addition would tend to discourage commutation.

NUMBERS

BY PROFESSOR LINDSAY B. LONGACRE

INTRODUCTION

Name. The book of Numbers is but part of a larger whole, the Pentateuch (see pp. 134f.). The title, Numbers, is a translation of the Latin, Numeri, which was in turn a translation from the Greek, Arithmoi. These terms served as titles for the book in the Vulgate and the LXX respectively. The title is appropriate for the first few chapters, but inappropriate for the book as a whole. Far more suitable is the simple, "In the Wilderness" (1¹), by which the book is popularly known to the Jews.

As a matter of fact, the book itself is almost a wilderness in the variety of its contents and the lack of any order in the arrangement of these contents. While this disturbs a Western reader, it must be remembered that the book is essentially an Eastern book in language, ideas, and atmosphere, and that the Eastern mind has moods and methods all its own.

Significance. To be properly appreciated the book must be read as it is and for what it is, namely, a miscellaneous collection of lists, laws, itineraries, and traditions, which later Israel had gathered up and preserved as part of its heritage of a past too distant to be distinct but too vital to be forgotten.

While some of these materials would be of interest for their own sake, a large part of them served mainly as a foundation on which to base the religious beliefs of a later time. It is this use that has preserved them. The book is not an ancient one, comparatively speaking, or one that comes from a time even approximating the date of the events it describes. As compared with many other O.T. writings it is a late book, and was designed to set forth and to confirm the religious ideas which the writers regarded as of paramount importance.

Date and Composition. The analysis of the book into its literary elements, and the assignment of those elements to their relative and approximate dates, is a process that has extended over many years; but it has been done so thoroughly and so convincingly that its literary character is clear beyond all reasonable doubt. The priestly writers living in the Exile and after prepared a document (P) which consisted almost exclusively of legal and ritualistic matter. For them, this document represented the last word in religious authority.

They possessed other documents, however, older than their own (J and E), from which they made selections for insertion in P. It is because these selected materials were usually not rewritten but incorporated bodily that it is possible even at this late day to distinguish them from the P document in which they are now found. Although it is convenient to speak of P as though it were a single homogeneous work, it is really composite, representing the work of a school rather than of a single individual, and uniting within itself strata of different dates and backgrounds. In the following notes these will be indicated where it seems necessary. (For a more detailed discussion of the composition of the Pentateuch and its permanent significance see article on The Pentateuch, pp. 134f.).

Literature: Kennedy, Numbers (Century Bible); Gray, Numbers (International Critical Commentary); Kent, Beginnings of Hebrew History (Student's Old Testament); George Adam Smith, Historical Geography of the Holy Land; Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible; Cheyne and Black, Encyclopedia Biblica.

CHAPTERS 1¹ TO 10¹⁰: BEFORE MOUNT SINAI

The book falls naturally into three parts: (1) 1¹–10¹⁰, Before Mount Sinai; (2) 10¹¹–20¹³, From Mount Sinai to Kadesh; (3) 20¹⁴–36¹³, From Kadesh to the Plains of Moab. The first section, taken from P, gives in considerable detail an account of the arrangements immediately preceding the journeyings through the wilderness.

CHAPTER I

I–4. Census of the Men of War Ordered. V. 1 locates the events about to be narrated as in the wilderness of Sinai, and gives the time as, the first day of the second month in the second year after leaving Egypt. The definiteness of both statements gives an impression of great accuracy characteristic of the whole section. But the wilderness referred to was a large place, so that the expression leaves the exact location of the camp quite problematical. It may also be questioned whether a calendar was so carefully preserved that the writer in Babylon, five hundred years afterward, could give the exact day of these events; but cf. note on ch. 2. The census was designed to establish the fighting strength of the whole people; but the author does not tell of any special use that was made of this enumeration, and it can only be conjectured that it represents his thought of a glorious army appropriate to the importance of a triumphant nation.

5-19. Heads of the Tribes. There are many variations in the way the tribes are listed. The lists do not always contain the same names, nor do they give the same order of names. Levi, for instance, is sometimes included and sometimes omitted, so that the total number, twelve, is attained in very different ways. The differences are so striking that it almost seems that the number twelve represents an ideal into which the names of the tribes were fitted more or less arbitrarily. (A convenient tabular view of the various lists may be found in Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible, vol. iv., p. 811.)

20-46. The Census. Note the formula used for each tribe, repeated with mechanical regularity. The grand total of 603,550 is impressive.

47-54. The Levites. Although the census is completed, it is only now explained why the Levites were not counted. A Western writer would have placed this instruction before, rather than after, the census.

CHAPTER II

The Disposition of the General Encampment. The tribes are given their places with reference to the tabernacle, which holds the central place of honor and security. Four tribes are placed east of the tabernacle; four, south; four, west; and four, north; with the tribe of Levi next to the tabernacle itself (v. 17). The disposition of Levi, however, is not clear (cf. 10¹⁷⁻²¹).

When it is remembered that the writers of these chapters were remote in both time and place from the events they record, and that the history of Palestine and its people during the intervening centuries makes the preparation and preservation of such detailed records so difficult as to be almost impossible, it will be recognized that the writers act, so to speak, "by faith, not by sight"; the pictures here painted of those ancient times are ideals, clear enough in the minds of the writers, but hardly to be interpreted as historical records in the modern sense of that term.

The numbers given in the census are an illustration of this principle. Modern vital statistics show that 600,000 men twenty years old or more imply a population of more than 2,000,000; whereas in the days of the monarchy the maximum population of the Northern and Southern Kingdoms did not exceed 1,000,000. A comparison of the numbers with each other gives the surprising result that there would have to be an average of fifty children to a family; and yet, on the basis of the number of first born, only one woman out of fourteen or fifteen would be a mother (cf. Gray, Numbers, pp. 10-15). How the numbers are to be accounted for cannot now be discovered. Presumably the writer had some basis for his statements, but what this basis was, and the principle according to which he built upon it, are subjects upon which there is no existing information. The fact that the Hebrew letters of Bene Yisrael (children of Israel) when used numerically give 603, may have something to do with it, yet this may be only a coincidence.

A similar difficulty attends the arrangement of the camp. The mountains and wadies of Sinai have no room for such an arrangement of such a multitude. All existing evidence goes to show that the country in which all these events are located is substantially the same now as it was then, and it is clear that whatever happened must have fitted the conditions of the country. But the testimony of those most familiar with the physical conditions in that part of the world makes it difficult to believe that such a multitude could have been accommodated. It is well, however, to remember that the real significance lies not in the numbers or the exact arrangement of the tribes, but in the idea which the author seeks to express in this concrete fashion—the sanctifying presence of God in the midst of Israel. Moreover, the Divine Presence must be guarded against sacrilegious approach; hence the "holy" priestly tribe of Levi is placed between the sanctuary and the other tribes; and the "most holy" portion, the sons of Aaron, are appointed to guard the entrance to the tent on the east.

CHAPTERS III, IV

The Levites, Their Number and Their Duties. For the priestly writers this subject was of great importance. They held that there existed from the days of Moses a distinction between priests and Levites, in which the priests, though coming from the tribe of Levi, belonged to special families within that tribe, and were definitely superior to the other Levites (3¹⁰, stranger, includes the non-priestly Levites). These other Levites, however, were ritually superior to non-Levites, and not only were they especially assigned to the care of the tabernacle, but they were so placed, in the encampment and on the march, that they acted as a kind of protective guard of honor for the sacred shrine. The author returns to this subject in 85-26 and 181-7. The passage includes more than one view of the status of the Levites: they are a gift to Aaron and his sons (39); they are substitutes for the first born who otherwise should have been offered to Jehovah. As the Levites, however, numbered only 22,000 (339), and the first-born males of Israel came to 22,273 (343), the extra 273 were redeemed by a money payment (346-48). The totals in 322, 28, 34 amount to 22,300 instead of 22,000 as given in v. 39. It has been suggested that in v. 28 the word "six" was originally three. The spelling of these two words in Hebrew makes this mistake easy.

CHAPTERS 5 AND 6: MISCELLANEOUS LAWS

CHAPTER V

1-4. Keeping the Camp Ceremonially Clean. This was to be done by the simple method of expelling the three classes of people concerned (v. 2).

5-10. Restitution for Guilt. The instructions cover the case of a breach of trust, but it should be noted that a sin against a man is also a trespass against the Lord. 8. The instruction here supplements Lev. 61-7 (see notes).

11-31. The Case of a Wife Suspected of Infidelity. The essence of this procedure is the test called ordeal, in which a suspected person is compelled to subject himself to some peril which, if he is innocent, will not harm him, but which, if he is guilty, will cause him injury and perhaps death. While this is the only instance in the Bible, the custom is widespread, and familiar to all readers of history. As here described it moves in a world of magic which to-day seems far removed from true religion, but which always has been closely connected with the earlier stages of religious development. 17. Holy water—an expression occurring here only and which, perhaps, should be living water, as in LXX. Back of the custom is the conviction that nothing can be hidden from the Deity.

CHAPTER VI

1-21. The Vow of the Nazirite. The vow is taken for a limited length of time decided upon by the man who takes the vow; but the period determined upon must be religiously kept. The case of Samson (Judg. 137) is the only clear one of a lifelong vow of this kind, though it is possible that Samuel also is to be regarded as a lifelong Nazirite. There are three requirements (vv. 1-8): (1) The idea of the sacred quality and function of the hair is not peculiar to the Hebrews. (2) Abstinence from any product of the vine is a symbolic assertion of loyalty to Jehovah the God of the desert as opposed to the baals of the cultivated land (cf. the Rechabites, Jer. 35). (3) The avoidance of defilement from a dead body connects with Lev. 21¹¹, where this requirement is specified for the high priest; and the supposition is near at hand that the Nazirites are to be regarded as a type of temporary lay priesthood. Vv. 9-12 make provision for an involuntary breach of the third requirement; and vv. 13-21 set forth the formal release from the conditions of the vow when the period is completed.

22-27. The Priestly Blessing. There could be no better illustration of the promiscuous character of this document P than the occurrence of this beautiful benediction in the midst of the mechanical details of the vows and offerings. The blessing itself, vv. 24-26, consists of three lines, of which the first contains three (Hebrew) words; the second, five; and the third, seven; while each line falls into two parts. V. 27 is an illuminating example of the way the name of God has a much wider significance than an English reader would give it. God is what his Spirit is; his name is his character. And his name is upon those who find in him their blessing, their joy, and their peace (cf. Mt. 28¹⁹ Acts 36, 16 19¹³).

CHAPTER VII

Offerings Made by the Heads of the Tribes. (Ch. 7 has the distinction of being the longest chapter in the Bible.) On twelve successive days the heads of the tribes already named (see chs. 1, 2) bring their offerings for their respective tribes. The wagons seem out of place in view of ch. 4, which specifies the Levites as the carriers of the tabernacle and its furniture. The mechanical twelve-fold repetition of the formula describing the offerings is a literary characteristic of the P writers. V. 89 is a fragment having no connection with what precedes or follows. It tells how Jehovah used to speak with Moses and is an echo of Ex. 25²².

CHAPTER VIII

1-4. The Golden Candlestick. The description of the candlestick is substantially a repetition of Ex. 25³⁷.

5-22. Purification and Presentation of the Levites. The manner and significance of the sanctification of the Levites are described in these verses (cf. chs. 3, 4). Proper offerings are specified, the children of Israel lay their hands upon the Levites, and then the Levites are presented before Jehovah at the tent of meeting as a wave offering (Lev. 8²⁷, notes). Just how the writer supposed these acts to be carried out is not stated. There is no hint that they are to be delegated or that they are symbolic; yet there is something almost grotesque in the thought of the whole congregation laying hands on the Levites, and of the Levites being waved in any literal sense. The writer was much more interested in the fact that the Levites were properly sanctified and that they were unmistakably set apart from the other Israelites than he was with any diagram of how the various steps were actually to be worked out. This indifference to exact facts and possibilities is of a piece with the freedom which in chs. 1 and 2 dealt in big numbers and vast territory. It is possible here as there because both the writer and his readers are removed from the conditions of a past so distant and irrecoverable.

23-26. Age of Levitical Service. This paragraph extends the period of service in both directions beyond that given in 4³. Here it begins at the age of twenty-five years instead of thirty; and while active service ceases at the age of fifty, as in 4³, voluntary service after that age is provided for.

CHAPTER IX

1-14. The Second Passover. A second Passover is provided for those who, by reason of uncleanness or of being on a journey, were unable to participate in the regular one. The fact that the provision grows out of an actual emergency is interesting in its reflection of the probable origin of many of these requirements, namely, that arrangements made to meet a special case developed into a formal law. Strangers may also keep the Passover. For an occasion when this provision was actually taken advantage of, see the account of Hezekiah's action in 2 Chr. 30.

15-23. The Cloud of Fire. The cloud over the tabernacle gives the sign for camping or marching. When it is taken up, the people continue their journey. When it abides, they encamp. Vv. 19-23 enlarge the statement of v. 18. On the cloud, cf. Ex. 40³⁴⁻³⁸, notes.

CHAPTER X

1-10. The Silver Trumpets. Signals are arranged for, to be sounded on silver trumpets. These are not to be confused with the shophar, a ram's or cow's horn, also called "trumpet" in R.V. (e.g., Lev. 25⁹). The calling of the congregation and the signal to march are obviously suitable to the desert situation; but

vv. 9 and 10 imply the days of settlement in Canaan. The shape and approximate size of these trumpets are known from the triumphal Arch of Titus still standing in Rome, on which are portrayed some of the sacred spoils Titus brought back from Jerusalem.

This closes the first part of the book, the division at this point being justified by the fact that thus far the people are located at Sinai and have not started from there on their way to the promised land. All that has occurred up to this point is thought of by the writer as preliminary to the forward march. The book of Numbers may thus be regarded as a continuation of the book of Exodus, Leviticus constituting a kind of grand parenthesis dealing specifically and exclusively with matters of ritual. Ex. 19-24 had brought the people to Sinai, and the remainder of the book, chs. 25-40, had taken up in great detail the setting up of the tabernacle. With the final arrangements as laid down in Num. 11-10¹⁰ the people are ready to proceed. At least, this is the view of the writers of P, who nevertheless did not hesitate to interrupt the story for the insertion of various legal passages dealing with matters which, to a Western mind, are wholly irrelevant to the narrative.

CHAPTERS 10¹¹ TO 13¹³: FROM MOUNT SINAI TO KADESH

The P documents which make up the first part of the book are here continued, but this second part contains also passages from JE. This involves some duplication in the narratives as well as some differences in the points of view of the stories themselves. The most interesting aspect of the section is its brevity. It purports to cover nearly the whole period of the forty years spent in the wilderness, and in view of the place given in later thought to this forty-year period, it might be expected that there would be a fairly rich supply of traditions concerning what had happened during that time; but such traditions are lacking. Practically all are given in this short section, while the few that are preserved deal chiefly with sins or outbreaks of some kind which call for condemnation and punishment. In the literary analysis of the section there is general agreement on the parts belonging to P, as there is also general agreement on the fact that the parts not belonging to P represent at least two other sources, J and E. The sources J and E, however, have so many traits in common that, while there is no doubt that the two are present, it is extremely difficult in some cases to make a satisfactory separation between them.

11-28. Departure From Sinai. The people set forward in obedience to the rising of the cloud which had been resting on the tabernacle. Instead of being "in the midst of the camps" (21⁷) the Levites are here arranged in two groups (vv. 17, 21), so that those who carried the tabernacle proper could have it set up and ready to receive the sanctuary, namely, the most sacred articles, 33¹; cf. 41⁵, mg. The wilderness of Paran, the scene of the following events, is here named in anticipation of the completion of this stage of the journey. The term is as vague as the wilderness of Sinai mentioned here and in 1¹, and the location can be identified only in a very general way. It lay west of the continuation of the Jordan Valley, which extends south from the Dead Sea to the Gulf of Akabah, and perhaps some fifty to seventy-five miles south of Beersheba (see art., Land of Palestine, p. 56). It is in this wilderness that Kadesh is located—the most important stopping-place, after Sinai, of the whole forty years; see below on 13²⁶.

29-36. Leaving the Mountain of Jehovah. Moses urges his father-in-law to accompany them, as one who knew the country (on Reuel see Ex. 21⁸⁻²², and cf. Ex. 31 18¹, 2, notes). Judg. 11⁶ indicates that he consented, although the present fragment from J breaks off without giving an answer. 33. The second three days is probably recopied by accident from the first. The idea that the ark got so far ahead of the people is contradicted by every other reference, to say nothing of the impossibility of such a plan. 35, 36. A fragment of ark ritual. The ark represents Jehovah. Where the ark is, Jehovah is. So that an address to the ark is an address to Jehovah. This fragment gives the formulas used when the ark was taken out to battle, and when it was brought back (in triumph). It is quoted here as suitable for the desert wanderings. (Cf. Psa. 68¹, 2.)

CHAPTER XI

1-3. Destruction of Murmurers at Taberah. The place is called "Burning" (Hebrew, Tabherah). It is not always easy to decide, in the numerous cases of this kind which occur in the O.T., whether the name of the place originated in the event or whether the story of the event grew out of the name itself. It is a well-known fact that names of places may be very ancient, while successive settlers explain the origin of the name in different ways. Undoubtedly, however, such an event as described here would easily justify a significant name. (Cf. 17¹⁻⁷ Gen. 20²²⁻³⁴ 26¹⁸⁻²².)

4-35. Incidents on the Way. The place is called "Gluttons' Graves" (Hebrew, Kibhroth- Hattaawah). In this passage there are evidently combined parts of various stories. There are the accounts of the manna and of the quails already given in Ex. 16 (see notes there); a fragment of one of the complaints Moses made to Jehovah (vv. 11, 12, 14, 15); the bestowal of the spirit of prophecy on the seventy elders and on the two who remained in the camp; and finally the explanation of the name of the place where all these events occurred. The manna as described in this connection had much in common with a sugary sap that in June and July exudes from a kind of tamarisk growing in the Sinaitic peninsula. It is possible that this natural product may form the basis of the account which regards this food supply as provided miraculously. The word "manna" is popularly represented (Ex. 16¹⁵, mg., notes) as the excited exclamation of the people the first time they saw it. The supply of quails, represented (vv. 31^f.) as a miraculous event on a large scale, is still an annual occurrence when these birds of passage, able to fly only with the wind, cross parts of southern Palestine in their migrations, and are captured in large numbers by the natives (cf. the flight of the pigeons in Cooper, The Pioneers, ch. 22). In the limited space available here it is not possible to furnish a detailed discussion of these incidents; for further comments see notes on Ex. 16 and larger commentaries. Vv. 11, 12, 14, 15 have such a loose connection with their context that they are now generally regarded as belonging elsewhere. It has been suggested that they would fit very appropriately after Ex. 33³. At any rate their spirit and content suit that context better than this.

The spirit of prophecy referred to seems to be the ecstatic kind illustrated in 1 Sam. 10⁵. The line of prophets, and the corresponding conceptions of prophecy, ran through many grades from the earlier ecstatic type to the deeply spiritual type represented in Isaiah and Jeremiah. The primitive, ecstatic, mechanical conception of prophecy, however, is no farther removed from the later spiritual view than the conception of deity represented in vv. 1 and 33 is remote from the thought of God in, say, Psa. 139 or the teachings of Jesus. (See arts., The Prophetic Literature, p. 150, and The O.T. Conception of God, pp. 158.) The conceptions of deity and of prophecy both moved gradually from the mechanical and local toward the spiritual and universal. If the marginal reading of v. 28 (from his youth) is correct the statement would be more appropriate at a time near the close of the wilderness period than near the beginning, as here. For v. 34 cf. note on vv. 1-3.

CHAPTER XII

Moses vs. Aaron and Miriam. Another combination of different accounts. Are Aaron and Miriam jealous of Moses on account of his marriage (v. 1) or on account of his supreme place as revealer of God's will? (V. 2.) Were both Aaron and Miriam involved? If so, why was Miriam the only one to be punished? (V. 10.) A final answer to these questions cannot be given and, perhaps, is not necessary. More interesting and more important is the position ascribed to Moses. V. 3 is the basis for the familiar proverb, "As meek as Moses." As a matter of fact, everything that is said of Moses elsewhere represents him as anything but meek in the commonly accepted meaning of the term. It is rather suggestive that this single isolated statement should have been allowed to outweigh every other reference bearing on the subject. V. 4 indicates the E document in its location of the sacred tent outside the camp. Vv. 6-8 fall into poetical form and might be paraphrased as follows:

"Listen to me!

If there be a prophet of Jehovah among you,
In a vision do I make myself known to him,
In a dream do I speak to him.
Not so is my servant Moses:
In all my affairs he is fully trusted,
By word of mouth do I speak with him,
Straightforwardly and not in mystic enigmas;
Jehovah's very form doth he behold.
Why then do you not fear to speak Against my servant, against Moses?"

This view of a prophet evidently implies a very different conception of prophecy from that of 11²⁵.

In spite of Aaron's claim in v. 2 to be equal with Moses, he does not have the courage to go straight to Jehovah with his complaint, but turns instinctively to Moses to act as intercessor. Why Aaron himself was not also stricken is not clear. According to vv. 1 and 5 he was as guilty as Miriam. The freedom of this conversation between Moses and Jehovah (vv. 13f.) confirms v. 8. The whole chapter is a striking illustration of the place of Moses in later thought. He was regarded as unique in his authority over his fellows. This authority the author regards as continuing down to his own day. Hazereth is presumably the stopping place in the wilderness of Paran, into which the Hebrews had already come in 10¹².

CHAPTERS 13 AND 14: THE SPIES, THEIR REPORT, AND ITS CONSEQUENCES

In a comparatively short time (according to P's chronology, less than two years) the Hebrews had made a triumphant escape from Egypt, had received from Jehovah elaborate instructions for their future conduct, had been promised a definite home in a fruitful land, and now with the beginning of ch. 13 are at the threshold of that land ready to enter and take possession. What stopped them? No wonder that the answer to this question perplexed later writers. It was hard to understand why the steady progress that had been made up to this point should suddenly be blocked so that the promised land was not entered till a generation—forty years—afterward. There must have been some reason; and the JE and P writers fixed upon the episode of the spies as the turning point. It is entirely reasonable that spies should be sent ahead in preparation for so momentous an advance, and equally reasonable to suppose that their report would have a decisive influence on the next step to be taken. There were different traditions of just how the crisis occurred, and these two chapters show clear evidence of being made up of different and sometimes diverging accounts. The spies start from the wilderness of Paran, 13³, 26a; or they start from Kadesh, v. 26b. They traverse the land to the extreme north, Hamath, v. 21; or only as far as Hebron, v. 22. The majority of the spies report a land of famine and starvation, v. 32; or they report a land of fertility, v. 27. Caleb dissents, v. 30; or Joshua and Caleb dissent, 14⁶⁻¹⁰. These facts along with others have led to many attempts to analyze the passage into its constituent literary elements. There is close agreement on the parts assigned to P; and if one would take the trouble to draw a line with a colored pencil around these parts, he would see clearly what a complete and consistent narrative they give. They are: 13¹⁻¹⁷ (to Canaan), 21, 25, 26 (to Paran), 32 (to thereof); 14¹ (to voice), 2, 5-7, 10, 26, 29, 34, 38. The parts omitted would be found to contain duplicate statements and other phenomena indicating a composite character, but it is not easy to make a satisfactory separation. They are assigned to J and E and may have been abbreviated in the interest of the P version. Connecting statements have been made here and there by the compiler in order to make his narrative more continuous. In addition to these three accounts there is still another in Deut. 1¹⁹⁻⁴⁶ (see notes there).

According to P, what happened was as follows: From Paran Moses sends twelve spies, one for each tribe, Joshua and Caleb representing the tribes of Ephraim and Judah respectively. They travel through the land going as far north as Hamath (!) and in forty days they return. Ten of them bring back such an unfavorable account of the land that the people begin to complain to Moses and Aaron. Joshua and Caleb seek in vain to quiet them. The people are about to stone Moses and Aaron when the glory of Jehovah appears. Jehovah then announces to Moses and Aaron that the people shall be punished by being compelled to remain in the wilderness forty years, a year for each day of the spies' journey, until all the men twenty years old or more (except Caleb and Joshua) should die. The ten spies who brought the unfavorable report die on the spot. The two chief factors in the reports of both P and JE deal with the fertility (or sterility) of the land, and the size and strength of the inhabitants. On the former point there is contradiction. On the latter there is agreement; but the majority regard the inhabitants as too strong to be conquered, while the minority say it can be done with the aid of Jehovah. One who has made the journey from the barren desolation south of Beersheba up to Hebron can appreciate the enthusiasm of the favorable report; for even to-day in contrast to its surroundings Hebron is a jewel of verdure with its fields and trees, and above all its springs of water. (See art., Land of Palestine, p. 56.)

CHAPTER XIII

The Spies Sent Out; Their Report. The Wilderness of Paran (v. 3), according to the view of P, lies south of wilderness of Zin (v.21). By the South (vv. 17, 22), literally, into the Negeb, a word referring to the dry country extending from Hebron to Kadesh. 21. The wilderness of Zin, in P's view, lies north of the wilderness of Paran. Kadesh lies here, and would be included in the territory the spies were sent to survey. In JE Kadesh has already been occupied and the spies start from there. Rehob, far in the north, at the foot of Mount Hermon. Hamath, an important city one hundred and fifty miles north of Rehob. The entering in probably refers to a mountain pass between Hermon and the Lebanon through which one entered from the south into the territory controlled by Hamath. 28. Children of Anak, or Anakim, a people who lived in the vicinity of Hebron, always referred to as people unusually large. 26. Kadesh—also called Kadesh-barnea. This has been identified with a place about fifty miles south of Beersheba which bears almost the same name to-day, Ain Kadis. Whether this identification be correct or not, Kadesh must have been not far from that general locality. The name indicates a sacred place, and as it bore this name before the Hebrews arrived it was evidently so regarded by the earlier inhabitants, just as Mecca was a sacred place before the time of Mohammed. It was the headquarters for the Hebrews during the thirty-eight years of the wilderness period, which is not to be thought of as a time of constant motion but (if one might be allowed the expression) of a kind of nomadic settlement, as Bedouins to-day confine themselves to a fairly well defined territory. It is the scene of a number of important events described in the following chapters and stands out as the most conspicuous and significant place of encampment during the desert period after the departure from Sinai. 29. Amalek: the Amalekites were a tribe living on the edge of the desert. They were still dangerous as late as the days of David (1 Sam. 30¹). The Hittites had their chief seat in Asia Minor but many had settled in Palestine (see Gen. 23¹⁰ 26³⁴). The Jebusites lived in the neighborhood of Jerusalem (cf. 2 Sam. 5⁶). Amorite and Canaanite are terms used in the sense suggested by the latter, that is, dwellers in Canaan; although at an earlier time the Amorites were farther north than the Canaanites.

CHAPTER XIV

The People's Rebellion; Jehovah's Threat; Moses' Intercession. The pathos and power of the scene described in vv. 11-25 are not diminished by the similar scenes in Ex. 32⁹⁻¹⁴, 30-35 34⁶⁻⁹. One cannot read unmoved the description of a leader as great as Moses, who not only champions the cause of Deity in the face of a shortsighted, thankless, turbulent people, but who is at the same time so devoted to his people that he casts in his lot with them whatever happens. There can be no doubt of the splendor and heroism which these writers saw in this great leader. This Moses of their ideals was so great that he not only dared to take Jehovah to task but actually prevailed in the argument. Yet this same Moses is willing to throw himself away if that will preserve the life of his people or the honor of his God. (Cf. Abraham's intercession for Sodom, Gen. 18²²⁻³³, and Paul's willingness to be anathema for his brethren's sake, Rom. 9³.)

CHAPTER XV

The accounts of events at Kadesh are interrupted by a small collection of laws supplementing items already noted.

1-16. The Amounts of Meal, Oil, and Wine That Should Be Used With Different Sacrifices. The amounts vary with the value of the animal offered. The requirement applies to the sojourner as well as to the Hebrews themselves. (See Lev. 23¹⁻⁸, notes.)

17-21. Reserving a Portion for Jehovah. A special case of an offering of first fruits. (See Lev. 23⁹⁻¹⁴, notes.)

22-31. Propitiation for Unintentional Wrongdoing. A much simpler and probably earlier treatment of the subject than Lev. 4 (notes). The law provides for unintentional breaches, but makes no provision for one who breaks it willfully, "with a high hand." Such a culprit is cut off from his people. It cannot be said definitely whether this means death or expulsion from the tribe; although in a country of nomads the latter might easily lead to the former. (See Lev. 7^{20, 21}, notes.)

32-36. The Sabbath-Breaker. Breach of the Sabbath punished with death. Cf. 9¹⁻¹⁴, note.

37-41. Fringes. Tassels (mg.) at each of the four corners of the outer garment attached with a blue cord are to serve as reminders of religious obligations (cf. art. "Fringes," in Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible, vol. ii).

CHAPTER XVI

The Authority of Moses and Aaron Challenged by Korah, Dathan and Abiram. (On also is named in v. 1 but is not mentioned again.) The analysis of the chapter is best begun by collecting the sections dealing with Dathan and Abiram. These are: v. 1b (from Dathan) to v. 2a (to Moses), vv. 12-25, vv. 25, 26, v. 27b (from and Dathan) to v. 32a (to households), and vv. 33, 34. These sections taken together make an almost complete story, continuous and consistent, yet entirely omitting Korah and his company. (The apparent exceptions, vv. 24b, 32b, are noted below.) These sections are generally assigned to JE. When they are set off by themselves it is seen that what remains, constituting the larger part of the chapter, deals with Korah and omits all reference to Dathan and Abiram. This separation of the two groups of passages is not an arbitrary separation based solely on an accident of names, but is confirmed by the way the two parties are always dealt with separately. When Moses is dealing with one no reference is made to the other. They come to different ends, Dathan and Abiram being swallowed up when the earth miraculously opens and engulfs them, while Korah and his company are burned up by fire from Jehovah.

The separation is further confirmed by the fact that Num. 27³ refers to Korah only, while Deut. 11⁶ refers to Dathan and Abiram only. The Korah sections are assigned to P. But these Korah sections are concerned with two different themes: (a) Korah with two hundred and fifty non-Levites denying the ritualistic superiority of the tribe of Levi; and (b) a struggle within the tribe of Levi itself in which the Levites challenge the exclusive priesthood of Aaron. These two themes are so different that they justify a further analysis of the chapter. The sections dealing with Korah and his two hundred and fifty non-Levites, princes of the congregation, men of renown, are: v. 1a (Now Korah), v. 2b (from with certain), to and including v. 7 (omitting from v. 6, Korah and all his company; and from v. 7, Ye take too much upon you, ye sons of Levi; on which see below), vv. 18-24 (to tabernacle), v. 27a (to tabernacle), and vv. 41-50. These sections, like the Dathan and Abiram sections, make a continuous, consistent, and complete story.

When these sections are set off by themselves, along with the JE sections, there remain two groups of passages: (1) the genealogy of Korah in v. 1, which connects him with Levi; vv. 8-11, 16, 17, and 36-40. These passages set forth the theme (b) mentioned above. (2) Phrases and clauses now seem to be designed to connect and harmonize the larger sections. They are: the two items in vv. 6 and 7 already noted; the combination of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram at the end of v. 24 and in the middle of v. 27; and the addition of Korah at the end of v. 32. These fragments are at such variance with their setting that they are best regarded as the work of a late editor who attempted (but failed) to make the chapter consistent. The group of passages which sets forth the (b) theme has so many characteristics of P that it is regarded as a secondary and later stratum of the basic P document which told about Korah and the two hundred and fifty.

There can be no doubt that the three narratives now combined in this chapter reflect actual situations. The criticisms made of Moses in the JE story are only too probable. Obviously, he had failed so far to bring the people into the promised land (v. 14); and it is easy to understand that there would be jealousy of Moses' authority on the part of men who were quite ready to charge him with self-importance (v. 13b); and even with taking advantage of his position to increase his private possessions (v. 15b). This last charge was made also against Samuel (1 Sam. 12³), and is one that is easily credible in the East, to-day as well as in ancient times. JE's charge is thus political and administrative, and it calls for no great effort of imagination to reconstruct the troubles of this kind that Moses must have met not once but many times. The second situation is equally credible. Why should the tribe of Levi be considered any holier than the other tribes? Tribal jealousy prompts the question. Korah organizes a representative committee of inquiry and challenges Moses as the representative of the favored tribe. The third situation is quite credible but not as a situation arising in the days of Moses. Down to the period of the Exile all Levites, as far as family relationships were concerned, were eligible to the priesthood. Not until after that was a distinction made within the tribe in favor of the descendants of Aaron—an innovation that could hardly have been established without jealousies and conflicts. The P document in its final form is quite late enough to reflect such disturbances. (Cf. art., "Priests and Levites," Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible, vol. iv.) Even the ghastly punishments meted out to the offenders are credible to those who hold the primitive view of Deity characteristic of the early pre-Christian teaching.

CHAPTER XVII

Jehovah's Choice of the Tribe of Levi Confirmed. This chapter reports the miraculous confirmation of the divine choice of the tribe of Levi (vv. 1-11); following appropriately on the preceding account of tribal jealousy. Vv. 12f. express a natural fear in view of the events just recounted.

CHAPTER XVIII

1-7. Duties of Levi. Closely parallel to 35-10 but with more detailed directions for the priesthood. Bear the iniquity (v. 1), or, better, guilt, means to take the responsibility of preserving the ritual requirement and to bear the consequences if that requirement be not met. The principle is part and parcel of the primitive conception of holiness, according to which holiness is a dynamic force almost physical and mechanical in its nature. Like electricity it can, and does, discharge itself or "strike" one who, unaware or unprepared, approaches a "holy" object. Ritual preparation serves as a kind of insulation rendering the persons involved immune from this otherwise fatal force. In this passage the priests are thus qualified to serve in the holiest (most powerful and fatal) part of the sacred tent and to handle the holiest (most dangerous) objects belonging there. The Levites are qualified to serve in matters that lie between the priesthood and the laity, especially in the handling and the protection of the sacred tent. As long as these instructions are obeyed, and unqualified persons avoid these dangerous contacts, there will be wrath no more upon the children of Israel (v. 5b). It hardly needs to be stated that this conception of holiness was destined to move on to one more deeply spiritual just as the conception of prophecy did (cf. note on 1125). Stranger (v. 7) is anyone not a priest, even though he be a Levite (cf. 310).

8-20. Provision for the Support of the Priests. The priestly revenues ran a course closely parallel to the increasing importance held by the priesthood in Israel. Such instances as Judg. 17¹⁰ and 1 Sam. 213^f. suggest that it was optional with the worshiper how much he should give the priest. From this point on there is a steady increase in the amounts up to and even beyond the generous allowance granted here. The present passage belongs to P and represents post-exilic regulations. By reason of the anointing (v. 8)—read as in mg. Corn (v. 12)—not, of course, Indian corn or maize, but grain, wheat. Devoted (v. 14)—set apart for the Deity. The custom, frequently mentioned in O.T., is ancient and not peculiar to the Hebrews. As observed in Israel it became a method of converting to the service of Jehovah persons or objects regarded as opposed to him. In practice this meant either seclusion or destruction of the devoted thing. Precious objects gained by conquest or offered in worship could be secluded, set apart, by being taken to the sacred tent (later, to the Temple), there to become "holy," i.e., the exclusive possession of Jehovah. Cities and populations, however, could hardly be thus set apart, so they were destroyed, rendered incapable of further opposition to Jehovah. The term is thus seen to apply to anything specially vowed to Jehovah, whether the vow is made officially by priests and leaders, or privately by individuals. (See notes on Lev. 27²¹ Josh. 7—Achan; Judg. 1129-40—Jephthah's daughter; 1 Sam. 15—Samuel and Amalek; Mk. 711—Corban.) Here the reference is obviously to things that could be used profitably by the priests. A money payment (v. 15) is arranged as a substitute for the first-born. Covenant of salt (v. 19)—an enduring covenant of fellowship, growing out of the ancient custom that united those who ate together; the sharing of food is the sharing of life (see art., Bible Manners and Customs, p. 74b).

21-24. The Dues of the Levites. The Levites shall receive tithes from the people as compensation for their special service and because they are to have no (territorial) inheritance of their own.

25-32. Tithes Paid by the Levites. The Levites are not exempt from the payment of tithes to the priests. Having no inheritance where they might raise crops of their own, they must give tithes of their tithes. The whole chapter belongs to P.

CHAPTER XIX

1-10. The Ritual of the Red Heifer. Although this chapter belongs to P, its subject is recognized as a most ancient one. Students of primitive religions are familiar with the almost universal feeling that one is defiled by contact with the dead. This defilement requires some method of purification. The present chapter sets forth a ritual so strange, so suggestive of a world of pure magic, that it has so far defied all attempts to account for its presence in the Hebrew legislation or to relate it satisfactorily to the religion of Jehovah.

1-6. Heifer—all other offerings of animals were of males. The priest has surprisingly little to do with the whole ceremony. Without the camp and away from the altar, where an offering to Jehovah would be made. Toward the front of the tent locates the place as east of, and at a distance from, the tent. Later discussions specified the size and amount of cedar, hyssop, and scarlet cloth. The ashes of these ingredients were as important as those of the heifer. (Cf. the notes on the ritual for cleansing from leprosy, Lev. 14, and for the day of atonement, Lev. 16.)

7-9. All persons concerned with the preparation of the ashes were rendered unclean and had to purify themselves after the operation.

11-22. Purification From Contact With the Dead. See the notes on similar legislation in Lev. 21¹⁻⁴, 10, 11. The ashes put into living (running, v. 17) water made a mixture which, when sprinkled on the persons concerned, purified them from the defilement caused by contact with the dead.

CHAPTER XX

1-13. Water From the Rock. V. 1 contains three brief preliminary statements: (a) place; (b) time; (c) death and burial of Miriam. The statement of time omits the year which, according to P, would be the fortieth, while according to JE the Hebrews reached Kadesh soon after leaving Horeb-Sinai (133. 23, notes). In the desert one's first and greatest need is water, and it would be strange if the traditions of the wilderness, however few, should not include tales of thirst. At least three of these are preserved in Ex. 15²²⁻²⁶ 17¹⁻⁷, and the present passage. This one in Numbers and the one in Ex. 17 are closely parallel, and it may be this close similarity that led later rabbis to the curious conclusion that the rock at Rephidim (Ex. 17) and the rock at Kadesh

(Num. 20) were one and the same rock, and that in some miraculous way it had followed the Hebrews from Rephidim to Kadesh (cf. 1 Cor. 10⁴). The rod (v. 8) is apparently thought of as the special rod which Moses had used in Egypt in the time of the plagues. The account is vague as to the sin of Moses and Aaron which prevented them from entering the promised land. It may be that they associated themselves too intimately with Jehovah (we, in v. 10) and thus detracted from the divine glory. Or it may be that in some passage now lacking they had addressed directly to Jehovah their doubt that water could be thus supplied. This latter view would find confirmation in the reference to Moses and Aaron as rebels in v. 24 and in 27¹⁴. In this case the rebels in v. 10 would be Moses and Aaron, instead of the people, as the verse reads now. Meribah (v. 13)—another place name (cf. on 11¹⁻³).

CHAPTERS 20¹⁴ TO 36¹³: FROM KADESH TO THE PLAINS OF MOAB

The same kind of literary variety is found in this part of the book as in the two other parts. From 20¹⁴ to 25⁵, J and E predominate; from there to the end of the book the material is practically all from P. With 20¹⁴ the departure from Kadesh has begun. The story then advances rapidly to the end of ch. 21, which finds the Hebrews encamped on the plains of Moab at a point opposite Jericho. This is as far as the book of Numbers takes them. Chs. 22-24 are occupied with the account of Balaam; and from there to the end of the book there are a miscellaneous succession of experiences in the land of Moab, a group of laws, an itinerary of the complete journey from Egypt to the Jordan, and instructions preparatory to the advance into Canaan. The time covered is less than a year, and that year is the fortieth after leaving Egypt. According to 33³⁸, Aaron died in the fifth month of the fortieth year. After his death the people mourned for him thirty days (20²⁹), so that not more than six months remain for all that follows.

The geographical disposition of the journey is clear in its large outlines, but perplexing in many of its details. Having failed to effect an entrance into Canaan from the south, the people move eastward around the southern end of the Dead Sea and then northward into the territory of Moab, whence the land of Canaan can be approached from the east. The chief perplexities of the route arise in connection with the intermediate stations between Kadesh and Moab. The most explicit itinerary (E) takes the people south from Kadesh as far as the Gulf of Akabah before they turn north toward Moab. This long circuit is made in order "to compass the land of Edom" (21⁴); and it is not surprising to find the people "much discouraged" (21⁴) with this roundabout journey. It is, indeed, difficult to see how it could all be compressed into the brief time of six months. P, however (33³⁷, 38), indicates the view that there was no southward move from Kadesh, but that from Kadesh the people moved east and then northeast, advancing as directly as possible toward Moab. Instead of "compassing the land of Edom" they pass its northwest corner and then turn directly north into the land of Moab. This route would harmonize better with the brief time allowed for the events in this last stage of the wilderness period. The chief difficulty in accepting this version of the story is the uncertain character of ch. 33 (see notes).

The literary and geographical questions are further complicated by the passages in Deuteronomy which refer to this period (cf. Deut. 1, 2, notes). These variant accounts have never been satisfactorily harmonized and it seems most reasonable to accept here as, indeed, throughout the Pentateuch, the existence of the different sources, each one of which tells its own story in its own way.

14-21. Israel and Edom. (JE.) The Hebrews ask permission to cross the land of Edom, but are refused. It is a little curious that no further reference is made to the tabernacle and the cloud over it as supplying signals for the advance and the halt. The events that follow are, indeed, not favorable to all that would be involved in the elaborate arrangements connected with the tabernacle; but these ancient writers are not disconcerted by such difficulties, and one can only wonder why such an important object and such an elaborate ceremony simply drop out of sight without comment. Without any indication of divine direction Moses takes matters into his own hands, and on his own responsibility sends messengers to the king of Edom.

Thy brother Israel—a relationship frequently referred to and indicating that the people of Israel felt themselves closely related as a people to the Edomites, a relationship which made enmity all the more bitter (cf. Gen. 25²⁴⁻²⁶ 36⁸ Obad. vv. 10-12). Kadesh (v. 16)—the location here is an important clue to the probable site. As the Hebrews are still west of the Arabah, the territory of Edom evidently included territory on the west as well as on the east of this great gorge. Until one has been in a desert country it is hard to appreciate the value of water. Great as the temptation would be to go through fields and vineyards and take some of the grain and fruit, it would be much greater to take a drink of water at a well or spring. How Moses or any other leader could have prevented this, or could have estimated the quantity on which to pay, is hard to tell. Evidently the king of Edom would not take the risk. The king's way (v. 17) may have been that part of the ancient trade route which passed Petra and Kerak (Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible, vol. v, p. 370). Denied permission to cross Edomite territory the Hebrews turn south in order to go around it.

22-29. Arrival at Mount Hor and Death of Aaron. (P.) Mount Hor cannot now be identified. Like Kadesh it is on the border of Edom, so that it could not be near Petra (Sela) as shown on most maps. Ye rebelled—cf. on v. 10. His garments—his robes of office (cf. Lev. 87-9). Died there (v. 28)—stated as mechanically as the exchange of priestly robes. The account is quite unconscious of the tragedy and pathos of the event it here describes. P is far more interested in the proper priestly succession than in Moses, Aaron, and Eleazar as mere human beings. The people weep thirty days for Aaron as they were to weep later for Moses (Deut. 34⁸).

CHAPTER XXI

1-3. Victories over Canaanites. (JE.) This fragment referring to battles with Canaanites and the destruction of Canaanite cities must refer to a time when the Hebrews, or at least some of them, were in Canaan, and is obviously out of its proper connection here; but it contains nothing to indicate what its original connection was. Judg. 117 may refer to the same situation, but this is not positive.

4-9. The Brazen Serpent. (E, except the words from mount Hor, which connect with P.) Another case where a complaint on the part of the people brings a plague on them, this time of poisonous serpents. Much discouraged—literally, shortened; as one might say, "gave out." They speak against God, Moses, and the manna (v. 5, mg., vile bread). A serpent of brass—the Hebrew word means copper or bronze. For Christian readers this brief incident has found its chief significance in the reference made to it in Jn. 31⁴, which is in principle the same sort of use that the ancient writer made. In both cases the incident is pressed into the service of a later theology, and both tend to obscure the fact that it is but one illustration of a practice well known outside the Bible as well as within it, namely, making an image of a pest or affliction and presenting the image to the deity who, in turn, would banish the pest (cf. 1 Sam. 65). A more modern attitude is represented in 2 Kings 18⁴, and also in the words of the apocryphal Wisdom of Solomon (167): "He that turned toward it was not saved because of that which was beheld, but because of thee, the Saviour of all."

10-20. From Oboto to Pisgah. (P and E.)

The places cannot be identified, but the idea is apparently that the route was eastward across the Arabah directly toward Moab (cf. intro. to section 20¹⁴-36¹³ above). According to the itinerary in vv. 12-20 the Hebrews have left the gulf of Akabah, and in their long journey northward have at last reached the border of Moab. No description is given of the long trail that intervened. The wady Zered has not been identified, but there is no doubt about the Arnon. This stream flows through a canyon nearly two thousand feet deep, narrowing sharply from approximately two miles in width at the top to forty or fifty yards at the bottom. This deep cleft forms a natural barrier to progress north or south and serves as a well-marked border line for the dwellers on each side of it. According to v. 13, the Moabites are at this time living south of the Arnon, with the Amorites on the north. Farther to the east, where the canyon broadens out and where a number of other streams join the Arnon, the Hebrews would not only be able to make a crossing, but would be eastward of the territory of both Moabites and Amorites.

In vv. 14f. a few lines of a poem are quoted showing that the Arnon had long been recognized as a Moabite border. The valleys (plural) in v. 14 are the ravines in which flow the streams referred to above which unite later with the Arnon proper. The lines quoted are taken from the book of the wars of Jehovah, a collection referred to here only and whose character can only be guessed from this title and the quotation. The "wars of Jehovah" are those fought in his cause and with his aid; warfare was a religious undertaking. Beer (v. 16)—a two-syllable word, Be'er, meaning, "a well" (cf. Be'er-Sheba). Vv. 17f.—another poetical fragment called "the Song of the Well." Its date and origin are as obscure as those of the previous fragment (vv. 14f.).

21-32. Defeat of Sihon King of the Amorites. (JE.) V. 22, cf. 20¹⁷. Jabbok (v. 24)—a stream about forty miles north of the Arnon. Both streams cut their way down through the high table-land to the low level of the Jordan and the Dead Sea respectively. They form well-marked boundaries for the territory which at this time was held by the Amorites. Was strong (v. 24)—better, with LXX, was Jazer, the place mentioned in v. 32. All these cities (v. 25)—implies a preceding list which is now lost. Heshbon and all its towns (v. 29)—i.e., the smaller towns that looked to Heshbon as their head. The Amorites had invaded the former territory of the Moabites and had driven the latter south of the Arnon. Vv. 27-30 contain another fragment from an ancient poem. It is ascribed to they that speak in proverbs, and is evidently introduced here as a reference to Sihon's conquest of Moab. While it is not impossible, it seems rather improbable that such an intensely patriotic document as JE should quote a triumph song of the Amorite enemies; and this, along with the utter obscurity of v. 30 in the original, has led to the opinion (1) that the song comes from the Hebrews; (2) that the first stanza, vv. 27b, 28, is ironical; and (3) that the second stanza, v. 29, voices a Hebrew triumph over Moab. V. 31 is evidently the close of a section; while v. 32 is a fragment from some other account of the conquest of the Amorites.

33-35. Occupation of Bashan. (D, practically identical with Deut. 31⁴.) This account is regarded as having been taken from Deuteronomy rather than the passage in Deuteronomy from this one, because of the Deuteronomic expressions it contains which are not used by JE.

P's itinerary is continued in 22¹ from v. 11, and the Hebrews are now finally encamped on the plains of Moab opposite Jericho.

CHAPTERS 22¹ TO 24²⁵: BALAAM BLESSES ISRAEL (JE)

This is one of the most interesting sections of the book of Numbers. Like so many other episodes, it stands by itself and could be omitted without interfering with the account of the progress of the Hebrews toward the promised land. Indeed, it is not concerned with an itinerary. Its main theme is the security and triumph of the Hebrews through Jehovah's invincible protection. In this security any opposition to them, as, for instance, Moab's, is foredoomed to failure. The particular exponent of this glorious prospect is Balaam, one who is neither a Moabite nor a Hebrew, but a wise man from the East. He has been sent for by Balak, king of Moab, to curse the invading Hebrew host, but he can speak only what Jehovah gives him to speak, and that is a blessing and not a curse. The passage has a sweep and fervor that are unmistakable, and which give it a high place in the literature of Hebrew religious patriotism.

The literary analysis shows (1) a prose narrative which supplies a setting for (2) a group of poetic oracles: 237b-10; 18b-24; 243b-9; 15b-17; 18, 19; 20b; 21b, 22; 23b, 24. The prose narrative is not a unit. There are many indications of this, among which are: (1) the obvious duplicate in 22²³; (2) the alternation of the names "Jehovah" and "God"; and (3) the apparent contradiction between 2222-35 which represents Balaam as disobeying God in starting off with the two servants, and the two preceding verses, which tell of God's permission that Balaam should return with the princes of Moab. So that it is now generally recognized that the present narrative is a combination of a J and an E version of the Balaam story. There is also a general agreement that, roughly speaking, the J narrative is represented in 2222-35 and ch. 24; the JE narrative (but more E than J) in 22-21, 36-41; and the E narrative in ch. 23. Many details, however, are uncertain, for which the critical commentaries should be consulted. Both J and E represent Balaam in a favorable light. Quite a different character is given him in P (318, 16 Josh. 1322), and it is this latter representation that underlies 2 Pet. 215, 16 Jude, v. 11, and Rev. 214. One's view of Balaam's character will thus depend on the documents on which the view is based. As soon as the independence of the documents is recognized the different representations of Balaam's character can be allowed to stand on their own merits. They do not have to be amalgamated or harmonized. Release from such a necessity, here and elsewhere, is one of the solid gains of the literary criticism of the Bible.

The date of the written narrative is, of course, the date of the documents in which they stand, but the traditions on which these are based may be far older than that—how much older, it is impossible to say; but not earlier than a time when Israel felt herself nationally secure and victorious. The poems may or may not be of the same date as the narratives. It seems probable, however, that they were already part of the tradition before the narratives were incorporated in the present documents.

The question as to Balaam's home and country is not easily answered. In the passage as it stands he is located at such widely different places as Pethor by the River, i.e., the Euphrates (225); Aram, which is the common term for the region about Damascus (237); and the mountains of the East (237), a general term for the mountainous country lying east of the Arabah. Larger commentaries must be consulted for detailed discussions. The view adopted here regards Balaam as one of the type of wise men referred to in 1 Kings 430

Jer. 497, whose word would have magic power (cf. Josh. 1322, "soothsayer"). He may have been a Midianite, as suggested by his connection with the kings of Midian (318; Josh. 1321f.), or more probably an Edomite, and for the following reasons: (1) On the practical grounds of mere distance the Euphrates and even Damascus (Aram) seem out of the question; (2) Gen. 3632 names a Bela, son of Beor, as a king of Edom, a name which, in Hebrew, is almost identical with Balaam; (3) the route along which Balaam proceeds—Ar (city) of Moab, at the Arnon (2236); Kiriath-huzoth (2239), a city west of Medeba (so Eusebius); Bamoth-baal (high places), near Dibon (2241); Pisgah (2314); and Peor (2328)—marks a line from south to north, i.e., from the direction of the Edomite country; and (4) Aram (237) may be an accidental change from Edom (in Hebrew the letters "d" and "r" could easily be confused, the difference in the names being, roughly speaking, the difference between a-d-m and a-r-m; cf. p. 100), a correction that is also called for by the necessary parallelism with mountains of the east in the next line. Most of the conditions are met by this view, and it may be added that no view meets them all.

Far more important, however, than the home and character of Balaam himself is the nature of this ancient story which tells about him. It is the kind, especially in the episode of the speaking ass, that is seized upon by those who regard the Bible as a mere relic of ancient superstition, just as at the other extreme it is regarded by others as a signal example of the miraculous power of God. It is neither. Such errors regarding biblical passages would not arise if the true literary character of these passages were recognized. The fact that this story is now in the Bible, and that it is told there in the interest of Hebrew history and of the Hebrew religion, should not obscure the deeper fact that it is an ancient story of exactly the type that would suit people who held the view of life, and the ideals of God and of man, held by the early Hebrews. No matter what later use may be made of it, its inherent and original nature and character can be overlooked only at the peril of a fatal misunderstanding of the true character of God and a blind misreading of the Bible. The interests of piety are not served by ignoring in the Bible distinctions which, outside the Bible, are not only obvious, but essential, and which are accepted as a matter of course; and there are few who would insist that stories of this kind, whether inside or outside the Bible, must be taken literally. Talking trees (Judg. 98-15) or talking animals (as in this case) have a perfectly proper and intelligible place in a certain type of literature, and not until the type is recognized can the true power of the tale make itself felt. For there is power here, and a passionate earnestness which must be permitted their own form of expression; and every obligation of reverence as well as reason is laid upon reader and student to recognize that form, and then to interpret it in obedience to its proper laws of structure and meaning. (See art., Bible as Literature, p. 19.)

CHAPTER XXII

1. See closing notes under ch. 21.

2-14. The First Embassy to Balaam. Vv. 2-4 are introduction: Moab is terror stricken before Israel. Balaam is sent for, but he declines to come. Pethor which is by the river. A month's journey by camel train. Too remote to suit the story, which calls for four journeys (cf. above). Of his people—read probably with Samaritan Pentateuch, of Ammon (final letter having dropped out in the Hebrew MS.). Blessed . . . cursed (v. 6). The power of a blessing or a curse was never doubted in ancient times, e.g., Gen. 27^{12f}. Judg. 17²; such belief is still widespread. Elders (v. 7, J)—cf. princes in v. 8 (E). The rewards—from time immemorial everyone acting officially had his fee, whether priest, soothsayer, or what not. As Jehovah shall speak (v. 8)—the view of God underlying the whole story is that of an ancient primitive people. It would be highly misleading to import into such a narrative the view of God represented in such prophets as Isaiah, Jeremiah, or in the N.T. These accounts are not abstract theologies, but survivals from a time when men were "feeling after God" (Acts 17²⁷), and were still thinking of him very much as they thought of each other. Such a passage as this must be allowed to be at home in its own world and must be recognized not so much as a revelation of how men should think of God now, but rather as a record of how men thought of God then. In keeping with this is the way Balaam is represented as a worshiper of Jehovah in spite of the fact that he was not a Hebrew and that different peoples had different gods with different names.

15-40. Balaam; the Ass; the Angel of Jehovah. A more honorable embassy wins Balaam's consent. According to vv. 22-34, the ass saves Balaam's life. Attention has already been called to the sharp contrast between this section and the verses which immediately precede it. In v. 20 Balaam is expressly directed by God to go with the men, a direction which he obeys, v. 21. The whole point of the present incident, however, is that Balaam has sinned in presuming to go in defiance of Jehovah. The difference is accounted for by the difference of the sources. If anything were needed to make the type of the story clear, it would be found in Balaam's utter lack of surprise at the idea of the ass speaking. And yet no one supposes that it was any more usual for asses to speak then than it is now. Note the effective way in which the story-teller leads up to the point where the ass asks, "Did I ever do this kind of thing before?" (v. 30), and then, instead of having the ass continue with an explanation, he lets Jehovah's angel step in and carry the action to its climax. V. 35, with its abrupt reappearance of the princes of Balak, is generally regarded as supplied by the editor in order to bring the story back to the point where it broke off at v. 21. Vv. 36-40 narrate Balaam's reception and his explanation of the only terms on which he consented to come. For v. 41 see under 23¹⁻¹⁰.

(For additional notes, see the introduction preceding ch. 22.)

CHAPTER XXIII

1-10. The First Oracle. The introduction to the first oracle is found in vv. 1-6, including also 22⁴¹. The sacrifices are not any that are ordered by the Hebrew ritual, but those which in various forms conventionally accompany any ceremony designed to inquire the will of Deity. Seven—different numbers are regarded as having mysterious importance. The sanctity of the number seven (the days of the week) is of high antiquity and not peculiar to the Hebrews. To a bare height (v. 3): the tablelands where these scenes are located descend rapidly on the west to the Dead Sea and the Jordan Valley, and have many bare heights any one of which would suit this situation.

7-10. This is the oracle itself. Parable: this translation is unfortunate in its suggestion of the N.T. parables, a literary form with which the Balaam oracles have no connection. The Hebrew term māshāl, here translated "parable," has as wide a variety of uses as the English word "song." In this case it is applied to an oracle in poetic form which praises the nation (Israel) especially blessed by Jehovah. Aram—rather, Edom; cf. note above on Balaam's home and country. 9. Better, Does not reckon itself one of the nations. 10. Read, with LXX, Who has counted the myriads of Israel? The two lines that close the oracle strike such a different note that some have regarded them as the comment of a later reader or editor. Whether originally part of the oracle or not, the righteous must be understood as the ideal Israelite. The oracle as a whole sees Israel as an established nation, secure, isolated, numerous, and (if the closing lines be included) one whose men lived to a good old age (Job 526). This oracle and the three that follow quite ignore the situation set forth in the prose narrative and concern themselves wholly with Israel's days of national glory.

11-24. Interlude Followed by the Second Oracle. Balak is disappointed, but he will try again. It was a second call that had persuaded Balaam to come, perhaps a second oracle would be the curse that Balak had asked for. Balaam's word was too powerful to be lost through lack of persistence, so he is taken where he can see better. Pisgah is a locality where several bare heights (v. 3) are found. In the second oracle Jehovah's faithfulness is set forth as the basis of Israel's happy lot in the future. King (v. 21) must refer to Jehovah. The first message telegraphed between Washington and Baltimore was the last line of v. 23.

25-30. Beginning of Interlude Leading to the Third Oracle. Similar to the preceding one but more definitely in favor of Israel.

(For additional notes, see the introduction preceding ch. 22.)

CHAPTER XXIV

1-9. The Third Oracle. Following the completion of the interlude in vv. 1, 2, the oracle itself is found in vv. 3-9. Whose eye was closed: the impossibility of translating this line is sufficiently shown by the great variety of proposals that have been made as to just what it means. Other obscurities are found, especially in vv. 7f. In spite of these, however, one cannot fail to catch the note of pride and fervor in which the poet utters his patriotic exaltation. He even sees in Israel a test or touchstone which determines the welfare or ill-fare of other nations, depending on their attitude toward Israel.

10-19. Interlude Followed by the Fourth Oracle. Vv. 15, 16 repeat vv. 3, 4. The star is a king (a David or an Omri) who conquers Moab.

20-25. Three Independent Oracles. Patriotic enthusiasm has forgotten the situation in the days of Balak and has added three brief oracles on other nations. Each is such a brief fragment that no connection can be found for it, and the general obscurity is intensified by the uncertainties of the Hebrew text. V. 25 brings the story to a close, leaving the whole section not only complete in itself, but independent of its context.

(For additional notes, see the introduction preceding ch. 22.)

CHAPTER XXV

1-5. Idolatry. (JE.) The Hebrews are beguiled into idolatry by the Moabite women. They yield to the wiles of the women and are persuaded to share in the sacrifices and worship of the Moabite god, Chemosh. V. 3 states the case differently, mentioning idolatry only, and connecting it with the special baal of Peor. Two different punishments are threatened in vv. 4, 5, representing two different versions of the story.

6-18. The Zeal of Phinehas. (P.) An incident somewhat similar to the foregoing and yet definitely different. Here it is Midianite women and the Midianites that are concerned, and the Hebrews fall into flagrant immorality. The account opens abruptly. A plague is raging which has been sent as a punishment for this immorality. The people are penitent and are assembled before the sacred tent imploring Jehovah to stay the plague. At this point v. 6 takes up the story. An everlasting priesthood (v. 13): this connection of the priesthood with Phinehas does not appear again outside this reference, until the late book of Chronicles. This is another example of the way an institution existing in the writer's day is traced back to an ancient origin in a special incident. The introduction of Peor in vv. 16-18 seems to be intended to connect this story of the Midianites with the story of the Moabites in vv. 1-5, but they are clearly two different stories.

CHAPTER XXVI

A Census of the People. The priestly school of writers (this narrative comes from P) was much interested in genealogies and numberings of the people. Conditions toward the close of the Exile and after brought these subjects into a prominence they did not have before. The spirit of this passage differs widely from the feeling before the Exile that there was something wrong about taking a census (cf. 2 Sam. 241-17). The present chapter is very similar to chs. 1 and 3. A second census is taken just before the advance into Canaan, as though to balance the one that had been taken at the beginning of the wilderness period thirty-eight years before. During that time, according to the view of the later writers, all the men of war had died except Caleb and Joshua, and, of course, except Moses himself. A new generation of warriors is now ready to proceed. The grand totals are surprisingly close to those of the first census (v. 51, cf. 146), although some single tribes show considerable differences, particularly Simeon and Manasseh.

1-4. General Directions. Similar to 11-19, but without the plan by which the numbering was actually to be done. The sense of the Hebrew is not clear in vv. 3 and 4. The words set in italics in R.V. do not appear in the original; and a full stop comes after "Moses" in v. 4. The rest of the verse then becomes a subject without a predicate. Evidently, something has dropped out which can be supplied only by conjecture. Better proposals have been offered than the one given in the present R.V., as, for instance, to supply the verb "were" at the close of v. 4. This would lead naturally to v. 5 as follows: "And the children of Israel which came out of the land of Egypt were"—etc.

5-51. The Census Proper. A double formula is followed, the first part giving the names of the families, and the second part giving the enumerations. Most of the clan names are found also in Gen. 46. Vv. 8-11 mark the first of two interruptions of the formula. V. 11 reflects the fact that in the days of the priestly writers there was an important group of sons of Korah (cf. Psa. 42-49, titles) which presumably were descendants of some of Korah's sons who had not perished when Korah and his company were destroyed in the fire of Jehovah (1635). The second interruption is found in vv. 30-33. The case of Zelophehad's daughters comes in for special treatment in chs. 27 and 36.

52-56. The Distribution of the Land. The passage of the Jordan and the conquest of the land are taken for granted. The death of Moses before the Jordan was crossed is also overlooked; the distribution was carried out by Joshua, not by Moses. V. 54 gives a reasonable direction for adjusting the amounts of land to the numbers in the respective tribes. Vv. 55f. offer an entirely different method, incompatible with the first, unless one assumes either that the lot was miraculously controlled or that the lot referred to geographical location and not to the size of the several allotments.

57-62. A Census of the Levites. Cf. 314-39. The totals differ by one thousand. The gist of the section is in vv. 57 and 62. What intervenes is really irrelevant, and v. 58 is obviously a different version of v. 57. There is no doubt that the three families of v. 57 have a historic basis. For Nadab and Abihu, cf. 34.

63-65. Conclusion. The story concludes with the significant statement that there was not a man except Caleb and Joshua who had been counted in the first census at Sinai.

CHAPTER XXVII

I-11. Inheritance of Landed Property. The distribution of the land just arranged for left some questions unsettled. For instance, in view of the custom that inheritance goes to male heirs only, what shall be done if a man leave daughters, but no sons? This case is here taken up and carried on to a general law regarding the succession of land ownership (cf. 1 Kings 21³ Mic. 21^{f.}). Further questions arose even after this law was established, and these are considered in ch. 36 below. In his own sin (v. 3)—i.e., the general sin of the people in refusing to proceed at once into Canaan (1426-30). In vv. 5f. the law is carried back to a divine origin, the special case being the occasion of further revelation.

12-23. Moses Makes Preparations for His Death. The preparations are two: (1) He is to go to the top of Mount Nebo (cf. the parallel passage Deut. 32⁴⁸⁻⁵²) and see the land which he is not to enter. There are several mountains overlooking the north end of the Dead Sea from the east, any one of which would satisfy the conditions of the hitherto unidentified Nebo. On a clear day one can see the Palestinian ridge from Engedi, touching the west coast of the Dead Sea, to Hermon at the far north (cf. G. A. Smith, Historical Geography of the Holy Land, pp. 562f.). For v. 14 cf. on 20¹⁻¹³. (2) He is to select his successor. Moses is here, as ever, represented as a leader whose first and only thought is for his people, regardless of what happens to himself. Joshua is selected. Moses formally passes on his office of leadership, but he cannot pass on his own supremacy (cf. 127^{f.}). From this time forward, according to P, the political headship is subordinate to the high priest, and Joshua is subordinate to Eleazar, through whom, as priest, Jehovah will henceforth reveal his will. Urim (v. 21)—usually coupled with the thummim (cf. Exod. 28³⁰ Lev. 8⁸). Two small objects bearing these names were used in ascertaining the divine will in special situations. What they were made of, what they looked like, and how they were used, are among the secrets of the past, though there have been many conjectures. The clearest example of their use is in LXX of 1 Sam. 14⁴¹ (notes). Just when one expects an account of Moses' death, somewhat as Aaron's death is described (20²⁸), the story breaks off. The death of Moses is not reported until the last chapter of Deuteronomy.

CHAPTERS XXVIII, XXIX

Public Offerings. Chs. 28 and 29 (P) give a list of the daily and festival offerings for the congregation, a list which stands alone in its completeness, with the amounts to be offered on each occasion. Lev. 23 is approximately parallel, or this section may be regarded as a supplement to that chapter. A closer but still incomplete parallel may be found in Ezek. 45¹⁸–46¹⁵. This list belongs to a late stratum of P, perhaps 400–300 B.C. Eight occasions are listed with the offerings for each, as follows: Ch. 28—(1) the morning and evening sacrifice for every day, whatever other offerings may be brought by reason of the day being a special one, vv. 3–8; (2) extra offerings for Sabbaths, vv. 9f.; (3) for the new moons (the beginnings of the months), vv. 11–15; (4) for the feast of unleavened bread following the Passover, vv. 16–25; (5) for the feast of first fruits, better known as the feast of weeks, vv. 26–31. Ch. 29—(6) for New Year's day (civil year), the seventh month of the religious year, vv. 1–6; (7) for the day of atonement, vv. 7–11; and (8) for the feast of booths which extends through eight days, with the specification for each day, vv. 12–38. Vv. 39f. contain a closing direction that these offerings are to be in addition to those brought by individuals.

With the kind and number of animals specified for the sacrifices, the meal, oil, and wine are added according to the amounts already given in 15¹–16. There is a noticeable number of sevens in the list. The seventh month stands out among the months as the seventh day stands out among the days of the week. The two great feasts in the first and seventh months continue through seven days each. Sevens of lambs are also frequent. These feasts differ from the pre-exilic feasts in the larger number of sacrifices, especially of animals; in the fixed numbers and amounts, which in earlier times were left largely to the worshiper; and, perhaps most distinctively, in their solemn priestly character (burnt-offerings and sin-offerings which laymen did not share) as contrasted with the happy feasts of earlier times shared by priest and worshipers. One can appreciate the devotion of the post-exilic Jews who revered and observed this elaborate and costly ritual, but in the light of the humane and spiritual teachings of the N.T. the fact cannot and need not be hidden that to-day one is appalled at such a program of ruthless slaughter. Was it some of this travail of the dumb creation that prompted Paul to write Rom. 8²²?

CHAPTER XXX

1–16. Responsibilities for Vows. (P.) The general principle, which in the remainder of the chapter has special application to women, is stated in vv. 1, 2, namely, that when a man makes a vow he must keep it. V. 16 is a closing summary.

3–5. First Special Case: A young unmarried woman in her father's house. Vow and bond in this chapter stand for two ideas; the vow involves action and the bond abstinence. One vows, for instance, to make an offering of some kind; one binds himself to abstain from food or drink or from cutting his hair (as in the case of the Nazirite). The father is the responsible party when he hears the vow made. He can annul it then if he will. If he says nothing it stands; silence gives consent.

6–8, 10–15. Second Special Case: A married woman. The provision here is like the preceding, the only difference being that the husband of the married woman takes the place of the father of the young unmarried woman. Afflict the soul (v. 13)—commonly means to fast. The reference here is to all forms of abstinence. V. 15 adds the possibility that the husband may keep silence at first and then repudiate the vow later. In this case the husband must bear the iniquity of the broken vow.

9. Third Special Case: Widows and divorced women must take full responsibility. This verse is not well placed and breaks the otherwise close connection of v. 8 with v. 10. The sense and independence of the verse, however, are quite clear.

CHAPTER XXXI

Legislation Regarding the Spoils of War. (P.) The regulations here laid down purport to have arisen out of a special campaign against the Midianites. Even a superficial reading, however, shows the high probability that the account is more ideal than historical. This is seen in the numbers alone; they are round numbers and they are enormous under the circumstances. The Hebrew warriors number 12,000 men—1,000 for each tribe. This army, without the loss of a single man, kills every Midianite warrior as well as the five kings and Balaam. The women and children of the Midianites are taken captive, along with all the cattle, all the flocks, and all the goods. All the Midianite cities and encampments are burned. The spoil includes 675,000 sheep, 72,000 beeves, 61,000 asses, 32,000 virgin women, and gold ornaments to the amount of 16,750 shekels. The primary interest in the distributive legislation is seen in the space devoted to its repeated details (vv. 25–54), in contrast to the silence of the writer on any time or place of march or battle. Second only to the distribution is the matter of purification following contact with the dead (vv. 19–24; see notes on 19¹¹–22 Lev. 21¹–4). Finally, if the account were literal history, the nation of Midian must have been wiped out, for not only are all women and children captured, but all males are killed (vv. 7-17). Yet they were very much alive at a later time (cf. Judg. 6-8).

A story of this kind is called a midrash. The root of the word means "to seek out," and it is applied to stories that seek out deeper meanings and present them for purposes of instruction and edification. Many passages in the O.T. are of this type. While they are not to be regarded as literal histories they are not for that reason misleading when once their method and purpose are recognized. Here, as always, the literary form of the passage is an essential guide to content and interpretation. (See art., Bible as Literature, p. 19.)

As a last act of Moses before his death the story seems rather horrible. Vengeance on Midian—see ch. 25. Trumpets—cf. on 109. What vessels of the sanctuary are intended in this connection cannot be determined, but cf. on 10¹¹⁻²⁸. Just as a matter of arithmetic it is interesting to consider how the small number of Hebrews would handle the large number of captives and cattle, to say nothing of the limited space at their disposal on the plains of Moab (v. 12). For v. 19 cf. on 19¹¹⁻²². The spoil is divided into two equal parts, one half going to the men skilled in war, the other half to all the congregation (v. 27). The men of war turn over one five-hundredth of their share to the priests, and the congregation one fiftieth of their share to the Levites. To make atonement (v. 50)—in pursuance of the instructions in Ex. 30¹¹⁻¹⁶, for having taken a census of the army. Sixteen thousand seven hundred fifty shekels (v. 52): the shekel was weight and not primarily a measure of money. This amount of gold would weigh about 600 pounds avoirdupois. (See art., Time, Money, p. 79.)

CHAPTER XXXII

Settlements East of the Jordan. (P.) The tribes Reuben and Gad prefer to settle east of the Jordan. A brief reference is also made to three families of the half tribe Manasseh (vv. 33, 39-42). The literary analysis of the chapter is not easy, and various analyses have been made. The material represents JE and P, but these strands have now been interwoven by a late priestly writer. The main outline, however, is clear and closely parallel to Deut. 31²⁻¹⁷. 1-15. Reuben and Gad propose to locate east of Jordan. Moses misunderstands their plan and is very angry. The cities named in v. 3 all lie between the Arnon and the Jabbok. Vv. 8-13 repeat the story found in chs. 13f. 16-27. Reuben and Gad explain their plan and Moses consents to it. 28-32. The agreement is confirmed with Eleazar the priest. 33. This would be more appropriately placed after v. 38. It breaks the connection in its present place. 34-38. All the cities named here lie between the Arnon and the Jabbok. 39-42. This is a fragment from a summary of the conquest (except the editorial v. 40), very similar in style and manner to Judg. 1.

CHAPTER XXXIII

1-49. A List of the Encampments During the Forty Years in the Wilderness. (P.) As far as the place and journeys are concerned the chapter raises more questions than it answers. It belongs to a late stratum of P, but reflects at least three sources: JE, P, and some source now unknown, for it includes names found in P, but not in JE; also names found in JE, but not in P, as well as names found in this chapter only and neither in JE or P. According to this list, the people start from Rameses and arrive at the plains of Moab. In between these terminal stations forty places of encampment are named. The number can hardly be accidental, yet it is not intended to indicate that the people stopped a year at each place; the list does not adjust itself to such an arrangement. The only notes of time are in v. 3, where the start is placed in the first year, and in v. 38, where Aaron's death is placed in the fortieth year. It would be a great satisfaction if one could take a map and trace these marches one after the other. But a map locating these places does not exist, and it cannot be made. Most of the places are but names, and there is now no way of finding out where they were. It is only natural that the chapter should have raised many discussions, for which the critical commentaries may be consulted. (Cf. also the arts., "Wanderings, Wilderness of" in Encyclopædia Biblica, and "Exodus and Journey to Canaan" in Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible.)

1. Journeys—better, stages, as in mg.
2. Moses wrote. It would be natural for the late priestly writer to suppose that Moses wrote an itinerary, and certainly some of the documents from which P drew purported to come from Moses. But, as stated above, even if Moses had written such a list and the list had been preserved, it would be of little if any use, for the various localities mentioned have long disappeared. It seems more probable, however, that this clause is an editorial note, and that v. 1 should continue with the words in v. 2: and these are their journeys, etc.
3. An high hand—in a high-handed fashion, boldly. 5-15. These verses include the route from Egypt to Sinai. On account of the importance of the events at Sinai this may be regarded as the first section of the itinerary, in spite of the fact that the location of Sinai is still under discussion (cf. p. 268, and Ex. 19, note). 16-36. Sinai to Kadesh may be taken as the next section on account of the importance of Kadesh. Rihmah . . . Hashmonah. These places and all those named between (vv. 18-29) are mentioned nowhere else, and their locations are quite unknown. 37-49. Third and last section. The writer's interest is indicated in his interruption of his list at v. 38 in order to say a word about Aaron. The most surprising omission from the list is "the wilderness of Paran," which elsewhere is so prominent in P. So far this omission has not been satisfactorily accounted for.

The material in the book of Numbers is arranged to agree approximately with these verse-divisions, except that Numbers begins with Sinai, and has no material corresponding to vv. 3-15. See introductory note preceding ch. 1. Vv. 16-36 cover 10¹¹-20²¹; vv. 37-49 cover 20²²-22¹.

CHAPTERS 33⁵⁰ TO 36¹³: MISCELLANEOUS LAWS (P)

Several regulations unrelated to each other, but which are all set forth in anticipation of the day when Israel should be settled in Canaan and these directions would be needed. While some of the material may rest on earlier sources, the present form comes from a late priestly writer.

50-56. Instructions Concerning the Conquest of Canaan. The Hebrews are to make a "clean sweep." The Canaanites, and especially their religion, must be put entirely out of the way. In view of the feeling represented in Deuteronomy and Kings, that the disasters which came upon the nation in the period of the monarchy were due to the insidious influences of Canaanite religion, it is quite natural that a still later writer should regard the extermination of everything Canaanite as the only safety. Figured stones, literally figures; but that stones were implied is indicated in Lev. 26¹. The stones would bear carvings or engravings of religious symbols. Molten images, high places: the books of Kings and of the prophets show that down to the time of the Exile Israel was continually yielding to the temptations of Canaanite worship. V. 54 is a parenthesis based on 26⁵⁴. The Exile was not unnaturally explained by later writers as the fulfillment of punishments of which the Hebrews had been warned before they entered Canaan.

CHAPTER XXXIV

1-15. The Boundaries. We learn here what the late writer thought the Hebrews should have conquered. The boundaries are indicated in the order, south, west, north and east. That they are to some extent ideal is indicated most obviously by the statement that the great sea marked the western border. As a matter of fact, it never did; the Hebrew territory always stopped some distance from the coast. That was Philistine territory. The southern border (vv 3-5) is indicated approximately as a line running from the lower end of the Dead Sea westward through Kadesh-barnea to the brook of Egypt (Wady el-Arish; see p. 54). The western boundary is given in v. 6; the northern boundary in vv. 7-9. This is quite vague on account of the impossibility of identifying the places mentioned. Even the entering in of Hamath (cf. 13²¹) is not absolutely certain. This Mount Hor is mentioned here only and is not to be confused with the other mountain of the same name in 20^{22f}. The writer evidently regarded the boundary as running well north of the Sea of Galilee. The eastern boundary (vv. 10-12) runs south from the unidentified Hazar-enan (which must have been located some distance north of the Sea of Galilee), well to the east of the Jordan, until it met the southern boundary at some point southeast of the Dead Sea. Sea of Chinnereth—another name for the Sea of Galilee. These boundaries inclose the territory which was to be divided among the nine and one half tribes that remained after Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh had been allotted their territory east of the Jordan.

16-29. The Distribution of the Land. The distribution of the land is to be managed by what might be called a distributing committee composed of the men here named.

CHAPTER XXXV

1-8. Levitical Cities. The Levites are to receive forty-eight cities. Of these, six are to be cities of refuge (see on vv. 9-34). The whole allotment is made by each of the other tribes giving up cities in proportion to the amount of its own size and holdings. After the explicit statements in ch. 18, that the Levites are to receive tithes instead of land, it is surprising to find this assignment of cities. The solution of the contradiction is found here, as elsewhere, in the different documents representing the respective views. An entirely different provision for the Levites is found in Ezek. 48⁸⁻¹⁴. Both are ideal and were never put into effect. The very nature of the country makes such laying out of the territory impossible. It might be done on a western prairie, but not in Palestine. Furthermore, the arithmetic is impossible. The cities are imagined as squares and the 1,000 cubits extending in opposite directions from two opposite sides leave 2,000 cubits for the resulting sides only when the city itself is reduced to zero. Neither Ezekiel nor this writer is concerned primarily with maps and surveys, but both are intensely interested in the functions and the prerogatives of priests and Levites. In pursuance of this object Ezekiel idealizes the future and this writer idealizes the past, both portrayals being ideal settings for an ideal group in an ideal country.

9-34. Cities of Refuge. The provision of shelter cities, three on each side of the Jordan, leads into a careful statement regarding those who may use them. Their first use is to protect a man until his case can be fairly heard and judged. After that the man's safety and responsibility depend upon the judgment that is pronounced and upon the man's subsequent behavior. From time immemorial it was a custom having all the force of law that when one man killed another the dead man's next of kin should avenge the death by taking the life of the killer. The legislation in this passage provides for a mitigation of this custom by sheltering the killer in case the deed was accidental. (Cf. notes on Deut. 19¹⁻¹³.) The congregation (v. 24)—regarded regularly by P as the sacred community, the holy people, whose voice is the voice of God, and whom he thinks of as living together in the "holy city." (Lev. 16³³ Psa. 89⁵ and cf. Psa. 15.)

CHAPTER XXXVI

Supplementary Legislation Concerning Daughters. The legislation supplements that in 27¹⁻¹¹ (notes). The permission that daughters inherit property carried the possibility that by marriage the inherited property might pass to another tribe. V. 13 is a formal close for the book. The last verse of Leviticus is a similar close, indicating that what preceded belonged to the period at Sinai. This last verse of Numbers refers similarly to the plains of Moab, which would point back to 22¹. The similarity of the two closing verses has led to the conjecture that they both may have been added at the time the Pentateuch was divided into its present five parts.

DEUTERONOMY

By PROFESSOR D. R. SCOTT

INTRODUCTION

Names. Deuteronomy, like other books in the Pentateuch, owes its name to the LXX. In 17¹⁸ the LXX translators rendered the Hebrew for "a copy of this law" by "this second law-giving," and gave the name Deuteronomion to the whole book. The translation is mistaken, but it truly describes Deuteronomy, which contains the second codification of the Law of Israel, the first being that which is found in Ex. 20²²⁻²³19, with 34¹¹⁻²⁷ 13³⁻¹⁰, 11-13, in which the most important part is the code contained in Ex. 21-23, known as the Book of the Covenant. In the Hebrew text Deuteronomy has no title, but it was referred to by its opening words, "These are the words," or simply "The words." In the course of the book other names occur, "this law" (15), "this book of the law" (29²¹), "the words of the covenant which," etc. (29¹), "this covenant" (53), "this commandment" (61), and the particular laws are spoken of as "the statutes and judgments"; but these names, in all probability, do not refer to the whole of Deuteronomy, only to certain parts. In our English version Deuteronomy is called the Fifth Book of Moses.

Contents. As the name rightly implies, Deuteronomy is, or, rather, contains, a code of law, but the most cursory reading shows at once that it is more than this, for it contains not only laws but historical narratives and exhortations, and the laws themselves are rounded off with hortatory motives. The book is presented as Moses' valedictory, consisting of three discourses addressed to Israel in the land of Moab, immediately previous to the crossing of the Jordan. As such it may be briefly summarized as follows:

It opens with an introduction giving the time and place of Moses' valedictory (11-5); then there follows the command to start from Horeb for the promised land, the appointment of the headsmen to assist Moses in the judicature (16-18); the command to attack the Amorites, the refusal of the people to make the attack and their subsequent repentance (19-46). Israel, then, is represented as spending thirty-eight years in aimless wandering in the neighborhood of Edom and then, at the divine command, passing peaceably through Edom (21-8). No attack was made on Moab or Ammon, but Sihon, king of the Amorites, and Og, king of Bashan, were defeated and their territory was apportioned to the tribes of Reuben and Gad and to the half-tribe of Manasseh, who were enjoined to help their brethren in the capture of the land to the west of the Jordan. Moses intimates that Jehovah will not allow him to cross the Jordan (29-32⁹). This historical review is then closed and there follows an urgent appeal for obedience to Jehovah's laws with an insistence on Jehovah's spirituality and absoluteness. If this appeal finds no response, then Israel will be dispersed among the nations, be diminished and worship other gods; but, on Israel's repentance, Jehovah, true to his promises and to his ancient choice, love and wonderful providence, will forgive Israel (41-40). Here is interposed irrelevantly the appointment of three cities of refuge (44-43). Then 44-49 contains a fresh heading which may have been the original introduction to Deuteronomy, the previous and longer introduction forming the First Discourse (16-44⁰), having been added at a later date.

At ch. 5 begins the Second Discourse of Moses, which continues right on to chs. 26, 28. The first part, chs. 5-11, is hortatory, inculcating the fundamental principles upon which the particular laws are based; the second, chs. 12-26, 28 (in which is interpolated an historical section 97^b-109^a) sets forth the particular enactments that are to regulate the daily life of Israel. Moses begins with "the ten words," the basis of the covenant of God at Horeb. Jehovah spake these words, wrote them on the two tables of stone, and "added no more." The people, dismayed by hearing the voice of God and by its accompaniments, the darkness and fire, request Moses to act as mediator between them and God. This request was granted (ch. 5); Moses then gives the charge declaring the God of Israel to be Jehovah alone (or one Jehovah), whom Israel must love, reverence, and obey, and teach the children so to do. This relation between Jehovah and Israel is based upon the deliverance out of Egypt (ch. 6). Israel must have nothing to do with heathenism in any shape or form, for Israel is Jehovah's peculiar possession. Obedience will bring the divine blessing, for Jehovah will continue to fight Israel's battles, and he will firmly establish him in the good land (ch. 7). Israel in the good land must be on his guard, for the wealth of the land will be a temptation to apostasy, and his prosperity may lead to self-righteousness (chs. 8-9^{7a}). Here (9^{7b}) follows an historical section, containing a detailed account of Israel's disobedience at Horeb—the making of the golden calf, the breaking of the two tables of stone, the hewing of new tables and the making of the ark. The section contains notes (10⁶⁻⁹) on Israel's itinerary and the separation of Levi. Then follows 10¹²⁻¹¹³² with final exhortations which lead up to the detailed exposition of the Code.

At ch. 12 the Code proper, consisting of some seventy separate laws, begins. These laws cover the whole of Israel's life—religion, judicature, war, social and domestic life. No principle of classification can be found in the laws, but roughly the chapters may be divided thus: (1) Chs. 12¹⁻¹⁶¹⁷ contain religious laws which deal with the place of sacrifice, the extermination of every idolatrous person and influence, abstention from the flesh of unclean animals, the regulation of tithes and firstlings, the religious and generous consideration of the poor, and the sacred pilgrimages or feasts. (2) Laws dealing with the judicature, the duties of the king, the revenues and privileges of the Levites and with the position and authority of the prophets in contrast to diviners and augurs (16¹⁸⁻¹⁸²²). (3) Laws dealing with murder, removing old boundary marks, witnesses, the conduct of war and exemptions, the communal responsibility for untraced murder, marriage with a woman captured in war, the rights of the first-born, rebellious sons and hanged malefactors (chs. 19-21). (4) Chs. 22-25 contain various laws dealing with social and domestic life—such as the laws of lost property, the sparing of the mother bird on the nest, the safeguarding of buildings, the wearing of clothes, the rights of a husband, adultery and seduction, the cleanliness of the camp, the treatment of runaway slaves, religious prostitution, the exaction of interest and pledges, remarriage, the payment of the wage-earner, the treatment of the poor, corporal punishment, Levirate marriage, weights and measures, etc. Ch. 26 contains liturgies for Israel's observance, and the whole Second Discourse ends with an impressive peroration (ch. 28) in which a blessing is pronounced upon obedience and, with much greater detail, a curse upon disobedience.

Chs. 29, 30 (the Third Discourse) are supplementary: in them Moses reminds Israel of God's goodness and warns them of the disaster that apostasy will bring, but—so gracious is Jehovah—even after apostasy repentance will insure restoration, and he concludes by placing before Israel the great choice of obedience that leads to life and disobedience leading to disaster and death. This ends the three discourses.

In a few concluding words Moses then heartens the people, encourages Joshua, who receives his commission, and orders the recital of the law every seven years (31¹⁻¹³). Then follows the introduction to the so-called Song of Moses and the song itself (31¹⁶⁻³²⁴³). Moses finally commends the law and, at the divine command, ascends Nebo to die (32⁴⁴⁻⁵²). Ch. 33 is the poem called "the Blessing of Moses," with which should be compared Gen. 49 and in which are set forth the special characteristics and destiny of the tribes of Israel. The book ends with a narrative of the death of Moses (ch. 34).

Religion and Ethics. No synopsis can convey the peculiar distinction of Deuteronomy among the books of the Pentateuch. That distinction lies in its religion and ethics, in its conception of God and its moral ideal. Deuteronomy shares with the rest of the Pentateuch in the emphasis upon the ethical greatness of Israel's God, in the assertion that Jehovah's relation to Israel rests upon Jehovah's own choice, his act of redemption and his providences, and is not merely physical and political, but morally purposive; with the rest of the Pentateuch it emphasizes the spirituality of Jehovah and his greatness compared with heathen gods; and Israel's greatness depends on a true response to this conception.

But Deuteronomy goes beyond all this in its continued emphasis of the love of Jehovah. He is a God who has borne with Israel as a man bears with and chastens his son. He has clung to Israel and set his heart upon him. He is the giver of rain and all the wealth of the land and he fights Israel's battles, but, above and beyond all, he is the lover of Israel that has made his vow of loyalty and will not break it; he has himself chosen Israel to be his own peculiar possession. By his choice, by his great act of redemption, by his unfailing, marvelous providence Jehovah has bound himself to Israel. He has loved Israel and will never let him down nor forsake him.

This God demands from Israel the devotion of his whole heart. It is true that Jehovah is a great and terrible God and men should fear him; but this fear is no pagan dread, but reverence that hears and keeps the divine law. But fear or reverence is not the only demand; Israel has to love God with his heart, soul, and mind. Only once besides in the Pentateuch (Ex. 20⁶) is man's love to God mentioned, but it runs through Deuteronomy narrative, exhortation and law, and sums up Israel's whole duty to his God Jehovah. It is the intense, whole-hearted love of God that demands a like whole-hearted devotion from man that is at the root of the separatism that is so marked a feature. Jehovah will not tolerate any sharing of his rightful due with other gods; there must be no traffic with heathen abominations, no converse with heathen worshippers; Israel must separate himself from all such by their ruthless extermination; the very platings of the idols were contamination to Israel and abomination to Jehovah. Jehovah has his own ancient ritual (though in Deuteronomy the emphasis is not on the ceremonial side of religion) and Israel must adhere strictly to it; Jehovah's feasts must be religiously and joyously observed, his dues paid and his vows kept, his symbols worn; his servants, priests, and prophets must be honored; but through all he himself as the one God of Israel must be revered, obeyed, and loved to the complete exclusion of every other religious and heathen attraction. God is Love, even in his discipline which is meant to prove and test Israel, and Israel must love him with all his heart, soul, mind, and strength.

This love of man for God is no mere emotion or passion; it functions in the love and service of a man for his fellows, and chiefly for those who have suffered and known something of life's hardness, for the widow, for the fatherless, for the stranger within the gates, for the slave, for the fugitive; it spreads itself out into the animal kingdom and takes in the mother bird with her young and the ox as he treads out the corn. This human love, that takes its rise in the heart of God, colors the whole social life of Israel; it aims at justice between man and man, "Justice, justice shalt thou pursue"; the place of justice must not be tainted by corruption and no man must be condemned without fair trial and sufficient evidence; and to justice are added kindness and humane consideration; the daily wage-earner, the slave, the debtor are to be treated with fairness and generosity; the newly married has to receive military and other exemption; the rights of woman, as mother, wife, and maid are duly acknowledged. The distinction of the particular laws taken as a whole is not in their moral and humane advance upon other codes, though, it is true, there is, in most cases, such advance, but in the spirit of consideration, kindness, and humanity that is reflected throughout the entire code.

This humaneness may seem to be contradicted by the severity of the penalties enjoined and by the ordination of "the Ban" (herem) against the Canaanites and the Israelite worshippers of and traffickers with other gods. But the sternness of the fight against heathenism has to be remembered and the great issue, Israel's very destiny as Jehovah's people, involved; to Israel there was no remedy against things that were an abomination and detestation to Jehovah short of ruthless extermination, and, as for other cases, like filial disobedience or adultery, it must not be forgotten that prisons were non-existent and the evil with its influence and defilement must be destroyed.

The utilitarianism of Deuteronomy's morality may be adversely criticized—the reward of virtue is length of days and prosperity in the land. This feature is referred to in the commentary proper; sufficient to say here that the ethics of Deuteronomy is not merely utilitarian, for the motives of conduct have their value as well as the results. In two respects the religion and ethics of Deuteronomy may be said to be deficient: they lack the missionary spirit and do not look beyond Israel, and there is no immortality. As a whole, the religion and ethics are absolute, there is none of our modern fondness for "extenuating circumstances." "Ye cannot serve God and mammon."

Deuteronomy and Josiah's Reformation. In 2 Kings 22, 23, there is an account of the discovery of a book in the Temple by the priest Hilkiah, which was read by the chancellor to the king. This book is called "the book of the covenant" (2 Kings 23:2) and is held by modern scholars to be Deuteronomy (in part or whole), the precepts of which brought about the reformation of Josiah. This conclusion is reached partly by a process of elimination: this newly discovered book cannot be the Pentateuch, which would be too long to be read, as the new discovery was, twice in one day; the Book of the Covenant in Ex. 20-23 has no reference to some of the most important points in Josiah's reformation and lacks the severity of denunciation to create so quick and terrible an impression as Second Kings tells us its book of the covenant did—and partly by comparison of the precepts of Deuteronomy with the details of the reformation—"point for point the details (of the latter) are paralleled by injunctions in Deuteronomy, notably the abolition of idolatry, the concentration of worship at a single sanctuary, the abolition of witchcraft and star worship, and the celebration of the Passover"; some of these enactments, it is true, are found in other parts of the Pentateuch, but only in Deuteronomy are they collected into one code or book. Only in one important point is there a difference, the provincial Levites are not called up in the reformation to officiate at the central sanctuary, and it has been suggested that the priests already in residence objected to such increase in their numbers with a corresponding decrease in their incomes. The "book of the covenant" (2 Kings 23²) was found in 621 B.C.; this fixes its composition and thus the composition of Deuteronomy before that date; and, as Amos and Hosea (750-735) do not demand the actual abolition of the local sanctuaries and the centralization of worship—the latter regarded by Deuteronomy as something new—Deuteronomy was probably composed between 735-621; according to some scholars, in Hezekiah's reign, about 700 B.C., according to others, in Manasseh's, about 650 B.C.

Such, in briefest form, has been the generally accepted position: (1) Deuteronomy enacts the centralization of worship which is the predominant principle, and (2) on the basis of Deuteronomy's enactments the reforms of Josiah were carried out. But recently the whole question has been reopened. Adam C. Welch, in The Code of Deuteronomy, holds that purity of Jehovah worship, not centralization, is the prevailing aim, and that, on this view, the majority of the laws and religious regulations are more simply and naturally interpreted than on the commonly accepted critical view. "The place that Jehovah chooses to make his name dwell there" is not Jerusalem alone, but any and every sanctuary consecrated to Jehovah and his worship. Only in one place (Deut. 12⁵) is the demand for the one altar definitely made; this paragraph (121-7), it is suggested not without reason, is a later insertion. May it be that this is one of the places where, as Jeremiah (8⁸) says, "the pen of the scribes hath wrought falsely"?

On one point Welch is right: purity of worship (whether it leads to centralization or not) is the main aim of Deuteronomy. The most cursory reader might read the book without grasping the principle of centralization; he could not miss the passionate insistence that Jehovah must be given his own worship and at the place (or places) of his own choice. On Welch's view Deuteronomy would be even earlier than the period assigned by orthodox criticism.

At the other extreme there is the view that regards Deuteronomy not as the program of Josiah's reformation, but as its deposit. This view, associated with the name of Professor Kennett in England and Professor Perry in America, brings the date down to the time of the Exile or even later.

Origin. In studying the origin of Deuteronomy we will consider: (1) Relation to other O.T. codes; (2) Structure; and (3) Authorship.

(1) Relation. There are four legal codes in the O.T.: The Book of the Covenant, etc. (JE), the Deuteronomic (D), the Law of Holiness (H) and the Priestly Code (P). By a comparison of D with the laws of JE it is evident that Deuteronomy is dependent upon the latter, covering practically all the ground of Ex. 20²²⁻²³ 33; in certain cases D follows JE almost verbatim (cf. Ex. 23¹⁹ 34²⁶ with Deut. 12⁵, 6); but the laws of Deuteronomy reveal a more advanced state of society; in its historical parts too Deuteronomy shows the same dependence on the narrative of JE as in the legislation. To the law of holiness (Lev. 17-26) Deuteronomy shows a certain parallelism, but the author shows no knowledge of P as a legislative system and what is true in this respect of the laws is true of the historical parts.

(2) Structure. The style, with its flowing rhetoric and oft recurring phrases, and the one religious spirit, tends to give the impression of unity, but a closer examination shows the book to be a compilation. Opinion is varied as to what was the original Deuteronomy. Certainly it included the code, chs. 12-26, 28 (14⁴⁻²⁰ is probably a later insertion), with or without its hortatory introduction, chs. 5-11. Chs. 1-4 are usually attributed to a different hand or hands from the body of Deuteronomy, as are also 9⁸⁻¹⁰ 11 14⁴⁻²⁰ (P), chs. 27, 29-34. Some of these passages contain references to the Exile and, though the style is deuteronomic, cannot belong to the original Deuteronomy. There are also signs of editors' hands in archæological notes and itineraries. "The Song of Moses" and "The Blessing of Moses" are from unknown sources. The code itself shows dependence upon JE, but no doubt the laws peculiar to Deuteronomy have their sources in older collections; the rough grouping, the cross divisions and the fact that the form of the laws varies (e.g., in some the second person singular, in others the second person plural) all suggest compilation. (See art., Legal Literature, p. 145.)

(3) Authorship. Deuteronomy claims Moses as its author, but doubt is thrown at once upon this by the phrase "beyond Jordan," 1⁵ 3⁸ 4⁴¹, i.e., the east side of Jordan, which shows that the author was living in western Palestine. Further, by the time the book was written, the Israelites had built houses (22⁸) and had the boundaries of their properties fixed by "those of old time." To those who hold with the majority of biblical scholars that JE is not the work of Moses, the point requires no further proof. The author, in ascribing the work to Moses, follows a literary method of his day, and one that has been adopted by many of the greatest literary artists, a perfectly defensible method, for if Moses was not the literary writer of Deuteronomy, he was its spiritual inspiration, and, in that sense, the real author not only of Deuteronomy but of all Israel's law and religion. (See for a more detailed discussion art., Pentateuch, pp. 138-9.)

Literature: Driver, Deuteronomy (International Critical Commentary); G. A. Smith, Deuteronomy (Cambridge Bible); H. W. Robinson, Deuteronomy (New Century Bible); Harper, Deuteronomy (Expositor's Bible); Welch, The Code of Deuteronomy; Johns, Code of Hammurabi (referred to in this commentary as C.H.); Eiselen, The Books of the Pentateuch.

CHAPTER I

1-5. Introduction. Moses undertakes to give instruction and to expound Jehovah's law to all Israel in the land of Moab. The writer of the introduction is on the west side of Jordan, Moses and his congregation are depicted on the east side. The verses give the time and place of Moses' discourses.

Wilderness, the usual term for the pasture land east of Moab and for the region of Israel's earlier wanderings; Arabah, the usual term for the deep depression running north and south of the Dead Sea; Suph, . . . Di-zahab are all uncertain; it is impossible to harmonize these places with the fact that Moses addressed Israel on the steppes of Moab. Horeb, in E and D = "Sinai" in P and J; vv. 1-5 are composite; v. 3 is in the style of P. For Sihon and Og (v. 4) see 224f. and 31f.

CHAPTERS 16 TO 440: FIRST ADDRESS OF MOSES

16-329 is historical material; 41-40 is chiefly hortatory.

6-8. Jehovah's Command to Start From Horeb for the Land. The Lord our God spake: his word is the great initial driving power. Advance into the hill country of the Amorites (the usual name in D for the pre-Israelite population of Canaan) and the parts adjacent as far as the Euphrates (the ideal but never the actual limit of Israel's land). This command is given with the assurance that Jehovah is Israel's God and present with them (vv. 6f.), that he will be faithful, having bound himself with an oath and that he is generous to the obedient and greatly daring (v. 8).

When God calls men to great ventures he never fails to equip.

9-18. The Appointment of Judges. At that time (i.e., after the charge at Horeb) Moses, finding his burden too heavy, bade the Israelites to appoint headsmen or judges—wise men, and understanding, and known according to their tribes. This the people did and Moses set them in graded ranks (vv. 9-15). He demanded scrupulous impartiality, for judgment is really God's (v. 17). The harder cases are to be brought to himself (vv. 16-18).

Notice in the passage the generosity and wisdom of Moses (v. 11), the democratization of the administration of justice (v. 13); above all, the emphasis on the fact that such administration is a service rendered not simply to man but to God (v. 17).

Cf. Ex. 18¹³⁻²⁶ Num. 11¹⁴⁻¹⁷. Notice the absence in D of any reference to Jethro. (For the meaning of the symbols, J, E, P, D, H, used frequently in this commentary, see art. Pentateuch, p. 137.)

19-46. The Grapes of Eshkol. The Israelites broke camp at Horeb, passed through the great and terrible wilderness and arrived at Kadesh-Barnea. There they are commanded by Moses, on the authority of Jehovah, to take possession of the hill country of the Amorites (vv. 19-21). They demurred and suggested the sending of scouts (v. 22). Moses, accordingly, chose twelve scouts who explored the vale of Eshkol, and brought back a good report of the land and a sample of its fertility. None the less, the people refused to attack; they defied Jehovah, accusing him of taking them out of Egypt for the sinister purpose of destroying them at the hand of the Amorites (vv. 23-27). Apparently, the scouts had returned with alarming reports of the people (cf. Num. 13^{1f.}, P). Moses attempted to rally the Israelites, assuring them of the help of Jehovah in the attack, and reminding them of God's loving care in the past. All to no purpose. They would not trust Jehovah, their faithful, never-failing Guide. Consequently, Jehovah was wroth and swore that only Caleb and Joshua of that generation would enter the land. The privilege would be their children's. As for the rest, they were sent again into the wilderness (vv. 28-40). At the outburst of Jehovah's wrath the people bitterly repented; they resolved to advance, but were divinely warned through Moses that the opportunity is gone. None the less, in presumption and self-will, they advanced, and were driven back by the Amorites, as bees chasing them. Broken in spirit the people wept before Jehovah, but Jehovah hearkened not (vv. 41-46).

The paragraph forms a very "human document." The Israelites tasted the blessings of the good land and were content, or, at least, had not the courage to do and dare what was necessary for complete possession and satisfaction. They ate the manna, as it were, and were dead as before; the clusters of Eshkol brought no new life and determination. Therein is a parable. Men are content with the grapes of Eshkol, with a few clusters, when the vine on which those clusters grow, might, at the cost of willing sacrifice, be theirs in full possession. A virtue or two with their corresponding happiness are enough. They will not dare the sacrifice that would make the very source of virtue and happiness their own. To refuse that sacrifice is not only to lose the vine of Eshkol, it is to be driven into the wilderness. The refusal of the best, when it is offered, may mean the experience of the worst. Christendom to-day, for instance, is called to possess the nations for Christ. Christendom may be content with the grapes of Eshkol; it may dread the sacrifice demanded. The refusal may mean the loss of the grapes of Eshkol, of already attained Christian virtue and blessing, and not only that, but wandering in the wilderness of strife and war.

Another moral lesson "writ large" in the paragraph is—it is dangerous to trust the report of a few men rather than the proved fidelity of God.

Cf. Num. 13¹⁴. (P and JE) noting the differences between it and Deuteronomy which point to a double tradition in the Pentateuch.

CHAPTER II

Edom, Moab, Ammon. Defeat of Sihon, King of Heshbon. After the repulse of Kadesh the Israelites turned back and spent many days (thirty-eight years, v. 14) in circling round Mount Seir. Then Jehovah gave command to go northward and skirt the eastern border of Edom. Attack is forbidden on Edom, from whom Israel must purchase bread and water, for Israel can afford to be independent in view of God's providence these forty years (vv. 1-8). The same clemency is to be shown to Moab and Ammon and for the same reasons (vv. 9-25). Sihon, King of the Amorites, is to be attacked. Before doing so, Moses endeavored to come to terms (vv. 26-29). Sihon was defeated at Jahaz, the population was put to the ban, but the cattle and spoil of the cities were preserved (vv. 30-37). For "the ban" see 72.

For "the hardening" of Sihon's heart cf. Pharaoh (Ex. 7¹³). Jehovah's absoluteness does not, however, necessarily preclude free choice.

Vv. 10-12 and 20-23 are antiquarian notes. The Anakim (v. 10) were a legendary race of giants, also called Rephaim, Emim and Zamzumim (v. 20). Rephaim=Hebrew "ghosts" or "weak ones"; Emim (cf. Gen. 14⁵) perhaps="the terrors," and Zamzumim perhaps="whisperers." The giants had a ghostly and terrible reputation. Heshbon=modern Hesban.

CHAPTER III

1-17. Og, King of the Bashan. Bashan was a district of some extent north and northeast of Gilead, and was famed for its pastures and forests; it held sixty cities. Og was a formidable foe, the last of the Rephaim and the final barrier between Israel and the promised land. In his case no attempt was made at conciliation. He and his people were routed and his territory was given to the two and a half tribes (vv. 12f.). Og himself was slain; his immense body was put into a sarcophagus (bedstead of iron) and in Rabbah became a curiosity.

The story has points of interest. The ethics of Israel's attack would not be accepted by pacifists to-day. True, Og was a gross materialist and utter heathen. To-day we send missionaries to such; we do not exterminate them. But Og would not strike the Israelites (or even us) as a subject amenable to missionary zeal. And at this time Israel had not a gospel that could convert materialists like Og. Hence a procedure that might be right for Israel, and the only possible one, might not be right for us to-day.

However, Og stood a gigantic and ghostly terror, the impersonation of brute force blocking Israel's path. Israel, in Jehovah's strength, faced him and defeated him, with the result that Israel goes forward on his destined career, while this piece of gross materialism was laid in his iron coffin to be a ghostly curiosity. But this was not in Israel's history the end of Og. Time and again the victory over him was remembered, and Og actually took his place in the spiritual songs of Israel (Psa. 135¹¹ 136²⁰). The great and ghostly terror became a great and spiritual inspiration. Before a man can enter the promised land there may be some gigantic evil to be met—there is always the elusive giant Self—but once defeated the evil may become an unfailing source of inspiration.

V. 9 is an archæological note; vv. 14-17, based on Num. 32⁴¹, repeat vv. 12f.; Havoth (v. 14), perhaps tent villages; cf. Judg. 10⁴ 1 Chr. 22².

18-22. Instructions to the Two and a Half Tribes and Joshua. After the conquest of Og and partition of territory east of Jordan, Moses charged the two and a half tribes to send their warriors over Jordan to help their brethren, leaving their families and the cattle in the apportioned territory (vv. 18-20); at the same time he charged Joshua, bidding him be courageous, for Jehovah fighteth for Israel (vv. 21, 22).

Cf. Num. 32¹⁶⁻³². To the charge to Joshua at that time the Pentateuch has no parallel.

23-29. The Prayer of Moses and Its Rejection. At that time Moses entreated Jehovah to complete his kindness by allowing him to cross the Jordan and view the whole land (vv. 23-25). Angry with him on Israel's account, Jehovah refused and directed him to ascend the headland of Pisgah and from thence view the land (vv. 26f.). He was also to encourage Joshua (v. 28).

Notice the pathos in the prayer: it begins O Lord God, thou hast begun but not fulfilled. How true of life! the great game never played out, the great art never perfected, the task never complete. Failure is a mark of all experience, but a necessity for progress and life itself. "The lamp surcharged with oil chokes." "A man's reach should exceed his grasp." Always is it "the broken arc," never "the perfect round"; "the best is [always] yet to be."

Notice further Moses' heroism. In the greatness of Jehovah he places his confidence; refused, he bears no grudge; he is content with his vision and transfers his privilege to Joshua. So long as Israel's destiny is realized, that is to him everything. Cf. Danton's wish—"Let me be accursed so long as France is saved." V. 29 closes the retrospect.

CHAPTER IV

Vv. 1-40 give the second or hortatory part of Moses' first discourse.

1-8. Commands to Keep the Laws. Moses commands obedience to the statutes and judgments. This will insure life, entrance into and possession of the land. The laws are not to be tampered with in the interests of human weakness. The experience at Baalpeor (i.e., the place sacred to the local god of Peor) was a warning. Those who turned to heathenism are dead; those who resolutely clung to Jehovah are alive. If Israel will only be obedient, then his wisdom will be proved and his religion and morality will excite the admiration of surrounding nations.

This prophecy of Israel's future greatness has been literally fulfilled, signally among enlightened Greeks after the conquest of Asia Minor by Alexander the Great, and to-day it is the religion and morality of Israel that claim our interest. Israel's living God, nigh unto him (v. 7), hearing and answering prayer, with his law and its religious sanctions, are Israel's abiding distinction. After all, these two, religion and morality, are the strength of every civilization.

9-24. Against Idolatry. Israel must zealously keep in mind the spiritual worship of Jehovah and teach this worship to coming generations. Let the memory of Horeb abide. No form was then seen, only a voice was heard. The revelation was spiritual, demanding a spiritual response. Let Israel take heed not to corrupt this spirituality and themselves by any materialistic representation of Jehovah; let Israel keep clear of all heathenish practices—such as the worship of graven images and the host of heaven (vv. 9-19). Nature worship and materialism in every form must be avoided. Israel belongs to Jehovah, who brought him out of the iron furnace (v. 20), was angry with Moses on Israel's account (v. 21) and forbade his entrance into Canaan; so must Israel keep spiritual to insure the entrance denied to Moses; Israel must be strictly faithful to the covenant (v. 23), cleave solely and absolutely to Jehovah, for he is a jealous God (v. 24).

Jehovah is spirit. He speaks to the mind and conscience and demands a religion of the spirit. He has nothing to do with paganism or materialism. Worship of the Creator, not of the creature, is Jehovah's demand.

Statutes and judgments (v. 1): the distinction may be between positive institutions and legal decisions which became precedents, what we call "statute law" and "case law," or between religious ordinances and civil enactments; covenant (v. 13): generally any agreement guaranteeing friendly relations between nations and individuals, first used of Jehovah's relation to Israel in JE (Ex. 19⁵ 24⁷); which the Lord . . . all nations (v. 19): an interesting statement; Jehovah is the God of Israel and the gods of the nations are appointed by him—an attempt to reconcile the truth of Jehovah as one god with the existence of other gods. On worship of host of heaven see 173, note.

25-40. Threat of Exile with Promise of Forgiveness on Repentance. The Uniqueness of God. The day will come when Israel will find spiritual religion stale and its first freshness faded; he will then turn to idolatry. That day will be Israel's downfall. Diminished, he will be driven into exile and to the worship of senseless gods. To Israel repentant Jehovah will be forgiving; he will not let Israel down; he will remember the old covenant (vv. 25-31). For assurance let Israel turn to the past. No god ever acted like Jehovah. He chose Israel, disciplined him to hear the divine voice and see the divine wonders. He led Israel out of Egypt, and out of love for their fathers has brought the children to the promised land. No god is like Jehovah with his personal love for Israel—and so in the day of apostasy and disaster (this is the implicit argument) he will be able to forgive and restore. But (with a return to the keynote in v. 1) keep the statutes and judgments (vv. 32-40).

41-43. Appointment of Three Cities of Refuge on East of Jordan. In 191-13 six cities appear to be appointed for the first time; these verses (441-43) may be a later addition. Cf. Num. 359-24 (P) and Josh. 2014. In earlier times asylum was granted at any and every altar (Ex. 2112-14).

44-49. Superscription to the Deuteronomic Code. This seems superfluous in view of 16-440. It may, therefore, be a later addition, or 16-440 may be the later addition. Driver accepts both as original parts of Deuteronomy.

CHAPTERS 5 TO 26, 28: SECOND ADDRESS OF MOSES

The theme of this long second address of Moses is the exposition of the Law. It comprises two parts: (1) a hortatory section (chs. 5-11); and (2) the code of special laws (chs. 12-26, 28).

CHAPTER V

1-21. The Ten Words. Moses begins his delivery of the Deuteronomic Law by a reference to the covenant made at Horeb where all his hearers were present. The covenant consists, according to Deuteronomy, of the giving of the ten words which Israel, on his part, has to obey. The following are the main characteristics of the rendering in Deuteronomy of "the ten words"—(1) hortatory additions, (2) more definite and emphatic statement, (3) raising of the wife's status, (4) humanitarian motive for the observance of the Sabbath, (5) additional motives for honoring parents, (6) the addition of "ox," "ass," "manservant" and "woman servant" to the list of Ex. 2010. The relation of the two editions (Ex. 2014 and Deuteronomy's) to each other and to other words given at Horeb is difficult. It is by no means certain that Ex. 2014 is the earlier, for it contains Deuteronomic expressions and one sentence (vv. 5b 6) reflects P. Notice too that in Ex. 20 the giving of the ten words from Sinai-Horeb is not connected with a covenant, which is connected in Ex. 243-8 with other words; again Exodus connects the ten words with other words (Ex. 2022f. 21f.) while Deuteronomy says that only the ten words were spoken from Horeb. It is probable that "the ten words" of Deuteronomy and of Exodus are derived from a still more primitive and briefer code. To the present writer there seems no insuperable difficulty in the opinion that the morality of Israel with a code goes back to Moses himself. How this came to Moses is the secret of his spirit. In him there is the inexplicable element that marks all genius, not least, genius of the religious order. Even if we could construct Moses out of his past, there would still be a residuum outside the sphere of historical influences—a residuum, which, in the last resort, can only be attributed to the living God. Consult further Ex. 20f. in this commentary and article "Decalogue" in any Bible Dictionary. A few brief notes are here appended.

6. The Preface. The tenderness is characteristic of Deuteronomy. I am the Lord thy God. The basing of Israel's duty on a great redemption is characteristic of O.T. religion—grace comes before law.

7. First Commandment. No rival god, real or unreal, to Jehovah is permitted.

8. Second Commandment. Against images. Such materializing denies the spirituality of Jehovah and degrades worship.

11. Third Commandment. Prohibition against the use of Jehovah's name for any unworthy purpose (e.g., some superstitious practice). It is a demand for reverence; not only that, but for truth and reality. The man from whose lips the name of God falls carelessly and frequently will lose hold of truth and reality. Cf. the N.T. saying, "Not everyone that saith Lord, Lord."

12-15. Fourth Commandment. Cf. Exodus and notice the more humane spirit of Deuteronomy. The Sabbath is a divine institution made in the interests of man, that man may remember God not only on the Sabbath but always.

16. Fifth Commandment. As in Exodus, but two additions: (1) as the Lord thy God commanded thee and (2) that it may be well with thee, a Deuteronomic phrase impressing Deuteronomy's doctrine of providence.

17-20. Sixth, Seventh, Eighth and Ninth Commandments. As in Exodus; for the word, "false" (Ex. 2016) Deuteronomy (Hebrew) has a broader term—"groundless."

21. Tenth Commandment. This passes from the sphere of action to that of thought and feeling. Paul (Rom. 77) selects this as exhibiting the spirit of the whole Law. Notice two differences from Ex. 2017: (1) the wife placed by herself; cf. Deut. 2110f. 2213f. 241f. for higher status of woman; (2) Deuteronomy adds his field (v. 21).

22-33. Request for a Mediator. After the giving of "the ten words" Jehovah added no more (contrast Ex.), but wrote them on the two tables of stone and handed them to Moses (v. 22). The overawed people then requested Moses to act as mediator (vv. 23-27). The request is willingly granted (vv. 28b-30). As for Moses, he is bidden to receive from Jehovah instruction for the people (v. 31). The paragraph closes with an exhortation in Deuteronomic phraseology to obey the new charge (vv. 32f.).

The request gives expression to the permanent need in national life of men specially gifted to interpret to their fellows the contemporaneous mind and will of God (as the Lord your God hath commanded you (v. 32), i.e., through Moses who is now about to give the new instruction to the people).

CHAPTER VI

1-3. The Benefits of Obedience. Moses states that he has now in Moab to fulfill the charge given in Horeb to expound the statutes and judgments. Obedience to these will result in reverence for Jehovah, length of days, and prosperity in the land which Jehovah has promised to give (cf. LXX).

4-9. The Fundamental Creed and the Fundamental Duty. This paragraph is the Jewish "Shema," so called from the first word in the Hebrew—Hear. With 11¹³⁻²¹ and Num. 15³⁷⁻⁴¹ it is the first scripture taught to Jewish children and has for centuries been the confession of faith among Jews. Later law demanded its recital every day, morning and evening. Jehovah our God is one Jehovah. The four possible renderings given by R.V. and R.V. mg. can be resolved into two: (1) Jehovah our God is one and indivisible—there are not many Jehovahs with different characteristics and localities; and (2) Jehovah is Israel's only God. Taken together the two are almost, if not quite, a declaration of monotheism.

This God Israel is charged to love with all his mind and soul (a Deuteronomic expression) and with all his strength. The one God demands the whole man. This primary and complete duty (outside Deuteronomy and Deuteronomic passages only referred to once in the Pentateuch, Ex. 20⁶) is set forth with peculiar emphasis in Deuteronomy in all its prosaic details, in its pragmatic teaching of history; in all its exhortations there runs the one echoing refrain, the one haunting motif—love of God. These words then in vv. 4f. are to be engraven on Israel's memory, impressed on the imagination of his children; they are to be the subject of conversation at home and abroad, at the break and the close of the day; to be a sign upon the hand and for frontlets between the eyes, to be inscribed on the doorposts of the house and on the gates of the village; in a word, these sublime words are to become the daily inspiration and the daily practice of Israel (vv. 6-9).

Our Lord made these words (v. 5) "the first commandment of all." And the great religious and national ideal which they express is still the necessity and the guarantee of a nation's true prosperity. It can become an effective national ideal only through individual acceptance (notice the "thou" and "thy" in v. 2) and the individual can make this ideal only through the grace of God (see 1 Jn. 4¹⁹). On v. 8 consult article "Phylacteries" in Bible Dictionary.

10-19. The Testing Time. When Israel has entered into the enjoyment of a civilization to which he has not contributed (vv. 10f.), then let Israel beware of forgetting his Deliverer (vv. 12f.), of imagining that the new wealth is due to the gods of the land and of serving them; Jehovah is the real giver of it all and he is a jealous God (v. 15). Only by steadfast obedience will Israel prosper (vv. 16-19).

How necessary the warning still is for the individual and nation! Civilization believes so easily that it has created itself—its knowledge, art, literature, its politics and all its wealth—forgetting that it is God that hath made us and not we ourselves nor any other forces less than God. The remembrance that the creative power and redemptive grace are the sources of all would save nations and individuals from the danger and disaster of prosperity.

Vv. 16f. are probably an addition and scarcely relevant here.

20-25. The Origin and Meaning of Law. When future generations ask the meaning of Israel's law, the answer is, Jehovah redeemed us unto life, and to complete this redemption and to maintain the life, he gave law in obedience to which Israel will gain and keep the righteousness that is life.

The purpose of law, then, is to preserve the life created by redeeming grace. Law is founded upon grace. The Christian law of service rests upon grace. "We love because he first loved us." Further, the act of grace can be kept permanent and alive only by man's continued obedience to the principle of grace.

CHAPTER VII

I-II. No Compromise with Heathenism. Israel must have no private or public dealings with the heathen nations which Jehovah will deliver into his hand. These must be put to the ban (vv. 1-5), for Israel is a holy people, consecrated to Jehovah who chose Israel for his sacred possession, not because of Israel's greatness; indeed, Israel was least among the nations. All Jehovah's wonderful deeds and gracious dealing are due to his love and faithfulness alone (vv. 6-8); Jehovah is everlastingly loyal to the loving and obedient, and requites his enemies. Let Israel know this—feel the force of it—and be obedient (vv. 9-11).

Such enumeration of the nations as in v. 1 is common in JE and Deuteronomic writers—the enumeration is rhetorical; for pillars and Asherim (v. 5) see 123, note.

12-26. The Rewards of Obedience. As a reward for obedience Jehovah will be steadfast in his loving-kindness. Every blessing will come to Israel, even health, while the diseases of Egypt will be reserved for other nations. Israel will devour his enemies and must have no pity (vv. 12-16). If Israel should think that the nations are too strong, let him remember that the great and terrible God is still with him. Jehovah will gradually and providentially drive out the nations and their kings (vv. 17-24.) In the hour of victory burn the heathen gods; let their gold and silver be an abomination and detestable, mere contact with which or even coveting would pollute Israel (vv. 25f.).

The idea of material prosperity as the reward for faithfulness is common to the O.T. And, no doubt, a righteous and God-fearing people means a healthy and prosperous people. On the other hand, immorality and irreligion are frequently among the factors of a prosperous population. With the individual the same law holds, but again with many exceptions. The best rewards of righteousness, however, are not in the market place, but in the soul. And to nations and individuals alike, it will be found, when life is viewed profoundly and broadly, that God never fails to pay his workmen in peace and joy.

Abomination (v. 25), that which is ritually and religiously unlawful and abhorrent; detest (v. 26): cf. noun, "detested thing," practically the same meaning as abomination; devoted thing=banned; cf. Josh. 7¹ and article "Ban" in Bible Dictionary.

CHAPTER VIII

A Call to the Remembrance of God's Providence With Its Obligations. Israel is bidden to keep the whole of the Deuteronomic Law, nor should he forget any of the discipline of the wilderness which had as its purpose the humbling of Israel, i.e., the creating of the feeling of dependence. In particular, the manna had this purpose, teaching Israel his complete dependence upon God's providence, whether ordinary or extraordinary; the chastenings too were signs, not of God's hostility but of his fatherly providence (vv. 1-6); the latter statement is remarkable in Deuteronomy, which regards physical suffering as a punishment for sin.

This discipline, gracious and generous, with its consequent duties, needs to be specially remembered in view of the nature of the land which Jehovah is about to give to his people. Its fertility, its wealth of minerals, its easily acquired commodities and luxuries—the whole generosity of the gifts calls for exceptional care against pride, self-sufficiency and forgetfulness of the providential and redemptive past (vv. 7-16). The temptation will be great and subtle to believe and say, "My power and the might of my hand hath gotten me this wealth"—to forget God and follow after other gods. Should Israel forget God as the Giver of all, Israel will perish like the dispossessed peoples (vv. 17-20).

This reminder of Moses becomes more and more urgent with the advance of civilization. The very generosity of God in the growing wealth of civilization may have its end defeated by blindness of heart.

Brooks (v. 7)=wadys either with only a winter flow or a continual stream; fountains (v. 7)=perennial springs; depths (or springs, v. 7)=outbursts of water from underground; oil-olives (or olive trees, v. 8)=cultivated olives; iron (v. 9)=basalt or iron proper; brass (or copper, v. 9)=bronze mixed with tin, or pure bronze.

CHAPTER IX

1-7. Warning Against Self-righteousness. Israel is about to dispossess nations mightier than himself. Jehovah is with him and victory is sure and summary. Let not Israel be deluded into believing that Jehovah is giving this signal victory because of any exceptional righteousness of Israel. From the time Israel left Egypt, he has been stiff-necked and intractable; Jehovah is dispossessing the nations for their wickedness and in simple fidelity to his promises.

That the gracious dealings of God do not rest on man's merit is a truth emphasized by the N.T. Man can never be out of God's debt; all is due to God's grace alone.

8-29. Proof From the Past, and Especially From the Incident of the Golden Calf, of Israel's Obduracy, Which, Had Not Moses Interceded, Would Have Brought National Destruction. (Continued in 10¹⁻¹¹.) This retrospect, in general style similar to chs. 1-3 and like it based on JE (Ex. 32, 34, etc.), is a composite, historical paragraph breaking in upon Moses' exhortation.

Israel is proved to be a stiff-necked people by his behavior at Horeb (v. 8), where, while Moses was on the mount receiving the tables of stone, he made a golden calf, thus arousing the wrath of Jehovah (vv. 9-14). Moses thereon broke the tables, fasted forty days and forty nights, in fear of Jehovah's wrath (vv. 15-19a). At Moses' intercession Jehovah pardoned both Aaron and the people, and Moses destroyed the golden calf (vv. 19b-21). Nor was Horeb the only place where the obdurate temper was shown (vv. 22-24). Moses intercedes for the people (vv. 25-29).

CHAPTER X

1-11. (See under 98-29.) Moses' intercession prevailed, for God gave commandment to hew out two other tables, and wrote again the ten words thereon, which Moses placed in the ark which he had been ordered to make (vv. 1-5). A fragment of an itinerary follows with mention of the death of Aaron (vv. 6f.). The separation of the tribe of Levi to the priesthood is mentioned (vv. 8f.). A renewed statement is given of Moses' intercession (probably going back to 926-29) on the mount with the command to lead the people forward (vv. 10f.). Consult articles "Ark" and "Levi" in Bible Dictionary.

12-22. Exhortation to Reverence and Love the Great and Righteous God. In conclusion, let Israel respond to Jehovah's demand—no complicated task—for what he demands is love, reverence, and practical obedience. He can demand these, for though Lord of all, he chose, of his own free love, the patriarchs and their seed for the purpose of revealing himself to them (vv. 12-15). Let Israel then circumscribe his heart—become receptive—and cease from his obduracy. Hardness of heart and self-will are vain in face of the sovereignty and absolute righteousness of Jehovah, whose justice and love are shown impartially. Let Israel imitate Jehovah; love the sojourner as Jehovah loved Israel, when he was a sojourner in a strange land (vv. 16-19). Reverence, then, serve and cleave to Jehovah. Let him be the object of thy praise, for—to take a particular instance—out of seventy persons he has made thee a great nation (vv. 20-22).

CHAPTER XI

1-9. An Appeal to Experience. Let Israel, then, love and obey Jehovah. His greatness and his grace are not hearsay, nor are they based on any outward authority: they themselves experienced the discipline in the great and terrible acts of Jehovah—in the deliverance from Egypt, in the long tramp in the wilderness, in the tragedies of Dathan and Abiram. With that discipline, his own, let Israel guard the whole charge; on that depend his life and prosperity, as Israel knows for himself.

10-25. A Warning. Canaan is not like Egypt where hard industry could keep the land watered and fertile; Canaan is a land of hills and valleys, dependent for water upon the rain of heaven, a land which is under the continuous personal supervision of Jehovah and always dependent upon his consideration (vv. 10-12). Therefore in Canaan let Israel sedulously keep Jehovah's commandments and he will give the rain upon which depends the whole fertility of the country (vv. 13-15). The generosity of Jehovah, however, may be a possible source of temptation, leading Israel to believe that the fertility is due to the Baalim (the local gods) and to worship these, so arousing Jehovah's wrath and bringing disaster (vv. 16f.). Therefore let Israel remember Jehovah's commandments (vv. 18-21; cf. ch. 6). Obedience will lead to complete possession of Canaan (vv. 22-25).

Again an appeal to materialistic motives! Let it be remembered, however, that the appeal is to the nation as a whole, and that perhaps the most impressive way to present the worth of goodness to a nation is to emphasize its concrete and material results. After all, there is truth in the saying, that sound morality and pure religion are good economics. "Seek ye first his kingdom and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you," said Jesus; the position of Deuteronomy is very similar: reverence and love Jehovah for what he is; put his laws into daily practice and it shall be well with thee.

Sowedst thy seed (v. 10). Only here are we told that the Hebrews practiced agriculture in Egypt. Wateredst it with thy foot . . . herbs (v. 10)—the meaning is uncertain; most likely it refers to the guiding with the foot of water through narrow channels, or it may refer to some machine worked by the foot, perhaps the shaduf, which carried water in a bucket from the river bed, or to water wheels—in any case to some method that might be used in Canaan for a small patch or garden of herbs, but would be impossible for general irrigation. The former rain and the latter rain (v. 14)—the former that breaks up the dry, sun-burned ground continues through winter till the latter rain, so important for the ripening of the crop, comes in April and May.

26-28. The Summing up of the Discourse. (Chs. 5-11; see introductory paragraph preceding ch. 5.) Obedience brings blessings; disobedience a curse (cf. 301, 15, 19).

29. An Outward Ceremony. This ceremony gives a certain sanction to the blessing and the curse (cf. 2711-13). Gerizim lies to the south, i.e., on the right hand according to Semitic orientation, and regarded as the auspicious quarter; Ebal on the north, or left hand, the inauspicious quarter.

30. A Geographical Addition. (Cf. 12). The way of the going down of the sun, supposed to be the great road running north and south through western Palestine; the Arabah (cf. 11), not relevant here; Gilgal—stone circle; there was more than one place of this name, probably a Gilgal near Shechem is meant; oaks of Moreh—LXX has “the oak of the revealer” (cf. Gen. 12⁸).

31, 32. A transition to the actual code (chs. 12–16, 28).

CHAPTERS 12 TO 26, 28: THE SPECIAL CODE

These chapters form the second part of Moses' second and main discourse (chs. 5–26, 28; see introductory paragraph preceding ch. 5). They give the practical exposition promised in 15, particularize the various statutes and judgments (seventy in all) by which Israel has to regulate his daily life and which form a legal code. But the code is not a mere code, for all through it the same motives and exhortations are urged that we have found in preceding chapters. In this feature the Deuteronomic Code distinguishes itself from the book of the covenant (Ex. 21–23). The arrangement of the laws is far from precise and consistent, but they fall roughly and with interruptions and overlappings into four main divisions of unequal length:

1. Laws of Sacred Institutions and Worship, 12¹–16¹⁷.

2. Laws of Office-bearers, Judges, King, Prophet, 16¹⁸–18²².

3. Laws Relating to Crime, War, Property, Evidence, 19¹–21⁹.

4. Laws Miscellaneous—Civil, Military and Domestic, 21¹⁰–25¹⁶. (25^{17–19}, on Amalek.)

Hortatory Conclusion, ch. 26.

Peroration, ch. 28.

(Ch. 27 is an interruption and later addition.)

CHAPTERS 12¹ TO 16¹⁷: LAWS OF SACRED INSTITUTIONS AND WORSHIP

CHAPTER XII

1. The Title. Statutes and judgments, as already stated (5¹), may be equivalent to statute law and case law, or statutes may refer to decrees dealing with religion and its institutions and judgments to civil and criminal laws. There is no reference to commandment or charge (Hebrew mizwah), perhaps because this is supposed to have been given in chs. 5–11.

2–7. Law of the One Altar. First Pronouncement. In Canaan the Israelites must destroy all the sacred places upon the hills and beneath spreading trees and not worship in these places and in heathen-wise (vv. 2–4). The places of sacrifice are to be cast down, the obelisks to be broken, the Asherim, or sacred poles, to be burned, the graven images hewn into pieces; every trace of all this idolatry is to be destroyed (v. 4 appears an addition disconnecting v. 3 from v. 5). But to the one place that Jehovah shall choose out of all the tribes shall the Israelites bring all their offerings and there shall they eat with all their household before Jehovah and rejoice in all their enterprises (vv. 5–7).

Pillars, or obelisks (v. 3), natural or artificial boulders in which the Deity was supposed to reside; Asherim (v. 3), wooden masts representing the sacred tree, also the abode of the Deity; heave offering (v. 6)—what is lifted from the common mass, perhaps “personal contribution.”

8–12. Second Pronouncement. The present irregular manner may be tolerated in Moab, for the Israelites have not come to the settled state which Jehovah intends to give (vv. 8f.). When they have come, they shall bring all their offerings to the sanctuary that Jehovah shall choose and they shall rejoice with all their house and the landless Levite (vv. 10–12).

13–19. Third Pronouncement. Practically the same as the two previous (vv. 15f. anticipate vv. 20–25 and disturb the connection).

20–28. A Relaxation in View of the New Law. When Jehovah has enlarged Israel's border in Canaan and when an Israelite living at an inconvenient distance from the One Altar desires to make a feast of flesh, he may kill of his stock, of the ritually clean or unclean, eat and rejoice, just as he would eat of game such as the gazelle or hart (vv. 20–22). But the blood must not be taken, it must be poured upon the ground for the Israelite's own sake, i.e., to prevent his ritual pollution (vv. 23–25). All holy sacrifice, however, must be at the One Altar (vv. 26f.). Keep this whole law (v. 28).

In early Israel all slaughter was sacrificial, but if there was only one place of legitimate sacrifice, an Israelite who desired to make a feast might be in a difficulty. So domestic animals were placed on the same level as wild animals taken in the hunt, which were not regarded as akin to man, and therefore need not be eaten sacramentally. So this relaxation (vv. 20f.) would prevent religion from becoming too burdensome and from interfering unnecessarily with social enjoyment. The blood was identified with the life, as such it belonged to the Deity, was inviolably sacrosanct; so, however keen an Israelite might be for the blood (see 1 Sam. 14³²), he must sternly restrain his desire.

29–31. Syncretism Forbidden. Neither curiosity nor self-interested desire must lead the Israelites in Canaan to traffic with Canaanish gods and ritual. All such is intolerable to Jehovah, for (to take an extreme instance) even children are sacrificed.

Syncretism in religion is always a wrong method, for truth is never attained by indiscriminate comprehension but by fidelity to fundamental and proved principles. The prevalent Semitic idea was that not only must the gods of an invaded land be propitiated but also that the local ritual or mishpat must be adopted (cf. 1 Sam. 26¹⁹ 2 Kings 17^{25f.}). For child sacrifice (v. 31) see 18¹⁰.

32. 13¹ in Hebrew. See 13¹⁻⁵.

CHAPTER XIII

1-5. Miracle no Test of Prophetic Truth. (See also 12³².) No prophet or dreamer whose word, even though it be attested by a marvel, implies defection from Jehovah is to be listened to (vv. 1-3a). By such a prophet Jehovah is actually testing the people's love. Cling to Jehovah (vv. 3b, 4). Such a prophet shall be put to death for his apostate speech against the Redeemer and for his attempted seduction of Israel. Exterminate, then, the evil. (Cf. Mt. 16³ Mk. 8^{11f.} Jn. 7¹⁷.) Thou shalt put away (v. 5)—a formula peculiar to Deuteronomy, laying upon the community the duty of clearing itself from all complicity with the specified evil.

6-11. Against Heathenish Enticements from Kith and Kin. Should one of one's own kith and kin secretly entice to idolatry, such an one shall be ruthlessly stoned. The witness to the sin shall cast the first stone, then the community, for such an one is trying to seduce Israel from Jehovah the Redeemer. The sentence will act as a deterrent to all Israel. (Cf. "He that loveth father or mother," Mt. 10³⁷.)

12-18. A Short Way with the Corrupters of Society. A problem arises: certain base people are said to be corrupting a city. Let the matter be carefully sifted. If the charge is true, then the whole community is put to the ban in its completest form—an instance of Deuteronomy's policy of no compromise with evil. Leniency was too great a moral risk. Base fellows—sons of Belial—worthless, immoral men (cf. 1 Sam. 2¹², A.V.)

CHAPTER XIV

1, 2. Against Heathenish Mourning. Sons of Jehovah are the Israelites; let them not gash their bodies or set baldness between their eyes. Israel is holy, Jehovah's special possession. With v. 2 cf. 7⁶; for these rites see Isa. 22¹² Amos 8¹⁰ Jer. 16⁶.

3-20. Clean and Unclean Foods. Cf. Lev. 11²⁻²³ (P); 20²⁵ (H); not in JE. There is no reference to this Law in the reforms of Josiah.

V. 21a: cf. Ex. 22³¹ (E) and Lev. 17^{15f.} (H). V. 21b: cf. Ex. 23^{19b} (E) and Ex. 34^{26b} J).

22-29. Concerning Tithes. Tithes (specified) are to be taken and eaten in Jehovah's sanctuary. Such a practice will lead to reverence of the Giver of all (vv. 22f.). If an Israelite be too far from the sanctuary, he may turn the tithes into money, buy at the sanctuary and feast with his household and the Levite (vv. 24-27). Every third year, however, all the tithe is to be retained for the Levite and the poor (vv. 28f.); i.e., the tithe is to be "secularized" into a "poor rate." Not in JE; in Num. 18²¹⁻³² (P) the law is quite different. The differences are due to the fact that the laws come from different periods, reflecting different historical and social backgrounds. (For similar differences in laws dealing with other subjects, see art., Pentateuch, p. 139.)

CHAPTER XV

1-11. The Year of Release; Borrowing and Lending. Every seventh year all creditors shall religiously cancel their loans to fellow Israelites, but not to foreigners. But if Israel is faithful, there will be no poor: Israel will lend, not borrow (vv. 1-6). Nor must an Israelite take advantage of the approach of this year and refuse loans to the poor, who will always be with them (vv. 7-11).

The contradiction is understandable in view of Deuteronomy's two ideals: (1) of loyalty to Jehovah with its inevitable prosperity, and (2) of philanthropy to the poor. The law applies to charitable loans (and their whole remission is intended) and not to interest, for this class of loan yielded no interest. Not in the other O.T. codes.

Borrowing and lending is, no doubt, a precarious practice. The generous lender is often deceived and the generous borrower has, sometimes, no need of a specially proclaimed year of release. Polonius' advice is not a bad rule. "Neither a borrower nor a lender be; for loan oft loses both itself and friend, and borrowing dulls the edge of husbandry," but, on the other hand, to refuse to grant a loan might be, in certain circumstances, mean and cruel, and to refuse to accept one but a proud folly.

12-18. Emancipation of Slaves. A slave is to be set free in the seventh year of service. Nor must he (or she) be cast penniless upon the world, but be richly endowed, for the Israelites were slaves redeemed by Jehovah (vv. 12-15). At his pleasure and after the customary rite he may remain for life as an old retainer in his master's house (vv. 16f.). The owner shall not take the emancipation ill, for he has received six years' service, double the hire of a hireling (quite cheap labor), and himself has been in many ways blessed by Jehovah (v. 18).

The law does not institute slavery but regulates it as humanely as possible. Hebrews fell into servitude through crime or poverty, but their condition as slaves was good and their law reveals the possibility of happy relations between master and slave. Through his ear (v. 17), i.e., the organ of obedience; cf. Ex. 21²⁻⁶ (E); Lev. 25³⁹⁻⁵⁵ (H and P).

19-23. Of Firstlings. Unworked firstlings of oxen and unshorn of sheep are to be consecrated and eaten at a yearly feast by the owner and his house at the central sanctuary (vv. 19f.). A blemished firstling is not to be offered in sacrifice but eaten at home as ordinary food, provided none of the blood be taken (vv. 21-23). The parallels are Ex. 13¹¹⁻¹⁶ 22^{28f.} 34¹⁹ (JE) and Ex. 13² Num. 18¹⁵⁻¹⁸ (P); cf. Deut. 12²⁰⁻²⁵. Deuteronomy does not treat the subject exhaustively, but aims at accommodating the existing law to the changed conditions of the one sanctuary: P makes the firstlings the perquisites of the priests—a position irreconcilable with that of Deuteronomy, according to which the offerer and his family enjoy them—an encroachment of the priesthood on the rights of the laity.

CHAPTER XVI

The Three Annual Festivals or Pilgrimages. (Vv. 1-17). The three feasts—the Passover with Mazzoth (unleavened loaves), Weeks, and Booths—were doubtless all originally connected with agriculture and were an acknowledgment of God's bountifulness in the fruits of the earth. "Passover" and "Mazzoth" celebrated the appearance of the young and ripening ears in the spring; "Weeks" or "Harvest" (Ex. 23¹⁶) or "Firstfruits" (Num. 28²⁶) the completion of the wheat harvest, and "Booths" (D and P), or "Ingathering," that of the vintage. In time, however, they all attained an historical meaning, "Passover" commemorating the sparing of the first-born in Egypt; "Mazzoth," the unleavened cakes made by the Israelites at the time of their flight; and "Booths," the years spent by the Israelites in the wilderness (P). "Weeks" finds no historical connection in the O.T.; later Jews, however, connected it with the giving of the Law from Sinai.

Deuteronomy definitely connects "Mazzoth" with "Passover"; localizes all the feasts at the central sanctuary and emphasizes their social joyousness, especially that of "Weeks" and "Booths."

1-8. Passover with Mazzoth. To be held in the month Abib (March-April, the later Nisan), and kept by the sacrifice of a bullock or sheep (vv. 1f.). For seven days unleavened bread is to be eaten, the bread of affliction, commemorative of the trepidation that marked the Exodus from Egypt; no leaven shall be found in Israel's borders during these days nor any of the Passover-sacrifice after the first evening (vv. 3f.). The offering is to be boiled and eaten in the evening at the central sanctuary and in the morning the Israelites shall return home (vv. 5-7). For six days shall unleavened bread be eaten, and, in the seventh, a sacred convocation shall be held and no work done.

The passage is composite, for vv. 3f. break the connection of vv. 1f. with vv. 5-7; there is also a contradiction between seven days (vv. 3f.) and six days (v. 8); again v. 7 fixes the feast for one day, vv. 3f. and 8 for seven. Originally there may have been two distinct laws, one for Passover (one day) and another for Mazzoth (seven days) which are here combined—not too successfully. Cf. for "Passover," Ex. 12²¹⁻²⁷ 23^{18b} 34²⁵ (JE); Ex. 12¹⁻¹³ Lev. 23⁵ Num. 9¹⁻¹⁴ 28¹⁶ (P); for "Mazzoth," Ex. 13³⁻¹⁰ 23¹⁵ 34¹⁸ (JE); Lev. 23⁶ (H); Ex. 12¹⁴⁻²⁰ Num. 28¹⁷⁻²⁵ (P).

9-12. Weeks. This was a harvest festival celebrated seven weeks after the start of the harvest, with gifts, according as the offerer has been blessed by Jehovah, in company with his household, the poor and the Levite, at the central sanctuary. Cf. Ex. 23¹⁶ ("Harvest"), 34²² (JE) Lev. 23¹⁵⁻²⁰ (H) Lev. 23²¹ Num. 28²⁶⁻³¹ ("Firstfruits"; P); Deuteronomy, unlike the other codes, makes no mention of firstfruits; v. 12 connects with manservant (slave) in v. 11; it is not relevant to the Law as a whole but is true to the spirit of Deuteronomy.

13-15. Booths. Another joyous harvest festival—the crowning one (cf. 1 Kings 8²⁻⁶⁵)—celebrated for seven days after harvest and the vintage by the Israelite with his family dependents and the poor at the central sanctuary. Ex. 23¹⁶ ("Ingathering") (JE) Lev. 23³⁹⁻⁴³ (P).

16, 17. Summary. The limitation to "males" does not conflict with vv. 1-15; to males attendance was obligatory, to others voluntary.

CHAPTERS 16¹⁸ TO 18²²: LAWS OF OFFICE-BEARERS, ETC.

18-20. Appointment of Judges. Judges are to be appointed in the various towns; they are to exercise their office with scrupulous impartiality and purity of motive. Bribery (very common in the East) is to be sternly eschewed. Righteousness—that must be the one aim. The details of judicial institutions among the Hebrews are unknown; the other codes in the Pentateuch simply presuppose the existence of judges and inculcate purity and impartiality (cf. Ex. 23¹⁻³, 6-8 Lev. 19¹⁵); the officers (v. 18) were probably subordinate officials, Deut. 20⁵, 8, 9 (cf. Johns, Code of Hammurabi, §5; hereafter referred to as C. H.).

21, 22. No Asherah and No Massebah to Be Placed Beside Jehovah's Altar. Cf. 12³, note. The Asherah is thought by some to have represented the female element and the Massebah (pillar) the male element in the Deity. Consult articles, "Asherah" and "Massebah" or "Pillar," in Bible Dictionaries.

CHAPTER XVII

1. Against Blemished Sacrifices. No bullock or sheep unless physically perfect is to be offered to Jehovah. Whatever may have been the original ideas behind this law (e.g., that sacrifice was the food of the Deity and should be of the best), there would be the natural temptation to offer the second best to Jehovah—the common abiding temptation to cheapen religion. Cf. Lev. 22¹⁷⁻²⁵ (P); not in JE.

2-7. Punishment of Idolaters. If any idolater be actually discovered and the offense proved, the idolater, man or woman, shall be stoned (vv. 2-5), but the case must be conclusively proved on the word of two or three witnesses; in this way shall the evil be burned out; the witnesses shall cast the first stone (vv. 6, 7). The seductive worship of the host of heaven, a main feature in Babylonian religion, is alluded to frequently in O.T. (See 2 Kings 17^{6f}, 23⁴, 5 Zeph. 1⁵ Jer. 8² 19¹³ Ezek. 31⁶.)

8-13. The Law of Appeal. Where a case, criminal or civil, is too difficult for the local courts (see 16¹⁸⁻²⁰, with which this passage is naturally connected), it is to be taken before the Levitical priests and a judge at the central sanctuary, whose decisions must be literally carried out on the spot (vv. 8-11). The man who refuses to accept the decision of the priest or the judge shall be put to death and be an example to all challengers of authority (vv. 12f.). The decision, of course, through the priest or judge is regarded as that of Jehovah; hence the severe punishment for contempt of court. For the dual authority cf. 19¹⁷ and 2 Chr. 19^{8, 11}.

14-20. The Law of the King. When Israel desires a king like other nations, he must be chosen of Jehovah and must be a native Israelite; he shall not amass cavalry nor encourage the people to trade with Egypt in horses (vv. 14-16); he shall not have many wives nor accumulate too much wealth (v. 17).

Seated on his throne, he shall make a copy of this code before the Levitical priests and shall study it continually. This will teach him reverence and obedience, and save him from arrogance toward his subjects, who are his brethren (vv. 18-20). This law is peculiar to Deuteronomy; it has points of contact with 1 Sam. 7², 17 8, 10^{17-27a}, i.e., with the later of the two narratives in First Samuel dealing with the establishment of the monarchy (see introduction to Samuel, p. 381). It is doubtful whether Deuteronomy or the narration in First Samuel is the older. The reference to wives, wealth, and horses is to the conduct of Solomon and implies a memory of his reign. The statement that the king shall be no foreigner is strange, for at no time in Israel's history did this danger seriously emerge. The main purpose of the Law is theocratic, and it is meant to guard against foreign influence.

CHAPTER XVIII

1-8. Of Priestly Dues. The Levitical priests (the whole tribe), being landless, shall have Jehovah as their inheritance, receiving the fire-offerings and other specified sacred dues. Jehovah has chosen Levi to be his priests forever (vv. 1-5). If a Levite shall keenly desire to leave his village and officiate at the One Altar, he may do so and take equal rank and share with the Levite already in residence, besides retaining what he may have realized from his practice, or—another interpretation—any property he may have inherited (vv. 6-8). See on 10⁹. The dues of the priest are different in P, Lev. 7^{31f}. Num. 18¹⁸; the latter half of this law was not carried out in Josiah's reformation (2 Kings 23⁹), perhaps because of the self-interested opposition of the priests already in residence.

9-22. Of the Prophet. In the promised land Israel must have nothing to do with any heathen superstitions such as child-sacrifice, divination, soothsaying, enchantments, sorceries, charms (by magic knots, spells, or incantations), ghosts, spiritualistic mediums, necromancy. These nine forms of superstition are to be strictly eschewed; they are abominations which have proved destructive to the heathen; let Israel have no traffic with them (vv. 9-14). Nor will this be necessary, for to Israel will be given a succession of prophets, raised up from among the people, representatives, like Moses, of Jehovah, just as the people had requested at Horeb. Let Israel hearken to these; from those that hearken not Jehovah will exact the fitting punishment (vv. 15-19). Any prophet who speaks in self-presumption, or in the name of other gods, will be put to death. And the test of a true prophet is that his word comes true (vv. 20–22).

This law of the prophet is peculiar to Deuteronomy, though throughout the O.T. the superstitions referred to are forbidden (1 Sam. 28³). The Law recognizes prophecy as a factor in the theocratic life of Israel; through prophecy are communicated the mind and will of God upon which Israel's life and destiny depend. Prophecy in Israel no doubt arose out of crude beginnings—out of the very superstitions which are here condemned—but the fact that it did rise and became the rational and spiritual power proves two things: (1) that there is a living God revealing his mind and will, and (2) that Israel, by God's choice and grace, was through its prophetic personalities in contact with that living God. The test of true prophecy in this passage is the fulfillment of the prophet's word (cf. 13¹⁻⁵); no doubt, it is true that the higher Hebrew prophecy is interpretative, not predictive, has insight rather than foresight (of particular events), and is concerned chiefly with morality and religion—but the confirmation of prophetic interpretation, insight, and truth would be in events, and upon these the popular mind would rely. The true prophet in Israel was (and always will be everywhere) the interpreter of the contemporaneous mind of God. He is one who has stood in the counsel of God, who has God's passion for righteousness and truth and the courage to declare to Jacob (everywhere) his transgression and to Israel his sin. He supplies the word of truth and inspiration that is necessary to social, national, and world progress, and declares the way of life to individuals and nations.

CHAPTERS 19¹ TO 21⁹: LAWS RELATING TO CRIME, WAR, PROPERTY, EVIDENCE.

CHAPTER XIX

1–13. Of the Cities of Refuge. When Israel is settled in Canaan he shall set apart three cities, to be selected after a survey and division of the land into three parts, so that every man-slayer may find refuge in one or other of the cities (vv. 1–3). And this is the method of dealing with the man-slayer who flees to a city for his life—if he has slain his neighbor by accident, say in hewing wood in the jungle, for such cases there shall be three cities of refuge (vv. 4–7). But if God extends Israel's border to its promised limits, then three more cities shall be added to prevent the shedding of innocent blood (vv. 8–10). But if a willful murderer shall arrive at a city of refuge, then the elders of his city shall send for him and deliver him up to the avenger and so the blood of the innocent shall not remain upon the land (vv. 11–13).

This law controls the vendetta—blood for blood—common among Easterners. The vendetta was not confined to individuals; it was the concern of the clan, and might be carried on to the third and fourth generation. The law, as it stands in Deuteronomy, controls the vendetta and, even in the case of actual murder, metes out through the elders a rough justice. Cf. 44¹⁻⁴³ Ex. 21¹²⁻¹⁴ Num. 35⁹⁻³⁴.

14. Of Landmarks. No encroachments on private property are allowed, the boundaries or "marches" of which go historically far back. This kind of law was known to the Greeks, where landowners were under the protection of Zeus Horios; Latin landholders, similarly, were protected by the god Terminus, in whose honor the annual festival of Terminalia was held. The right of private property and the passing of heritage are presupposed by Deuteronomy. But this right—in every age—is derived from society, and those who enjoy the right should not forget the duty to society which the possession and enjoyment of such right entail. Deuteronomy does not consider the state of matters where a right—even a time-honored one—is held to the exclusion of the public good. It rightly, as we believe, accepts the principle of private ownership, but of the abuse of this principle it says nothing, though we can assume that such abuse would find no favor, for land throughout Deuteronomy is God-given. Not in the other codes, but cf. Hos. 5¹⁰ Prov. 22²⁸.

15–21. Of Witnesses. At least two witnesses are required for any conviction (v. 15). In case of perjury (literally, a witness of violence, i.e., one who prefers might to right) the perjurer and the man against whom he has borne false witness shall be brought before Jehovah in the persons of the priests and judges, and if the perjury be proved, the perjurer shall come under the lex talionis, and suffer the punishment which his evidence would have brought upon the man against whom he has borne false witness. Cf. 17⁶ and Num. 35³⁰; both passages refer to a capital charge; for the lex talionis cf. Ex. 21²⁴ (JE) Lev. 24¹⁸⁻²⁰ (H).

CHAPTER XX

1–9. Of Warfare and Exemptions from Service. When Israel goes to war with a foe stronger than himself, he shall not be afraid, for Jehovah, the Deliverer, is with him, and, through the priest he shall be exhorted and reminded that Jehovah will fight on his side and win his battles (vv. 1–4). The officers shall give exemption to the man who has (1) built a new house but not dedicated it, or (2) has planted a vineyard but not fulfilled the rites that bring it into common use, or (3) has betrothed a wife but not married her, and (4) to all who are faint-hearted, lest they may infect the others (vv. 5-8). Then captains shall be appointed (v. 9).

10-18. Of the Capture of Foreign Cities. When Israel in war approaches a city, he has to offer terms of peace; if these be accepted, the inhabitants shall be taken for task-service; if not, the siege must be begun, and when, through Jehovah, the city has been captured, every male shall be slain, but women, children, cattle and spoil shall be taken as booty (vv. 10-14). "The ban" (not in its severest form) is to be applied to a foreign city, but in its severest form to the heathen cities of Canaan, to save Israel from being infected with their abominations (vv. 15-18).

19, 20. Of Sparing the Fruit Trees. In a protracted siege Israel shall eat of the besieged fruit trees and not wantonly destroy them; other trees may be hewn down for siege works (read v. 19. Is the tree . . . man? i.e., human). These three laws do not regulate the entire conduct of war, a sacred business to the Hebrews. They tend to moderate certain cruelties of ancient warfare, and in the exemptions (vv. 5-8) they recognize human claims. The whole chapter reads like an interruption between chs. 19 and 21¹⁻⁹, perhaps it originally stood after 21⁹.

CHAPTER XXI

1-9. Expiation for an Untraced Murder. If a man is found murdered by an unknown in the open country, the elders and judges of the nearest village shall take an unworked heifer to a perennially running stream in some uncultivated spot, break its neck, wash their hands over it, and, in presence of the priests, shall declare their entire innocence of the deed. So will the land and the people be cleansed of defilement caused by the murder. Probably an old incorporated law, peculiar to Deuteronomy.

CHAPTERS 21¹⁰ TO 25¹⁶: LAWS MISCELLANEOUS

10-14. Of Marriage with a Captive in War. An Israelite may in war take captive a woman whom he desires for his wife, but he must not treat her as his wife till she has performed certain rites and mourned for a month for her parents (vv. 10-13). If he has no pleasure in her as a wife, he must let the woman go according to her will, but he must not sell her nor deal in a despotic way, for he has dishonored her (v. 14).

The shaving and the paring (v. 12) may be mourning rites or acts of purification, cleansing her from the impurities of her old environment, or they may express, symbolically, the fact that her forsaken condition is at an end now she has found a home and a husband. The case contemplated would be possible only in case of war with distant nations. Marriage with a Canaanite was forbidden. Peculiar to Deuteronomy.

15-17. Of Primogeniture. A man cannot transfer the double portion of his eldest son, born of a disliked wife, in favor of the favorite wife's son (cf. Gen. 27, 48).

18-21. Of a Rebellious Son. In the case of a rebellious son, a squanderer and a glutton, his parents shall bring him before the elders, and all the villagers shall stone him. So will the evil be exterminated and the punishment act as a deterrent. We see here how the old absolute parental authority (Ex. 21⁷) was limited, and how parental authority was guided and enforced by communal authority. Notice too that the mother has her say in the matter.

22, 23. Of an Exposed Corpse. The body of a criminal hung, after execution, upon a tree must be taken down before nightfall, for the hanged is cursed of God and defiles the land (cf. Gal. 3¹³; notice Paul's omission of "of God").

CHAPTER XXII

1-3. Of Lost Property. Cf. Ex. 23^{4f}.

4. Of Assisting Fallen Beasts. Cf. Ex. 23⁵.

5. Against Interchange of Clothes. Not simply a law of conventional propriety but directed against those simulated changes of sex common in heathenism. Peculiar to Deuteronomy.

6, 7. Of Bird Protection. For regard for the animal kingdom cf. 22¹⁻⁴ 25⁴ Lk. 12⁶. As the same promise is attached to this law as to the fifth commandment, reverence for motherhood may be the motive of the law, which may, however, go back to the conception of "the right of use" in the bird to the extent of sharing its produce but not of entire possession of the user. Peculiar to Deuteronomy.

8. Of Roof Protection. Cf. Ex. 21^{33f}. ("pit"). The roof of an Eastern house was flat or domed, with a flat surrounding terrace, and was used for taking the air, conversation, or worship. The idea of solidarity is seen in the guilt falling upon the whole household. Peculiar to Deuteronomy. Cf. Johns, C. H., §§229-233.

9-11. Of Mixtures. (1) Of Seed, (2) of Plowing Animals, and (3) of Wearing Material. The origin of these laws is obscure. The underlying conception may be that of distinction of species (cf. Gen. 11¹, 12, 24^{f.}): each species has its distinct and divinely given characteristics which are not to be interfered with (cf. Isa. 28²⁴⁻²⁹). The fruit forfeited (v. 9), i.e., consecrated to Jehovah, banned from common use, a proof that the prohibited mixture was a religious or ritual offense. The law on plowing (2) is peculiar to Deuteronomy as also are the words appended to (1); cf. Lev. 19¹⁹ (H).

12. Of Twisted Threads or Knots. Cf. Num. 15³⁷⁻⁴¹ (P).

Laws on Chastity. Several of the important laws on this are stated in vv. 13-30.

13-21. Of a Husband's Charges Against His Bride. If a man marries and denies his bride's virginity, her parents shall produce publicly proofs of her previous chastity. The elders shall then corporally punish the husband for his wanton words, fine him one hundred shekels of silver (£13-£15 = $65-$75) paid to the father and deprive him forever of right of divorce (vv. 13-19). If the allegation be found true, then the woman shall be stoned before her father's door, for she has wrought senselessness in Israel, turning her father's house into a harlot's. Thus shall Israel exterminate the evil (v. 20^{f.}); cf. Johns, C. H., §§127, 142.

The absence of the physical evidence is not certain proof of unchastity and probably other evidence was allowed. The law may seem to us cruel and indelicate, but such proof was considered essential among ancient peoples in the case of all marriages and is still called for by certain tribes in Syria, Egypt, and Morocco. The case in Deuteronomy, it should be noticed, is where a man has married out of carnal desire, and who, after his passion is gratified, by a revulsion of feeling turns against his bride: by this law he is not allowed to do just as he would wish; he has to grant the woman justice, and, unless he has good grounds for his allegations, he will have to pay. The law shows an advance in social ethics, especially in the status of woman; and that such a law is not needed to-day is due, in part, to its enforcement in olden days. Peculiar to Deuteronomy.

22. Of Adultery. Both guilty parties put to death, probably by stoning. Cf. Lev. 20¹⁰; Johns, C. H., §§129, 131, 133, 135.

23-27. Of Seduction. Of a betrothed virgin with consent (vv. 23^{f.}), without consent (vv. 25-27). The former case is treated as adultery and both are stoned; in the latter case the man is stoned. Peculiar to Deuteronomy; cf. Johns, C. H., §130.

28, 29. Of Intercourse with a Virgin not Betrothed. The man shall pay the brideprice, and marry her without right of divorce. Cf. Ex. 22^{16^{f.}}.

30. Against Intercourse With a Father's Wife. Cf. Lev. 18⁸ 15⁸ Ezek. 22¹⁰; cf. Johns, C. H., §157.

CHAPTER XXIII

1-8. Certain Classes to Be Excluded From Religious Communion With Israel. (1) Eunuchs, probably on the ground that their mutilation is an outrage upon the nature which God has created or because the eunuch carries on his body the sign of devotion to other gods (cf. Lev. 21²⁰). In Isa. 56^{3^{f.}} the loyal eunuch is given a place in the future kingdom (cf. Acts 8²⁷⁻³⁸). (2) Bastards, i.e., children of an incestuous union to the tenth generation, i.e., forever. (3) Ammonites and Moabites, on the ground of their unfriendly treatment of Israel (contrast, however, 2²⁰) (vv. 1-6). The Edomites and Egyptians, however, may in the third generation enter the congregation, for Edom is Israel's blood-brother and Egypt was his host. The assembly (vv. 1, 8) or congregation—the word not used elsewhere in this sense in Deuteronomy; the originality of vv. 4-6 is doubtful.

9-14. Of the Purity of the Camp. In camp, Israel shall avoid every evil (v. 9); in particular, if a man suffer pollution, he shall leave the camp, bathe, and then return; and a place shall be reserved outside the camp for natural necessities and all excrement shall be covered up (vv. 10-13). Israel's God, who walketh in the camp to give victory, must not gaze on indecent things (v. 14).

The ideas behind this law were religious; sexual uncleanness was a disqualification for the religious service of war (1 Sam. 21⁵) and, in the second case, there was the danger of exposed excrement being found by the enemy and used magically against one (Frazer, Golden Bough, vol. i, pp. 327^{f.}). Deuteronomy adds an æsthetic reason in v. 14^b. No sanitary reason is given, but the religious and æsthetic reasons led to sanitary results. Cf. Num. 51⁴ (P), though the particular case of Deuteronomy is not mentioned.

15, 16. Of Runaway Slaves. If a runaway escape to Israel (notice unto thee (v. 15), suggesting that the slave is escaped from a foreign master), he shall not be returned to his owner, he shall dwell where he chooses, and unoppressed. Peculiar to Deuteronomy; cf. 15¹²⁻¹⁸; Johns, C. H., §§15-20.

17, 18. Condemnation of Religious Prostitution. No Israelite, man or woman, shall be a hierodule. Nor shall Israel bring the wage of a harlot or hire of "a dog" to the house of Jehovah his God. The practice of religious prostitution (i.e., hierodulia) was common in Canaanite and Phœnician cults, as it is in modern India. For dog cf. Rev. 22¹⁵.

19, 20. Of Interest. Interest is prohibited on loans (charitable) to fellow Israelites, but allowed on loans (probably commercial) to foreigners. The condemnation of interest is in harmony with Greek, Roman, and early Christian ideas on the subject. Peculiar to Deuteronomy; cf. 15¹⁻¹¹ Ex. 22²⁵ Psa. 15⁵.

21-23. Of Vows. To forbear to vow is no sin, but once made, a vow shall be paid without delay: this is God's demand. Cf. 12⁶, 11, 17, 26. See article "Vow" in Bible Dictionaries.

24, 25. On the Use of a Neighbor's Corn and Fruits. The law checks the spirit of meanness in the grower and greed in the passer-by. It justifies the action recorded in Mt. 12^{1f}. Lk. 6^{1f}. The rabbis regarded "plucking" as a kind of reaping, and "rubbing" as threshing, and so both were works unlawful on the Sabbath—an instance of legalism destroying the spirit of kindness. Peculiar to Deuteronomy.

CHAPTER XXIV

1-4. On Remarriage of a Divorcée. If a man, for some unseemly thing (probably immodesty), going through the proper process, divorce his wife, and if she marry a second husband and be divorced by him, or if this second husband should die (vv. 1-3), then, in such case, her former husband cannot remarry her; she is polluted. Such a remarriage is an abomination and brings sin upon the land (v. 4).

The Law does not institute divorce—indeed, there is no law of divorce per se in the O.T.—nor does it regulate the process exhaustively; it simply states a particular case, in which the legal requirements for divorce are all fulfilled, and then the divorcée marries again, is divorced a second time or loses her husband by death; in that case—the apodosi begins at v. 4—she and her former husband cannot remarry. The Law, then, prohibits the remarriage of a woman whom he has divorced and who meantime has been another's, thus preventing the easy passage of a woman between one man and another, and being, on the whole, in the interests of the woman. The second marriage of the divorcée is not sanctioned in v. 2 (it is tantamount to adultery as far as her first husband is concerned), though such marriage in early Israel was probably not unusual; cf. e.g., David and Michal (1 Sam. 18²⁸ 25⁴⁴ 2 Sam. 3^{14f}). Hosea's case is scarcely relevant here. Cf. 22¹³⁻²¹ Mt. 19^{8f}.

5. Exemption from Public Service Granted to the Newly Married. No military service or other public office is to be imposed on a man during the first year of married life, for the sake of his wife and home. Peculiar to Deuteronomy; cf. 20⁷; for cheer his wife read with Vulgate be happy with his wife.

6. The Mill or Upper Millstone Not to Be Taken in Pledge. This would be to pledge life itself by taking away an actual necessity. "The ancient Common Law of England provides that no man be distrained by the utensils or instruments of his trade or profession."

7. Against Man-Stealing. An Israelite convicted of stealing a brother and acting tyrannically toward him shall be put to death. Cf. Ex. 21¹⁶ (JE), which has "man" for any of his brethren; cf. Johns, C. H., §14.

8, 9. Precautions in Leprosy. These are prescribed by the priestly Levites under divine authority shall be carefully observed by the people, remembering the case of Miriam (how she was secluded, Num. 12^{14f}). Leprosy was regarded as a stroke from Jehovah, and was under the supervision of the religious authorities. In v. 8b read with LXX, all the Torah—the teaching or prescriptions—that the priests, the Levites, do teach you. This Torah is not Lev. 13^f. with its various cases, but some earlier priestly Torah expanded later in Lev. 13^f. (P).

10-13. On Pledges. When an Israelite lends to his brother on the security of a pledge he is not to enter the house of a borrower who has the right to select his pledge. If the borrower be a poor man and pledges his mantle (used for sleeping in and for other purposes), it must be restored before nightfall (vv. 10-12). This will secure for the lender the gratitude of the borrower and be reckoned as a righteous act by Jehovah (v. 13). The same humane motive as in v. 6. Cf. Ex. 22^{25f}. (JE) for the second part; the first is peculiar to Deuteronomy; cf. Johns, C. H., §241.

14, 15. On the Payment of the Wage-Earner. The wage-earner, Israelite or "guest," if he be poor, is to be paid at the close of each day: his very life depends upon his wage. Otherwise, he will cry to Jehovah (cf. 15¹⁰—there was supposed to be a peculiar power in the voice) and the withholder will be guilty of sin. Cf. Lev. 19¹³ Jas. 5⁴; Johns, C. H., §§257, 261, 273f.

16. On Individual Responsibility. See 2 Kings 14⁶, where Amaziah, putting to death his father's murderers, does not slay their children, the Deuteronomic editor of Kings quoting this law as authority for Amaziah's clemency. In ancient times the family was the unit and the guilt (as well as the disgrace) of the crime fell upon the whole family. Individual responsibility is proclaimed by Ezek. 18⁴ (cf. Jer. 31³⁰) and emphasized by Christianity. The law is not in conflict with 59, for there the children suffer through the self-acting operation of natural and divine law; this is no reason why men should deliberately increase the suffering of the innocent, rather the reverse. Peculiar to Deuteronomy.

17, 18. Against Injustice to the Protected Stranger, Orphan and Widow. Notice that the motive (v. 18) is the great act of redemption as in v. 22. Cf. Ex. 22^{21f.} 23⁶⁻⁹ (JE) Lev. 19³³ (H).

19-22. On Gleanings. The gleanings of the cornfield, the olive-garden, and the vineyard are not to be gathered in a mean way, but are to be left for the stranger, orphan, and widow. Obedience to this law will bring prosperity (v. 19b) and the law is to be kept as an expression of Jehovah's will and in remembrance of the great redemption (v. 22; cf. v. 18). A spirit that grasps the last penny is contrary to the will of Jehovah and unworthy of his great redemptive act. Cf. Lev. 19^{9f.} (H), which adds "the corners" but omits "the olive-garden."

CHAPTER XXV

1-3. On Corporal Punishment. After a regular trial between two parties to a suit, if one is declared guilty and if he deserves beating, then the punishment shall be carried out in the presence of a judge; the number of strokes shall be in proportion to the gravity of the offense, but shall not exceed forty, for excessive punishment of this kind would be dishonor to a brother. The Law does not ordain corporal punishment; it accepts it as a fact and regulates it; later Jews reduced the number of strokes to thirty-nine, in case of a miscount. There are frequent references in the O.T. to corporal punishment: Ex. 21²⁰ Prov. 10¹³ 17²⁶ 19²⁹ 26³ Isa. 50⁶ Jer. 20², etc.

4. On Kindness to the Working Ox. Cf. 22¹⁻⁴. Quoted 1 Cor. 9⁹ 1 Tim. 5¹⁸ to enforce the principle that the laborer is worthy of his hire. Peculiar to Deuteronomy.

5-10. On Levirate Marriage. In the case of two brothers living on the same estate and one dying without son, his widow is not to marry into another family; the surviving brother must marry her and the eldest son born to this marriage shall succeed to the name and estate of the deceased brother (v. 5f.). Should the surviving brother refuse, a public demonstration before the elders with the widow and recusant present shall be held, in which the widow is to strip the sandal from the recusant's foot and spit on him, so expressing publicly the fact that he has repudiated the obligation and that he and his family are the object of public contempt (vv. 7-10).

Levirate marriage ("Levir" is Latin for "brother-in-law") was an old institution in Israel (cf. Gen. 38⁸). The institution was not confined to the Hebrew people, but in varying form is found among many peoples—Hindus, Arabs, etc. Its origin is uncertain; the practice of polyandry, ancestor worship (the marriage being part of the rites performed to the spirit of the deceased), and the principle of Baal-marriage (i.e., that the wife was the property of the deceased and passed with the rest of the estate to the next-of-kin) have all been suggested. The case of Ruth and Boaz was not a Levirate marriage. It is as Goel (kinsman), not as Levir, that Boaz takes Ruth, Naomi having no son to act the part of Levir. Lev. 18^{6f.} and 20²¹ (H) forbid marriage with a brother's wife; probably Leviticus gives the general rule, which is superseded by the special circumstances stated in Deuteronomy, in which the main features of the law are, that it is confined to the case of two brothers living on one estate, that there is no son, and that the Levir, by fulfilling the obligation, does not found a family and estate for himself but for his deceased brother. P (Num. 27¹⁻¹¹) by allowing daughters to inherit, partly does away with the need for the Levirate law.

11, 12. On Immodesty in Woman—a Typical Case. It may be that the woman's hand became tabu through contact with the organs of generation, for this is the only case, apart from 19¹⁵⁻²¹, where mutilation is prescribed as a punishment.

13-16. On Strict Honesty in Trade. Traders are not to have two weights and two measures. The trickery of diverse weights and measures (or two prices for different customers) is not righteous (straight) and is an abomination to Jehovah; v. 15 (interrupting the connection) gives length of days as the reward for honesty in business. Honesty, as a rule, helps peace of mind, no small factor of longevity; the words upon the land, etc., are not without meaning. Dishonesty with God-given gifts increases the offense. Cf. Lev. 19^{35f.} (H) Amos 8⁵ Mic. 6¹¹ Ezek. 45¹⁰ Prov. 16¹¹.

17-19. On Amalek. Amalek's cruelty in smiting the stragglers in the wilderness is not to be forgotten. Exterminate him! Cf. Ex. 17¹⁴ 1 Sam. 14⁴⁸ 15^{2f.} The treatment received from Amalek rankled in Israel.

CHAPTER XXVI

Hortatory Conclusion; Two Beautiful Rituals. These two rituals set forth Deuteronomy's ideal of worship, which should be national, carried out at one sanctuary by the different families with their dependents, full of joyous gratitude for the wonders of the past, and mindful of God and the poor.

1-11. Ritual of the First-fruits. Settled in Canaan, Israel shall take of the first-fruits in a basket to the central sanctuary and, coming to the priest, shall announce his presence before Jehovah in the land of promise; the priest shall then take the basket and set it before the altar (vv. 1-4). Then Israel shall say, An Aramaean nomad was my father, who went down to Egypt, etc.—all emphasizing the wonderful growth, sore bondage, mighty deliverance and guidance to the promised land (vv. 5-9); then, setting the first-fruits before Jehovah (in v. 3 the priest had already done this), Israel shall worship joyously with his household, Levites, and strangers (vv. 10, 11).

Notice that the name of God in various forms occurs nine times in the paragraph. All is of God, the wonderful history and the bountifulness of the land—Jehovah, not the Baalim, is the author, Jehovah alone. A Syrian ready to perish (v. 5)—an Aramaean nomad (mg.), a reference to Jacob and his Aramaean connections. In 18⁴ the first-fruits go to the priests, but this present passage does not make clear their disposal; perhaps only some of the first-fruits were put in a basket and the rest were eaten at the joyous feast of v. 11; if all were given to the priests, then the joyous feast may be one of the three great annual feasts.

12-15. The Ritual of the Tithes. When the tithe, every third year, has been collected and given to the poor, Israel shall confess that he has dedicated all that he ought and fulfilled all the laws pertaining to the tithe, namely, that he has not, as a mourner for the dead, eaten part of the tithe or given of it to a mourning feast or to the dead (perhaps as viatica) and thereby defiled the tithe (vv. 12-14); after this confession he shall appeal for the divine blessing on the God-given land (v. 15). The poor's portion is sacred.

16-19. Closing Exhortation. The obligations involved in the relation between Jehovah and his people are affirmed. Israel by accepting the obligations has made Jehovah say that he will be their God, and Jehovah has made Israel say that he will be Jehovah's people and possession, and this will bring to Israel power, praise, and honor and make him truly a consecrated people. Avouched (v. 17), literally, "made say"; Israel did not actually make Jehovah say that he would be their God; he himself chose Israel (78), but Israel confirmed the divine decision.

CHAPTER XXVII

An Interruption and Later Addition. This chapter, in the third person, interrupts the discourse of Moses; it connects neither with 26¹⁹ nor with 28¹. Ch. 28 forms the natural conclusion to the code (chs. 5-26) and connects well with 26¹⁹. Further, the various parts of the chapter are themselves imperfectly connected, and, while there may be a Deuteronomic nucleus in vv. 9f., the chapter as a whole cannot be regarded as an original part of Deuteronomy.

1-8. Moses, with whom are associated the elders (the only time in Deuteronomy), ordered the people to set up stones immediately they have crossed the Jordan, to smear them with chalk and to inscribe on them the Deuteronomic code (vv. 1-3). This is to be done on Mount Ebal (v. 4); an altar too is to be built for whole-offerings and peace-offerings and for joyous worship before God (vv. 5-7); the code is to be written very distinctly. The difficulties in this paragraph are: (1) the repetition, vv. 2f. = vv. 4, 8; (2) the contradiction, v. 2 stating that the stones are to be set up immediately after the crossing of Jordan, and v. 4, that they are to be set up on Mount Ebal, which was more than a day's journey from the Jordan; (3), vv. 5-7 concerning the altar are an interruption, and how is this law of the altar to be reconciled with the law of the One Altar? The difficulties plainly mark the passage as composite.

9, 10. Cf. 26¹⁶⁻¹⁹.

11-13. In 11²⁹ the word "put" or "set" suggested some kind of ceremony in the "setting up" of the blessing and curse: this ceremony is evidently described in these verses and in vv. 14-26.

14-26. Vv. 11-13 appoint the pronouncement of blessings and curses, but in vv. 14-26 we have only curses which anticipate unduly 28^{15f.}; again in vv. 11-13 Levi is placed on Mount Gerizim among the tribes that bless, but in vv. 14-26 Levi is chosen from all the tribes to pronounce the curses. Further, of the sins against which these curses are pronounced only seven are condemned in the Deuteronomic code; six are condemned in JE and nine in H. The whole chapter is full of literary and historic difficulties.

CHAPTER XXVIII

Peroration of Moses' Second Discourse. For the analysis of this discourse, see introductory paragraphs preceding ch. 5 and ch. 12.

1-14. The Blessings of Obedience. Israel will be exalted over all nations; prosperity will pursue him in the city and in the country; all manner of bountifulness will be his; his enemies will be destroyed and Israel, established as Jehovah's people, will win the respect of the world and be exalted to highest supremacy.

15-68. The Curses of Disobedience. Failure in every department of national life (vv. 16-19 corresponding to vv. 3-6), pestilential fevers, droughts, ruinous defeat in battle (vv. 20-26); loathsome diseases, madness and other afflictions, leading to Israel's oppression by foreign invaders, and ultimately to shameful exile and public shame (vv. 27-37); failure of crops, Israel becoming so impoverished as to become dependent on the foreigner in his land (vv. 38-44; v. 41 is out of place and repeats v. 32); the next two verses (45f.) form a conclusion to vv. 15-44, and all the calamities, enumerated in vv. 15-44 are due to Israel's disobedience (45f.); then vv. 47f. form an introduction to vv. 49-68. Israel has not served Jehovah with joy, therefore he will in want serve his enemies (47f.). Jehovah will bring against Israel a fierce, relentless foreign nation, which will desolate the country and besiege the inhabitants in their cities, till they are under the gruesome necessity of eating their own offspring (vv. 49-57): Jehovah will plague Israel with terrible afflictions and rejoice in his disaster; homeless and helpless, Israel will find life an anxious terror and a burden; any survivors will be carried off as galley-slaves to Egypt; there they will be exposed for sale, but none will buy (vv. 58-68).

This chapter, forming a fitting conclusion to the Deuteronomic code, is, for its sustained eloquence, one of the most striking in the O.T. No paraphrase or synopsis can do justice to its wealth of biting detail and burning invective: it is a furnace belching forth flames of moral indignation and threatenings of evil. Such a chapter shows that there was a living conscience in Israel. Right is right and wrong is wrong, and out of them come inevitably the joy and tragedy of life.

It is true that the consequences of good and evil are pictured as material, on the one hand prosperity, on the other, disease and death. But is not this just the ancient way of stating that the foundations of civilization are moral? If those foundations are sound, civilization will be a blessing, if rotten—immoral and irreligious—it will be a curse. Individuals may be wicked and prosper, but let their wickedness infect the community, as it certainly will, and the community is near the precipice. And yet the consequences are not simply material in this chapter; the heart, mind, and will, reacting to the consequences of evil, become demoralized, lose balance, insight, and foresight. Men become blind of heart, lose their way, and grope about in inconsequent futility.

Jehovah is conceived as a God of absolute integrity. He cannot change evil into good nor cancel their inevitable consequences. The moral law with all its consequences is enthroned in his very being. When the writer pictures Jehovah as rejoicing over the afflictions of evil Israel (v. 63), he seems to depart from that conception of love which he elsewhere emphasizes so strongly, or from the conception of Hosea, who argues from a broken-hearted husband to a broken-hearted God, or most of all from the Christian conception of God, with his deepest sorrow for sin, but we must not forget that the writer is being carried along on a flood of moral feeling. What he wants to drive home to Israel is that they are not to think, because they are Jehovah's people, he will not punish their iniquities (cf. Amos). He certainly will, and behind the punishment there will be profound emotion, as profound as Jehovah's joy over Israel's righteousness, for Jehovah is no bloodless God.

For with the sword (v. 22) read with drought; v. 24 refers to the sirocco and is an accurate description; for tossed to and fro (v. 25) read thou shalt be a horror; v. 32—there was a large deportation in 701; the chapter is not necessarily, in whole or in part, post-exilic; for as the eagle flieth (v. 49) read as the vulture swoopeth; for who would not adventure (v. 56) read who had never ventured to set, etc., i.e., because she had always been carried; that are written in this book (v. 58)—not compatible with the prevalent representation that the laws, etc., of Deuteronomy were spoken by Moses, nor with 319, that the law was only written down after this discourse; the verse betrays the fact that Deuteronomy was always a written book; into Egypt (v. 68)—a striking climax—back to the place from which Israel was delivered (cf. Hos. 8¹³).

CHAPTERS 29 AND 30: MOSES' THIRD DISCOURSE

This forms a kind of supplement to the Deuteronomic Code.

CHAPTER XXIX

1. An Editorial Addition. The verse was probably inserted as a subscription to chs. 12-28. In the Hebrew, it forms the last verse of ch. 28.

2-9. The Inspiration of the Past. Moses reviews before all Israel the wonderful goodness of Jehovah from the time of the deliverance from Egypt. The wonder of that goodness Israel had failed to perceive and understand, but now (since it has been plainly set forth by Moses) it should be the motive for Israel's wise and fruitful obedience.

10-21. The Covenant Binding on Present and Future Generations. All Israel is gathered together for the completion of the covenant which will also be binding on future generations (vv. 10–15); those present know from experience the dangers and consequences of lapsing into idolatry (vv. 16f.); let no man or woman apostatize, thinking in self-deception to escape the general disaster (vv. 18–21).

Hever of thy wood unto the drawer of thy water (v. 11)—a description used in a later age for menials of the sanctuary, here probably in a more general sense; idols (v. 17)—a contemptuous expression—"rolled blocks" or "doll-images"; to destroy the moist with the dry (v. 19)—a proverbial expression, meaning to sweep away everybody and everything.

22–29. Certain Disaster of Apostasy. The dreaded disaster is now pictured as a certainty. The land is utterly desolate, strewn with sulphur, salt, and lava. Future generations and foreigners will ask the cause of this disaster to the whole land and people. It is because Israel has forsaken his God and has been disobedient to his commandments—his God in whose keeping are the secrets of the future, while Israel knows only the present. V. 29 with its first person plural reads like a closing liturgy.

CHAPTER XXX

1–10. The Promise of Restoration on Repentance. When Israel, an exile in a foreign land, repents, then Jehovah in compassion will restore Israel's fortune and will change his heart, giving to it a new spiritual perception, so that Israel may again love and obey God and live. The curses will fall upon Israel's enemies while Israel himself will enjoy every blessing, and Jehovah will rejoice in blessing Israel's obedience. Two abiding spiritual facts are declared in these verses: (1) that repentance is the condition of restoration, and to repentance God is unfailingly responsive, and (2) that for repentance divine help is necessary (v. 6; cf. Jer. 31^{31f.}). Return (v. 8) does not necessarily refer to the Exile; it may be used (though only here in Deuteronomy) in a spiritual sense (cf. Isa. 1021 1922 Jer. 31–7).

11–14. The Divine Will Present in the Conscience. The divine rule of life—what God wants from man—is not beyond man's power of apprehension nor outside the sphere of everyday life and practice. He who does his will will come to know his mind (see Jn. 7¹⁷). Paul (Rom. 10^{6f.}) makes a free reproduction of the words—to Paul the law was oppressive, but the living inspirational word of faith is in the heart and conscience. Vv. 11–14 do not connect with v. 10 and are probably an independent fragment.

15–20. Peroration to the Discourses. The choice of the two ways—of life and of death—is now. Therefore choose life and live. Vv. 15–20 are considered by some to have followed originally ch. 28.

CHAPTERS 31 TO 34: MOSES FINISHES HIS WORK; HIS SONG; HIS BLESSING

These chapters are of the nature of an appendix containing a narrative of events connected with the close of Moses' life and incorporating two poems. The various parts of the narrative are not closely knit together nor are they homogeneous. JE is the main nucleus of the narrative with Deuteronomic additions and excerpts from P.

CHAPTER XXXI

1–8. Last Word of Encouragement to the People and to Joshua. Moses has run his race; he has seen but will never cross the Jordan, but Joshua and the people will. God will go before them, destroying every foe; he will not let them down nor desert them. Be strong therefore. Fear not. Cf. 31² with 34⁷ (P).

9–13. The Writing and Recitation of the Law. Moses delivers the Law written by himself to the priests and elders and gives instruction for its reading to the assembled Israelites, once in every seven years at the Feast of Booths in the year of Release. Thou (v. 7); in v. 9 Moses is addressing the priests and elders.

14, 15. Joshua Commissioned by Jehovah. Moses and Joshua are commanded to present themselves at the tent of meeting (i.e., the tent of Revelation, P's expression), where Joshua is appointed as successor to Moses.

16–22. Prediction of Apostasy. After the death of Moses, so Jehovah predicts, Israel will go awhoring after strange gods (possibly to be taken in a literal sense in view of the practice of prostitution in Semitic cults). This apostasy will bring heavy disaster, and Moses is instructed to write the Song that will testify against such apostasy. Imagination (v. 21), frequently in O.T. of evil and rebellious imagination against God.

23. This verse goes back to v. 14; the subject is Jehovah.

24–30. Vv. 24–26 repeat 9f.; vv. 27–30 form a second introduction to the Song. Cf. v. 28b with v. 19; cf. v. 29 with vv. 20f.; v. 28, these words, i.e., the Song.

CHAPTER XXXII

The Song of Moses. This Song is a didactic poem, and as such is unsurpassed for fire and force and sweeping rhetoric in the O.T. According to 31²⁰ its purpose is to testify before-hand against Israel, but the poem itself is in the main one of mercy and hope, and is full of God's faithfulness and grace to a sinful and repentant people. The poem makes no claim to be by Moses and depicts a situation and events long after his time; the people are settled in the land long enough to have become demoralized. The precise date is impossible to fix; in its thought and theology it has points of contact with the eighth-century prophets and it has been called "a compendium of prophetic theology." Driver, however, holds that the general thought of the poem and its predominant ideas have decidedly greater affinities with the prophets of the Chaldean period (Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Second Isaiah) than with the earlier prophets Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, and Micah. In that case the poem belongs to the eve of the Exile or is even later. It is uncertain, then, whether the poem is pre-exilic, exilic or post-exilic, but if it were either of the two latter, it is remarkable that the greatest of Israel's afflictions is not mentioned. Whatever may be its date, the poem has a certain appropriateness in the book of Deuteronomy, for it sets forth, in strong and sweeping verse, the lessons which Deuteronomy, in law and narrative, seeks to inculcate and which Moses is depicted as declaring plainly to Israel on the steppes of Moab.

The following is a new translation of the Song, embodying some textual changes suggested by the ancient versions or by modern scholars:

1-3. Exordium. The Universe as a fitting audience is called upon to listen to the poet's theme, the greatness of Jehovah.

Give ear, O ye heavens, and I will speak;
And let the earth hearken to the words of my mouth;

Let my message drop as rain,
May my word distil as dew,
As mist upon the tender blades,
And as showers upon herbs;
For the name of Jehovah will I proclaim.
Give ye greatness to our God!

4-6. The Central Theme: A Faithful God, a Faithless People.

The Rock,¹ perfect is his work,
Yea, all his ways are ordered,
A God of troth, no treachery in him!
They have fouled their truth, no sons of his,²
A generation twisted and crooked.

¹ Rock—the word is applied to Jehovah and to the other gods; it expresses the idea of unchangeableness.
² Text uncertain.

Is it Jehovah ye thus requite,
O senseless folk and unwise?
Is he not thy sire that got thee?
Is he not thy maker and thy founder?

7-14. Consider the Past, With Its Proof of God's Providence.

Remember the days of old,
Consider the years, age after age,
Ask thy father, let him shew thee,
Thine Elders let them tell thee.

(The Elders answer:)

When the Most High gave the nations their inheritance,
When he separated the sons of man,
He fixed the bounds of the peoples
According to the number of Israel's sons;
For the lot of Jehovah is his people,
Israel the range of his inheritance.
He found him in a desert land
And in a desolate and howling waste.
He circled round him, he scanned him,
He guarded him as the pupil of his eye;
Like a vulture that stirreth up its nest,
That hovereth over its young,
He spread his wings, he took him.
Jehovah alone was his leader
With no foreign god to help him.
He made him to ride upon the highest lands
And to eat¹ of the fruitage of the land,
Suckled him² with honey from the crag³
And with oil from the flinty rock.
Curd of kine and milk of sheep
With fat of lambs and rams,
Herds of Bashan and he-goats,
With the richest and finest of wheat,
And the blood of the grape thou drankst—
a foaming draught.

15-18. Jehovah's Generosity Led Only to Thankless Satiety.

Jacob ate and was full;⁴
Jeshurun⁵ waxed fat and he kicked;
Thou waxedst fat, grewest thick, wast gorged;
And he forsook the God that made him
And treated as a fool the Rock of his deliverance.
They made him jealous with strangers,
With abominations they vexed him,
They sacrificed to demons, a no-god;
To gods they had not known,
New gods that late appeared,
Before whom your fathers shuddered not;⁶

¹ Adopting the reading of the LXX.

² I.e., made him enjoy.

³ I.e., out of most unlikely places.

⁴ This line is in LXX.

⁵ A poetical name for Israel derived from Hebrew word for "upright": here applied reproachfully.

⁶ Or "to whom they never gave a look."

Of the Rock that got thee thou wast unmindful
And thou forgattest God that had travailed with thee.¹

19-25. The Punishment Meted out by Jehovah on Israel's Defection.

But Jehovah saw and he spurned
Out of chagrin for his sons and daughters,
And he said: I will hide my face from them,
I shall see what their end will be.
For a generation of tricksters are they,
Sons in whom is no steadfastness.
They made me jealous with a no-god.
They vexed me with their vanities;
But I will make them jealous with a no-nation,
With a degraded people I will chagrin them.
For a fire is kindled in my nostril;
Yea, it hath flames to shoot beneath,
Yea, it devoureth the earth and its increase And setteth aflame the foundations of the hills.
I will heap evils upon them,
My last arrow hurl against them;
Drained by famine,² devoured by fiery bolts of fever and bitter destruction.
And the teeth of beasts will I send against them
With the venom of things that crawl in the dust.
Without, shall the sword bereave,
And in the chambers, terror
Destroying, yea, both youth and maid,
The suckling and man of hoary head.

26-33. The Withholding of Jehovah's Vengeance and Dread of the Taunts of the Foe.

I would have said, "I will split them in pieces
And still their memory among men.
Save that I dreaded the taunt of the foe
And the blunder of their rivals.
Lest they should say, Our hand raised itself aloft,
'Twas not Jehovah did all this.
For a people lost in counsels are they³
And there is no discernment in them.
Had they been wise, they would understand this;
They would discern their latter end.
How could one have chased a thousand⁴
And two put to flight ten thousand,
Were it not that their Rock had sold them
And Jehovah left them to their fate?
For their Rock is not as our Rock,
With our foes as judges.

For from the vine of Sodom is their vine¹
And from the fields of Gomorrah;
Their grapes, grapes of poison,
Bitter clusters are theirs;
The poison of reptiles is their wine
And the cruel poison of cobras.²

34-36. Jehovah's Vengeance, Withheld From Israel, Is Reserved for Israel's Foes.

Is it not all stored with me,
Sealed in my treasures?
Vengeance³ is mine and requital
What time their foot shall slip:
Yea, near is the day of their destruction,
And their fate will rush upon them.
Yea, Jehovah shall judge his people
And relent for his servants' sake;
Yea, he seeth their hold is gone
And there is left nor fettered nor free.⁴

37-39. God Will Speak to Israel in His Need, Showing to Him the Folly of His Trust in Strange Gods.

And he will say: Where are their gods,
The Rock whereon they refuged,
That ate the fat of their sacrifice,
Drank the wine of their offering?
Let them arise and help you,
Let their shelter be over you.
See now I, yea, I am he
And there is no god beside me.
I slay, yea, I make alive;
I wound, yea, I heal,
And there is no deliverer out of my hand.

40-42. In Conclusion Jehovah Swears Vengeance on Israel's Foes.

For I lift mine hand to heaven
And say: As I live for ever
I will whet the lightning of my sword,
And on judgment my hand shall grip
To wreak vengeance on my foes
And requital on those that hate me!
Mine arrows I will make drunk with blood,
My sword's fodder shall be flesh,
The blood of slain and captive
And the scalps of the longhaired foe.

43. Conclusion.

Sing triumphantly, ye nations, his people;
Surely the blood of his servants will he re-quite,
And revenge will he repay to his rivals,
And sweep clean the land of his people.

44. Concluding Note. Tautologous with 31³⁰; the natural sequel to 31²²; so LXX. Hoshea, probably an error for "Joshua."

¹ Notice how both fatherhood and motherhood are applied to the Rock.

² Text uncertain.

³ In v. 23 the poet resumes in his own person.

⁴ With reference to some disastrous defeat of Israel.

¹ I.e., their national stock is in nature like Sodom's.

² Do vv. 31-33 refer to Israel or his foes? Probably the latter.

³ LXX for the day of vengeance.

⁴ An alliterative phrase=everybody.

45-47. Moses' Final Exhortation. Obey the law; it is worthy of regard, for on obedience to it depends Israel's life.

48-52. Moses Bidden to Die. Moses is commanded to climb Mount Nebo and view Canaan and die there like Aaron on "Hor the mountain," because of their breaking faith with Jehovah at Kadesh. Only the sight of the land is to be his. Cf. Num. 27¹²⁻¹⁴ (P), of which these verses are a duplicate with expansions.

CHAPTER XXXIII

The Blessing of Moses. This "Blessing" appears as an independent poem, the introductory verse connecting it but loosely with the rest of the book. The introduction (vv. 2-5) describes the advent of Jehovah, the giving of the Law and the establishment of the kingdom; the main part (vv. 6-25) consists of a series of eulogistic sayings (there are no curses, as in the similar poem in Gen. 49) concerning eleven of the tribes, Simeon being omitted; the conclusion (vv. 26-29) emphasizes the uniqueness of Jehovah and the blessedness of his chosen people. The "blessings" characterize each tribe by some salient feature in its history, situation, or character.

As in the case of the "Song of Moses" (ch. 32) internal evidence makes it impossible to consider Moses as the author; but it is not easy to determine its exact date. Perhaps the several utterances originated independently in different places and at different times. Later they were collected, probably in the Northern Kingdom. If so, the poem must be dated earlier than 722 or 721 B.C., the date of the dissolution of the Northern Kingdom. The favorable comments on the tribe of Levi have led some scholars to conclude that the author or collector was a member of that tribe.

The following is a new translation:

1. Editor's Introduction to the Blessing. Cf. similar introduction to the "Song" (31³⁰).

2-5. Exordium. A Theophany in which the Law is Given.

Jehovah from Sinai came,
And beamed forth to them,
He shone from Mount Paran,
He came nigh to Meribath-Kadesh;¹
At his right hand a burning fire for them.²
Yea, he hath love for his people;³
His consecrated are in his hand.⁴
And he sustains thy lot
And keeps his covenant with thee.⁵

A law did Moses command us,
A possession for the congregation of Jacob,
And he became king in Jeshurun¹
When the heads of the people were gathered,
All together the tribes of Israel.

6. The Blessing of Reuben (cf. Gen. 49³).

Let Reuben live and not die;
But let his men be few.

7. Judah (cf. Gen. 49⁸⁻¹²).

Hear, Jehovah, the voice of Judah,
And unto his people do thou bring him.
His hands strove for him;
But a help from his enemies shalt thou be.

8-11. Levi (cf. Gen. 49⁵⁻⁷).

Thy Thummim and Urim² be to thy pious one Whom thou didst prove at Massah,
With whom thou didst contend at the waters of Meribah;³

Who saith of his father and mother, I have not seen them;

And his brothers he hath not owned
Nor known his own sons.

For they keep thy saying,
And thy covenant they guard.
They show thy judgments to Israel,
They set incense in thy nostril
And whole offerings on thine altar.
Bless thou his strength, O Jehovah,
And the work of his hands do thou receive.
Smite in the loins those that rise up against him,
And those that hate him so they rise up no more.

12. Benjamin (cf. Gen. 49²⁷).

The darling of Jehovah, he dwelleth in security by him;
Jehovah ever broodeth over him
And between his shoulders⁴ he has dwelling.

13-17. Joseph (cf. Gen. 49²²⁻²⁶).

The blessing of Jehovah be on his land,
With the wealth of heaven above⁵
And waters of the deep that couch beneath,
With the wealth of the increase of the sun,
With the wealth of the yield of the moons,
And from the head of the mountains of yore
And from the wealth of the everlasting hills,
And from the wealth of the land and its ful-ness
And from the favor of the Dweller in the Bush,⁶
May all come on the head of Joseph,
Upon the crown of the prince among his brethren.

¹ An ideal poetic name for Israel; cf. 32¹⁵.

² Cf. Ex. 28³⁰, note. Urim and Thummim were the two sacred lots used by the priest in making decisions.

³ Inconsistent with other accounts of events at Massah.

⁴ Alluding to the site of the Temple.

⁵ Hebrew, "with the dew."

⁶ Ex. 3².

¹ Wellhausen's conjecture of a very uncertain text.

² Dillman's conjecture.

³ LXX.

⁴ According to ancient versions.

⁵ Bertholet's emendation, but the text is very uncertain.

The firstling of his ox¹—its majesty!
With horns like those of the wild ox;
With them he thrusteth the peoples
Together to the ends of the earth.
These be the myriads of Ephraim,
These be the thousands of Manasseh.

18, 19. Zebulun and Issachar (cf. Gen. 49^{13f.}).

Rejoice, O Zebulun, in thy strength;
And Issachar in thy tents.
Peoples to the mountain do they call;
There they offer sacrifices of righteousness,
For they suck the abundance of the seas²
And the buried stores of the sand.

20, 21. Gad (cf. Gen. 49¹⁹).

Blessed is the extender of Gad.
As a lion he dwelleth
And tears the arm, yea, the scalp;
And he sought out the choice part for himself,
For there was a commander's portion reserved:

And he came with the heads of the people,
He wrought the righteousness of Jehovah,
And his judgments along with Israel.

22. Dan (cf. Gen. 49¹⁷).

Dan is a lion's whelp,
He leapeth forth from the Bashan.

23. Naphtali (cf. Gen. 49²¹).

Naphtali, abounding in favor
And full of the blessing of Jehovah,
The sea and the south do thou possess.

24, 25. Asher (cf. Gen. 49²⁰).

Blessed above sons be Asher.
May he be the favorite of his brethren,
And be dipping his foot in oil.
Iron and brass are thy bolts³
And as thy days so may be thy strength.⁴

26–29. Epilogue.

There is none like the God of Jeshurun,
Riding the heavens as thy help,
And in his pride through the skies.
The God of old is a dwelling place
And underneath are the everlasting arms.
And he drove out the enemy before thee,
And said, "Destroy!"
So Israel dwelt securely,
The fountain of Jacob alone,
Upon a land of corn and wine;
Yea, his heavens drop dew.

¹ Refers to Ephraim, Gen. 48^{13–20}.

² Allusion to the wealth accruing to the two tribes from the sea.

³ Perhaps a reference to Asher's geographical position which would require strong defense against invasion.

⁴ "Thy strength"—the meaning of the Hebrew word is unknown.

Oh happy art thou, O Israel; who is like thee?
A people delivered by Jehovah,
The shield of thy help,
The sword of thy pride.
So shall thine enemies feign and fawn before thee;
But thou on their heights shall trample them.

CHAPTER XXXIV

The Death of Moses. Moses ascends from the steppes of Moab to Mount Nebo and is given a vision of the promised land—a magnificent panorama; he is told that he will not enter, and he dies alone in some undiscovered spot on the mountain of Moab. Jehovah buries him (vv. 1–6). His days were complete—one hundred and twenty years—but his strength and vision were unimpaired. For thirty days the Israelites bemoaned the loss; Joshua assumed the leadership (vv. 7–9). There is a final word on the greatness of Moses (vv. 10–12).

Moses, alone on the mountain, viewing the future glory of his people, not allowed to enter, dying in a strange land, the people mourning his loss, is all humanly pathetic and humanly true. But it is the implications in the passage that mark its distinction. Moses dies, his life's work is complete, yet "his eye was not dimmed nor his natural force abated." According to 312, he was worn out, but (347) he still possesses the spirit of immortal youth; his vision, his expectation, his power over Israel still live. How easy to have written, "his body was lost in some crevice of the rocks," to state the simple particular! How childlike to write, "He buried him!" Childlike yet universally true, for it is Jehovah that buries all his children. And a Christian might have written even more, for Jesus said, "It cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem." Jehovah buried Moses in Jerusalem, the home of the Eternal God.

The fact that Moses is no longer accepted as the author of Deuteronomy does not lessen its permanent value, for the significance of a book does not depend upon its authorship or literary history, but upon its inherent worth. Judged by this standard Deuteronomy ranks very high. (See intro., pp. 319f.; art., Pentateuch, pp. 139f.) The spirit of the entire book is pre-eminently prophetic. Service is ever placed above sacrifice. To love and to serve Jehovah and one's fellows with all the heart and soul is its supreme demand. No wonder Jesus and the N.T. writers used it so extensively. We may well agree with the judgment of McFadyen: "Deuteronomy is one of the epoch-making books of the world."

JOSHUA

BY PROFESSOR LINDSAY B. LONGACRE

INTRODUCTION

Place in the Canon. In the Hebrew Bible the book of Joshua (named for its chief character, not its author) begins a new division. The law closed with Deuteronomy. After the Law comes the division called the Prophets. Of the two parts into which this division is itself divided, the Earlier and the Later Prophets, Joshua is the first book in the Earlier Prophets. This designation suggests that the book's interest is primarily religious. It is presented neither as a book of law nor as a book of history, but as a book of prophecy. This suggestion, however, needs two qualifications: (1) The term "prophecy" must here be taken in a sense that reaches far beyond the narrow field of prediction; it must include also exhortation and instruction. (2) The book uses historical traditions as the basis of its appeal, so that it may properly be used as a source of history.

In one respect, however, the division in the Jewish Bible is misleading. The book of Joshua does not simply stand next to, but with, the Pentateuch, and for two reasons: (1) The whole Pentateuch in all its constituent documents points forward to the possession of the promised land. Had it not been followed, completed, crowned by an account of that possession it would have, so to speak, died without issue, or, like Moses, would have hailed the land from afar but left it unattained. So that on the basis of historical continuity the story in the Pentateuch needed to be carried further. (2) One familiar with the Pentateuch does not have to get far beneath the surface of the book of Joshua to realize not only that it is composite, but that the literary elements of which it is composed are already familiar. Deuteronomy has left an unmistakable mark on Joshua. Here too are the familiar JE and P, establishing a literary connection between the Pentateuch and Joshua too close to be severed by the latter's assignment to a fresh division of biblical books. It is this close connection of the book of Joshua with the Pentateuch that has led scholars to substitute for the term "Pentateuch" the newer term "Hexateuch," so that this sixth volume of the Story of the Promised Land might be taken into its proper place in the family of its closest literary relatives. (See further the art., The Pentateuch, p. 134, and cf. p. 92b.)

Literary History. The literary form of the book is due chiefly to RD (i.e., the Deuteronomistic Redactor). Who is this RD? The answer is not far to seek. It begins with the book of Deuteronomy, a book which reveals a very definite conception of the conditions under which the Hebrews should enter the land of Canaan; and this Deuteronomistic point of view is unmistakably represented in Joshua. If one should read, for instance, Deuteronomy 134-39 318-22 1122-25 311-8, and then turn to the first chapter of Joshua, he would realize the similarity between the two far better than any amount of second-hand description could tell him.

How does the book of Joshua get this Deuteronomistic coloring? Probably because it was in large part written by someone who looked upon the past from the Deuteronomistic point of view. This "someone," desiring to continue the ancient story beyond the death of Moses and on to the conquest of Canaan, collected his materials and set them down in the way a good Deuteronomist would. This compiler or redactor is designated, for convenience, R, and to indicate that his work was done in the spirit of Deuteronomy, a D is added; hence R^D.

The exact extent to which J and E, singly or in combination, are used in the book is a matter still under some discussion; but there is no doubt about their presence, and many passages show themselves clearly to belong to one or both of these early sources. P also is well represented, more especially in the second half of the book, and the characteristic style and point of view of this document are easily recognized. The main features of the literary analysis are indicated in the notes.

The Hero Joshua. The figure of Joshua is an elusive one. He moves through the book in a fashion that is not easy to follow. The book as a whole has idealized so much of its material that it is not surprising that the chief character should also be idealized. The name means "Jehovah is salvation," in Greek it appears as "Jesus" (cf. Mt. 12¹ Acts 74⁵, mg.). The connection of Joshua with the territory of Ephraim (19⁵⁰ 24³⁰) suggests that back of the narrative there may lie a recollection of the conquest of that district by the tribe of Joseph in which Joshua may have been active. He is mentioned first in Ex. 17⁹ (E) as a mature warrior, although later (Ex. 33¹¹) he is represented as a young man (cf. Num. 11²⁸, mg). His special function in the book is to carry out the commands of Moses as these are set forth by D.

Historical and Religious Value. In estimating the historical value of Joshua two facts have to be kept in mind: (1) The book is primarily a book of prophetic teaching, and only secondarily a book of history. The author or compiler was much more interested in teaching religious truth by the use of historical material than in narrating facts of history. (2) The story of the conquest is told from two divergent points of view. According to the book as a whole, the invading Hebrews formed a single army under the leadership of Joshua, and the entire land of Canaan was conquered by this united army in the short space of seven years (see, e.g., 10⁴⁰⁻⁴³ 11¹⁶⁻²⁰, 23 21⁴³⁻⁴⁵). Following the conquest the land was divided among the twelve tribes by Joshua and Eleazar. Then there are other passages which clearly show that, though in the beginning the armies of Israel may have been united, they soon separated into several groups, each group fighting its own battles. According to the same passages the conquest was less rapid and less complete (see, e.g., 13¹³ 15¹⁴, 63 16¹⁰ 17¹²⁻¹⁸ 23⁴, 5, 12, 13; cf. also the brief summary in Judg. 1).

On account of the primarily didactic purpose of the book, the divergence in the points of view of different sources embodied in the book, and the absence of definite extra-biblical information concerning this early period, it is exceedingly difficult to trace with any degree of assurance the successive stages in Israel's conquest of Canaan; indeed, it may never become possible to determine exactly the steps by which the Hebrews made themselves masters of the land. Nevertheless, there is insufficient reason for doubting that the biblical narratives rest upon a substantial historical basis; on the contrary, there is every reason for believing that the Joshua narratives, especially those going back to the J and E documents, when properly interpreted, possess great historical value.

Since the interest of the compiler was primarily religio-didactic, it is only natural that the book in all its parts should be permeated by an intensely religious atmosphere. Not to mention specific truths suggested in individual narratives, the book as a whole reflects a sublime faith in Jehovah the God of Israel, in his purpose for the nation, and in the ultimate triumph of this purpose. There is also the irrepressible conviction that the tribes fighting the battles of Jehovah were sustained by the unlimited powers of heaven. Inspired by this faith and conviction, the hero, Joshua, is made to emphasize, in his farewell address, the importance of uncompromising loyalty to Jehovah as a condition of national permanence and prosperity.

However, these lofty conceptions did not completely blot out the survivals of cruder and more primitive ways of religious thinking. Such ideas as blood-revenge, the ban (i.e., consecration to Jehovah by destruction), sacred trees and stones, the use of various forms of primitive magic, all reflect a very early stage of theological thinking, before the purer Jehovah religion had succeeded in driving out or transforming the elements which came to the Hebrews as a part of their common Semitic inheritance. Thus the book of Joshua throws much light on the earlier stages in the development of the religion of Jehovah. (See further the art., The Religion of Israel, pp. 165-7.)

Literature: H. Wheeler Robinson, Deuteronomy and Joshua (New Century Bible); G. A. Smith, Historical Geography of the Holy Land; Kent, Beginnings of Hebrew History (Students' Old Testament); Eiselen, The Prophetic Books of the Old Testament; Driver, Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament; articles on "Joshua" in modern Dictionaries of the Bible.

CHAPTERS 1 TO 12: THE INVASION AND CONQUEST OF CANAAN

The book of Joshua falls into two parts; the first of these includes chs. 1-12. In contrast to the books of the Pentateuch, no further laws are given. Everything is ready for the advance. The striking aspect of the story is its directness, its completeness, and its speed. The Hebrews are encamped at Abel-Shittim, the point to which they had been brought at the close of the book of Numbers. Moses is dead and Joshua has succeeded to the leadership. After the start is made the campaign proceeds rapidly. Jericho is captured and an entrance is effected into the hill-country. Next comes a southern campaign. This is followed by one in the north; and the task is done.

CHAPTER I

Preparation for the Crossing of the Jordan. Joshua is exhorted to advance; rations are prepared; the two and one-half tribes east of the Jordan reassert their loyalty. The chapter is characteristically Deuteronomic. All this people (v. 2)—not only the fighting men. The whole nation is thought of as invading the land and taking forcible and complete possession. Joshua, an ideal hero according to Deuteronomic conceptions, is promised complete success. The idea that God would take or need an oath (v. 6) has its place in early conceptions of Deity, but one could hardly imagine such an idea held by Jesus, who taught that even men (let alone, God) should be too trustworthy to need an oath (Mt. 533-37.) The ideal of a good man set forth in v. 8 has its most familiar memorial in Psa. 1. Beyond Jordan (v. 14)—evidently written west of Jordan, hence not by Moses, for the territory of these tribes was east of the Jordan. He shall be put to death (v. 18): in his zeal for Moses, RD lets the two and one-half tribes speak as though they were the special defenders of Moses.

CHAPTER II

The Spies and Rahab. Sent spies—as Moses had done before the first futile attempt to invade the land. Jericho: there have been at least three cities of this name in the same general location: the Jericho of to-day, the Jericho of N.T. and Roman times, and the Jericho of the O.T. They are quite distinct and lie a few miles from each other. The first two are now unimpressive villages. The third is a mound of ruins. Excavations carried on here in 1907-09 disclosed at the lowest level remains of a prehistoric settlement, above which were remains of a Canaanite city, which may well have been the one existing at the time of the Hebrew invasion. This city was a small affair with walls 12 to 14 feet thick, walls and houses being built mostly of sun-dried brick. It showed evidences of destruction by fire (624). The desolate Judæan mountains rise rapidly about a mile west of the place; and as far as the present chapter is concerned the narrative is wholly credible. (See G. A. Smith, Historical Geography of the Holy Land.) Rahab. (Cf. art. in Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible.) Mt. 15 makes her an ancestress of Jesus; and she is highly praised in Heb. 1131 and Jas. 225. Her treachery to her own people, however, should not be overlooked.

The king of Jericho (v. 2)—an interesting side-light on the political conditions the Hebrews had to meet. The Canaanite cities had their own kings, as confirmed by the Tel-el-Amarna correspondence (about 1400 B.C.). If these kings had been united in a confederation, it would have been a much more difficult task for the Hebrews to make their way into the country. As it was, they faced comparatively small units of inhabitants, each Canaanite city acting for itself. There came men of Israel: taking the story as it stands, it must be supposed that both king and people of Jericho would be very much disturbed as to what might happen at the hands of the horde of invaders camping only a few miles away across the river (v. 9). Pursued after them to Jordan (v. 7)—supposing, of course, that the spies had hurried back to their own people. In vv. 10f. RD represents Rahab speaking like a good Deuteronomist (cf. Deut. 225 439 1125). She urged the men to flee to the mountain (v. 16), which was nearer than the Jordan and in the opposite direction, with many caves where it would be easy to hide. Which thou didst let us down by (v. 18)—refers to the window, not the line of scarlet thread, nor the cord (v. 15). The scarlet thread may have been something worn by one of the spies and he hastily takes it off, to use as a convenient and not too conspicuous signal (cf. Gen. 3818).

CHAPTER III

Crossing the Jordan. Two chapters are devoted to a description of events connected with the crossing of the Jordan. All the children of Israel would be approximately two million people (cf. note on Num. 1, 2). Sanctify yourselves (v. 5): the advance is an act of God and as such must be prepared for. The people must be ceremonially clean before they are fit to share in the divine act. The sanctifying would consist in the washing of garments and bodies as well as abstaining from any act or object regarded as unclean (cf. 713 and Ex. 1910). The most vivid commentary one could have on the principle involved is to see a Mohammedan to-day making his ceremonial ablutions before going into the mosque to pray.

The accounts in vv. 8f. are not quite clear; one represents the priests as standing on the east bank of the river until all the people have passed over, the other places the priests in the bed of the stream which had become dry. Evidently, materials from two different sources are used by the compiler. The close of v. 8 looks like a note intended to harmonize the two conceptions. It is easy to read the story without realizing all that is involved in dealing with such a great number of people. The selection of twelve men, first mentioned in v. 12, is ordered a second time in 42, where the purpose of the selection is explained. In its present position the direction has no connection with the story. At Adam (v. 16) the Jordan is a very crooked river, and it happens on rare occasions that the bank becomes so undermined that a huge mass of earth and rock falls into the stream, forming a temporary dam and entirely blocking the flow of water for a time. Such a case is reported to have happened in the year 1257 A.D. (See Kent, Beginnings of Hebrew History, p. 259, note; and Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible, vol. ii, p. 765.) An occurrence of this kind might easily form a basis for the present narrative; although this, from the point of view of the compiler, would only transfer the miraculous element, which is central in the narrative, to a point farther upstream. There are many places where the Jordan can be forded in the dry season, but this crossing did not occur at such a time (cf. v. 15 and 418).

CHAPTER IV

The Twelve Memorial Stones. Take twelve stones: there is nothing in Palestine quite so plentiful as stones; they are everywhere, and they supply the natural and universal material for boundaries, monuments, and memorials. Twelve men (vv. 2, 4)—cf. on Num. 16-15. Vv. 6-9 are another indication of the ideal character of the story. The writer evidently regards the pile of stones as conspicuous throughout many generations and the Hebrews as being where such a question might frequently be asked. This view, however, overlooks the ease with which such a pile of stones would lose its identity among the stones of the land and its innumerable stone piles, as well as the fact that the biblical narratives of later times represent the Hebrews as living in the high lands of Judah rather than near Jericho, so that at best there would be comparatively few children to ask this question.

Set up stones in the Jordan (v. 9)—apparently another tradition about twelve memorial stones. Obviously, they could not be set up in the bed of the river and also taken to the camp (v. 8). The people hastened (v. 10). This is the only hint that the writer had considered at all the magnitude of the operation involved in moving two million people with their camp equipment. Haste would be imperative. Forty thousand (v. 13)—but cf. Num. 267¹³, 34. The first month (v. 19)—Nisan, i.e., April, so that the time of year would not be the dry season, when it might be practicable to ford the river (cf. note on 316). Gilgal—a name of several localities in Palestine. The word is used generally for a circle of stones having religious significance, a cromlech. The natural sense of the passage is that the place here referred to had this name before the Hebrews took it, which means that it was a place sacred to the Canaanites. But 59 explains the origin of the name differently. It may be that the writer regarded Gilgal as the place where the Hebrews lodged that night (vv. 3, 8), yet two different places seem to be intended by these terms.

CHAPTER V

1. Belongs rather to the preceding chapter, bringing to a close the compiler's comment on the crossing of the Jordan.

2-12. Circumcision and the Passover. The practices of circumcision and the keeping of the Passover are intended to consecrate the new stage of the march. Circumcise: on the subject of circumcision consult Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible, Encyclopædia Biblica, and the Jewish Encyclopædia. Knives of flint, instead of metal, used probably because they were felt to be more in keeping with ancient custom. In vv. 4-7, R^D offers an elaborate statement that the men had not been circumcised, without indicating why this had not been done. V. 9 looks as if circumcision had not been instituted in Egypt (cf. Ex. 425) and that this reproach is only now rolled away. The words again and the second time in v. 2 may have been added by R^D in order to connect the two points of view. A quite different representation of the introduction of circumcision among the Hebrews appears in Gen. 17, which carries the rite back to an origin that has no relation to Egypt. Gilgal—derived from the Hebrew verb, galal, "to roll," but this form does not mean rolling (v. 9, mg.; cf. note on 419). The precise details mentioned in vv. 10-12 are all characteristic of the priestly writer who felt sure that no "uncircumcised" would eat the Passover, and also that the manna would hold out until native food was available.

13-15. Vision of Joshua. Joshua was by Jericho: in view of the preceding chapters, according to which Joshua with the people have been by Jericho for two or three weeks, this statement is for purposes of exact location both indefinite and unnecessary. It is, however, wholly appropriate and characteristic as introducing the story of the vision which dramatizes Jehovah's support of Joshua in the attack on Jericho. The location of Jericho made it the door to western Palestine through which the Hebrews would have to enter if they were to enter at all from this direction, and its conquest was imperative. One never knew when he was in the presence of divine messengers and forces (e.g., Num. 2231 2 Kings 617). Put off thy shoe—as Moses was bidden to do (Ex. 35), and as the Mohammedan does to-day before entering a mosque.

CHAPTER VI

The Capture of Jericho. The Lord said: if this is a continuation of 513-15 the writer has lost sight of the captain with his drawn sword. But more probably the original continuation of 513-15 has been omitted in favor of the story which here begins afresh. Vv. 6-11 describe the march which is made in obedience to the instructions in vv. 2-5. The order (v. 9) seems to be: (1) armed men; (2) priests bearing trumpets; (3) the ark; and (4) a rear guard. The word priests that is printed in italics does not appear in the Hebrew text, either here or in v. 13. The statement in both verses is simply that the rear guard went after the ark blowing with the trumpets as they went; although nothing has been said about supplying the rear guard with trumpets. The repetition of compassing the city seven times (v. 15) is an obvious duplicate due to separate sources. Vv. 17-19 hardly belong here; v. 16 should be followed immediately by v. 20. These directions belong earlier in the story. At this point there is no time for further instructions and there would be too much noise to have heard them had they been given after the order to shout. Devoted—see Num. 1814, note. The presence of the devoted thing in the camp would cause the whole camp to be devoted (cf. mg. of v. 18 for accursed).

The fall of Jericho is a subject which has long had its place in the familiar picture gallery of O.T. scenes. Yet somehow the story does not read convincingly to men whose thoughts move naturally in the world as it is known to-day. But why should it? It was written by and for men who regarded the world, not as a unity but as a diversity in which the familiar course of events could be interrupted or reversed without in the least disturbing adjacent objects or interfering with (unknown) laws of nature. The real root of the modern reader's perplexity over the passage is his failure to distinguish between the overthrow of Jericho as a fact of history and the writer's explanation of its cause and method—the distinction between the "what" and the "how"; for the two are distinct and separable. The former is easily disposed of: the conquest of Jericho by the Hebrews is reliable history. It is the latter question which calls for comment.

The writer does not claim to have witnessed the event. He was dependent on the traditions which had come down to him from an earlier time. The difference between his own point of view and that of a modern reader is seen, for instance, in his apparent unconcern that his narrative represents Rahab's house as being on the town wall (215), that the walls fell down flat (620), and yet that Rahab's house is still intact (622). There was no doubt, however, that Jericho had been overthrown. As a matter of fact, the Hebrews were not the only ones who had taken this city at one time or another. Further, the sacred ark was regarded as having magic power, even if it was not always victorious (cf. on 1 Sam. 4-6). Also, belief in the power of a united shout was easy to one who believed in the objective power of a blessing or a curse (cf. on Num. 226). So that materials were at hand for just such an account as is given here, provided one lived in a world where these views were valid. And that is where the writer lived. And the modern reader, if he would appreciate these narratives, must be willing and able, in imagination, to place himself in that ancient world so different from his own. (See art., How to Study the Bible, pp. 5-7.)

These narratives are imaginative, but they cannot fairly be called fictitious. They are products of a pious imagination whose underlying motive is faith, not fancy. Once the capture of Jericho is established, along with its significance for the Hebrew people, it was as legitimate for the ancient writers to picture the scene in terms of their faith and of the world as they knew it as it is for the believer to-day to picture biblical history in terms of his faith and the world as he knows it (cf. the famous pictures of biblical scenes by the great painters). Thrilled with the vision of an ancient triumph, the biblical writer painted his picture, not in color with a brush on canvas, but in words with a pen on parchment; and he had a perfect right to do this, for he was preaching faith, not drawing diagrams. So that the obligation rests upon those to whom his words have come to understand his method and his purpose, and not to distort his meanings by forcing them into patterns they were never designed to fit. From time immemorial, sacred symbols, whether ark or crucifix, have fired men's hearts with courage, trumpets have sounded for assembly and attack, walls have gone down before invading armies, and all in the name of the God of Hosts; and this is what happened at Jericho. The destruction was probably not as complete as this passage indicates, for the city is apparently still standing in Josh. 1821 and 2 Sam. 105. On v. 26 cf. 1 Kings 1634.

CHAPTER VII

1-5. Defeat at Ai. Devoted—see above on 617. The anger of Jehovah: it is only the familiarity of this phrase that obscures the primitive conception of Deity underlying it. Ai—up in the hill-country, well within the promised land. To toil thither: the ascent from Jericho in the Jordan Valley is by way of a steep gorge or wady whose ascent is extremely toilsome. Thirty-six out of three thousand does not seem such a terrible loss. The disaster lay in the fact of defeat, whether with or without casualties.

6-9. Joshua Argues with Jehovah. Cf. Deut. 926-29. Joshua argues with Jehovah as Moses had done; a dialogue in which the writer dramatizes Joshua's humiliation and his discovery of the reason for the defeat. V. 9 shows clearly how closely united the welfare of Jehovah was supposed to be with the welfare of his people. In the thought of the early Hebrews the defeat of a nation was the defeat of its deity.

10-26. Trespass of Achan and His Punishment. To take the devoted thing was to rob God, a far worse sin than to rob a fellow man. (See notes on Lev. 27^{28, 29} and cf. on Acts 51-11.) This brought upon the whole camp the ban under which the devoted thing had already been placed (cf. 61⁸). The deity's intervention (v. 13) must be properly prepared for (cf. on 35). Which the Lord taketh (v. 14): the selection was probably thought of as having been made by some use of sacred lots, although just how this was done can only be conjectured. The ban is carried out against Achan and the place is named for the event. A goodly Babylonish mantle (v. 21) indicates in an interesting way the commerce of the day, as one might now have a gown from Paris. The inclusion of Achan's family with himself (v. 24) was inevitable. The separation of an individual from his family in matters of responsibility arose only at a comparatively late period. In this case all would have been contaminated by the devoted things. Death by stoning was a recognized form of execution. Stones big enough to be taken up in both hands were thrown down upon the victim until life was extinct (cf. Jn. 81-11 Acts 757-59 1410). The confused text—stoning, burning, stoning—in this verse is due to the fact that the documents used are poorly combined. The name of the place Achor (v. 26) is attributed to this event by one of the popular etymologies so frequent in O.T.; cf. on 59.

CHAPTER VIII

1-29: The Capture of Ai. The camp having been purified in the drastic fashion just described, a second attack on Ai is made. The numbers in v. 3 seem too large (cf. v. 12).

4-7. A quite reasonable strategy. 8-13. Among the people (v. 9): the difference of one Hebrew letter would give the reading, "in the midst of the vale," as in v. 13. Vv. 10-12 are parallel to vv. 3-9. V. 13 reaches the same point reached in v. 9. 14-29. The strategy is successfully carried out. At the time . . . Arabah (omitted by LXX) gives no meaning. No previous plan of this kind (v. 18) has been mentioned. The idea is similar to that in the story of Moses (Ex. 1711). Joshua is apparently imagined to be on some high point where he could see and be seen, for he directs the outbreak of the men in ambush and also (v. 21) the return of the Hebrews who by apparent flight had drawn the people of Ai away from their city. The slaughter of the inhabitants (vv. 22-26) is carried out with the same thoroughness as in the case of Jericho. A heap forever (v. 28)—an echo of Deut. 1316. Forever must not be taken too literally; for, according to the author of Ezra 228, Ai was still a city in his day. The king is first killed and then his body hung on the tree (cf. Deut. 2122f.). Heap of stones—cf. 726 and 43, note.

30-35. A Fragment About a Ceremony at Mount Ebal. The location is at Shechem and presupposes settlement in the country. The passage does not relate to what immediately precedes or follows and interrupts the close connection between 829 and 91. It apparently wishes to make clear that Deut. 27 was actually obeyed, but it plainly belongs elsewhere, having no place in the story until after the land has been conquered.

CHAPTER IX

1-15. The Trick of the Gibeonites. Vv. 1, 2 give a summary of the successful progress made up to this point, dramatically indicated by the fear of the Hebrews that is spreading through the country. Perizzite, Hivite—the names of two inconsiderable peoples of central Palestine; on the other names in this verse cf. Num. 1329 and note there. Note the similarity between these verses and 51. V. 3 begins the special story of the Gibeonites. Gibeon was five or six miles northwest of Jerusalem. In Solomon's day it was "a great high place" and the chief place for sacrifices before the Temple was built (1 Kings 34). Heard what Joshua had done (v. 3). While this statement is appropriate to the course of the general narrative, it does not seem applicable to the story of the Gibeonites. The reason which they themselves give (v. 10) refers only to events previous to the crossing of the Jordan; and were it not for this editorial harmonization in v. 3b it would be most natural to suppose that the camp at Gilgal (v. 6) was the one pitched immediately after the river had been crossed (ch. 4). This would agree with the implied smartness of the Gibeonites, who would then be represented as realizing their danger, and as taking immediate and timely steps to save themselves.

The success of the strategy described in vv. 4, 5 (in v. 4 follow the reading of the versions; see mg.) is attributed to two causes, either of which would have been sufficient; the two-fold explanation probably indicates different versions of the story. These causes are: (1) that the Hebrews were deceived; and (2) they failed to ask counsel of Jehovah. The existence of the two versions also explains the change from Gibeonites to Hivites (vv. 3, 7; cf. 11¹⁹), and the alternation between Joshua and the men of Israel as leaders in the negotiations for the Hebrews. The princes of the congregation (v. 15b) connects this clause with the version of the story given in vv. 17–21. This v. 15 is a good illustration of the textual conditions which raise questions of literary analysis. Here are three well-defined statements: (1) Joshua made peace with them; (2) he made a covenant with them to let them live; and (3) the princes sware unto them. These appear to be too many statements for a single operation; and when they are crowded together like this their presence is most reasonably explained on the basis of the composite character of the present text.

16–27. The Resulting Status of the Gibeonites. V. 16 connects with the covenant in v. 15 and is continued in v. 22. Vv. 17–21 give a parallel account. House of my God (v. 23) connects with place which he should choose (a Deuteronomic phrase) in v. 27, both referring to the Temple. There was, of course, no Temple in the days of Joshua, but when these documents were written it had long been the center of the nation's religion. This verse is continued in v. 26. V. 22 does not call for any answer. The phrase, hewers of wood and drawers of water (v. 27), has become a current term for any persons who are condemned to menial service.

CHAPTER X

1–15. Gibeon Attacked by Five Kings in Southern Canaan, Rescued by Joshua. The covenant made with the Gibeonites obligates the Hebrews to come to their defense when threatened by the five kings. Under Joshua's leadership, and with the aid of a thunderstorm sent by Jehovah, the five kings are utterly defeated. The territory indicated would be included approximately between lines drawn from Jerusalem west to the coast, from Jerusalem south to Hebron, and then from Hebron west to the coast. Throughout all this campaign the headquarters of the Hebrews remains at Gilgal, where they first encamped after crossing the Jordan (4¹⁹). It could not have been an entirely satisfactory location because, lying in the low Jordan Valley, every move into Canaan would have to start with the steep ascent up to the high-lying hill-country which was the object of the invasion and of the conquest. Ascent of Beth-horon (v. 10). There were two Beth-horons, the upper and the lower, near together and only a few miles northwest of Gibeon. In the pursuit from Gibeon the upper Beth-horon would be reached first, a descent leading down from there to lower Beth-horon, a little distance beyond. Azekah and Makkedah must have been in the same general neighborhood, though the exact sites cannot now be located. The Lord discomfited them. These were the wars of Jehovah (cf. Num. 21¹⁴) and Jehovah was the final factor in all victories. V. 11 pictures Jehovah's direct co-operation in the sending of a terrific hailstorm (cf. Judg. 5²⁰).

Vv. 12–14 contain the famous reference to the sun standing still, which, like so many other familiar passages, would never have been misunderstood if its literary form had been recognized. There is here a four-line fragment of a poem. Taken by itself, it is plainly a poetic expression of the idea that the day was long enough for a complete victory. It is quoted from the Book of Jashar; Jashar meaning "upright," and referring to the nation as a whole or to the nation's heroes, or to Jehovah himself (cf. 2 Sam. 1¹⁸). But the writer of the book of Joshua, in his zeal for Jehovah and for Joshua, has taken the poetry as though it were mechanical description and has made a nature miracle out of a poetic expression (vv. 12a, 13b). Later readers, ignoring the distinction between prose and poetry, and themselves as interested in signs and wonders as the author of Joshua, have been equally prosaic and mistaken in their reading of the poem. (See art., Bible as Literature, p. 19.) V. 15 is more suitable at v. 43, where it also appears. At this place it is premature; the fighting is not over.

16–27. The Fate of the Kings. The reference to the cave is true to the country; caves there are still numerous, and still used for various purposes. To put one's foot upon the neck of his foe (v. 24) was no mere gesture of triumph, but was supposed actually to complete the victory. In v. 25 RD adds his familiar exhortation. The kings are treated as the king of Ai had been (8²⁹).

28-43. Review and Summary. RD reviews and summarizes the campaign of which details have already been given. He views it as a complete subjugation of southern Palestine. Kadesh-barnea (v. 41) marks an extreme southern outpost fifty miles south of Beersheba. From here the Hebrews have conquered the country extending as far north as Gibeon and Ai, and from the Jordan Valley westward to the sea. It was a "whirlwind campaign," a "clean sweep"; but see below on 13¹³, and also introduction, section on "Historical and Religious Value," p. 346.

CHAPTER XI

1-15. Conquest of Northern Canaan. Just as the possession of southern Canaan had been won by a single victorious engagement (ch. 10), so the possession of northern Canaan is now won by another complete victory over a northern group of Canaanite kings (vv. 1-9). The places and peoples named in vv. 2, 3, are intended to indicate all Palestine lying north of a line through the plain of Esdraelon and the southern end of the Sea of Galilee (Chinneroth). The name of Jabin (v. 1) and the location of the battle (vv. 4-9) are points of contact with the similar engagement doubly described in Judg. 4 and 5. Waters of Merom (v. 7)—identified by many with Lake Huleh, but a location more appropriate to the narrative would be nearer to the modern Meron, southwest of Hazor. The Hebrews never maintained control of the more open and level parts of the country and so had little use for either chariots or horses (v. 6). This fact may have had its influence on the burning of the chariots and the brutal mutilation of the captured horses (cf. 2 Sam. 8⁴). Great Zidon (v. 8): the familiar city on the coast north of Tyre is meant, but this seems too far away. The Misrephoth-maim may be the modern Musherfe, which lies on the coast almost directly west of Hazor. If the Mizpeh of this verse is the same as the Mizpah of v. 3, then the flight took place in two directions, some of the fugitives going northwest toward the Sea and others northeast back toward Hazor. Vv. 10-15 (RD) complete the story, specifying that the king of Hazor was slain, that the Canaanites were exterminated, and particularly and characteristically that Jehovah's commands to Moses were fulfilled to the letter.

16-20. Summary of the Conquest of Canaan. A summary of the two campaigns which, according to this narrative, gave the Hebrews complete possession of Canaan. Seir and Lebanon (v. 17) represent the extreme south and the extreme north similar to the more familiar "from Dan to Beersheba," although these are named in the reverse order and do not embrace quite so much territory. A long time (v. 18)—cf. on 14¹⁰. To the early Hebrew it would appear no more strange that Jehovah should operate on men's hearts (v. 20) than that he should fight with hailstones (10¹¹). The word "heart," however, must be understood in the biblical sense, namely, of men's thoughts and ideas, not of their feelings and emotions. The expression, "a hard heart," is equivalent to the modern expressions "head-strong," "self-willed."

21-23. The Anakim. These verses contain a final note concerning the giants who, according to tradition, lived near Hebron and in the Philistine country, as did the later Goliath of Gath (1 Sam. 17⁴).

CHAPTER XII

The Kings That Were Conquered by Moses East of Jordan (1-6) and by Joshua West of Jordan (7-24). Chs. 10, 11, telling of the conquest of the south and north respectively, had each closed with a summary of successes. Now that the conquest of the land is completed, there is given a summary of the whole enterprise. On vv. 1-6 cf. Deut. 2, 3. Vv. 7-24, which sum up the exploits of Joshua, repeat the names already mentioned in the preceding chapters with fifteen names in addition.

The following facts should be noted of the book so far: (1) The northern and southern campaigns left unmentioned a considerable extent of territory in central Canaan. This was eventually occupied by the Hebrews. Some of the names in this chapter, Bethel for instance (v. 16; cf. 8¹⁷), may be echoes of the invasion of this part of the country; as may also the isolated fragment, 830-35. (2) The conquest as represented in this part of the book was accomplished with conspicuous thoroughness ("there was none left that breathed," 11¹¹). (3) It was carried through quickly. The undertaking really reduced itself to two decisive battles, one against the kings of the south and the other against the kings of the north. The Hebrews acted unitedly under Joshua's leadership. This representation of the conquest is emphasized because it differs so widely from another one that appears later in the book (see on 13¹³), in comparison with which the one given here shows itself clearly as an idealization of the story in terms of an ideal fulfillment of the Deuteronomic command that the Canaanites should be exterminated (see intro., p. 346).

CHAPTERS 13 TO 24: THE DISTRIBUTION OF THE LAND AND JOSHUA'S FORMAL FAREWELL

The first part of the book consists mainly of narratives compiled from JE with frequent expansions by R^D and a few additions from P. The subject is primarily the conquest of the land. The second part consists mainly of geographical lists from P with only occasional brief extracts from JE and comparatively little of R^D. The subject is primarily the distribution of the land among the tribes. Additional matter includes the assignment of cities to the Levites, release of the tribes settled east of Jordan (cf. Num. 32) who had helped in the conquest, and two versions of a farewell address by Joshua. The first part of the book closes with Joshua's triumph, the second with his death.

CHAPTER XIII

1-7. Jehovah Orders Division of Canaan Among the Tribes. Remaineth (v. 1) may have referred originally to parts of the country lying within the territory traditionally occupied by the Hebrews (see below on v. 13), but R^D immediately applies the statement to border districts never occupied, and, indeed, never claimed (except ideally), by the Hebrews. The five Philistine cities named in v. 3 are frequently referred to (e.g., Judg. 33 1 Sam. 64). Something has dropped out between v. 8 and the preceding verses; v. 7 is speaking of the Manasseh west of the Jordan, while v. 8 is speaking of the eastern part of the tribe. Furthermore, him, v. 8, has no proper antecedent in the present text.

8-33. Inheritances East of the Jordan. For the various sites and cities mentioned in these verses the critical commentaries and Bible dictionaries should be consulted; no attempt is made here to discuss them all.

V. 13 is the first of a series of fragments which represent a view of the invasion so different from the ideal view set forth in the book as a whole that it deserves more than casual mention, not only as an interesting item of literary significance, but more especially because of its bearing on the historical course of events (see also intro., p. 346). The other fragments are 1514-19, 63 1610 1711-18 1947. With these should be compared Judg. 1, where they are substantially repeated in combination with additional material. These passages are from J and represent the oldest and most reliable view of the history. According to their testimony, the settlement in Canaan was made gradually and partially, not by a single victorious movement; and it was carried out by single tribes or small groups of tribes acting independently, rather than by a united campaign undertaken by the whole nation. Treaty as well as warfare played its part in the story. The outcome was that the Hebrews established themselves in the hill-country, but they were unable to occupy the broader and more level districts and many of the cities. There are many reasons for regarding this as the actual course of the history, not the least being its correspondence with the conditions indicated in the books of Judges, Samuel, and Kings. It offers such a contrast to the idealization of the past which is characteristic of the present book of Joshua that the two must be regarded as mutually exclusive. Of the two the earlier testimony must be recognized as the more historical.

With v. 14 cf. ch. 21. Medeba (v. 16)—interesting to-day chiefly on account of the mosaic map, dating from the sixth century A.D., in the floor of the Greek church there (cf. Cobern, New Archaeological Discoveries, pp. 367f.). Plain (v. 17)—better, with mg., table-land; for while the district referred to is one of broad fields, it lies high above the level, not only of the Jordan Valley, but also of the Judæan ranges to the west. Balaam (v. 22)—cf. on Num. 21-24. With v. 3 cf. ch. 22.

CHAPTER XIV

Assignment of Hebron to Caleb. Eleazar and Joshua were the successors respectively of Aaron (Num. 2022-29) and Moses (Num. 2715-23); but whereas Moses took precedence over Aaron, Eleazar takes precedence over Joshua. Vv. 6-15 give an explanation of the fact that Caleb and his descendants possessed Hebron, one of the most important cities in the territory of Judah. Although named here with Judah, Caleb is usually represented as a descendant of Kenaz the Edomite (cf. Judg. 113). There are grounds for supposing that his clan had penetrated the country from the south at an earlier period. Forty-five years (v. 10): this is the only statement in the book that bears on the length of time the conquest was supposed to cover. If the traditional forty years are taken as the correct number for the wilderness period, this verse would indicate that the conquest extended through five years. If the wilderness period was thirty-eight years (Deut. 214), then the conquest would have covered seven years. Anakim (v. 12)—giants. Three are named in 1514; cf. on 1121-23.

CHAPTER XV

1-20. Judah's Allotment. Roughly speaking, it included the territory west of a line drawn from the mouth of the Jordan at the Dead Sea to Kadesh-barnea, with the Mediterranean as the western boundary. Gilgal (v. 7)—not the place of the encampment near Jericho. "Gilgal" means "circle," and occurs frequently as a place name, indicating the site of a circle of stones having religious significance (see 419, notes). Jerusalem (v. 8)—another indication of the ideal character of the book, as Jerusalem did not come into the possession of the Hebrews until the time of David (2 Sam. 56-9).

Caleb receives his portion (vv. 13-19; cf. on 146-15) as though he belonged to the tribe of Judah, but he is among the children of Judah, i.e., he constitutes a different tribe. Vv. 14-19 are repeated in Judg. 110-15; and cf. above on 1313. Springs of water (v. 19), rare enough in Judah, would make all the difference between desirable and undesirable fields. Hebron's value is due to its supply of water. V. 20 gives P's concluding formula.

21-63. List of the Cities of Judah. Twenty-nine (v. 32)—the total is incorrect; it should be thirty-six. A smaller error occurs in v. 36. For v. 36, cf. 1313, notes.

CHAPTERS XVI, XVII

The Territory of the Children of Joseph. Joseph is not a single tribe but always is divided into the so-called half-tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh (164). Of these the more important and influential is Ephraim, who gives his name to the hill-country where he settles. Manasseh's chief share lay east of the Jordan. For 1610 cf. on 1313.

For 173-6 cf. on Num. 271-11 361-12. For 1711-13 cf. on 1313. The towns here named are situated in or near the broad fertile plain of Esdraelon, which the Hebrews were never able to hold (cf. 1716), a fact easily overlooked if the glowing idealism of the book of Joshua is not understood. 1714-18 (cf. on 1313) furnishes further indication both of the partial failure of the conquest and also of the way the tribes act independently. Thou shalt drive out, etc. (1718): the sense here should obviously agree with 1716.

CHAPTER XVIII

The Tent at Shiloh; The Territory of the Children of Benjamin. In chs. 16 and 17, Judah and Joseph have had their lots assigned, but now there is a halt in the narrative. Seven tribes remain who have not been assigned to their inheritance. After long obscurity the sacred tent appears again and in a fragment from P is located at Shiloh in Ephraim's territory. Slack (v. 3) suggests again that the conquest was not as complete and triumphant as might otherwise appear. Joshua has to exhort the people to make a survey of the remaining territory with a view to final distribution. V. 7 is plainly from RD, as is shown by its view of the Levites and its reference to the tribes east of Jordan. Beginning with the distribution to Benjamin at v. 11 the distribution to the seven tribes is set down in the same manner that had been followed in the case of Judah and Joseph.

CHAPTER XIX

The Distribution Completed. (Continued from ch. 18.) Vv. 15, 30, 38 contain numerical discrepancies which cannot now be explained. 47. Cf. on 1313. Leshem is probably the same as the Laish of Judg. 1829. 49f. Joshua, as national leader, and also as belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, is specially mentioned as receiving his portion within the bounds of his own tribe, although the commandment of Jehovah referring to it is not found elsewhere. 51. Looking back from this verse to 181, it seems reasonable to suppose, as some do, that 181 originally stood just before 141. This would make an appropriate beginning and unify the whole account of the distribution, locating it at Shiloh (cf. on 830-35) before the sacred tent, i.e., under divine auspices, with 1951 as the appropriate conclusion.

CHAPTER XX

Designation of the Six Cities of Refuge. Cf. on Num. 359-34 and Deut. 19. The imperative custom of blood revenge required that if one person kill another the dead man's next of kin should kill the killer. The custom knew no exceptions and made no provision for accidents. These cities are provided for the protection, not of men who had committed a premeditated murder, but (1) to shelter the accused until his case could be heard and acted upon by proper judges; and (2) in case the death were accidental to provide for the accused a place where he could live in safety from the avenger. These six cities are located, three on each side of the Jordan, and each of the three in the northern, middle, and southern parts of the land respectively. They are included in the list of cities assigned to the Levites in the next chapter and were in all probability known already as places of religious importance. The text of the chapter differs considerably in Hebrew and LXX, the latter omitting and unawares, in v. 3, and all the vv. 4-6 except the phrase until he stand before the congregation for judgment, in v. 6. On blood revenge, see the article, Bible Manners and Customs, p. 75.

CHAPTER XXI

Cities Assigned to the Levites. Cf. Num. 351-8. Vv. 1-7 give the general statement of the number of cities involved, the tribes which should release them, and the Levitical families to whom they should be assigned. Vv. 8-40 give the cities by name; a kind of itemized list to accompany the general statement in vv. 4-7. The children of Aaron the priest (v. 4) constitute a special group within the family of Kohath, and their thirteen cities are priestly cities as distinct from the thirty-five remaining Levitical cities. The word translated suburbs means throughout the chapter lands close to a city where cattle could be pastured. Vv. 11f. reflect the compiler's embarrassment over the assignment to the children of Aaron of the cities that were already held by Caleb. Though among the children of Judah (15¹³), he is not treated as a Hebrew and would therefore be under no obligation to surrender any cities for the sake of a Hebrew religious requirement. In these verses the idea is that the children of Aaron received Hebron and the adjoining pastures while Caleb retained the fields and villages. Vv. 43-45 express the devout belief of the Deuteronomist that in ancient times in Israel everything turned out exactly as it should. Many people feel that way to-day about the past, instinctively idealizing and glorifying everything that happened then and correspondingly depreciating everything belonging to the present.

CHAPTER XXII

1-8. Return of the Transjordanic Tribes. A happy conclusion of an arrangement which when proposed threatened disaster (Num. 32). 8. Better, omit with LXX, spake unto them saying and read and they returned with much wealth. Your brethren refers presumably to the men who had remained behind as a home guard after the departure of the quota of warriors promised to aid in the western campaign; cf. the provision in 1 Sam. 30²⁴.

9-34. An Altar Erected East of the Jordan. An example of the literary form called a midrash (cf. on Num. 31), a story designed to illustrate and to enforce a religious teaching. The teaching here to be illustrated is that the Hebrews should worship Jehovah at one sanctuary only, in this case Shiloh (cf. 18¹ and 195¹). When the book of Joshua was written, Jerusalem was the sole shrine, and the principle of one central sanctuary is clearly laid down in the present midrash. Its late date is indicated by the principle which it embodies, a principle which had not been laid down in earlier days (cf. Ex. 20²⁴ and 1 Kings 19¹⁰), as well as by the suppression of the civil leader Joshua in the interest of the religious leader Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, the priest. The midrash may have as a historical foundation an actual altar somewhere along the Jordan in connection with which was told a story of threatened war between the tribes (cf. Judg. 19, 20). To see to (v. 10)—i.e., to look at, conspicuous. The establishment of an altar to Jehovah anywhere else than Shiloh (v. 16; later, Jerusalem) was regarded as nothing less than rebellion against Jehovah. V. 19 suggests that the land west of Jordan was the real Holy Land, the land east of Jordan was debatable. The English translation of v. 22 misses the impressive threefold name "El," "Elohim," "Jehovah," which appears also in Psa. 50¹, and which makes the following assurance a particularly solemn one. The characteristic of an altar is, of course, that it is a sacred place upon which offerings are made to a deity (v. 23). A witness (v. 28)—also in v. 34 where the words in italics in English do not appear in the Hebrew. This means that the Hebrew text does not give the name of the altar, but that the name is supplied here by the translators, perhaps under the influence of Gen. 31^{47f}.

CHAPTER XXIII

Joshua's Farewell Address: First Account. The Deuteronomic spirit, language, and point of view of this account will be quite evident to one who will compare Deut. 28, or even the little paragraph, Josh. 21⁴³⁻⁴⁵. The conquest has been completed; it was all Jehovah's doing, and now the remaining people of the land must be driven out; there must be no fellowship with them, under penalty of all the evil things (v. 15) that will come upon those who transgress the covenant by serving other gods (v. 16).

CHAPTER XXIV

Joshua's Farewell Address: Second Account. This is the address as E thought of it. The address leads into a renewal of the covenant on the part of Joshua and the people to be loyal to Jehovah. The details of the historical allusions can easily be traced by the use of a reference Bible. 1-14. Other gods (vv. 2, 3): according to some modes of expression Abraham would be termed a heathen while he was in his home beyond the River. Balak fought against Israel (v. 9)—cf. Num. 22-24. The men of Jericho fought against you (v. 11)—this is not the impression one would get from ch. 6. Amorite . . . Jebusite—the familiar catalogue from RD. The hornet (v. 12)—may be meant figuratively (cf. Deut. 14⁴), or literally, in the way that Jehovah sent locusts and other pests; but the reference is not clear. The intention, however, is plainly to emphasize Jehovah's agency as being the effective factor, and not Israel's sword or bow. The indication in v. 14 is that up to this point the Hebrews were not yet worshiping Jehovah only; but that earlier gods, from beyond the River and from Egypt, were still cherished (see v. 23). 15-18. The people choose Jehovah because of his aid and guidance in the past. 19-24. They confirm their choice by agreeing to be absolutely and exclusively loyal to him in the future. While Jehovah was merciful and forgiving, he was also jealous and, on some points, quite unforgiving (cf. Ex. 34^{6f.}). Furthermore, the natural reading of the verse would make jealous explain holy (cf. on Num. 18¹). 25-28. It would be interesting to discover the history lying back of the covenant, statute, and ordinance (v. 25), connected with Shechem, and what relation this covenant had, if any, to the one associated with Moses at Sinai. There has been much discussion concerning the book of the Law referred to in v. 26. If the verse came from R^D, it would be natural to think of the law book as the original Deuteronomy. Some have thought the reference to be the Book of the Covenant (Ex. 20²²⁻²³¹⁹; cf. Ex. 24⁷). In any case the book referred to was evidently thought of as a book to which additions could still be made, and one that was separate from the book of Joshua. The stone, the oak—sacred stones and sacred trees are frequently mentioned in O.T., and are quite numerous in Palestine to-day, where they are still regarded in the primitive way indicated in v. 26. 29-33. Cf. Judg. 26⁹. The body of Joseph is probably thought of as embalmed according to the Egyptian custom (v. 32), which was not practiced by the Hebrews (cf. Gen. 50²⁵ Ex. 13¹⁹). Abraham had purchased a burial place at Hebron for his dead (Gen. 23); and so had Jacob (Gen. 33¹⁹). With v. 33 cf. 21¹⁰⁻¹⁸; there the children of Aaron receive no cities in the hill-country of Ephraim.

JUDGES

By PROFESSOR W. O. E. OESTERLEY

INTRODUCTION

Title and Place in the Canon. The Hebrew title of the book is Shôphêtim, the root meaning of which is "to govern" as well as "to judge," in the sense of discriminating and deciding between right and wrong. It signifies also "to vindicate," and thus "to deliver"; and it is in the sense of "deliverer" that the word is here used; see especially 21⁶⁻¹⁸. Sometimes the Judge is spoken of as a "Saviour" because he saves his people from the hand of their enemies (see 3^{9, 15}). The Hebrew canon consists of three divisions: the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings. The second division has two parts, the Former and the Latter Prophets. Our book belongs to the "Former Prophets," the subdivision consisting of Joshua, Judges, First and Second Samuel, First and Second Kings.

Contents. The Introduction (11-25) tells of how the Israelite tribes effected a settlement in Canaan; it shows that this was a long-drawn-out process, and that it was not brought about by any concerted movement, but that individual tribes acted independently. The book proper begins at 2⁶, where the narrative is continued from Josh. 24²⁷; indeed, there is a slight overlapping at the start, for 2⁶⁻¹⁰ is more or less a repetition of Josh. 24²⁸⁻³¹. The main narrative runs to the end of ch. 12. There are, properly speaking, only six judges who come into account: Othniel (a somewhat shadowy person), Ehud, Shamgar (also little more than a name), Deborah, Gideon, and Jephthah. These deliverers are introduced in connection with six more or less serious crises: (1) The first of the Judges, Othniel, is said to have delivered Israel from a Mesopotamian king whose name is not given, but who is called Cushan-rishathaim, which means "the Cushite of double wickedness" (37-11). (2) Ehud, of the tribe of Benjamin, did his work in the south. Eglon, the king of Moab, had seized the city of Jericho, and imposed tribute on the adjacent territory. Ehud treacherously slew the king and, summoning the Ephraimites, succeeded in driving the Moabites across the Jordan (31²⁻³⁰). (3) Meanwhile the energy of the Israelites in the north was expended in attempts to conquer the land, but they were not altogether successful. In the course of time the natives prevailed against the newcomers, and the Israelites were threatened with complete subjugation. In this crisis Deborah, the prophetess, and Barak of Kadesh Naphtali assumed the leadership. The battle with the Canaanites was fought in the Plain of Esdraelon, and ended in a decisive victory for Israel. The power of the Canaanites was broken and Central Palestine was thrown open to the immigrants (41-531). (4) A new danger threatened from the east. Midianites began to cross the Jordan, and in a short time the Israelites, especially the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, were reduced to galling serfdom. From Manasseh arose the deliverer in the person of a brave, patriotic, God-fearing farmer by the name of Gideon. So great was the gratitude of the delivered tribes that they offered to make Gideon king, but he declined the honor. However, after his death, Abimelech, the son of Gideon and a Canaanite woman, secured the kingship, after slaying all the other sons of Gideon but one. The rule of Abimelech proved disastrous and soon came to an ignominious end (61-957). (5) The next crisis was caused by the Ammonites, another east-Jordan people. They took advantage of the unsettled conditions in Israel, and seized the Israelite territory east of the Jordan. In time they crossed the Jordan, and the Israelites, without a competent leader, were worsted. Finally they called to their aid Jephthah of the tribe of Gad, who defeated the Ammonites and dislodged them from all the Israelite territory (10⁶⁻¹²⁷). (6) The sixth and severest crisis was caused by the Philistines in the southwest. The book describes the exploits of Shamgar and, at much greater length, of Samson, but their deeds of personal daring were without permanent results. The struggles continued for several centuries, and ended in the complete triumph of Israel.

Five other judges are mentioned—Tola, Jair, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon, concerning whom little information is given; hence they are commonly referred to as the Minor Judges. Samson, who is the twelfth, comes under quite a different category. He is not one of the Judges in the ordinary sense; and the cycle of the Samson stories (chs. 13-16) forms a distinct series of narratives radically different from the others. Another separate narrative is contained in chs.

17, 18, which describe the migration of the Danites from southern to northern Palestine, and tell how the sanctuary in Dan came to be founded. Finally, there is another story, and a very gruesome one, which gives an account of an outrage committed by the Benjamites of Gibeah, and of the almost complete annihilation of the guilty tribe by the rest of the tribes, means being found, however, of saving the tribe from total extinction.

Our book consists thus, strictly speaking, of five main parts, though they have been run into a more or less continuous narrative, namely, Introduction, 11-25; History of the Judges, 26-1215; the Samson stories, chs. 13-16; the Danite migration, chs. 17, 18; and the Gibeah episode with its consequences, chs. 19-21.

This variety of content is of itself sufficient to show that the book does not form a unity, but is a compilation of material taken from different sources.

The Sources of the Book. It is within the nature of things that the exploits of tribal heroes should run from mouth to mouth, and that a more or less stereotyped form of the narratives should soon come into being. In each tribe such narratives would be preserved by being handed down orally; and thus there must have existed in the various Israelite tribes traditional material regarding their early history, which, in the first instance, floated about within the circumscribed area of the particular tribe. And, as the occurrences related must have been witnessed by many, different versions of the same event would naturally be current. How long it was before this oral material assumed a written form is, of course, impossible to say; but when it was written down more than one form would inevitably be preserved. After the stories of different occurrences had assumed written form, the next step would be that of gathering the written material together into a collection. Such a collection formed the original basis of our book.

Moreover, it is manifest from many indications in the book that more than one collection was laid under contribution in its compilation; indeed, it is generally recognized that at least two main collections are to be discerned. The older one, because it contains the well-established characteristics of the Jehovist document of the Hexateuch, is called J; and the later one, because of its Elohistic character, is called E (see art., The Pentateuch, p. 137). The former is a Judæan source; the latter a northern Israelite source. It must not, however, be supposed that these two sources, J and E, represent two individual writers; they stand, respectively, for Judæan and Israelite literary circles or "schools"; and each of the two sources was preserved within these "schools" for some considerable time quite independently, and no doubt received modifications and additions from time to time from different adherents of the two "schools" respectively. The redactor of Judges made use, then, of these two sources; however, he did not incorporate all that they offered; but what he did make use of from each he contrived to weld into a single narrative. Sometimes he succeeded in doing this well; at other times he was less skillful, and the twofold source becomes quite obvious. For example, in the Gideon story compare these two sets of passages: 62-6, 11-24, 34 84-21, on the one hand, and 67-10, 25-32, 36-40 71-83 822-27, on the other; and again in the Jephthah story: 107, 17, 18 111-11, 29, 33b, 121-16 represent one tradition; 1122-28, 30-33a, 34-40, represent the other. The same divergence is observable more or less throughout the book.

The next step in the literary history of Judges took place after the rise of the Deuteronomic school. Owing to the different religious point of view that resulted from the discovery of the book of the Law in the Temple in the reign of Josiah (621 B.C.), and the reforms this gave rise to, the religious history of the past came to be differently envisaged, and was interpreted accordingly. The written accounts of the history handed down from the past received the impress of this different envisagement. The marks of this in Judges are indubitable, so that we are justified in believing that it was subjected to a Deuteronomic redaction. Here, again, the work was not that of an individual; the book received from time to time additions from different members of the Deuteronomic school. A similar process took place finally with the rise of the Priestly schools. Again a somewhat different religious point of view developed, and again the nation's sacred records received the impress of this new school of thought. This too is observable in Judges. (Cf. art., The Pentateuch, p. 137.)

It is well to realize that, however alien to modern ideas of the sanctity of authorship the procedure just sketched may appear, it is one which was not only natural, but altogether justified. The guardians of the Hebrew Scriptures were also the religious leaders and teachers of the people. On them devolved the twofold task of preserving the ancient records intact, and of teaching the people in accordance with the development of their religious thought. They could not lay violent hands on the records and delete all which they did not accept; so they did the next best thing—they added here and there sentences and words more in accordance with their own higher views, and thus they sought to make a right impression, as they conceived it, on the reader.

Chronology. A brief consideration of the chronology of the age may assist toward a better understanding of the general course of events during the period of the Judges. (For a fuller discussion see Eiselen, The Prophetic Books of the O.T., vol. i, pp. 44-50.) According to the chronological data furnished, the period of the Judges whose exploits are narrated in the book extended over 410 years. In 1 Kings 6¹ the statement is made that 480 years elapsed between the Exodus and the fourth year of Solomon's reign. Now, if we add to the 410 years suggested in Judges other events between the Exodus and the building of the Temple—some belonging to the generations earlier than the Judges, others to the years following the period covered in the book of Judges—the total would be at least 580 years, or about 100 years in excess of the total given in 1 Kings 6¹. Even after a solution of this problem has been found other difficulties remain. The beginning of building operations on the Temple may be assigned to about 970 B.C. If to this date are added the 480 years of 1 Kings 6¹, the result is 1450 B.C. as the date of the Exodus. But, while there are some who favor such an early date for the Exodus, available evidence, though by no means absolutely conclusive, makes a date around 1200 B.C. much more probable, and this later date is accepted by the great majority of modern scholars. If, however, the Exodus is assigned to such a late date, the period of the Judges must be shortened to about 200 years.

A close examination of the records themselves increases the arguments in favor of such shortening. The chronological scheme totaling 410 years is a part of the framework of the book. It is the same framework that expresses the view that the Judges were saviours and rulers of all Israel, that they did their work for the whole nation, and that the land of all the Hebrew tribes had rest under them. On the other hand, the older narratives embodied in the framework, which are much nearer to the events, fail to support this view; they represent the Judges as local or tribal heroes, active within small districts in widely separated parts of the country; there is not the slightest indication that the power and authority of even the most prominent of these leaders extended beyond a limited area. In most cases, therefore, two or more Judges may have been contemporaries carrying on their activities simultaneously in different parts of the land. If this interpretation is correct, the period of the Judges may be greatly reduced; indeed, room can easily be found for all the persons and events of the age within the two centuries or less between the Exodus and the establishment of the monarchy.

Historical Value. Although the book of Judges presents us, in the main, with only local tribal history, its historical importance can hardly be overrated; and this in spite of the fact that it has been subjected to repeated revisions. It gives us a clear insight into the way in which the Hebrew tribes gradually acquired for themselves various districts in the land of Canaan and made for themselves a permanent home in face of strong opposition on the part of the original owners. The individual episodes recorded, it must be remembered, tell of times of crisis; we get little or no knowledge of the long intervening periods. When it is said, "the land had peace" for so and so many years, it may mean in some instances simply that the records of what happened during those periods were wanting. The original owners of the land did not acquiesce in subjugation for long periods without any attempts to oust the intruders. They were well equipped for defense and offense; and we may have to regard the episodes recorded only as illustrations of numberless similar ones, though the accounts that have been preserved may well represent the decisive and final struggles of a long series. Without any question, the most important of these was that recorded in the Song of Deborah, for this was something much more than a conflict between a single tribe and one particular foe; under Deborah and Barak occurs the first concerted movement of the Israelite tribes against a confederation of Canaanite rulers; and the vivid touches and minuteness of detail contained in the account impel the belief that it came from an eyewitness. The Song and other early literary fragments embodied in the book undoubtedly give an essentially true picture of conditions among the Hebrews—both the northern and the southern groups—during the generations immediately following their entrance into Canaan; the very simplicity and life-likeness of the narratives create confidence in their substantial accuracy.

Value for the History of Religion. The importance of our book from the religious point of view lies in the fact that it shows so clearly the retrograde tendency regarding both religious belief and practice which arose after the Mosaic period. This is to be accounted for (1) by the absence of any outstanding religious leaders to carry on the work of Moses; and (2) by contact with the religion of the Canaanites. The fundamental differences between the religious conceptions of nomadic tribes, such as the Hebrews were when they entered the Promised Land, and those of the agriculturists settled in Canaan, could not fail to produce a profound effect. Whatever counteracting influences there may have been among the Israelite tribes—and such undoubtedly existed—they were insufficient to stem, at any rate for a long time, the strong current of Baalism. That the religion of Jehovah did not become submerged during this period must have been due, on the one hand, to the presence of a small nucleus of true Jehovah worshipers which persisted on in spite of strongly adverse circumstances; and also because Jehovah-worship was adapted to Baalism. Spurious as the resultant religion was, it, at any rate, preserved the name of Jehovah among the people; and when, in due course, the spiritual descendants (i.e., the prophets) of the small body of worshipers who had preserved the Mosaic tradition preached what they had received, it was a known name which they proclaimed. So that even the spurious religion, insofar as it retained the name of Jehovah, was to the good. And it is this form of religion, Jehovah-worship adapted to Baalism, which is presented to our view in the book of Judges.

The ethical note in religion was very faint. The ideal man was the warrior; deeds of cruelty, if done to a national foe, were related with much glee. Jael is praised for treachery and murder, even though it involved the breaking of the law of hospitality, which was esteemed most sacred by all Semites. The story of Jephthah shows that human sacrifice was not unknown. In other words, the whole book pictures simple, primitive, and crude religious and ethical conditions during the period of the Judges, thus suggesting how much additional progress had to be made before Israel could become, as it did become, the teacher of religion and ethics to mankind.

Literature: Black, The Book of Judges (the Smaller Cambridge Bible for Schools); Budde, Das Buch der Richter (Kurzer Hand-Kommentar); Burney, The Book of Judges; Cooke, The Book of Judges (Cambridge Bible); Moore, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Judges (International Critical Commentary); Nowack, Richter, Ruth, und die Bücher Samuelis (Hand-Kommentar); Cooke, The History and Song of Deborah; Smythe Palmer, The Samson-saga and its Place in Comparative Religion.

CHAPTERS 1¹ TO 25: CONQUEST OF CANAAN AND SETTLEMENT OF THE TRIBES

An introductory summary of the conquest describing the events which happened after the death of Joshua. Victories are gained by Judah and Simeon. Caleb appears as the leader of the tribe of Judah, though he is not spoken of as one of the Judges. Then follows an enumeration of those districts which the Israelites were unable to conquer. The reason of this is revealed by the angel of Jehovah; it is because the people had not obeyed the voice of their God, but had made covenants with the people of the land, and had refrained from breaking down their altars. The people thereupon lift up their voices and weep—hence the name of the place, Bôchm ("weepers," 25)—and sacrifice to Jehovah. The narrative then breaks off abruptly. Though not an original part of the book, this section has preserved a thoroughly reliable accurate account of the events during the early period of the conquest.

CHAPTER I

1-3. Introduction. The oracle is consulted as to which of the tribes is to begin the invasion of the land. Judah is designated, and invites Simeon to join him. The Canaanites—the J source uses this name of the inhabitants west of Jordan, the E source prefers "Amorites" as the name of the pre-Israelite inhabitants of the land. My lot—it is assumed that the land has been divided up into lots and assigned to the different tribes (see Josh. 17^{14, 17}).

4-8. Defeat of Adoni-Bezek. V. 4 may be a gloss; v. 5 follows smoothly after v. 3. Adoni-bezek—better Adoni-zedek, king of Jerusalem (see Josh. 10^{1, 3}); the mistake arose through the proximity of the place-name Bezek. In v. 7 it speaks of his having been brought to Jerusalem to die. It is probable that "king of Jerusalem" has fallen out after the name. Cut off his thumbs—the object of this was to incapacitate him from fighting. Threescore and ten kings (v. 7)—points to his having been a powerful and successful king. Under my table—not, of course, to be taken literally; the Hebrew word for "table" (shulchan) means a round piece of leather which was spread on the ground. They brought him—the reference must be to his own followers, not to the Israelites, for Jerusalem was not taken (see v. 21 and 19^{11, 12} Josh. 15⁶³). The assertion in v. 8 that Jerusalem was taken probably arose from a misunderstanding of "they brought him," which was thought to refer to the Israelites.

9-15. Caleb's Campaign. V. 9 is a later insertion. The South—called the Negeb, the arid district extending from south of Hebron to the border of the desert. The lowland—called the Shephelah—the valley in v. 19; it was the lower lying hill-country which extended from the center of the land westward to the maritime plain. With vv. 10f. cf. Josh. 15¹³⁻¹⁹. Caleb and Othniel in this context are not to be understood as individuals but as tribes; the name Kenaz = Kenizzite (see Num. 32¹²), i.e., non-Israelite. Othniel's marriage expresses a union between the two tribes. The narrative about Achsah's request being granted is the picturesque way of explaining how it originally came about that the fertile land with springs came into the possession of the Achsah clan instead of belonging to the older line of the Calebites.

16-21. Further Conquests of Judah and Simeon. Kenite—see 1 Sam. 30²⁹, for the friendly relationship between Judah and the Kenites. For the children of the Kenite we should probably read Hobab the Kenite (see 4¹¹); a proper name is more natural in view of Moses' father-in-law (not brother-in-law) which follows (cf. Num. 10²⁹). The city of palm-trees—(cf. 3¹³) i.e., Jericho (see Deut. 34³ 2 Chr. 28¹⁵). Utterly destroyed—the word means “devoted” to entire destruction, herem (“ban”) in Hebrew; Zephath receives the name of Hormah because it had been put to the ban. This etymology belongs, however, to later times. Hormah is similar in meaning to Hermon, “sacred,” because it was a sanctuary.

Gaza, Ashkelon, Ekron, were Philistine cities in the low-lying land, which, as v. 19 says, Judah was unable to conquer. This verse comes from a later scribe who wished to make the section agree with Josh. 15⁴⁵⁻⁴⁷. The three sons of Anak—see v. 10 and Num. 13^{22, 28}; they are spoken of as giants in Deut. 9²; they represent three clans which were driven out of Hebron by the Calebites. Benjamin—this, according to Josh. 15⁶³, should be Judah, which doubtless stood here originally; a later scribe changed it to Benjamin to bring it into agreement with Josh. 18²⁸.

22-29. Campaign of the House of Joseph. The tribe of Joseph conquered Bethel; but the Manassites and Ephraimites failed to drive out the Canaanites from several cities. These two tribes together formed the house of Joseph (see Josh. 17¹⁷); the passage, therefore, shows that when they fought side by side they were successful (vv. 22-26), but when independently, they were unable to overcome the enemy, and therefore settled down among them (vv. 27-29; cf. Josh. 17¹¹⁻¹³).

30-36. The Northern Tribes. Zebulun, Asher, and Naphtali, being unable to assert themselves against the inhabitants of the district they attacked, settled down among the native population. Dan, however, is driven into the hill country. Yet the hand of the house of Joseph—this refers to later times. Amorites—the whole passage, especially v. 36, shows that this should be Edomites; the two names look very similar in Hebrew. The ascent of Akrabbim (“scorpions”) was on the border of Edom (Josh. 15¹⁻³), and the rock, or Sela, was an Edomite stronghold (2 Kings 14⁷).

CHAPTER II

1-5. The Words of the Angel of Jehovah. On the angel of Jehovah see note on 6¹¹⁻²⁴. These verses are obviously the work of a redactor, who wished to explain why it was that the chosen people of Jehovah, under whose guidance the promised land had been invaded, were unable to effect a complete conquest of the land. The central point of the speech lies in the rebuke to the people for not having broken down the altars of the Canaanites, and in the words their gods shall be a snare unto you. The section shows, what the prophetic books abundantly illustrate, that the religion of the Canaanites, i.e., Baalism, had fatally influenced the Israelites. And this is not to be wondered at, for Judg. 1 implies again and again that the Israelite tribes settled down among the native population; and as the Canaanites were far more cultured than the nomad Israelites, these latter were naturally impressed by what they saw in their new surroundings; and they adopted not only the customs and pursuits of the Canaanites but also what inevitably followed, religious rites, usages, and beliefs.

CHAPTERS 26 TO 1631: THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL UNDER THE JUDGES

6-23. Introduction Explanatory of the History that is to Follow. (31-6 is also included in this introduction.) Vv. 6-23 contain a philosophy of the period of the Judges. Vv. 6-10 constitute a link between the history related down to the end of the book of Joshua and that which is to follow in Judges. The rest of ch. 2 is the Deuteronomist's conception of the meaning of Israelite history during the period to be considered. Each “Judge” is regarded as having been specially raised up by God to deliver a repentant people from some enemy oppressor. The oppressor too has been raised up by God in order to punish the Israelites for apostasy. As soon as the people are sorry for their sin God is merciful to them and sends the deliverer. While it is impossible to deny that an element of artificiality enters in here, it must be recognized that the writer bears witness to a living truth, the full scope of which he could not, however, be expected to apprehend. Right living in the sight of God, whether national or individual, does bring prosperity; not necessarily material prosperity, but prosperity in the higher sense of spiritual contentment, just as the contrary entails, sooner or later, futility of effort and consequent degradation of life.

Unless this is remembered we shall be doing less than justice to one who, while not a historian in the modern sense, was imbued with the love of righteousness which was one of the glories of the prophets of Israel, whose follower the Deuteronomist was, and who therefore believed that the course of history was not unconnected with national morality and religion.

V. 6, cf. Josh. 24²⁸; v. 7, cf. Josh. 24³¹. All the great works—i.e., the deliverance from Egypt, and the leading of the people through the wilderness, culminating in the conquest of Canaan. With vv. 8, 9, cf. Josh. 24^{29, 30}. The mountain of Gaash—cf. 2 Sam. 23³⁰. Baal and the Ashtaroth—see note on 10^{6f}. Have transgressed my covenant (v. 20)—the two parts of the covenant are stated clearly in Deut. 26¹⁶⁻¹⁹; the people's part was to walk in the ways of Jehovah, and keep his statutes, etc. Jehovah's part was that they were to be "a peculiar people unto himself"; cf. Amos 3²: "You only have I known of all the families of the earth."

CHAPTER III

1-6. The Nations that were Left to Test Israel. (See also 26-23.) The five lords of the Philistines; the word for "lords" (seren) is used only in this connection, and is probably a purely Philistine title. Hivites—read Hittites. The suggestion is that in reality Israel did not succeed in driving out any of the nations already settled in the land.

7-11. Othniel as Judge. The narrative of Othniel introduces for the first time the stereotyped framework characteristic of the main part of the book. However, in distinction from the other occurrences, here the information furnished within the framework is practically nil. There is only the name of the deliverer Othniel and of the oppressor Cushan-rishathaim, and the statement of the conflict and Othniel's triumph. The lack of all specific details has raised questions in the minds of many scholars as to the historicity of the entire narrative, and one must admit that a good case can be presented in support of their view. In 11³ Othniel is described as a Kenizzite, "the son of Kenaz," Caleb's younger brother and a leader in war; otherwise nothing is known concerning him. Cushan-rishathaim means, literally, "the Cushite of double wickedness"; evidently the word is to be regarded not as a proper name but a descriptive title expressing the contempt of the author. For Asheroth, v. 7, we should possibly read Ashtaroth, i.e., the female deities associated with the Baalim; or the Asheroth, i.e., wooden posts standing at the places of worship which must be regarded as symbols of these female deities. See also note on 10^{6f}.

12-30. Ehud as Judge. Apart from the working over by the Deuteronomist, two sources have been combined in this narrative. This can be seen by comparing vv. 19 and 20, which contain two accounts of Ehud's interview with Eglon; v. 26, moreover, gives two accounts of Ehud's escape. There are other indications of two sources having been combined, though they have been so intermingled that it is now impossible to disentangle them. Ehud's treachery was in accordance with the moral standard of his time.

The stereotyped Deuteronomic introduction is found in v. 12a. A man left-handed (v. 15)—the Hebrew says "bound as to his right hand," i.e., lame in his right arm (see v. 16). But in 20¹⁶ we read of 700 Benjamites who were left-handed, so that in this case we must understand the term as meaning ambidexterous (so the LXX). In later Hebrew the expression has both this meaning and that of being lame in the right hand or arm. The translation quarries in v. 19 is uncertain, for the Hebrew word never has this meaning; elsewhere it always refers to a "graven image," or better a "hewn-out image." It is difficult to explain the expression here; no doubt it was plain enough in the original source. His summer parlor (v. 20)—the reference is to a chamber on the flat roof; cf. 1 Kings 17^{19, 23} 2 Kings 12⁸ the lattice windows permitted the air to pass through, which cooled the atmosphere. H-covered his feet (v. 24)—a delicate way of expressing that he was relieving nature (cf. 1 Sam. 24³).

31. Shamgar as Judge. That this verse is a later insertion is seen by the fact that it breaks the narrative; 4¹ is clearly the continuation of 33⁰. It was inserted to help to make up the number of the judges to twelve, and was probably suggested by 5⁶ and 15⁵⁻⁸.

CHAPTER IV

Deborah and Barak. A later prose parallel to the poem in ch. 5. Both undoubtedly record an historical event of great importance. Of special interest is the fact that two women, Deborah and Jael, appear as the heroines. It is the former who inspires Barak to attack Sisera, promising him victory. Sisera is defeated and takes refuge in the tent of Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite; she kills him while asleep with a tent peg. It was a grievous breach against the law of hospitality; but the end was held to justify the means.

CHAPTER V

The Song of Deborah. As this magnificent poem is probably the oldest piece of poetry in the O.T., and contains some points of great importance for the study of the early phases of Israelite religion, it demands closer attention than any other portion of the book.

Vv. 4, 5 present a picture, which the poet constructs in his mind's eye, of the advent of Jehovah as leader of Israel's hosts. There is, of course, no reference here to the giving of the Law on Mount Sinai; indeed, in the Hebrew both rhythm and grammar make it probable that the words even you Sinai were not part of the original text. But their insertion is quite comprehensible, both because the imagery employed was reminiscent of the theophany on Mount Sinai, and also because Sinai was believed to have been the primeval dwelling-place of Jehovah. It lay in the south whence Jehovah would have come in passing through Edom to Canaan. The mention of Seir and Edom (they are identical, see Gen. 32³), in fact, implies the thought of Sinai being Jehovah's starting-point. Jehovah, therefore, was in the beginning not the God of Canaan, whose worship the Israelites found there when they settled down in the country, but he was the God who came with them when they invaded the land, and by whose help they were able to conquer it. They had learned to know him at Mount Sinai, his original place of abode (see Ex. 19¹¹, 18, 20 34². 3 Deut. 33²), where he was sought on special occasions (Ex. 32¹. 1 Kings 19⁸¹). As by his help Canaan was conquered, he was later believed to have taken up his abode there, and Zion became his "holy hill."

The next point of religious interest would at first sight appear to be in v. 8. They chose new gods, then was war in the gates—but the text is corrupt, and we should render: The sacrifices of God ceased, and the barley bread was exhausted; i.e., as consequences of the state of the country described in the preceding verses, the people were unable to offer the usual sacrifices, and there was also the danger of famine.

20. The stars in their courses fought—the belief in the personality of the heavenly bodies was widespread in the ancient east (cf. Isa. 24²¹ 40²⁶). 23. Curse ye Meroz, said the angel of Jehovah—the angel of Jehovah is the same as Jehovah himself; and the reference is to God as he was thought to reveal himself to men. The conception is very primitive: Jehovah curses those who did not come to his help when other mighty ones went forth to war. Jehovah is thus clearly conceived of as a battle-god in this early stage of belief; and the ideas regarding him were strongly anthropomorphic. It was an age when religion was largely utilitarian; Jehovah was called upon if it was thought that his help would be of use; presents, in the shape of sacrifices, were brought to him when anything was to be got out of him. He was worshiped if it was worth while; but if it paid to worship some other god, recourse was had to this other god. This was, briefly, the attitude of the bulk of the people toward God during the period of the Judges, and the Song of Deborah, insofar as it speaks of God, bears this out. 31. This is the Deuteronomist's conclusion to the Song; it is composed in the spirit of the psalmists (see Psa. 194, 5 68²).

CHAPTERS 6 TO 8: GIDEON AS JUDGE

The next enemy onslaught is that of the Midianites, a conglomeration of Bedouin tribes, living on the east of the Jordan. They are described as ravaging the settlements of the Manassites. These Bedouin wanderers over the steppe-land were in the habit of making sudden inroads into the cultivated land west of the Jordan on their swift camels, and, having looted whatever they could lay their hands on, made off as quickly as they came. On one of these expeditions the Midianite hordes attacked the Abiezrites, a Manassite clan. The head of this clan, Jerubbaal ("Let Baal contend") or Gideon ("hewer"), called together three hundred of his kinsmen, and went after the enemy; he came up with them soon after he had crossed the Jordan and was approaching the desert. He at once attacked them; the Midianites were defeated and their leader slain.

This narrative of Gideon's victory over the Midianites has been preserved in two forms; the earlier account is contained in 8⁴⁻²¹, the later in 6¹⁻⁸³.

CHAPTER VI

1-10. Attack of the Midianites. The Deuteronomic editor prefaces the narrative with his interpretation of what is doubtless based on historic fact. With this hiding in dens and caves (v. 2) cf. 1 Sam. 13⁶. When Israel had sown—this reference to agricultural pursuits shows that settled life existed among some of the tribes, at any rate, by this time. The content of vv. 7-10 shows very clearly the thought of later times. Prophets were not yet known in Israel; and, above all, the words of v. 9 are a naïve contradiction of what is said in the previous verses.

11-24. Gideon's Call to Deliver His People. The angel of the Lord—it is to be noted that "the angel of the Lord" and the Lord himself are used interchangeably (see vv. 16, 21-23). The expression "the angel" or "messenger" of the Lord is used to express the divine presence. It may well be that "the angel of the Lord" was substituted for "the Lord" for reasons of reverential awe by some later scribe; but if so, he has not always been consistent; and the same applies to other books of the O.T.

The writers of the original records no doubt believed that the Almighty appeared at times in days gone by in bodily form. The more enlightened compilers of the biblical records who lived in later times conceived God as a Spirit and, consequently, could not believe in a bodily appearance of this kind. It is probable, therefore, that in redacting the biblical books their intention was to act on this principle: when an actual appearance of God was recorded they would interpret it in terms of a human being regarded as the representative or messenger of God (in Hebrew the same word is used for "messenger" and "angel"; cf. Malachi, interpreted in Mal. 1¹ mg. as "my messenger"); but where it was a question of divine communication coming direct to the recipient, Jehovah himself could be spoken of as imparting it, and this could take place without any appearance, as in the case of the prophets. Exceptions, as in the case of such outstanding personalities as Abraham and Moses, can be readily understood. If it be objected that this distinction is not always observed, the reply is that this ought not to cause surprise, for neither the exactitude, nor the logic, still less the consistency of thought, of moderns is to be expected in writers of a more or less remote antiquity. The point of vv. 20, 21 is that what was intended to be the offering of a meal on the part of a hospitable host became the offering or sacrifice of a worshiper.

25-32. The Destruction of the Altar of Baal. The marked differentiation here between Baal and Jehovah worship reveals the influence of the eighth-century prophets; for not until the time of Hosea is the application of the term "Baal" to Jehovah condemned (Hos. 2¹⁷). Prior to this the name "Baal," which means "lord," "master" or "husband," was applied to Jehovah without any thought of disloyalty.

33-40. The Narrative of the Midian Attack Resumed. The valley of Jezreel—not the great central plain which lies west of Jezreel, and is better known as the Plain of Esdraelon, but the broad valley east of Jezreel, which descends down to the Jordan. The spirit of the Lord came upon—literally, "clothed itself with him"; this curious expression describing the indwelling of the Spirit occurs elsewhere only in 1 Chr. 12¹⁸ 2 Chr. 24²⁰. For other ways of describing this see 31⁰ 11²⁹, simply "was" upon; 13²⁵ "began to move," or "impel" him; and 146. 19 15¹⁴, "came mightily," literally, "rushed" upon him. Vv. 36f. well illustrate the naïve conception of God held at the time.

CHAPTER VII

1-8. Gideon's Army Reduced. The original number, 32,000, is first reduced to 10,000, and then to 300. The first reduction is apparently made in the light of Deut. 20⁸, which would show that the redactor was acquainted with Deuteronomy (published 621 B.C.). The reason for the second reduction is given in vv. 5, 6, and has occasioned much questioning. There is, however, an easy solution of the difficulty if one recognizes, as is evidently the case, that a copyist or a later redactor was not quite clear regarding the matter, and made as a dog lappeth refer to the wrong people. The two types of drinkers are those who drink standing, putting their hand to their mouth, and those who bow down upon their knees; obviously, it is these latter who lap like a dog, since they are on all fours; but it is the rest of the people who do this, not the three hundred. So the three hundred are chosen because in standing to drink they can keep their eyes about them and guard themselves from sudden attack; whereas those on their knees are concentrating their attention on their enjoyment. The former are likely to be the better soldiers.

9-15. Gideon's Secret Visit to the Midianite Camp. Gideon, with his servant, steals into the Midianite camp, and overhears one of the Midianites telling his dream to his fellow. According to this dream a cake of barley bread fell into the Midianite camp, and turned a tent upside down. Gideon takes this as an omen of success, the cake of barley bread signifying the sword of Gideon, according to the Midianite.

16-25. Gideon's Victory. Even a cursory examination of this section necessitates the supposition that excerpts have been made from two accounts of the event. According to v. 16, Gideon puts into the hands of each of his three hundred men trumpets and empty pitchers with torches inside them (presumably lighted, since that was the object of holding them in the pitchers); according to v. 18 they are to blow the trumpets and shout; according to v. 20b, it is clearly indicated that they drew their swords. The carrying of pitchers and lighted torches would occupy two hands; the simultaneous blowing of trumpets and shouting would be an impossible feat. Further, one has only to read vv. 20-22 to see at once that two accounts have been, unskillfully, welded into one. A procedure such as this can occasion no surprise, for originally there must have been various accounts from those who had participated in the battle; more than one of these would ultimately have been reduced to written form; so that when the compiler of Judges wrote down his account of the episode it would have been a very natural thing for him to utilize all the material before him. Oreb and Zeeb (v. 25)—“raven and wolf”; in 8^{5f.} the Midianite rulers are called Zebah and Zalmunna (cf. Psa. 83¹¹); it is probable that two traditions are incorporated.

CHAPTER VIII

1-3. Jealousy of Ephraim. Cf. 12¹⁻⁶. As the leading tribe Ephraim resents not having been invited to join in the attack on the Midianites (but see 7²⁴); by a skillful piece of flattery Gideon assuages the anger of the Ephraimites; the mere gleanings of the Ephraimites is greater than the entire vintage of the Abiezrites, Gideon's tribe. The use of this species of proverb is interesting as showing that the construction of proverbs was in vogue among the Israelites in early times; many of the sayings in Proverbs owed their origin to spontaneous utterances of this kind. Anger (v. 3)—literally, “spirit”; for a similar use of the Hebrew ruach (spirit) see Prov. 16³² 25²⁸.

4-21. The Pursuit East of Jordan. From vv. 18f. it is evident that this further pursuit was for the purpose of avenging the death of Gideon's two brothers. This section reflects yet another tradition of the Midianite encounter, for it differs from what has preceded: (1) One would expect the Ephraimites to have joined in this pursuit after what is said in vv. 1-3, but they are not mentioned; (2) Gideon has still only his three hundred men, whereas in 7²⁴ the whole countryside has been called together; (3) when it is said that Gideon and his men were faint with pursuing (v. 4) we have an incongruity with what has preceded, namely, a victory (7²⁵).

5. Succoth—neither this place nor Penuel (v. 8) has been identified, but from Gen. 32²³, 30^{f.} 33¹⁷ they were situated on the banks of the Jabbok. 7. Read I will thresh your flesh together with thorns—cf. Amos. 1³; the threat is carried out (v. 16), where threshed should be read instead of tough. 10. Karkor—another unidentified site. 11. Nobah and Jogbehah—for the former, see Num. 32⁴²; for the latter, Num. 32³⁵. 13. From the ascent of Heres—delete; it is a variant of “and discomfited all the host” (Burney); in Hebrew the two sentences look very similar. 14. Described—read wrote down; perhaps this refers to Gideon; there is no reason, however, to doubt the possibility of the “young man” being able to write; the only surprising thing is that he should have been able to remember all the seventy-seven names. 21. Crescents—hung on the necks of camels to avert the evil eye; according to Isa. 3¹⁸ they were worn by women.

22-27. Gideon Refuses the Kingship, and Sets Up an Ephod. I will not rule over you—these words reflect the thought of later times owing especially to the teaching of Hosea (8⁴ 13¹¹); the succession of worthless rulers in the Northern Kingdom, during the period from the death of Jeroboam II (about 743 B.C.) to the fall of Samaria (722 B.C.), brought home the conviction that the existence of the monarchy was incompatible with the belief in the sovereignty of Jehovah. In 9⁶, 16-19 it is assumed that Gideon was king, and it is also stated (9²²) that Abimelech, his son, reigned after him for three years. 27. Ephod—this sacred image, representing the Deity (cf. 1 Sam. 21⁹), must not be confused with the linen ephod, a priestly garment worn, e.g., by Samuel (1 Sam. 21⁸) and by David (2 Sam. 6¹⁴). The image-ephod was used for divination. And all Israel went a-whoring—for apostasy from Jehovah-worship described figuratively as adultery see Hosea passim.

28-35. Conclusion of the Narrative of Gideon's Judgeship. The hand of the Deuteronomist is clearly discernible in these verses. V. 33 especially comes strangely after what is told in v. 27. The worship of Baal-berith was, according to 9⁴, 46, a purely local cult in Shechem; but it is spoken of here as though Baal-berith were the national god.

CHAPTER IX

The Reign of Abimelech. This narrative has been compiled from two sources, the sifting of which is no easy matter; and it is not to be wondered at that commentators differ in their opinions as to which parts belong to either source. Following Budde, it will be found that, apart from a few redactional elements, the two sources may be separated thus: Vv. 1-6, 26-33, 34-40, 46-49, 50-54; read in this order these verses form a coherent whole, and in all probability belong to J. Similarly, vv. 7-20, 23-25, 42-45, 56-57, belonging to E, follow in logical sequence.

1-6. Abimelech Becomes King. Shechem—the modern Nablûs, thirty miles north of Jerusalem. His mother's brethren—cf. 8³¹; she was what is called the saddika wife of Gideon, i.e., female friend, who remained with her clan, and was visited from time to time by her “husband” (see Robertson Smith, Kinship and Marriage, p. 93). Abimelech thus belonged to his mother's clan in Shechem, not to that of his father in Ophrah, and could therefore speak of himself as bone and flesh of the Shechemites. With the wholesale slaughter referred to in v. 5, cf. 2 Kings 10¹⁻¹¹ 11¹⁻³.

7-21. Jotham's Fable. A very interesting example of the existence of the popular material out of which in later times the Wisdom literature grew. There are two difficulties which this fable presents: (1) If, as is widely held, it is intended to be a satire on the monarchy, it can hardly have been composed at this early stage. (2) There is no real parallel between the fable and the occurrence recorded; one has but to try to apply the fable to see this. Abimelech acquires the kingship; nobody offers it to him; in the fable the kingship is offered, but refused. The only point of parallelism is that the thorn destroys, and the implication is that this will be the case if Abimelech becomes king. It seems clear that the fable is an independent piece, and was inserted here on account of this last point. With v. 20 cf. vv. 56f.

22-49. The Revolt of the Shechemites. Prince over Israel—there was no consolidated Israel in the days of the Judges; the words reflect a later condition. God sent—with this primitive conception of God cf. 1 Sam. 16¹⁴ 1 Kings 22²¹⁻²³ and see comments there.

28. The point of Gaal's words is that he contrasts the Shechemites with Abimelech; why should the Shechemites serve Abimelech, who is not really one of them, but the son of Jerubbaal, and belongs to a different clan? It is Abimelech and his officer Zebul who ought to be subservient to the Shechemites! Instead of serve ye the men of Hamor—read they [should] serve the men, i.e., the son of Jerubbaal and Zebul should serve the Shechemites. Gaal's words are intended to be a counterblast to what Abimelech said in v. 2. The abrupt mention of Zebul is noticeable; he must presumably have been the leader among those of Abimelech's "mother's brethren" referred to in v. 3.

29. And he said to Abimelech—these words cannot have been spoken by Gaal; they have clearly got misplaced, and probably belong to v. 32: "And he [i.e., Zebul] said to Abimelech, now, therefore, increase thine army, and come out; rise up at night, thou and . . ." 31. Craftily—read in Arumah (see v. 41); like several other places mentioned in Judges the site has not been identified with certainty, but possibly it is the modern Ormeh, not far from Nablûs. 37. The middle of the land—literally, "the navel of . . ."; cf. Ezek. 38¹²; no doubt the expression is in reference to some height with a slight depression on the summit which would serve as an ambush (see end of v. 35). The oak of Mēñēnim—i.e., the soothsayers' terebinth; this was probably the ancient Canaanite name which in later days the Israelites called Elōn Mōreh, "oracle terebinth" (Gen. 12⁶ mg.); both names refer no doubt to the same tree, as in each case it is near Shechem.

45. Sowed it with salt—the action, which is not mentioned elsewhere, was symbolical, based on the idea, contained in such passages as Deut. 29^{22, 23} Jer. 17⁶ Job 39⁶ Psa. 107³⁴, that the place would become like a "salt land and not inhabited." There was a similar custom among the Assyrians; Tiglath Pileser I strews salt over the conquered city of Hanusa, and Ashurbanipal over Susa after it had been laid waste (see Jeremias, The O.T. in the Light of the Ancient East, vol. ii, p. 42). 46. The tower of Shechem—cf. the tower or migdal of Penuel (817); the context shows that this was not in the city itself; it must, therefore, have been a strong place of refuge in the vicinity. The hold—from 1 Sam. 13⁶, the only other mention of the word, this seems to have been below the ground; entrance to the tower from it is implied in v. 49. El-berith—cf. 833⁹⁴; LXX reads Baal-berith; the same temple is meant. 48. Mount Zalmon—i.e., the shady mount.

50-57. The Death of Abimelech. Thebez—cf. 2 Sam. 11²¹, possibly the modern Tubas, though the consonants, excepting the b, differ; it is twelve miles northeast of Nablûs. 54. Cf. 1 Sam. 31⁴.

CHAPTER X

1-5. Tola and Jair as Judges. Tola the son of Puah—according to Gen. 46¹³ Num. 26²³ 1 Chr. 7¹, these two are brothers, the sons of Issachar, by which is meant that they were clans belonging to the tribe of Issachar. The site of Shamir is not known. Jair—likewise the name of a clan (cf. Num. 32⁴¹ Deut. 3¹⁴ 1 Kings 4¹³). Havoth-jair—the name means "the tent-villages of Jair," and points to the transition from nomad life to more settled habitations. Kamon—the site of this place is not known, but it is possibly represented by Kamun "which is named by Polybius in connection with Pella."

6-16. An Explanatory Introduction to the Succeeding History. The Deuteronomist's conception of the history is again very evident in this section, but other hands have had a large share in it.

6. Baalim—cf. 21³; the reference is to the various local Baals of the Canaanite shrines. The Ashtārōth—the reference here is likewise to the Ashtarts, i.e., female deities, of the Canaanite shrines. The name Ashtar (=the Babylonian Ishtar) is written Ashtoreth in the Hebrew Bible, the vowels of the word bosheth ("shame") being substituted in order to indicate that the worship of this goddess was a shameful thing; cf. also Molech for Melech. Bōsheth is also substituted for Baal in Hos. 9¹⁰ Jer. 32⁴ 11¹³ (cf. also the name "Ish-bosheth" = "Ish-baal," 2 Sam. 28 1 Chr. 8³³, notes).

The goddess Ashtart (Astarté is the proper pronunciation) was, above all, a fertility goddess to whom the fruitfulness of the crops and fecundity of the flocks was believed to be due; hence the temple prostitutes, as with the Babylonian Ishtar.

11, 12. The names recorded here of the peoples who are said to have oppressed the Israelites give rise to considerable difficulties. As Moore points out, the editor "has accumulated the names of neighboring nations without any discoverable principle of selection or order. We read in it the names of some which nowhere else appear as oppressors, while we miss others, notably Moab and Midian, which we should certainly expect to find."

17, 18. See next paragraph.

CHAPTERS 10¹⁷ TO 12⁷: JEPHTHAH AS JUDGE

Editorial Introduction to the Story of Jephthah. 10¹⁷, 18 is a summary of 11⁴⁻¹¹. The children of Ammon . . . Gilead is based on 11⁴, 5; and the children of Israel . . . Mizpah is based on 11¹¹; and v. 18 is based on 11⁶, 8.

CHAPTER XI

1-3. Introduction Proper to the Story of Jephthah. The name Jephthah occurs in Josh. 15⁴³ 19¹⁴, 27, as that of a place; R.V. in those passages spells it "Iphtah," but in the original the two names are identical. The son of an harlot—not being the son of a lawful wife, nor even of a sadika wife (see on 91-6), nor yet of a concubine, meant that he was fatherless; so that when it is said that "Gilead begat Jephthah" it simply means that Gilead was the land of his birth, and stands for his nameless father. Under such circumstances the legitimate sons of his father would have felt justified in driving him from their home. The land of Tob—an Aramæan district on the east of Jordan (see 2 Sam. 10⁶, 8 1 Macc. 5¹³). They went out with him—i.e., took to the road, became highway robbers.

4-11. Jephthah Invited to Lead the Gileadites Against the Ammonites. V. 4 is repeated in the first part of the next verse and should be deleted. Jephthah's exploits must have become notorious for him to have been invited to take the lead in this way; he is offered the leadership of his people if he will come and deliver them; he is naturally a little sceptical at first; but agreement is reached, and ratified before Jehovah. 11. Mizpah—not to be confused with Mizpah in Benjamin (Josh. 18²⁶).

12-28. An Historical Discussion Regarding Israel's Right to Possess Gileadite Territory. It is immediately evident, in reading this section, that it breaks the course of the narrative; it must, therefore, be regarded as having been added from elsewhere. But it contains manifest marks of antiquity, and cannot therefore be a late insertion. From its general contents it is clear that the people with whom it is mainly concerned are the Moabites, while the context both before and after deals with the Ammonites. Burney gives good grounds for believing that we have here parts of two originally distinct narratives in which Jephthah appeared as the deliverer of his people from the Moabites and Ammonites respectively; and he constructs the basis of each narrative from these passages, substantially thus: to the narrative of the Moabite oppression belong 10¹⁷ 11¹²⁻²⁸, 30, 31, 33-40; while from the Ammonite narrative the following are excerpts: 11¹⁻¹¹ (exc. parts of vv. 1, 2, 5), 29, 32, 33 (in part) 121-6. These two narratives were welded together, so that in separating the respective elements from each there are necessarily gaps which have to be conjecturally filled in; and this has been done skillfully and with great probability of correctness by Burney (Book of Judges, pp. 302f.). This seems to be the most probable solution of the difficulties raised by the presence and contents of this section.

12. The children of Ammon—on the basis of the solution of the difficulties here followed we must, of course, read the children of Moab, and so throughout this section. 13. Israel took away—see Num. 21²⁶. From Arnon even unto Jabbok—a distance of about fifty miles. Cf. v. 17 with Num. 20¹⁴⁻²¹, upon which it is evidently based. With v. 18 cf. Num. 21¹¹⁻¹³; with v. 19 cf. Num. 21²¹⁻²³; with v. 20 cf. Num. 21²⁴⁻²⁶. 24. Chemosh—the mention of this national god of Moab further bears out what is said in the introduction to this section. The god of the Ammonites was Milcom (see 1 Kings 11³³ 2 Kings 23¹³ Jer. 49¹, 3). For Chemosh see Num. 21²⁹ 1 Kings 11⁷, 33 2 Kings 23¹³ Jer. 48⁴⁶, and the Moabite stone. It is noticeable that Chemosh is here regarded as the god of the Moabites just in the same way as Jehovah was of the Israelites. The belief in God had not yet reached the development which is found among the eighth-century prophets. 25. Balak—cf. Num. 22-24.

29-33. Jephthah's Vow, and His Victory Over the Ammonites. Whatsoever cometh forth—there is no justification for this rendering; the Hebrew can only mean "whosoever," which is further borne out by the words "to meet me"; this could be said only in reference to a person. The most likely person to welcome the returning victor would be a woman (see 1 Sam. 18⁶, 7 Psa. 68¹¹), and Jephthah must have expected this person to be his daughter; it is just herein that the essence and significance of his vow lay. The sacrifice of a child to Jehovah was not an unknown idea in Israel (see Gen. 22, Ex. 22²⁹, 30 Mic. 67 Ezek. 20²⁵, 26); the more precious the gift offered the more likely would Jehovah be to grant what was required; this was the conception of the age; cf. the action of the king of Moab (2 Kings 3²⁶, 27).

34-40. Jephthah's Vow Fulfilled. With timbrels—cf. Ex. 15²⁰. His only child—note how this is emphasized; it enhanced the value of the sacrifice. 35. He rent his clothes—cf. Gen. 37²⁹, 34 Josh. 7⁶; on the meaning and significance of this mourning rite see the writer's Immortality and the Unseen World, pp. 143-149. That Jephthah's daughter knows the reason of her father's sorrow without the necessity of any explanation is significant, for it shows that the terrible custom of such a sacrifice, rare as it was, no doubt, was perfectly understood. 37. And go down upon the mountains—read and wander about upon the . . . , requiring only a very slight alteration in the Hebrew text. And bewail my virginity—to be deprived of motherhood was a grievous thing to a Hebrew woman; cf. Isa. 47⁸, 9 49²¹, and see end of next verse, she had not known a man. 39, 40. In all probability the sacrifice of Jephthah's daughter and the annual festival here spoken of were originally quite distinct; the former was a historical fact; the latter was the same festival as that spoken of in Ezek. 8¹⁴ (the "weeping for Tammuz"), and was mythological in origin. The central act in the festival was the wailing for the death of the god, the personification of spring; this was explained as having originated through the lamenting of the women for Jephthah's daughter ("celebrate" in the R.V. should be read as in the mg. "lament"). It will be noticed that this is spoken of as a custom in Israel, not merely among the Gileadites, the significance of which speaks for itself.

CHAPTER XII

1-7. Jephthah Defeats the Ephraimites; His Death. With this section cf. 81-3. Passed northward—but to reach Mizpah they would not go northward; R.V. mg. "Zaphon" (=Hebrew), a place in the Jordan Valley near Succoth (Josh. 13²⁷), but this would involve going southward. It is impossible to say what stood in the text originally. 4. Because they said . . . Manasseh—this reason for the conflict is quite different from what is said in the preceding verses according to which the Ephraimites attack Jephthah because he did not invite them to join him against the common enemy. The words evidently do not belong here; they are omitted by some LXX MSS. 6. Shibboleth—it is interesting to note that there should at that time have been this difference in pronouncing the sibilant between two tribes closely connected racially, and living in adjoining territories. Even to this day the natives in and about Nablûs (Shechem) pronounce the word for "sun" sems instead of shemsh. Shibboleth means both a "stream," and an "ear of corn"; here, of course, the former is meant, as the scene described takes place on the fords of the Jordan. Forty and two thousand—that is too much; but numbers are often exaggerated in this book. 7. In one of the cities of Gilead—the Hebrew reads in the cities of Gilead; there is some authority for emending the text so as to read in his city, in Mizpah of Gilead.

8-15. Three Minor Judges. See note on 3³¹. Bethlehem—this must refer to Bethlehem in Zebulun (Josh. 19¹⁵); not to the Bethlehem of Judah. This is the only place where the name "Ibzan" occurs. 15. The Pirathonite—cf. 2 Sam. 23³⁰.

CHAPTERS 13 TO 16: THE SAMSON NARRATIVES

These narratives, which contain some of the most ancient material in the O.T., offer an extraordinarily interesting mixture of history, tradition, folk-tale, and glimpses of social life, together with religious and possibly even mythological elements. In all probability they were originally independent stories of a purely secular character, centering in the first instance around one or more village heroes; they were then gradually formed into a cycle, and finally they all became attached to one central figure. This material was then utilized for historical purposes, and some religious touches were added. A few examples of these different elements may be given. The most prominent feature is the folk-tale, which comes out in the exploits of the rollicking hero with his weakness for women; the rough humor and absence of moral sense stamps them as genuine village tales which are, certainly in some cases, based on fact. (See 14^{1f}. 15^{9f}.) Pictures of social life are seen, e.g., in 14⁵ 15¹²; the historical element is clearly seen in that the whole cycle is brought into connection with the growing Philistine menace. Religious traits, at times rather incongruous, may be observed in 13^{5f}. 14⁵ 15¹⁸, 19. Mythological elements may be discerned, e.g., in the name of the hero (Samson="sun-man"), in the story of the foxes (15³⁻⁵), in Samson's seven locks of hair (=the sun's rays; 16^{13f}), and in the story of the water coming from the spring of Ramath-lehi (15^{17f}.); the name of Delilah must also be mentioned in this connection, though space does not permit of this being more fully explained (see Jeremias, The O.T. in the Light of the Ancient East, vol. ii, pp. 169-173). It should be noted, however, that the use of mythological elements does not militate against the presence of a substantial historical nucleus.

CHAPTER XIII

1-25. Samson's Birth. V. 1, which is from the Deuteronomist, as the stereotyped words show, brings the whole cycle into connection with the growing Philistine aggression. The danger went on increasing, until it forced in Israel a centralization of government under the monarchy; it was not finally averted until the time of David. 2. Zorah—the name is perhaps not without significance from the point of view of the mythological elements in these stories, for this place is in close proximity to Beth-shemesh ("the house of the sun"). 3. For the angel of the Lord see note on 6¹¹. 5. A Nazirite—cf. Num. 6^{1f}; one "consecrated" to Jehovah; the word is connected with a root meaning "to vow"; a Nazirite's vows bound him to abstain from all intoxicating drink, to let his hair grow, and to keep at a distance from a dead body. The vows could be taken either for a limited period, or, as in Samson's case, for life; the child shall be a Nazirite unto God from the womb to the day of his death (v. 7); the only vow Samson observes is that of letting his hair grow; he comes in contact with a carcass (14⁸, 9), and drinks wine (14¹⁰, 12, 17), for the word used for "feast" is mishteh, which means a "drinking-bout." He shall begin to save—apparently the remark of the redactor who knew that the deliverance from the Philistines was a long-drawn-out process. In vv. 16-19 the narrative does not run smoothly; the text is evidently a little out of order. 20. When the flame went up—here the flame is from the sacrificial fire kindled by Manoah; in 6²¹ the angel strikes fire out of the rock. 21. But the angel . . . his wife—these words break the connection; they would come more appropriately at the conclusion of the episode, after v. 23, where they probably stood originally. 22. We shall surely die, because we—cf. 6²², 23. 23. The wife's very practical argument is somewhat piled up, and reads rather artificially; probably an originally simpler phrase has been elaborated. 24. Samson—the Hebrew Shimshon means a "little sun," or a "sun-man."

CHAPTER XIV

Samson Chooses a Wife. 1. Timnah (cf. 1³⁴ Josh. 15¹⁰ 1943 2 Chr. 28¹⁸)—the modern Tibneh, a few miles southwest of Zorah. 2.

Told his father—see note on vv. 4-10; the arrangements for a marriage were made by the respective fathers of the man and of the woman; the mention of the mother here is quite unusual, but see below; with the exception of the marriage feast no mention is here made of the other customs usually observed, namely, the betrothal, the mohar, "dowry" (see Deut. 22^{28f}), the wedding processions, and the bridegroom's gift to the bride. But it is probable that in these early times the marriage feast, quasi-sacramental in character as it was, was the central rite, which placed the couple on a conjugal footing (see further under vv. 4-10). Get her—according to the ancient Hebrew view a wife was looked upon as bought property; this is implied by the paying of the mohar, cf. Ruth 4¹⁰, where the word used is to "purchase"; this is not, however, the word here used. 3. Uncircumcised Philistines—cf. 1 Sam. 14⁶ 1726, 36 314.

4-10. The confusion manifest in the text here is due to insertions in later times when it was thought impossible that a hero in Israel should not have conformed to what (in those later times) had become the proper procedure in arranging a marriage. In order to rectify this the redactor inserted the references to Samson's father and mother (this applies also to vv. 2, 3), making it appear as though the marriage were arranged in the normal way. But the story as a whole shows that Samson did not contemplate a marriage in the proper sense; it was the case of a sadika wife (see note on 9¹); this comes out clearly in the fact that Samson does not bring his "wife" to his house, but visits her in her home in Timnah, just as Gideon did in the case of his "wife" in Shechem (see 8²⁹⁻³¹).

8. There was a swarm of bees—taken in a literal sense this story is extremely improbable; but the point is that we have here the remnants of the mythological part of the narrative; "bearing in mind the phenomenal meaning so often attached to the lion as a solar symbol, we have no difficulty in understanding that the lion fostering the bees and producing honey is only another way of expressing the idea that the midsummer constellation with its warm, sunny weather favors the work of the bees. When the sun is in Leo, honey is plentiful" (A. Smythe Palmer, The Samson Saga, p. 99; see the whole of ch. ix).

11. Thirty companions—these occupied the most important position at a marriage feast after the married couple and the friend of the bridegroom; in Cant. 3⁷ there are as many as sixty. From v. 16 it is seen that Samson's companions were Philistines. 12. A riddle—cf.

Prov. 16, a "dark saying," the root meaning is "to turn aside"; the word, therefore, means something not straightforward, something indirect, and thus obscure. Linen garments—a rectangular piece of linen; in Isa. 32³ it is spoken of as worn by women. Changes of raiment—i.e., raiment worn on festal occasions. 15. Seventh—read with the LXX fourth. Entice thy husband—this dishonorable proceeding is presumably justified by Samson's unfair act; as bridegroom his challenge could hardly be refused and yet the nature of the riddle made the answer impossible by fair means, since the companions, who did not know the facts, had nothing to go upon. That he may declare unto us—we should expect unto thee, it being taken for granted that she would repeat it to them. Lest we burn—somewhat drastic, but cf. 15⁶. 17. The seven days—i.e., the rest of them, since it was the fourth day (see above) on which the companions threatened her. 18. Before the sun went down—these words are pointless here, a slight emendation of the Hebrew text enables us to read before he went into the chamber (see 15¹). It does not follow from this that the marriage was not yet consummated, as can be seen by 15¹. If ye had not plowed—a far from flattering insinuation against his "wife." It is very likely that v. 19, with the exception of and his anger . . . house, is a later insertion for the purpose of representing that Samson paid his wager. It is far more likely that in the original story Samson, finding that he had been deceived by his "wife," left her there and then; this would be the more justified as she was only a sadika wife. Quite in accordance with the morals of the time Samson's "wife" is handed over to his "best man" (v. 20).

CHAPTER XV

1-8. Samson Avenges the Loss of His Wife.

In the time of the wheat harvest—cf. v. 5. Visited his wife with a kid—this indicates the kind of relationship existing between Samson and his "wife"; note, too, that she is living with her father; but Samson's right to her is taken for granted. The father's action, however, is justified from his point of view because he thought, not unreasonably, that Samson had given up his "wife." 2. Therefore I gave her—by this means the father had obtained a second payment for his daughter; his profit would be further increased by Samson taking the younger daughter. Revolting as these social conditions are to our ideas, it must be remembered that they were perfectly normal in those times (see Robertson Smith, Kinship and Marriage, passim). 3. Unto them—perhaps we should read unto him, with the LXX, but it is not necessary; the verse simply describes what Samson was thinking; he is doubtless glad to have some excuse for venting his wrath. It might be thought that with his great strength Samson would have entered his "wife's" chamber in spite of the father's obstruction, instead of taking the vengeance described in vv. 4f.; but this would have eliminated the pretext for the fox-story. 4, 5. To press the details in this account is quite unnecessary; it is simply an adaptation of a world-wide solar myth; for details see A. Smythe Palmer, op. cit., pp. 101-111, and cf. Frazer, Spirits of the Corn and of the Wild (The Golden Bough, pt. v.), vol. i, pp. 296f.

9-20. Samson Slays a Thousand Philistines at Lehi. Lehi—"jaw-bone"; cf. 2 Sam. 23^{11f}. Burney draws attention to the similarity between the deeds of Samson, Shammah, and Shamgar (op. cit., p. 75). The men of Judah, recognizing the superior strength of the Philistines, are at once prepared to deliver up Samson; being of a different tribe he had no claim upon their protection. Incidentally, this reflects once more what our book so often illustrates, namely, the entire lack of cohesion among the Israelite tribes. That it takes three thousand men to bind Samson is intended to be a witness to his prodigious strength. 13. They bound him—a quite unnecessary precaution, as the sequel shows; but it enhances the graphic character of the narrative; the old Hebrews were past-masters in storytelling. 15. A new jawbone—another graphic touch; a dry one would have been brittle. 18-20. Being oppressed with thirst Samson cries out to Jehovah for help lest he should be overcome by his enemies; water is miraculously provided from the crag, and he revives; hence the name of the spot, En-hakkore, "the spring of the caller." There are a number of traits in this story which justify the contention of many scholars that we have here the adaptation of a solar myth; the subject is well dealt with by Burney, op. cit., pp. 391f. En-hakkore—in 1 Sam. 26²⁰ Jer. 17¹¹, "the caller" refers to the partridge which is common in the hill country of Palestine, and its call-note is often heard. The "Partridge spring" is probably the original meaning, which was adapted and given another meaning appropriate to the story. 20. This is the Deuteronomist's addition; as it was here inserted too soon, it had to be repeated at the end of the Samson cycle (16³¹).

CHAPTER XVI

1-3. Samson Carries Off the Gate of Gaza. Gaza—the southernmost of the Philistine cities, situated on the coast. 2. And it was told—this has accidentally fallen out of the Hebrew text, but can be supplied from the LXX. As the words stand v. 2 is difficult to reconcile with what is said in the next verse, for if the Philistines were lying in wait in the gate all night, Samson would have other work to do before carrying off the gate. It is simplest to follow Moore and to regard the words and they compassed him in . . . of the city as a later interpolation added for the purpose of making Samson's escape more wonderful. The narrative runs smoothly if we read: And it was told the Gazites, saying, Samson is come hither. And they were quiet all the night, saying . . . 3. That is before Hebron—i.e., to the east of Hebron. This was thirty-eight miles off! But in a wonder-story this is a trifle. Burney suggests a solar motif, which is extremely likely (see his commentary, p. 407).

4-22. Samson and Delilah. Samson's brilliant exploits are drawing to a close; he becomes entangled in the wiles of Delilah. After several attempts, she at last finds out that the source of his strength lies in his wonderful hair; by treacherously cutting this off while he sleeps she deprives him of his strength and delivers him to his enemies. They blind him and put him to shame. In none of the Samson stories does the solar myth motif come out more clearly than here. This cannot be illustrated in detail; but the following points indicate the lines along which the solar myth interpretation runs: After the brilliant exploits of his life's day, the first of which is to appear as a bridegroom (cf. Psa. 19⁵), Samson enters into the toils of Delilah (the name is connected with the Hebrew word for "night," lāyēlāh); she weaves his seven locks of hair (=the sun's rays) with a web, i.e., night spreads her curtain over the sky (cf. Psa. 104²); by shaving off his locks she deprives him of his strength, i.e., the power of the sun's rays decreases as night overmasters them; ultimately he is blinded, i.e., night reigns supreme. In the Midrash Tehillim, on Psa. 19⁷, it is said in reference to the sun: "He is like a hero who goes forth strong, and returns home powerless; thus the sun at his rising is a mighty hero, and at his setting a weakling" (quoted by Goldziher, Mythology Among the Hebrews, Eng. trans. by Martineau, p. 162).

4. Sorek—the site has been identified in the modern Surik, west of Zorah; the name means "choice grape" (see Isa. 5² Jer. 22¹). 5. The lords of the Philistines—five in number (see 33). Eleven hundred—this from each of the five ("every one of us") would make an enormous sum for those days; but it is in keeping with the wonder tale. 6. Tell me—the charming naïveté of the request shows that whatever foundation in fact may lie behind the story, it is artificially constructed. 7. As another man—Hebrew, literally, "as one of mankind"; Samson's superhuman personality thus comes out quite incidentally. 9. So his strength—i.e., the source of his strength. It is obvious that at the end of v. 13 something has fallen out of the text; it can, however, be supplied from the LXX: "And fastenest it with the pin, then will I become weak like any other man. And it came to pass that while he slept Delilah took the seven locks of his head, and wove them into the web"; then the Hebrew text continues, and she fastened with the pin. 17. There hath not come . . . womb—an editorial addition (cf. 13⁵, 7). As soon as one attempts to take literally what is said in vv. 19, 20 one is launched into absurdities; a man would not sleep through the operation of having his head shaved, nor would this result in the loss of his strength. The editor brings in a religious note by adding, but he wist not that the Lord was departed from him, implying, no doubt, that this was because the Nazirite vow was broken by the shaving of Samson's hair; but Samson had no part in this. These words do not belong to the original text. 21. He did grind in the prison house—"this representation may be due to the primitive conception that the sun, in performing his daily march around the sky, is compelled by a law ('bound with fetters of brass') imposed upon him by a superior power" (Smythe Palmer, op. cit., p. 161). 22. Howbeit—this is added by way of explaining how Samson was able to accomplish his final feat of strength as narrated in vv. 29f.

23-31. The Death of Samson. Dagon—spoken of here as the national god of the Philistines; besides his temple in Gaza, he had one in Ashdod (1 Sam. 52^{f.}); widely separated places with names compounded with Dagon show that he was worshiped by the Philistines wherever they settled. That he was a fish-god is very unlikely; there is strong reason for believing that he was a corn deity; dāḡān is the Hebrew word for "corn." A number of commentators transpose vv. 24, 25, which is certainly to be preferred, because when the people saw him (v. 24) must come after the call for him (v. 25). It is difficult to believe that v. 28, at any rate in its present form, with its strongly religious tone, can have formed part of the original narrative. 29, 30. While it is, of course, possible that in this, as in the other Samson stories, a kernel of fact may have been utilized, occurrences such as those narrated in these verses show that imagination has played a large part in the construction of the stories. 31. The redactor's conclusion.

Generally speaking, the biblical writers used historical material primarily for the purpose of teaching religious lessons. This assertion can hardly be made of the Samson stories; for they were selected not so much for their religious value as for their popularity. Moreover, it is precarious to hold up Samson as an example of wholesome courage and virtue. Even when judged by the standards of his own age he reveals a lack of the moral qualities which make for true nobility.

It is, indeed, much safer to present him as a warning rather than as a type to be imitated. Although he was a worshiper of Jehovah and a hero who gripped the imagination of his age, he was governed largely by passion and selfishness; he had little regard for the rights and property of others; he was driven to some of his deeds by a spirit of vengeance, and finally died a victim of this very spirit. Samson represents one type of national hero during the primitive period of the Judges, but by no means the most exemplary; Deborah and Gideon, though not without weaknesses, illustrate a much nobler ideal, which found even fuller expression in the lives and messages of the later prophets. Thus the stories of Samson, as compared with later portrayals, show what remarkable progress was made in the appreciation of ethical ideals during the generations culminating in the eighth-century prophets (see Amos 5²⁴ Hos. 6⁸ Isa. 11⁶, 17 Mic. 6⁸).

CHAPTERS 17¹ TO 21²⁵: TWO SUPPLEMENTARY NARRATIVES

FIRST NARRATIVE

CHAPTERS 17, 18: THE DANITES AND THEIR SANCTUARY

The migration of the Danites and the founding of their sanctuary is the theme of chs. 17, 18. This section is by far the most important part of the book from the point of view of the history of religion and cult. It is seen how in these early times a sanctuary could be the private possession of an individual and that the prime requirement for it is an image of the god. We learn, too, that at this time any Israelite could be consecrated as priest, though it was preferable for a Levite to function as such. On the other hand, we learn that the priesthood claimed descent not from Aaron, but from Moses.

From the historical point of view also the section is important. It tells of the Danites having at one time been settled in the south of the land, which is borne out by Josh. 19^{40f.}, as well as by the Samson stories, before they migrated to the North, as here recounted.

*The contents of these two chapters come from two sources; but the two forms of the narratives have been skillfully interwoven, and it is only here and there that repetitions, variations, etc., betray the existence of more than one source.

CHAPTER XVII

1-6. Micah's Graven Image. 2. Micah—this is one of the three names in the book which contain the abbreviated form of "Jehovah"; the others are Joash (611^{f.}) and Jotham (95^{f.}). It is evident that vv. 2-4 are not in order. They start in the middle of a conversation between Micah and his mother; the giving and receiving of the money is confused, and the sentences do not follow logically. Various reconstructions of the text have been proposed; that of Budde seems to read most smoothly, namely: "And he said unto his mother, 'The eleven hundred pieces of silver that were taken from thee, about which thou didst utter a curse, and didst also speak it in my ears, behold, the silver is with me, I took it; now, therefore, I restore it unto thee.' And he restored the money unto his mother. And his mother said, 'Blessed be my son of the Lord. I verily dedicate the silver unto the Lord from my hand for my son, to make a graven image and a molten image.' And his mother took two hundred pieces of silver, and gave them to the founder, who made thereof a graven image and a molten image; and it was in the house of Micah." One would have expected the narrative to have begun with the statement that the mother, finding that her money had been stolen, utters a curse against the thief; and the confused state of the present text supports the view that something to this effect has dropped out. At any rate, the narrative, implying that the son is terrified at the curse his parent has uttered, goes on to say that he returns the silver; the mother thereupon revokes the curse by pronouncing a blessing, and dedicates part of the silver to a pious use, the benefit of which is to accrue to her son. 3. And a molten image—probably a later addition; so, too, in the next verse. 4. Two hundred—this would have sufficed for the purpose; it is arbitrary to assume that the woman withheld the rest of the eleven hundred pieces out of avarice; had there been any intent to defraud the Lord, the point would have been brought out. Some commentators hold that the difference in the numbers is due to a difference of sources. 5. An house of gods—cf. 18²⁴. Ephod—see note on 8²⁷. Teraphim—see Gen. 31^{19f.} 1 Sam. 19¹³, 16; from these passages it is clear that teraphim were images of gods in human form; they were a species of household gods, and in all probability were a remnant of ancestor worship. (See further, the present writer's Immortality, pp. 108f., 135f.) Consecrated—literally, "filled the hand" (cf. Ex. 28⁴¹ Lev. 8³³); it became the technical term for installing in the priest's office; originally it probably had a wider connotation and referred in general to investing someone with authority; that is the Assyrian use of the term, from which the Hebrew was derived. (See further, Nowack, Hebräische Archæologie, vol. ii, pp. 120f.) 6. This may be the addition of a later scribe who wished to excuse the enormities (as they were to him) just mentioned; it is worthy of note that he thinks they were perpetrated because there was no king.

7-13. Micah Secures a Levite to Be His Priest. Of the family of Judah, who was a Levite—this seems to imply that the Levites were not a separate tribe, but members of a priestly caste who might belong to any tribe. On the other hand, many passages plainly state that the Levites formed a distinct tribe. It cannot be said that the problem has yet been satisfactorily solved. (See Burney's interesting note, op. cit., pp. 436f.) 13. Now I know—this gives us a very interesting insight into the naïve religious conceptions of the time; the point is that, since the Levites had formed a close entourage about Moses and had learned from him the proper way of conducting the worship of Jehovah, and that this tradition had been handed down among them, therefore there was a special advantage in having a Levite as priest, for by observing the correct ritual he would please Jehovah, and Micah would reap the benefit of this. A Levite would, moreover, be more skillful in consulting the oracle. Contrast with this artificial form of religion the prophetic ideals of the elements of true religion. Micah appears here as a worshiper of Jehovah; but in his worship of the ephod and the teraphim (v. 5) this would, at first sight, seem to be excluded; the truth is that just as in later days it was not thought incompatible to adapt the worship of Jehovah to Baalism, so Micah saw nothing incongruous in worshipping his household gods as well as Jehovah.

CHAPTER XVIII

1-6. The Danite Spies Come to Micah's House. In those days . . . Israel—a redactional addition (cf. 17⁶). Danites—a small group in v. 11, but cf. Num. 13⁹. 2. Cf. with vv. 13, 14 for one illustration of many showing the twofold source. 3. They knew the voice—i.e., they recognized the southern dialect; if the writer were thinking of the recognition of a personal friend whom the men had known before, he would have expressed it differently; the most obvious way of recognizing a friend is by seeing him. 6. Before the Lord is your way—literally, in front of, i.e., he sees right along it.

7-10. The Spies Come to Laish. Laish—situated at the source of the Jordan. After the manner of the Sidonians—i.e., the Phœnicians, a peaceful people occupied with trade and commerce; and therefore easily overcome (see v. 10). With any man—read with the support of the versions, Aram ("Syria") for Adam ("man"); in Hebrew the two words were even more similar than in English transliteration; the emendation gives better sense. The verse means that the Sidonians were sufficiently distant from the city, on the one hand, while, on the other, there was no confederacy with Aram; so that there was no danger of interference in taking possession (see vv. 26, 27). The idea that what they are able to annex has God's approval is another illustration of the primitive moral sense characteristic of the times.

11-26. The Danites and Micah. When the whole body of the Danites arrive in the hill country of Ephraim the spies tell them of the shrine in Micah's house; they determine to steal the cult objects and to carry off the priest; the armed men hold the entrance to the city, while the five spies seize the former and lure the priest away with them. When the whole cavalcade has got some way from the city Micah and his fellow citizens pursue them and overtake them; but the thieves are too numerous; Micah suffers insult as well as injury, and returns home.

27-31. Laish Captured; the Setting Up of the Danite Sanctuary. The Danites take Laish and burn it to the ground; in place of it they build a new city which they call Dan, after their forefather. But the point of importance is the setting up of the sanctuary. An interesting detail about the priesthood is also added; this is traced to Jonathan, the grandson of Moses, and it is stated that it continued till the fall of the Northern Kingdom. 30. This must be a later addition because the hitherto unnamed Levite is now paralleled by "Jonathan"; had the original narrator known anything about Jonathan being the name of this Levite, he would assuredly have mentioned it earlier in the narrative instead of adding it as a kind of after-thought at its conclusion. But the indication regarding the origin of the Danite priesthood is important, and no doubt historical. Moses—so the versions; but the Hebrew text has an "n" suspended over the text, making it "Manasseh," seeking thereby to obviate the distasteful fact that an idolatrous priest traced his descent from Moses. 31. Shiloh—cf. 21¹⁹.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTARY NARRATIVE

CHAPTERS 19 TO 21: THE OUTRAGE AT GIBEAH, AND ITS CONSEQUENCES

This extraordinary narrative runs as follows: A Levite from the hill country of Ephraim goes to fetch back from her father's house his concubine who has deceived him. At the father's request he remains with him for a few days. In the evening of the fifth day he departs homeward with his concubine. On the way they turn into Gibeah of Benjamin for the night; they have some difficulty in finding a lodging, but are ultimately received into the house of an old man (19¹⁻²¹). The house is surrounded by men with evil intent, and the Levite delivers up his concubine to their will. The next morning she lies dead on the threshold. The Levite takes the body to his home, where he cuts it up into twelve pieces and sends them throughout all the borders of Israel (19²²⁻³⁰). The Israelites gather together, hear about the occurrence, and decide to punish the evildoers, for which purpose they assemble before the guilty city (20¹⁻¹¹). The Benjamites are summoned to deliver up the culprits, but refuse to do so, whereupon war breaks out between the eleven tribes of Israel and the single tribe of Benjamin (20¹²⁻¹⁷). During the first two days the Israelites are repeatedly defeated in spite of being encouraged to attack by Jehovah, whom they seek in Bethel. But on the third day they are able, by a piece of strategy, to take the city; the Benjamites are put to the sword, only six hundred escaping; these take refuge in the wilderness at the rock of Rimmon. The whole territory of Benjamin is ravaged, and everyone is slaughtered (20¹⁸⁻⁴⁸). The Israelites now mourn over the fact that one of their tribes has been thus exterminated. Six hundred had escaped, it is true; but as these were all men the tribe would die out, and all Israel had sworn not to give their daughters to the Benjamites (see 21¹). It is then discovered that none of the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead had taken part in the war against the Benjamites; an army is, therefore, sent to punish the recalcitrant city; everyone is killed save four hundred virgins, and these are given to the Benjamites for wives (21¹⁻¹⁵). The two hundred other Benjamites, for whom wives had not been supplied, are bidden to hide in the vineyards during a vintage festival in Shiloh; when, according to custom, the maidens came out to dance, they are to rush out of their hiding places, seize a maid apiece, and carry her home to wife. This the Benjamites do, and then return to their inheritance (21¹⁶⁻²⁵).
*Regarding this narrative it is to be noted, first, that the idea of united action on the part of eleven tribes is quite contrary to the conditions of the time as presented by Judges; the Song of Deborah, e.g., deplors the want of unity among the tribes (5^{16f.}), and that was at a time of far greater crisis than anything pointed to in this narrative. Again, the almost total annihilation of the tribe of Benjamin shortly before the hegemony of that tribe under Saul shows that what is here told cannot have taken place during the period of the Judges. Once more, the destruction of all the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead at this period is not probable in view of the fact that soon after this time it appears as a flourishing city which is saved by Saul from the meditated attack of Nahash the Ammonite (1 Sam. 11¹⁻¹¹).

On the other hand, that the narrative contains some historical kernel seems probable; for there are references in Hos. 9⁹ 10⁹ to Gibeah which seem to point to the event dealt with in these chapters. That the two sources J and E have been utilized and welded together may be regarded as certain; and in all probability some other source has also been laid under contribution. Furthermore, midrashic material appears also to have been added at some later period; and the redactional elements which occur are what we have been accustomed to look for.

CHAPTER XIX

1-10. The Levite's Visit to Bethlehem; the First Part of His Journey Home. For the first half of v. 1, cf. 17⁶ 18¹ 21²⁵; it is the redactor's addition. 2. Played the harlot against him—read with various commentators, following some LXX MSS. and the Vulgate, was vexed with him; this also suits the context better. 10. Jebus (the same is Jerusalem)—there is no other evidence to show that this ever was the name of Jerusalem; it is called Urusalim in the Tel-el-Amarna letters (cir. 1400 B.C.); the city belonged to the Jebusites before David conquered it; and it may be that the redactor assumed that it was originally called Jebus after its owners.

11-21. The Levite in Gibeah. Gibeah which belongeth to Benjamin—for other places of the same name see Josh. 15⁵⁷, Gibeah in Judah, and Josh. 24³³ mg., in the hill country of Ephraim. The name means "hill," and in each case the locality is, or was originally, a sanctuary. 18. And I am . . . Lord—read following the LXX, I am going to my house, i.e., I am on my way home.

22-30. The Outrage on the Levite's Concubine. Cf. Gen. 19^{2f.} 23. Folly—the word in Hebrew denotes moral delinquency (see Gen. 34⁷ Deut. 22²¹ 2 Sam. 13¹²). In v. 30, the addition in some of the best LXX MSS.

should be read; then the whole verse would run: "And he commanded the men whom he had sent, saying, Say ye thus to every man in Israel, Was there ever such a thing since the day of the coming up out of Egypt of the children of Israel unto this day? Consider of it, take counsel, and speak. And it was so, that all that saw it said, there was no such deed done nor seen from the day that the children of Israel came up out of the land of Egypt unto this day." This evidently represents a more original form of the Hebrew text of this verse than the present form, which begins too abruptly.

CHAPTER XX

1-11. The Children of Israel Take Counsel in Mizpah. The congregation—this term is used only in post-exilic times; it is characteristic of the P document. LXX has "synagogue." From Dan to Beersheba—these were the northern and southern limits of the kingdom in the time of David and Solomon (see 1 Sam. 320 2 Sam. 310 17¹¹ 1 Kings 425). Mizpah—the modern Nebi' Samwil, five miles northwest of Jerusalem; an ancient sanctuary (cf. 1 Macc. 346f.). 5. Cf. 1922-30. 10. That they may do . . . Israel—the reconstruction of the text suggested by Moore is preferable: "to do to Gibeah of Benjamin as all the wantonness which it has wrought in Israel deserves."

12-17. The Israelites Prepare for War. 15. Twenty and six thousand men—LXX reads twenty-five thousand, which is nearer the number given in vv. 44f. 17. Four hundred thousand men—an impossible number; but it is not easy to determine the exact man power.

18-28. The Israelites are Defeated in Two Battles. The two sources have been very unskillfully combined in vv. 19, 20. 23. Went up and wept—they went up either to Mizpah (v. 1), or to Bethel (vv. 18, 26). Altogether five acts are enumerated in v. 26: weeping, sitting before the Lord, fasting, burnt-offerings, and peace-offerings; such an accumulation of propitiatory acts would be sure to incline Jehovah to grant them victory. The verse gives a good insight into the religious ideas of the times. The words in brackets, in vv. 27, 28, are a later addition to explain why the ark, before which the oracle was given, stood in Bethel and not, as heretofore, in Shiloh.

29-48. The Israelites are Victorious in the Third Battle. 30f. Cf. for this stratagem, Josh. 814f. A good example of the two sources utilized is seen by comparing vv. 31-36a with vv. 36b-44. 38. A great cloud of smoke—cf. Isa. 3027. 40. The whole of the city . . . heaven—cf. Deut. 1317. 43. The text here is very corrupt; according to Burney's skillful reconstruction (though he speaks of it as "extremely precarious") read and they beat down Benjamin, and pursued him from Nohah as far as over against Geba towards the east. Nohah (so LXX) was probably the name of a Benjamite city or village; it is mentioned in 1 Chr. 82. Drastic as this emendation is, Burney makes out a good case for it. 45. Gidom—no such place is known; perhaps, following LXX, we should read Geba. As Moore points out, the word can also be translated till they cut them off, cf. 216.

CHAPTER XXI

The Destruction of Jabesh-Gilead; The Rape of the Shilonite Maidens. In this chapter the two sources are again clearly discernible, namely: vv. 1-14 and vv. 15-24; and some commentators would, not without good reason, discern signs of a third source, extracts from which have been inserted in each of the two main sources.

1-14. War Against Jabesh-Gilead. In order to provide wives for the Benjamites Jabesh-gilead is destroyed with the exception of four hundred virgins, who are handed over to the Benjamites. Now the men—this oath has not been mentioned; it must have stood, however, in the source from which this was taken (cf. vv. 7, 18). 2. To Bethel—cf. 2018, 26. 4. And built there an altar—but according to 2026-28, there must already have been an altar there; this statement, therefore, can hardly belong to the original form of the story. 5. For they had made—this also is not mentioned previously in the present text; but no doubt the account of taking this oath stood in the original source. At the end of v. 11 LXX adds: "but the virgins ye shall save alive. And they did so." This evidently stood in the Hebrew text originally. 12. To Shiloh which is in the land of Canaan—cf. Josh. 212 229. 14. Sufficed not—there were six hundred Benjamites who had escaped, but so far only four hundred wives had been provided.

15-25. The Remaining Two Hundred Wives Are Obtained. There is clearly a new beginning in v. 15; had made a breach—cf. 2 Sam. 68 mg. 17. There must be an inheritance—read following some LXX MSS., How shall a remnant be saved? 19. Behold there is—these words must be understood as being addressed to the Benjamites. Which is on—these topographical details cannot have belonged to the original text; in very much later times it is likely enough that the site of Shiloh was not generally known; hence this insertion. 22. That we will say unto them—read that ye shall say unto them. Neither did ye give them unto them—read neither . . .

to us. Else would ye . . . i.e., because they would have broken their oath (see v. 18). What the verse seems to mean is this: the Benjamites are bidden to say to the fathers of the stolen maidens, "Do not grudge us your daughters, because it is not as though we had captured them after a battle; on the other hand, you have not given them to us, so it is not as though you had broken your oath." This is clearly an extraordinary way of arguing, and it can scarcely be doubted that we have here an attempt to weld into one two accounts of what was said, and that the attempt has not succeeded. 25. Cf. 17⁶ 18¹ 19¹.

RUTH

By PROFESSOR WILLIAM C. GRAHAM

The book of Ruth is universally regarded as one of the most charming little idyls in all literature. The story has four distinct phases which are correctly indicated by its chapter divisions.

Textual Notes. The text is so clear and easy to follow that it is necessary to offer only a few brief notes. These will be found at the close of the discussion of each chapter.

The Interpretation. This follows ch. 4 on p. 378.

CHAPTER I

The Return of Naomi and Ruth to Bethlehem-Judah. This chapter tells of the return of Naomi to her native place, accompanied by Ruth the Moabitess, her daughter-in-law.

1-5. We have here the history of Elimelech's household prior to the action of the story. The time is the period of the Judges, since Obed, son of Ruth and Boaz, is said to have become the grandfather of David (417). Elimelech's household had been kindly received in Moab. The inference is that had it not been for the death of the two sons the household would have remained in Moab permanently.

6-15. Naomi, for all her years of residence as a foreigner in Moab, and for all the kindly treatment there accorded to her, still thinks of the wives of her own sons as foreigners. She sees no place for them in the life of her native country which she is about to resume. When urging them to part finally from her she assumes that because she has no more sons to marry them their matrimonial possibilities among the Hebrews are nil. There is no little irony in the situation, yet the author depicts Naomi sympathetically. She is quite unconscious of the narrowness of her attitude. Her fortitude in being ready to face alone her problematical future is touching.

16-18. Ruth's course is inspired by the altruistic motives of sacrificial love and service. Orpah, moved by utilitarian considerations, is ready to re-erect the barriers of national and religious feeling between her and her late husband's mother. Conversely, Ruth's course implies renunciation of her own people with all that that involves.

19-22. The unconsciously narrow and self-centered nature of Naomi is again sympathetically portrayed. Once back in the familiar scenes of her youth she gives way to a burst of self-pity which carries her close to rebellion against Jehovah. She fails altogether to regard the loving devotion of Ruth. All the latter's self-sacrifice has failed to break down the intangible barrier of national feeling.

Textual Note. 2. Naomi means "delightful."
20. Mara means "bitterness."

CHAPTER II

The Meeting of Ruth With Boaz. Ruth's meeting with Boaz, described here, was apparently accidental, but the rest of the story turns on it.

1, 2. Further evidence of Ruth's altruism and of Naomi's real dependence on her. The latter was confronted by two alternatives: should she attempt to re-establish herself without Ruth's help, namely, penurious independence at the cost of grueling labor, or the humiliation of becoming an object of charity. Between her and either of these fates Ruth interposes the strength of her youth. She becomes a gleaner in the harvest fields. In doing so she braves not only the rigor of toil but also a certain amount of personal danger (cf. vv. 8, 9, 22).

3-17. Boaz's gracious attitude to the foreign gleaner who has chanced to seek permission to glean in his fields is here the theme. It is essential to the author's purpose that he should make a declaration of the motives which inspire his attitude. Thus Ruth is made to commit what is almost, if not quite, an indelicacy by inquiring of her benefactor, "Why have I found grace in thy sight, that thou shouldst take knowledge of me, seeing I am a stranger (=foreigner)?" Boaz's statement of his motives and his subsequent consideration are tantamount to a declaration that Ruth is, for him, no longer a foreigner.

18-23. These verses further contrast the respective attitudes of Naomi and Boaz to Ruth. The elder woman is still unawakened to the deeper significance of the younger's relation to her. She blesses the man who has allowed Ruth to glean in so fruitful a field. She fails to bless the gleaner herself. She expresses gratitude to Jehovah when she learns the identity of Ruth's benefactor, tacitly assuming that her only hope lies entirely in her own kin. Yet her lack of appreciation is due not to any inherent harshness in her nature but entirely to her nationalistic prejudices.

Textual Notes. 1. A mighty man of wealth. The expression so translated means, "a man of great influence." Boaz was wealthy but his claim to mightiness lay in his magnanimity. 2. Cf. Deut. 24^{19f}. Lev. 19^{1f}. 23²². 20. One of our near kinsmen. The word translated "kinsman" is gō'el. Its technical connotation is best suggested by the English words, "redeemer" or "avenger." His duties included the avenging of a kinsman's blood and the redemption of his person and property from seizure or forced sale (cf. Jer. 32⁸⁻¹² Lev. 25²⁵, 47-49).

CHAPTER III

Naomi's Stratagem. Naomi discloses to Ruth a stratagem which she has devised to stimulate Boaz to decision and action concerning his privileges and duties as gō'el ("redeemer") of her late husband's house.

1-5. The point here as before is again Naomi's attitude to Ruth. She thinks of herself as taking care of the latter, which, so far as the exercise of shrewd insight avails, she does. She cannot yet think of Ruth as taking care of her. Likewise it does not occur to her that her stratagem involves thrusting Ruth into a situation in which her honor may be imperiled. The latter is to take all the risk, which only enhances her more than filial submissiveness to the will of one who, all unconsciously, is using her as a pawn in the game of life.

6-15. Boaz is the hero of this incident. His morals do not crack under the strain to which they are subjected. The episode serves to make it perfectly clear that his regard for Ruth proceeds from worthy motives. Boaz is depicted as one who is meticulously upright in his observation of all the accepted social customs of his day.

16-18. These closing verses serve to intensify the previous delineation of Naomi as a shrewd, calculating, self-centered, though well-intentioned person, who, through the blindness induced by prejudice, utterly fails to recognize the sacramental love and sacrifice of one with whom she is daily thrown into the closest contact. Her anxiety about how matters have turned out with Ruth shows that she was aware of the risk which the latter, in obedience to her counsel, had incurred.

Textual Notes. 15. And he went—read and she went. 16. Who art thou? Naomi wishes to know not the identity of Ruth but what treatment she has received from Boaz (see mg.)

CHAPTER IV

The Marriage of Ruth and Boaz, and the Re-establishment of Naomi. The story comes to its climax in Ruth's marriage of her kinsman. On this marriage and what it implied the real message of the book depends.

1-12. That the marriage of Ruth and Boaz was a step taken under public approval, and only after every recognized custom of the day had been observed, and that by this marriage the assimilation of the foreign-born bride to her adopted people and country was consummated, is the theme of these verses. There can be little doubt that the author introduced the claims of the unknown kinsman in the preceding chapter, so that Boaz would be compelled to submit the whole matter to a council of the elders of the community. Thus it becomes clear that objection to the marriage of an Israelite to a foreigner, provided there are no barring circumstances, has no official warrant in the ancient social practice of Israel.

13-22. Similarly, the point here made is that such mixed marriages have often proved highly beneficial, not only to those closely concerned, but to the nation at large. So Naomi's neighbors, after the birth of Ruth's son, name him Obed, "Servant," typifying, perhaps, the values of his mother's life. Likewise they do not hesitate to declare to Naomi that her foreign-born daughter-in-law has been to her "better than seven sons."

But Ruth's crowning honor is that she becomes the ancestress of David, founder of the united kingdom of Israel. This is the real point of the story, to make which the tale is told.

Textual Notes. 3. Selleth—read has sold (cf. Lev. 25²⁵). 5. Thou must buy it also of Ruth—read thou must also buy Ruth (cf. v. 10). Naomi was the vendor of the land (cf. v. 3). The difference between the custom of the levirate marriage as reflected here and in Deut. 25⁵⁻¹⁰ should be observed. 7. Cf. Deut. 25⁹.

THE METHOD OF INTERPRETATION

The question of how the book of Ruth is to be interpreted is bound up with the author's motives in writing it. If it may be regarded as authentic historical literature, then there need have been no other motive than that of recording certain facts of historical value.

May the book, then, be so regarded? On this point the date of authorship is of importance. It must be borne in mind that the characters of the story are all otherwise historically unknown. Unless, therefore, the writer lived at a time approximately close to that of which he writes, the chances are that the tale is not primarily historical. This does not mean, however, that the author did not have access to or make use of valuable historical material.

By noting the descendants of Ruth as far only as the third generation, there is left with the reader the impression that the author may have lived close to the times of David. If this were the case, there would be less reason to doubt that the book is a genuine historical vignette.

There are, however, many considerations which point to the conclusion that the author was more probably a contemporary of Nehemiah than of David. These are: (1) This book, in the Hebrew Scriptures, has a place only in the third, latest, and least venerated group of sacred books known technically as "the Writings." (2) The diction and style show the influence of the Aramaic language, which is never found in genuinely early Hebrew literature. (3) The author in 47 feels the necessity of explaining, as a kind of obsolete social curiosity, a custom which was duly sanctioned by law in Deut. 255-10, itself only a late pre-exilic passage. (4) The idyllic simplicity and pastoral beauty of the life reflected in the book of Ruth, when compared with the atmosphere of harsh and cruel necessity in which one moves as one reads the genuinely early stories in Judges, suggests later idealization.

But why should the author have chosen as the time of his story "the days when the judges judged"? Because he could not do otherwise, inasmuch as he wished to make Ruth an ancestress of David. In addition to this it may be said that any writer of fiction who chooses a historical milieu for his characters does so because he believes that in such milieu he will be able better to handle the problem of the story. The parallels between the period of the Judges and the days of Nehemiah are very great. This alone would account for the choice of the situation.

What, then, is the central problem of the book of Ruth? Surely, it is nothing else than the relation of the foreigner to Israel, a theme which runs through the whole book and to which the writer contrives to give commanding importance by many reminders that Ruth is a foreigner (cf. 122 22, 6, 21 45, 10). There is, too, no doubt of his attitude on this question. His story shows that he wished to argue, first, that foreigners may be spiritually assimilated, and, second, that they may make contributions of essential value to society in general. If, then, we can find in history a time when this foreign question became acute, we shall be justified in interpreting the book as primarily didactic aimed at the propagation of the writer's views on that question.

The Historical Situation Which Stimulated the Author to Write the Book. It is definitely known that the problem of the relationships of Israelites with foreign-born or foreign-descended elements of the population did not become a public issue until the days of Ezra and Nehemiah. For an explanation of the circumstances which made that problem so acute at that time the reader is referred to the introduction to Jonah, section on "Historical Situation."

Here it will suffice to draw attention to the existence of three clearly defined groups in the population of Palestine in those days. These are: (1) The returning exiles and those descended from returned Babylonian Jews. (2) The foreign elements. (3) The native group who had never before come under the influence of the peculiar ideas and standards of their exilic compatriots.

The Interpretation. In the book of Ruth, surely by the deliberate intent of the author, the three leading characters, Naomi, Ruth, and Boaz, symbolize the three above-mentioned parties to the controversy which engaged public attention in the author's time. By attention to his delineation of these characters it is possible to see how he regarded each and what was his idea of the right policy for the time. Let us briefly review the characters of the story from this viewpoint.

1. Naomi, the Returning Exile. The widow of Elimelech manifests several characteristics which there is reason to believe were typical of the group she represents. She is given to self-pity and to brooding over the harshness with which life has treated her. She is inclined to be rebellious against the Divine Providence. She is essentially self-seeking and egotistical. This in turn makes her shrewd, calculating, cold, proud and inconsiderate even of those who serve her. Intellectually she is the strongest character in the story. Morally, she is the weakest. She will use, not only foreigners, but also her own kin to gain her ends. Apply this to the group which she represents and you have the author's rather shrewd appraisal of its limitations.

But the author is not hostile to the returned exiles. He is aware that great sorrow lies at the root of their shortcomings. He values, too, the loyalty to the homeland which even sorrow and long years of exile could not kill. He appreciates the courage which, alone and defenseless, would undertake the difficult journey home to a problematical future. Finally, he believes that the weaknesses he has exposed are not fundamental but accidental. Under happier circumstances, he hopes, they will be overcome.

2. Ruth, the Foreigner. It is manifest that the author sympathizes strongly with the foreigner. He is acutely conscious that the latter makes great sacrifices in leaving his own land. He cuts himself off from the social support offered by his kindred and must take his chance of integrating himself in the social fabric of his adopted country. In this difficult process of adjustment he, of necessity, passes through a period of humiliation which he may survive only by the exercise of moral strength of a high order. Such humiliations are usually imposed through the thoughtlessness and unconscious prejudices of essentially well-disposed people. The writer's evident belief is that a foreigner who can survive this period and prove himself a useful citizen, while, at the same time, coming to appreciate the spiritual heritage of those among whom he has come to live, is worthy of all acceptance.

3. Boaz, the Native. Boaz is a simple-hearted, unindoctrinated citizen. He is so occupied with his crops and herds as to have escaped altogether from the prejudices which are so strong in the exilic group. He is of a pragmatic turn of mind, little interested in racial and religious tags and labels. He is just such an ancestor as David might have had, jovial, hearty, manly, a "big man," mighty in toil, in the pleasures of life, or, if need were, in battle.

There are two influences at work in the life of Boaz, first, the clever mind of Naomi, who wishes to exploit the hold of kinship which she has upon him; second, the personality of Ruth the foreigner. Of these two the latter, in the author's judgment, is the stronger. Naomi's plans work out only because Ruth is her agent. Without her she would have planned in vain. This gives the key to the author's view of the social situation with which he deals. The success of the exilic party can be achieved only by the inclusion of the non-Jewish elements of the population in its plans. If the intellectually more able exilic group will follow the course taken by Naomi in the story, all three elements may relate themselves and harmony and prosperity ensue.

The ideal of the author for the future of his country was the re-establishment of a monarchy, brought about by a liberal policy which would unify all disparate elements of the population into one strong whole. This is the significance of the last words of the story (4¹⁷), which tell how Obed, the son of Boaz and Ruth, became the grandfather of David. Let exile, native, and foreigner draw together in harmony and in three or four generations there may be another David and another united kingdom of Israel.

The Teaching Values of the Book. The social problem with which the author endeavored to deal is a live issue in our own day and will be to the end of time. One can hardly doubt that the universal acceptance of the principles laid down in this book in regard to the treatment of foreigners would result in increasing good will among men the world over.

But perhaps the greatest lesson of the book is that the way to happiness lies through intelligent co-operation with others. The individual virtues possessed by each character would not have sufficed in themselves to achieve the happy result. It is our human limitations, of which no one is free, which make us essential to each other. To give what we can in gracious co-operation with those who can give what we cannot—this is the path by which we may best serve, not only our own age, but posterity.

Literature: Eiselen, The Psalms and Other Sacred Writings; Thatcher, Judges and Ruth (Century Bible); Cook, The Book of Ruth (Cambridge Bible).

FIRST AND SECOND SAMUEL

By PROFESSOR NATHANIEL MICKLEM

INTRODUCTION

Place in Canon and General Contents. In Hebrew MSS. and in the earliest printed editions of the Hebrew Bible the two books of Samuel are treated as one, but in the Greek Bible they constitute with First and Second Kings the four books "of kingdoms." The division of Samuel into two books, therefore, is only a matter of convenience, carried through rather arbitrarily. They deal with the beginnings of the Hebrew monarchy and cover the lifetimes of Samuel, Saul, and David.

Manner of Literary Composition. When we are told in 1 Sam. 27⁶ (cf. 1 Sam. 30²⁵ and 2 Sam. 6⁸) that "Ziklag pertaineth unto the kings of Judah unto this day," it is clearly implied that the writer lived several reigns at least after the time of David. But the question, When was Samuel written? is misleading unless we bear in mind the Hebrew method of writing history, so different from our own. If we judge by the O.T., we may conclude that the Hebrew historian worked by what may be called the "scissors-and-paste" method. His book would consist of a series of excerpts taken from earlier chroniclers and stitched together with a few connecting sentences or judgments giving the editor's point of view. The editor or final redactor of Samuel, therefore, may have lived long after the time of David, while some of the sources or chronicles from which he quotes may have been old books in his time and contemporary or nearly contemporary with the events they record. Thus questions of date, authorship, and reliability are very complicated and, except in broad outline, can be answered only very tentatively. Those who wish to follow the detailed arguments and analyses made by scholars can find them in the standard modern introductions to the literature of the O.T. Here only the surest and most generally accepted conclusions will be stated.

Source Materials. As to the documents which the editor of Samuel used it is impossible to arrive at certainty, but the various types of tradition which he has incorporated can be recognized even by the reader of the English translation.

1. Of one whole group of traditions the prophet Samuel is the hero (1 Sam. 11-28 21¹-41^a 72-82² 101⁷-27 111²-122⁵ 137^b-15^a 151¹-161³ 251¹ 283-25).

Whether or not these passages are taken from a single document, they represent a common and distinctive point of view: in the days of the Philistine oppression the national life and the national religion were at a low ebb, but before the lamp of God was quite extinguished (so some Jewish commentators mystically interpret 3³), God raised up a political and religious leader in the person of Samuel. He became a national religious leader (4¹, etc.) and a national deliverer from the Philistine oppression (7¹³); he judged all Israel (7¹⁵). It was natural that his sons should succeed him in this work (8¹), but the people, not satisfied with the kingship of the Lord their God, exercised through Samuel, demanded a king (8⁵); an earthly monarchy was for Israel a form of apostasy (8⁷); none the less Samuel, at the divine command and with many warnings, selected Saul as king by means of the sacred lot (10²¹). Samuel then makes a long farewell speech to the people (12^{1f.}). Saul's kingship is a failure from the first, for God immediately rejects him for disobedience (13¹³). After a second act of disobedience on Saul's part (15¹⁹) the breach between him and Samuel becomes final (15³⁵); Samuel anoints David in Saul's place (16¹³). Samuel's death is the occasion of mourning on the part of all Israel, who gather at Ramah to bury him (25¹), but even after death Samuel dominates the situation (28^{3f.}).

There can be little doubt that in the main this picture of Samuel reflects a later rather than a contemporaneous point of view: Samuel did not judge "all Israel," for in reality "all Israel" was not united until the time of the monarchy, and in another and earlier tradition Samuel is represented as a relatively unknown local seer (9⁶). Moreover, if, in fact, Samuel had destroyed the power of the Philistines, that task would not have remained for Saul and David. This does not mean that these stories are historically worthless, but only that the general picture they give idealizes the work and to some extent the character of Samuel. Further, some of the passages which give little historical information are, as we shall see, of great religious significance.

2. Another group of traditions deals with the history and miraculous powers of the ark (41^b-71). Perhaps they were stories and legends cherished by the Jerusalem priesthood who became the custodians of the ark. Whether these stories represent a written document by themselves or are taken from some document with a wider interest are questions we cannot answer.

3. Of a third group of traditions Saul is the hero (1 Sam. 9:1-10:16 11:1-11 13:1-7a 15b-18 14:1-52 16:14-23). These tell how Saul went out to seek his father's asses and found a kingdom (9:1f.), how God's Spirit came upon him (10:9), how he first came to public notice by his deliverance of the people of Jabesh in Gilead (11:1f.), how he was successful in all his wars (14:52), and how at last he failed because the Lord sent an evil spirit upon him (16:14). These stories may naturally be thought to represent the Benjamite tradition. Whether they belong together in the sense of coming from a single document we cannot say. Their substantial historical accuracy there is no need to doubt.

4. A fourth group of traditions deals with David's relationship to Saul and David's exploits and sufferings before he became king (1 Sam. 17:55-19:17 20:1b-24:22 25:2-28:2 30:1-31 31:1-13 2 Sam. 1:1-16). These stories doubtless come from various sources; they are popular tales rather than history in the modern sense of that term; they all have David for their hero, and they are in many cases marked by a strong bias against the Benjamite monarchy of Saul; they are the traditions of Judah and of the south country where David was long outlawed; they are bona fide traditions and are based upon historical events, though doubtless the stories have been somewhat colored by the enthusiasms and prejudices of those who passed them down. These stories are not a literary unity.

5. There is a small group of stories which may be regarded as romances (1 Sam. 13:19-23 17:1-54 19:18-20:1a). These must be ascribed in large part to imagination, not history; they are intended as edifying stories, and possess much religious significance.

6. There is a series of narratives (2 Sam. 11:1b-12:25 13:1-20:22) dealing with the family life and court history of David, and in particular with Absalom's rebellion. These narratives are so vivid, so detailed, so well informed that it seems natural to refer them to someone who was actually in close touch with David and the court. These stories constitute a document of first-class historical importance; presumably they lay before the editor of Samuel in writing.

7. Most of the rest of Second Samuel is taken up with narratives of David's reign doubtless taken from various sources (2:1-7:7 8:1-11:1a 12:26-31 20:23-26 21:1-22 23:8-23). In general, these may be taken as reliable traditions; but for the most part we have before us traditions, not contemporary records.

8. Finally there is a group of poetical or semi-poetical pieces (1 Sam. 21-10 2 Sam. 1:17-27 7:8-29 22:1-51 23:1-7). One of these (2 Sam. 1:17-27) is quoted from the lost Book of Heroes (Jashar), another (2 Sam. 22:1-51) is found in a variant form in the book of Psalms (Psa. 18).

This analysis, it will be noted, is concerned with types of tradition rather than with documents. In the case of the Pentateuch the analysis of documents is relatively sure; in the case of Samuel it is quite uncertain. It constitutes a literary problem of great fascination to scholars, but of little direct importance to the ordinary Bible student. It is, however, of great importance to bear in mind the kind of sources, whether written or oral, which the editor had before him. Through what stages and "editions" the books of Samuel may have passed before they reached their present state it is impossible to say. It seems fairly clear, however, that 2 Sam. 21-24 is an appendix added at some late stage to the book and giving items of information that should have come in earlier. The book reached its final form at approximately the same time as the books of Joshua and Judges, namely, about 400 B.C.

Purpose. What purpose did the editor put before himself in the compilation of Samuel? In the Hebrew Bible, Samuel, with Joshua, Judges, and Kings, belongs to the section called "the former prophets." Samuel was regarded, then, primarily as a prophetic book. It contains much historical material of first-class importance, but its purpose was not to give a scientific picture of a past age, nor to serve the purposes of archaeology, but to edify the Hebrew Church; it is devotional literature or preaching, not scientific history such as we have learned to demand. The editor of Samuel fulfills Frederick Schlegel's definition of an historian as "a prophet who looks back into the past"; his interest lay in the moral order of the world, the righteous will and purposes of God. The editor was a preacher using the past as his text from which to give his contemporaries light upon the present, comfort, warning, and exhortation. From the documents and traditions available he chose such elements as served his purpose. These things are written, the editor of Samuel might say, that ye might believe that God has revealed his holy and righteous will in history, and that believing ye might have salvation and blessing in his favor.

The early Christian Church had no archaeological interests. First and Second Samuel became Christian Scriptures because they were then, as they are still, useful for edification. No teacher finds difficulty in discoursing about the good Samaritan and the prodigal son because these are characters of fiction, not historical persons. The books of Samuel contain historical material of the greatest interest and importance, but the spiritual truth and value of the stories are very little affected by the minutiae and uncertainties of historical criticism.

Permanent Significance. As has already been suggested, Samuel is of great importance as an historical document, not because it is history in the modern sense of that term, but because it contains some historical material of the highest order. Regarding the oldest sources used by the editor, the historian Eduard Meyer says: "It is something remarkable that an historical literature of this sort was possible in Israel at that time. It is far beyond anything that we know otherwise regarding the writing of history in the ancient Orient." The chief value of the later documents consists in their interpretation of the earlier history, which furnishes an interesting insight into the thought development of Israel's prophetic leaders. The rise of opposition to the monarchy revealed in the later portions is only what might be expected in view of the fact that as early as the time of Solomon the political developments incident to the maintenance of the monarchy threatened the very life of the religion of Jehovah.

Much may be learned from Samuel regarding religious and moral conditions during the period described: Enemies were tortured; the truth was held none too sacred; women and children were not exempt from the cruelties of war; polygamy was common among the higher classes. Evidence of progress, however, is not lacking. The rights of life and of property came to be more clearly defined and more carefully guarded. Even the poor had an opportunity of securing justice before a judge like David. Adultery was recognized as a crime. The law of blood revenge was gradually superseded by trial before an authorized tribunal. The centralization of government exerted a strong unifying influence on religious thought and practice. The offering of sacrifice was not yet restricted to the priesthood, nor was the priesthood restricted to the tribe of Levi, but the number of priests was increasing and their duties were becoming more clearly defined. The chief function of the priests was still the determining of the will of Jehovah. The care of the sanctuary, the offering of sacrifice, and other primary responsibilities were only gradually intrusted to them. Another person occupying a prominent place in the religious life was the seer, who was thought to possess the power of determining the divine will or, in general, of revealing secrets. Some persons might combine the two offices, but ordinarily the seers were concerned more with personal and temporal affairs, while the priests were interested in public and religious matters. Samuel was a seer, but a later writer thought him worthy of being called a prophet. In reality he marked the transition from the lower office of seer to the higher and more dignified office of prophet. As a prophet he was a worthy predecessor of Elijah, Amos, Isaiah, and other later prophets in Israel and Judah.

With all the advances in religious thought and practice, the age did not free itself entirely from religious shortcomings. Even the most enlightened had a relatively low conception of the character of Jehovah. David, for instance, considered departure from the land of Israel equivalent to exclusion from the presence and service of Jehovah (1 Sam. 26¹⁹). When Samuel slew Agag before Jehovah (1 Sam. 15³³), and when king and people united in slaying innocent human beings to pacify Jehovah (2 Sam. 21), they gave conclusive evidence that they had not as yet fully comprehended his real character (cf. 2 Sam. 24). Succeeding generations had much to learn before the fullness of the perfection of Israel's God could be appreciated and proclaimed by the great prophets.

Condition of Text. The books of Samuel were written some two thousand years before the invention of printing; it is not surprising that in the course of those two thousand years mistakes and corruptions have crept into the text through the slips of copyists and other causes, nor that the Hebrew text, as it comes down to us, is sometimes unintelligible, often puzzling, and widely different from the Greek version (the LXX), which was made in the centuries immediately before Christ (see p. 103). Commentaries on the Hebrew text are largely taken up with attempts, that never can be more than tentative, to restore the text as it is supposed to have come from the author's pen. Almost all these discussions are concerned with points of literary but not religious interest. They are passed over in the following commentary except in cases where the English Version seems obscure or definitely misleading.

On dates, see art., Chronology of O.T., p. 108. Variations indicate that as to some of these dates there is still difference of opinion.

Literature: H. P. Smith, Samuel (International Critical Commentary); Kirkpatrick, Samuel (Cambridge Bible); Kennedy, Samuel (Century Bible); Eiselen, The Prophetic Books of the O.T., vol. i; Driver, Introduction to the Literature of the O.T.

FIRST SAMUEL

CHAPTERS 1¹ to 4^{1a}: THE BIRTH AND PROPHETIC CALL OF SAMUEL

CHAPTER I

1-18. Hannah's Prayer and Vow. The home of Samuel's parents, Ramathaim or Arimathea, cannot certainly be identified; it was perhaps due west of Shiloh. Hannah means "grace," Peninnah, "pearl" or "coral." In ancient Hebrew thought childlessness was the greatest disaster that could overtake a family; it involved annihilation for the family-soul in which all members of the family, past and present, participate. The duties of the priest at this early time are given in Deut. 33⁸⁻¹⁰; they were to divine the will of God by means of the urim and thummim—i.e., two lots used in divination—to teach the people the requirements of God and to offer the sacrifices. The covenant or Law, which they were to keep and teach, corresponds, in general at least, with the Book of the Covenant (Ex. 20²²⁻²³¹⁹). In v. 5 read with LXX a single portion; Jerome in the Vulgate says, "to Hannah he sadly gave a single portion, for Hannah was his love." No razor (v. 11)—a mark of special consecration to God (cf. the tonsure in Christendom). The word Belial (v. 16; cf. A.S.V., "a wicked woman") suggests negation, and connotes godlessness, emptiness, rottenness.

19-28. Answer to the Prayer and Performance of the Vow. The etymology of Samuel suggested in v. 20 is a popular etymology based on similarity in sound. Perhaps the writer means only that "Samuel" sounds in Hebrew like "asked of God." The reference to weaning suggests a period of at least three years, but more time seems implied. The sacrifice offered is an unusually valuable sacrifice. In v. 28 read Samuel worshiped the Lord, or they worshiped the Lord there.

As Mark, who tells of "great David's greater Son," begins with John the Baptist, so here David is introduced with the story of Samuel, who is represented as the son of his mother's vows (Prov. 31³). We see the simple piety of early days in Israel, the annual pilgrimage to Shiloh, where the ark was housed, the sacrifice there and the feast, the whole compared by Bennett to a Christmas and a Christmas dinner away from home. After dinner Hannah went into the sanctuary sadly to pray before the Real Presence represented by the ark. We note that the language of prayer has not changed, and that she leaves the sanctuary cheerful with the old priest's blessing. Much is implied of real understanding and affection between husband and wife; there is simple faith in the prayer-hearing God; and when at last the child has come and the time is ripe, his mother takes him to the sanctuary and dedicates him to God with thanksgiving and a special sacrifice.

Sacrifice is not a formality and empty rite; it is a gift; and in Hebrew thought everything that belongs to a man is, as it were, charged with his personality; therefore in the gift he gives something of himself; thus every gift is sacramental; nor is it a light thing to receive a gift, for the receiver in receiving accepts a personal obligation to the giver; he is bound by his acceptance. Sacrifice, therefore, is a solemn sacrament.

CHAPTER II

1-10. Hannah's Song of Thanksgiving. This, with its reference to the monarchy (v. 10), or possibly the Messiah, was hardly composed by Hannah on this occasion. Possibly it was inserted here because in later days it was used in the liturgy for the service corresponding to our "churching" of women. However, the psalm was used also as a song of victory and of thanksgiving on a variety of occasions. The wild ox symbolizes strength and victory; hence in v. 1 the metaphor of the horn. Salvation—deliverance from the shame of barrenness. Hannah's Exultavit (see v. 1) is the first draft of the Christian Magnificat (Lk. 1⁴⁶); the motif of both songs is the same, and the one points to the other.

11-17. The Disgraceful Conduct of the Sons of Eli. In the latter part of v. 12 follow R.V. mg. Knowing God in Hebrew thought is always much more than knowing about God; it implies a personal relationship to God (cf. Jer. 22¹⁶). The custom described in vv. 13, 14 was an offense against courtesy. The priest's due should not be snatched in this way. The attitude reflected in vv. 15, 16 involved sacrilege, for the fat was a sacred part of the victim, belonging to God alone.

18-21. Samuel and Hannah. The story of Eli and his sons is interrupted by a few verses dealing with Samuel. Ephod refers to the priestly garment, probably a loin-cloth; the robe is presumably an outer garment, worn over the tunic.

22-26. Eli Reproves His Sons, but Without Effect. In an ordinary case of plaintiff and defendant, God, through his representative, the judge, can mediate between them; but when God is the plaintiff, his direct vengeance is to be expected (cf. Job 9^{32f.}). Would slay, i.e., was to slay, as the event proved (v. 25).

27-36. A Prophecy Against Eli's House. In the light of the context the house of thy father must be the tribe of Levi, and the contrast seems to be between the Levitical house of Eli and the non-Levitical Samuel (that Samuel in the early stories was not a Levite is clear, for instance, from his mother's special vows for him); but the point of the later verses (30-36) is that the Levitical house of Zadok, the "faithful priest," shall supersede the house of Eli. Eli's sons, Hophni and Phinehas, died in battle (411). According to a doubtful tradition, the priests of Nob whom Saul slew (v. 33; 2211-19) and Abiathar, whom Solomon banished (1 Kings 227), were descendants of Eli. These verses are certainly of late origin. In v. 18 the ephod is clearly a garment; in v. 28 this interpretation is doubtful. In the latter place, as in many other O.T. passages, it seems to be a solid object, probably a divine image, possibly in the form of a bull or a calf. (Cf. Judg. 827 1830; see Budde, Zeitschrift für Alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, 1921, pp. 1f.) Instead of wear, therefore, read carry. The man not to be cut off (v. 33) is probably Abiathar (2229). The reference in v. 36 presumably is to the plight of the country priests when all the worship was centered in Jerusalem (Deut. 186-8).

In the passage dealing with the rejection of Eli, which embodies material from different sources, the editor seeks to show three things: (1) that Eli, who was responsible before God for his sons, was rejected by God from the priesthood; (2) that at first Samuel took his place; and (3) that later the priesthood passed to the house of Zadok. The religious principle underlying the narrative is clear: There is no such thing as a "divine right" of priests, no "apostolic succession" that cannot be broken. God calls a man to a task, to its duties and its privileges; the sons may be expected to carry on their father's work; but if the duties are neglected, the privileges are withdrawn. "And say not within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham" (Mt. 39).

CHAPTER III

The Prophetic Call of Samuel. (See also 41a.) The story is simply told. Child would better be rendered with v. 1 mg., lad. See comment on 44 for a discussion of the ark. On sacrifice and expiation (v. 14; cf. mg.) see closing paragraph on 21-10 and on ch. 27. God will not accept Eli's gifts, and therefore will not accept or forgive Eli.

The daily opening of the doors was probably the occasion of a solemn service (v. 15). Samuel would be consulted on such questions as, whether a journey would be prosperous, and where lost objects would be found. All his oracles came true (vv. 19-21).

The subject of this chapter is the prophetic call of Samuel or the coming of a personal experience of God to him. When religion in Israel was at the lowest ebb (v. 1), God called forth a prophet. Samuel heard the voice of God, as did Saint Augustine in the garden (Confessions, viii, 12). Hitherto Samuel's religion had been traditional and at second hand; henceforward he knew God for himself (v. 7). As we have the story, the only message that comes to Samuel is a word of doom against the house of Eli, but a call to personal service on the part of Samuel is implied in v. 19 and in what follows. Eli, when he hears the message, consents to the law of God that it is holy and just and good. Possibly in v. 21 we should read that, not the Lord, but the people appeared again in Shiloh. Shiloh became the center of a religious revival, because it was known that God's word was to be heard there through Samuel. While these stories that make Samuel a national religious teacher may be late, they indicate the editor's conception of that prophetic office to which Christian ministers and teachers are also called, and of the experimental and personal religious experience which it implies.

CHAPTER IV

Defeat of Israel by the Philistines. The site of the battle with the Philistines, which led to the loss of the ark, is probably not far inland from Joppa.

For the Philistines, see on ch. 17. It is noteworthy that there is no mention of Samuel in this narrative. The ark of the covenant of the Lord of hosts which dwelleth (mg.) amid the cherubim is the fullest and longest title of the ark (v. 4); but it is not likely that this full title was used in these early days. Ark of the covenant—because as the visible representation of the God of Israel, inherited from the Mosaic era, it was a solemn reminder of the covenant between Israel and Israel's God. It was later supposed that the two "tables of the Law," the Decalogue, the basis of the covenant, were deposited within it. Lord of hosts: the hosts are primarily heavenly hosts of angels, stars, "sons of God," spiritual, demonic beings, but they may also include the armies of Israel. Cherubim are angelic beings, perhaps partly of human, partly of animal shape, attendant upon God; they were pictorially represented as guardians of the ark in Solomon's Temple, and it is doubtful whether they were associated with the ark and the religion of Israel before Solomon's time.

The ark was a box; such is the meaning of the Hebrew word 'aron, translated ark. Later tradition supposed it to have contained various relics of the Mosaic period, the tables of the Law, Aaron's rod, manna, etc. The most probable suggestions as to original content are (a) that it contained nothing; (b) that it contained volcanic stones from the Sinai region. The God of Israel was the God of Sinai, and the region would be charged with his presence; therefore, in taking part of Sinai with them, Israel would be taking a potent talisman, would indeed be taking God himself; for, just as, in Hebrew thought, the whole family-soul is represented in each member of the family, to the whole of God, "God's presence and his very self and essence all divine," would be inevitably associated with the sacred stones from his own country. But it is no longer possible for us to know with certainty what, if anything, the ark contained. In later years, it may be, the ark came to be regarded as the throne of the invisible God (see further on ch. 6).

In v. 8 read and with the pestilence for in the wilderness. Only according to later theory was Eli a judge over all Israel (v. 18). Not only was the ark taken, but in all probability Shiloh itself was destroyed at this time (see Jer. 7¹²). This must have been a time of religious crisis for Israel. Much more after the capture of the ark must the elders have asked, Wherefore hath the Lord smitten us to-day before the Philistines? (v. 3). Were the gods of the Philistines stronger than the God of Israel? or had the God of Israel reason to be displeased with his people? Was repentance necessary? Many will have espoused the former view; it was a spiritual triumph that the latter prevailed. Eli, who trembled for the ark of God, betrayed an uneasy conscience (v. 13). National calamity, rather than success, is a time of spiritual growth. Yet this calamity was hardly on a national scale. No general is named; and if all Israel was concerned in the loss of the ark, not all Israel was engaged in the battle. This defeat may well have impressed upon all Israel the need for national unity and a king.

CHAPTERS 5 AND 6: THE MYSTERIOUS POWER OF THE ARK

CHAPTER V

The Ark No Blessing to the Philistines.

The capture of the ark did not prove an un-mixed blessing to the Philistines; even their gods suffered disaster. Ashdod was one of the five great cities of Philistia. Dagon, a fish or corn god, an old Akkadian sun-god. (See further comment on Judg. 16²³). V. 5 offers an explanation of the habit in Ashdod of jumping over the temple threshold as a specially sacred or spirit-haunted place. The custom was widespread but forbidden to Israel as heathen (Zeph. 19). In Solomon's Temple the threshold had a special guard (2 Kings 12⁹; cf. Esth. 6²). Tumors, better plague boils, i.e., bubonic plague (vv. 9, 11, 12). See further under ch. 6.

CHAPTER VI

The Ark Returned by the Philistines.

Instead of a guilt-offering (v. 3), read compensation. Mice are a symbol of plague. The offering of golden boils to heal plague is a kind of homeopathic magic (see on 2 Kings 19³⁵). A new cart and animals not broken in must be used for a sacred purpose (v. 7). To have the cows leave their calves and voluntarily take a certain road would be a kind of miracle. V. 15 seems to be a later addition. In later ages only priests might sacrifice. In v. 19 accept the marginal reading. Omit fifty thousand men. Kiriath-jearim (v. 21) was further up the Jerusalem road.

The burden of this passage is the mysterious and magical power of the ark, bringing destruction to the Philistines, and even to the Israelites, if it were not treated with due respect. There is nothing here of the God "whose property is always to have mercy." How differently do the heathen come to recognize the God of Israel according to some of the sublime prophetic utterances! That God has all power is a necessary idea in religion, but it is even more important to inquire how he exercises his power and to what ends. Religion develops as men moralize and spiritualize their conceptions of God's power. Christ might have summoned twelve legions of angels, but he sought a power over men's hearts which can only come by free consent. In the cross, more than in the creation, is shown God's omnipotence so far as religion is concerned.

Teaching of chs. 5 and 6. This section, by laying stress on the ark's magical powers, misses the religious significance of the ark for Israel. A probable clue to much of the religious history of the period may be found in the difference and opposition between the ark and the ephod. The ephod (see on 22⁸) was a divine image—an idol; the ark was a box, either empty or containing stones from the Sinai region (see on 4⁴), and thus constituted in a real sense a non-idolatrous symbol of the invisible God of Israel. Moreover, the ark was the symbol of the austere worship of the wilderness and of the religious foundations established by Moses. The ephod, on the other hand, was a Canaanite symbol taken over into Israel's religion, but never altogether freed from the degrading associations of Canaanite worship and the fertility-cults of Canaan.

After the ark had been captured by the Philistines, apart from these stories which are of somewhat doubtful historical worth, nothing is heard of it for some twenty years or more. It probably remained in Philistine hands at Gath (see 2 Sam. 6¹¹.); Saul seems to have made no effort to regain it; at least it is not mentioned in connection with Saul. His neglect of the ark may have been typical of his quarrel with Samuel. David's bringing up of the ark to Jerusalem is more than a sign of victory over the Philistines, more than a means of uniting north and south religiously; it is probably to be regarded as indicative of his general religious policy. David stands for the older and nobler religious traditions of Israel, the religious ideas of Moses. For this reason he builds no temple for the ark but houses it in a tent (see on 2 Sam. 7¹⁻²⁹). We notice, moreover, that once David has taken the ark to Jerusalem, we hear no more of the ephod. He does not even take it with him in his flight from Absalom when he leaves the ark behind.

There is always a tendency in religion, as illustrated by these stories of the wonder-working of the ark, to externalize and materialize a spiritual miracle; thus feeding upon Christ by faith is easily externalized into the eating of bread, the moral glory of the saints into a halo round their heads, or justification by "faith" into justification by "orthodoxy."

CHAPTERS 7 AND 8: THE THEOCRATIC IDEAL

CHAPTER VII

1, 2. See on ch. 6.

3-17. Samuel Reappears as a Prophetic Leader. Baalim and Ashtaroth, male and female Canaanite deities, representing Canaanite religion generally, polytheistic, unethical, and often lascivious. The solemn libation of water (cf. 2 Sam. 23¹⁶) is a part of the cleansing penitential ritual of the fast-day (cf. the rite of baptism). While the Israelites were engaged in religious rites the Philistines attacked them, but without success (v. 10), for they were supernaturally discomfited. If Samuel had really won so sweeping a victory over the Philistines, the work of Saul and David would have been needless. See further under ch. 8.

CHAPTER VIII

The Demand for a King Granted. In the earliest parts of the O.T. only twice (and even there not certainly) is God called "king" (Deut. 33⁵ and Num. 23²¹), but Gressmann thinks that from earliest times there was a close connection between the ark and the idea of the divine kingship (Mose, pp. 439f.; contra, Budde Segen Moses, pp. 13f.), and Mowinckel has given strong reasons for supposing that there was yearly in Jerusalem a festival of the "enthronement" of the God of Israel (see on 2 Sam. 6). The earthly king was always regarded as God's representative, but only in the Northern Kingdom, so far as we know, was there a repudiation of the earthly monarchy (for instance, Hosea). This section, therefore, presumably comes from a northern source. The description of the king's conduct seems the fruit of bitter experience.

Teaching of chs. 7 and 8. This section was written less to tell history than to set forth the author's theory of the destiny of Israel and of the significance of the kingship: Israel was intended to be a theocracy, a rule of God mediated, not through a king, but through a religious officer, prophet, priest and judge, such as Moses had been and such as, in the writer's view, Joshua and the Judges to Samuel must have been, till rebellious Israel asked for an earthly king. This ideal was realized after the Exile in the high-priestly rule; but this was legal rather than prophetic; it is at least partially realized in the constitution of the Roman Church. It is transcended in the N.T. idea that the Spirit is given to all believers; but the Christian Church is still a theocracy, not a democracy.

CHAPTERS 9 TO 11: SAUL'S ELECTION TO THE KINGSHIP

CHAPTER IX

Samuel Led to Select Saul. With 9¹ begins a new account of the establishment of the monarchy and the selection of Saul as the first king. Saul means "desired." The places named in vv. 4, 5 are unidentified. According to this narrative, Samuel was a local seer, not a national Judge and hero; evidently he is not known to Saul. The local sanctuary was usually on the hill above the town—a custom which dates from Canaanite times. Samuel is priest as well as seer. The monarchy in this story is regarded as of God's purpose and gift, while in ch. 8 it is traced to the people's rebellion. For that which was upon it (v. 24), read perhaps the fat tail; and for the last sentence perhaps that thou mayest eat with the guests. In v. 25 follow the marginal reading.

CHAPTER X

1-8. The Anointing of Saul. This is credited to Jehovah himself. Saul's choice by Jehovah is to be evidenced by several experiences predicted by Samuel. To God (v. 3) means "to worship at the sanctuary." The instruments mentioned in v. 5 correspond roughly to the guitar, tambourine, flute, and harp. Prophesying (vv. 5, 10-13) means "being in the prophetic frenzy." Gibeah (v. 5 mg.) means "hill." There seems from ancient time to have been some confusion between Gibeah, Geba, and Gibeon. It is probable that the Philistine prefect had his residence at Gibeon, and that Saul after his first successes against the Philistines made this residence into his palace. Thus, as Jerusalem later became "David's City," so Gibeon became Saul's Hill, or Gibeah. In 2 Sam. 21⁶ Saul's Gibeah seems clearly to be Gibeon. Gibeon is here called "God's Hill," and it is likely (so Sellin) that the priests of Nob were the local priesthood here (see 22¹¹).

9-16. The Return of Saul. Two interpretations of the surprise questions are possible: (1) Kish is an unlikely man to have a son among the prophets; (2) Saul is behaving in an abandoned way such as would not be expected of the son of Kish; these prophets are men of no family connection; no one knows who their parents were. The latter is much more probable.

17-27. The Kingship Viewed as Disloyalty to Jehovah. As in 84-22, the kingship is represented as due to the people's rebellion. Having demanded a king, who shall he be? The belief that God directs the sacred lot persisted into the Christian Church (Acts 12⁶). If in doubt, pray and then toss up, is the principle; it may be childish, but it is not irreligious where a man is entirely willing to do God's will if he can discover it. The phrase God save the king! was not a mere formality. According to primitive thought, to say "Hail" to a man actually adds to his strength and dignity. Perhaps 8¹¹⁻¹⁸ gives the contents of the book alluded to in v. 25. See further under ch. 11.

CHAPTER XI

A Differing Account of Saul's Selection. With some additions this chapter continues 10¹⁶ and gives another and probably more historical account of Saul's popular election as king. The Ammonites were nomad marauders; the covenant offered is presumably the right to a tithe of the crops. The men of Jabesh in Gilead were kinsmen of the Israelites. According to the ideas of the time, the Ammonites by putting out the right eyes would disgrace Israel; but even more—by taking away their honor, they would rob them of the strength of soul, their valor and prowess. The author here obviously knows nothing of the story that Saul was already elected king.

Every exceptional emotion or power, physical or spiritual, was traced by the early Israelites to Jehovah. The anger, boldness, and bravery of Saul could be explained only on this principle. The numbers in v. 8 may have been supplied subsequently. It is doubtful that the number of fighting men was so large at this time. Moreover, such an army could not be mobilized so quickly; and the mention of Israel and Judah presupposes the division of the kingdom. Bezek—almost opposite Jabesh on the west of the Jordan. Vv. 12, 13 are in the nature of an editorial addition, intended to connect the narrative in vv. 1-11 with the story in ch. 10, especially v. 27. V. 14 refers to the Gilgal near Jericho (Josh. 4¹⁹) which would lie on the return journey from Gilead. The term renew the kingdom (v. 14) is another editorial phrase to reconcile this chapter with the preceding: Saul had been privately anointed king by Samuel; he is now publicly elected.

Teaching of chs. 10 and 11. These chapters, which deal with Saul's election as king, describe the evoking of the hidden forces of his soul through God's Spirit making him a new man: God "turned him another heart" (10⁹ mg.). Matthew Henry's comment is entirely along the lines of ancient Hebrew thought: "Whom God calls to service he will make fit for it. If he advance to another station, he will give another heart to those who sincerely desire to serve him with their power." But, as the sequel shows, ecstasy and spasmodic violent emotion are no substitutes for ethical insight and conviction. It is natural to compare and contrast this passage with the conversion of the N.T. Saul (Acts 9).

In this story we are first introduced to the sons of the prophets and the prophetic movement in Israel. These prophets, or "dervishes," as Moffatt translates or paraphrases the word, were bands of enthusiastic devotees, marked off from other men by their hairy mantle, their tattoo-marks or tonsure, who worked up the ecstatic frenzy by dancing, music, and other means. As organized bands we read of them now in connection with the Philistine peril and later in the time of the Syrian wars (1 Kings 22⁶ 2 Kings 23, etc.). They would seem to have been the inspiration and backbone of the national resistance to the oppressor, carrying, as it were, "the fiery cross" from one end of the land to the other. For them religion and patriotism were inseparable.

Prophecy in its later and higher form came to be one of the distinctive elements in the religion of Israel, but the prophetic bands we meet here are part of a much wider movement which had its home in Thrace or Asia Minor. The "seer" appears to be of Semitic origin; not so the prophet; and the Dionysiac or orgiastic character of the prophetic frenzy would seem at first to have shocked the Israelites (see 10^{11f.}). The movement was perhaps Aryan in origin and was possibly connected with the Aryan intoxicating sacred drink (meth, soma, haoma) associated with the moon-cult. It passed into Greece in the worship of Dionysius (Bacchus) and thus became the mother of the Greek tragedy (the word "tragedy" is from the Greek tragos, "a goat"; the goat-skins of the original dancing chorus from which the drama arose may be compared with the Hebrew prophet's hairy mantle). Through the Orphic cults it powerfully influenced the sublime mysticism of Plato; and through Plato, Plotinus, and Pseudo-Dionysius, the whole development of Christian mysticism. The movement passed to India, but there the ecstasy took the form of the absorption of contemplation, passive and ascetic; it seems to have passed to Iran, where Zarathustra (Zoroaster, possibly a contemporary of Saul but probably earlier), himself the closest parallel to the great Hebrew prophets, the enemy of the haoma-drink, seems to have regarded it with contempt.

In Israel it may well have been Samuel, as Kittel thinks, who laid hold upon this essentially un-Hebrew movement and turned it to the service of Israel's religion and Israel's God. In Israel some of the prophets became selfish and mercenary; they earned their bread by giving oracles and performing the functions of the seer in older days (Amos 7¹² Mic. 3⁵). Amos (7¹⁴) and "Zechariah" (13^{3f.}) in particular dissociate themselves from the movement; yet the great Hebrew prophets are connected with these humble origins, even though they had outgrown or largely outgrown the primitive ecstatic elements in it. Finally, we may note that the prophetic movement came to Christianity, largely in its primitive form and from its early home, in the form of Montanism.

The prophetic frenzy was ascribed to the invasion of man's body by God's Spirit or breath. In the Bible we trace this primitive conception of God's Spirit through such passages as Isa. 11^{2f.} 61^{1f.}, to Paul's doctrine of the Holy Spirit. There is always a tendency to see divine inspiration in states of high emotional tension (see notes on 19²⁰). Thus Joubert says of Madame de Staël that "she took the fevers of the soul for its endowments, intoxication for a power, and our aberrations for a progress."

CHAPTER XII

The True Religious Leader. The reference to the sons of Samuel (v. 2) is obscure; presumably the point is that they are men of mature years.

For Bedan, v. 11, read Barak. V. 12 offers a rewriting and noticeable alteration of the story given in the preceding chapter. The wheat harvest (v. 17) took place in May-June.

This passage contains an address put into the mouth of Samuel protesting his innocence and laying down principles for the guidance of king and people in the light of God's dealings with Israel in the past. Whatever may be the historical value of the chapter, its religious significance is considerable, since it reveals the religious outlook and ideals of the age in which it originated. It depicts the true religious leader as one who instructs his people in "the good and the right way," who never ceases to pray for them (v. 23), who never uses his power and influence for his own personal advantage, never does violence to the rights of others or exercises favoritism (v. 3). As such Samuel is depicted. Again, the people can never prosper if they forget their past; and their nationhood is based upon the grace and goodness of God in days of old (vv. 6f.). God has shown special favor unto them; yet the past proves his moral order, and that his hand is heavy upon them when they forsake his ways and his law; but repentance has always been followed by deliverance (vv. 9f.). All past history pleads with them to walk in God's ways in gratitude and godly fear (v. 7). Not liberty primarily, not democracy, not empire must be the motive of the national life, but gratitude to God. The people's destiny depends neither upon wealth nor military preparedness, but on the pure religion of its members (v. 10). To forsake God and his ways is to turn to unprofitable emptiness (v. 21). God will punish sin, but his grace may be depended on forever, for it is his acknowledged purpose to make them a people unto himself, and he cannot allow his purpose to be thwarted in the end (v. 22). Such was "national self-consciousness" in Israel. Is it only with Israel that a prophet might plead all the righteous acts of the Lord which he did to you and to your fathers? (v. 7).

CHAPTERS 13 AND 14: THE VICTORY AT MICHMASH

CHAPTER XIII

A Composite Narrative. The narrative in ch. 13 contains material taken from different sources. Vv. 1-4 give the historical setting. The age of Saul is uncertain. The Hebrew text says that Saul was a year old at his accession; "thirty" in R.V. and "forty" in A.S.V. are alike mere conjectures. Michmash is the key to the mountains of Ephraim from the south. Instead of Gibeah read Geba, and in v. 3 Gibeon for Geba (see on 10¹⁻⁸).

Jonathan raises the standard of revolt by assassinating the prefect (not "garrison") of the Philistines. V. 4 is in the nature of an editorial addition to connect with vv. 7f. Gilgal does not fit this battle, and all the people were not with Saul (see vv. 6, 15, 20).

Vv. 7a-15a, led up to by the editor in 108 and 134, break the narrative. The section reflects relatively late ideas, and apparently is taken from a much later source. According to the earlier custom, Saul as king had a perfect right to offer sacrifice. Only according to later legislation was the offering of sacrifice restricted to the priests. The author of this story knows nothing of Ahijah (143). V. 15b returns to the older narrative, which has no connection with Samuel. In v. 17 spoilers are "detachments," probably a technical term. Vv. 19-22 may again be a later addition, to enhance the extent of the victory. It is not probable that Israel was completely disarmed. V. 21 is so corrupt that no sense can be made of it without radical reconstruction of the text. See further under ch. 14.

CHAPTER XIV

Jonathan's Exploit. 141 returns to the main narrative. It introduces Jonathan's proposal to make an attack upon the Philistine garrison. In v. 2 read Geba; in v. 2 for wearing read carrying (see comment on 228). The plan is carefully outlined by Jonathan; in due time the attack is made and proved successful (vv. 23, 30).

On discovering the flight of the enemy Saul inquired who was missing of his own camp (v. 17). He also sought to determine the further will of his God (v. 18). Apparently, the ephod—so read with LXX instead of the ark—needed manipulating and this took time, for Saul impatiently tells the priest to take his hand away. The instrument might fail to give any oracle at all (v. 37). The silence of the oracle implied the divine displeasure. Saul took steps to discover the cause of the divine wrath. In v. 41 read with LXX, And Saul said, Lord, God of Israel, why hast thou not answered thy servant this day? If the guilt be in me or in my son Jonathan, Lord, God of Israel, give urim; but if thus thou say: It is in my people Israel, give thummim. The urim and thummim were the sacred lots. Both Saul and Jonathan accept the decision by lot as final, and Jonathan professes himself ready to die. In harmony with the cruel custom of the age he would have been put to death, had it not been for the interference of the people. Possibly another victim, human or animal, was substituted.

Vv. 47-51 furnish a summary of Saul's activity. For he vexed them read he was vic- torious (cf. A.S.V. mg.). Presumably these stories of Saul's heroic exploits come from Benjamite traditions. There is no reference to Samuel, and in contrast with the following chapter, Saul's victory over the Amalekites is a subject only of congratulation. Ishvi (v. 49) is Ishbaal. In v. 51 the R.V. marginal reading is to be preferred. Saul failed in the task that David ultimately accomplished, but of Saul's heroic struggle for liberty there should be no doubt. We detect a strong bias against Saul in some of the (presumably) Judean sources.

Teaching of chs. 13 and 14. This section is significant because it points to a religious problem of perennial interest. In the late fragment 137b-15a Saul is represented as careless of the proprieties of religious observance, but in the rest of the narrative, which is doubtless more accurate historically, Saul seems to be depicted as scrupulous, even overscrupulous, in his ritual observances. It is true that in 1410 he seems to lose patience with the priest who is busy with the oracle and bids his followers take advantage of the obvious panic in the Philistine camp. But even here he shows himself perfectly human, for when God delivers the enemy into your hands (or your neighbor is in want), there is no need to spend time seeking divine guidance. The curse pronounced in 1424 against any who should eat during the day may be ascribed to a scruple against the appropriation of any of the booty before the first-fruits had been dedicated to God. Further, Saul's care for ritual matters is shown in his consternation when he finds that the hungry soldiers are eating food that has not been properly slain and prepared (1433). Jonathan, on the other hand, stands for a "common-sense" position (1429); victory is more important than ritual regulation and ceremonial niceties (cf. Mk. 225f.). This may be taken as a higher point of view; but it is not clear whether the author's sympathies here are on this side. At any rate, once Saul has made eating tabu, God is angry when the tabu is broken (1437); even Jonathan does not protest against his fate, and the proposed night attack is dutifully abandoned (1446).

To divine God's will by means of chance remarks made by the enemy, 149f., may not be a very spiritual proceeding, but it is here connected with the Hebrew conviction that the issues of all things are in the hands of God, and God is equally able "to save by many or by few."

CHAPTER XV

1-9. War Against Amalek. The divine command carries out the law of retaliation (see Ex.

178-16 Deut. 25^{17f.}). Utterly destroy (v. 3) means consecrate utterly, make over to God by destroying. Saul does not hesitate to undertake the campaign, but he did not carry out the instruction to destroy utterly man and beast. The Kenites, or sons of Cain, were zealous worshippers of Israel's God, perhaps wearing a special "Jehovah mark" upon their foreheads; they were old allies of Israel. Amalek was not in fact annihilated (see 1 Sam. 30¹ 1 Chr. 4⁴³, etc.).

10-35. Saul Rejected for His Disobedience. Samuel, as the representative of Jehovah, could not keep silent in the presence of Saul's disobedience. Carmel was located south of Hebron. Saul set up a monument shaped like a hand (v. 12, mg.), or with a hand carved on it; a number of such monuments are known. To save the animals for sacrificial purposes would seem to deserve commendation. But the people may have been interested even more in the feast accompanying the sacrifice. The prophet recognizes no sin greater than disobedience to Jehovah. For rebellion is the sin of witchcraft, and self-will is the guilt of teraphim (v. 23). Whether teraphim were family gods, or waxen ancestral images, or idols, or oracular instruments, or healing talismans, or skulls, or sacred masks—all of which identifications have been suggested—we cannot say. They seem to have been of Syrian or Canaanite origin like the ephod. Instead of delicately, v. 32 (A.S.V., "cheerfully"), read perhaps trembling; for the bitterness of death is past perhaps death is bitter. The slaying before the Lord indicates that it was a solemn sacrificial slaying. With v. 35 of 1924.

This narrative indicates the breach between Saul, the leader of the political party, and Samuel, the leader of the prophetic party. It is a curious mixture of primitive barbarism and sublime religion. The ferocious Samuel hewing Agag in pieces before the Lord is less attractive, if closer to history, than earlier pictures of him. On the other hand, the great saying in v. 22 contains the quintessence of the prophetic teaching: in religion it is the spirit, not the outward sacramental expression, which really matters. But the sublimity of this thought does not involve, as some have thought, that it must be a later addition under the influence of the great prophets, for a thousand years before this an Egyptian thinker had written, "Righteousness of the heart is better than the sacrifice of an ox brought by an unrighteous man."

It is in this chapter that we probably have the most authentic portrait of Samuel. The sin for which Saul is rejected is given as self-will or disobedience, perhaps aggravated by sacrilege; but the quarrel between Samuel and Saul had deeper roots than this one incident. Saul was ceasing to prove the mere tool of the prophetic-nationalist party; we may say perhaps that he exercised reasonable prudence in showing some moderation in his treatment of Amalek; to have slaughtered all his prisoners would have meant the impossibility of peace with the Amalekite tribes. But Samuel stands for the old-fashioned, fierce, inexorable ways of warfare in the desert in the time of Moses; there must be no accommodations for the sake of prudence and statecraft; disobedience to the absolute demands of the ban was to be repudiated as utterly as anything connected with Canaanite worship (the teraphim, which Samuel assumes to be illegitimate). See further on 2 Sam. 1.

CHAPTER XVI

1-13. David is Anointed by Samuel. These verses continue the narrative of the previous chapter. David is represented as a lad, the youngest in the home of Jesse, altogether unknown to fame, when the seer under the divine inspiration anoints him king in Saul's stead.

14-23. David is Introduced to Saul. In marked distinction from the preceding, David is here represented as a tried soldier, a musician and a story-teller. In ch. 17 he is again the shepherd lad, unknown and unhonored. These verses are the first of two different accounts of David's introduction to Saul; there is no reason to doubt their historical accuracy. Saul was troubled with some form of melancholia; his prowess, daring, and kingly power, gifts of the spirit of the Lord, left him, and an evil spirit, regarded as a "visitation" upon him for his sin, preyed upon him (see further on ch. 20). By the simple gift sent to Saul, Jesse at once bound himself to the king and the king to him.

The chapter raises difficult literary questions. There is no reason for doubting the historicity of the account in vv. 14-23, but neither this account nor the narrative in ch. 17 is consistent with the view that David has already been anointed as Saul's successor. But even though the historical value of vv. 1-13 may be open to question, the religious teaching in the whole chapter is perfectly plain. The author or editor believed that " . . behind the dim unknown.

Standeth God within the shadow, keeping watch above his own."

David's gradual superseding of Saul was no chance matter; when no one thought anything of David, God who knows men's hearts had chosen him and put his spirit upon him (v. 13), giving him a kingly soul. But there is here no doctrine of immutable predestination. David was chosen to receive the spirit because he was worthy (v. 7), and Saul who had been chosen was rejected because of his "rebellion." Phil. 2¹³ gives the same idea in Christian form. Note, further, that though Saul's melancholia was regarded as sent by God, yet a remedy is also sent by God through music "that gentlier on the spirit lies than tired eyelids upon tired eyes."

CHAPTERS 17 TO 20: THE BEGINNING OF DAVID'S ADVENTURES

CHAPTER XVII

David Overcomes the Philistine Goliath. 17¹ opens the second account of David's introduction to Saul: David is a stripling, unknown to Saul and to fame (contrast 16¹⁸⁻²³). It is interesting to note that there is an Egyptian tale of Sinuhe telling of his exploits in Palestine about 2000 B.C., closely parallel to the story of David and Goliath. In 2 Sam. 21¹⁹ we are told that Goliath was slain by Elhanan (see also 1 Chr. 20⁵). The Philistines gathered in the mountainous country due west of Bethlehem. Goliath's armor was not unlike that of a Greek warrior. The Philistines probably came to Palestine from Crete, and they were not unconnected with the early migrations which issued in the Greeks of the historical period; they may be said to represent the early contact of Europe with the Hebrew race.

12. This appears to be a fresh introduction of David, without reference to ch. 16. 18. Pledge, i.e., of their welfare. 29. Presumably "it is not a matter of importance." 39. Proved means "tried." 52. For Gai read Gath, which was not far west. 54. The reference to Jerusalem is late. (See 2 Sam. 5^{6f.}). 55. This is inconsistent with 16¹⁴⁻²³.

Heroic contests of the kind described here are common in many literatures, but the nuance given by the Hebrew writer is peculiar. David's concern throughout is for the honor of his God (v. 36); he ascribes his deliverances in the past and his confidence for the future, not to his prowess, but to the power of God (vv. 45f.). The omnipotence of God is accepted, speculatively by us, but practically by the Hebrews. Cf. Isaiah's doctrine of faith (Isa. 79 28¹⁶ 30¹⁵⁻²¹).

CHAPTER XVIII

1-5. The Friendship of David and Jonathan. This is one of the most beautiful incidents in all literature. In Hebrew thought the family makes a psychic unity; similarly, the friendship of David and Jonathan makes them psychically one. Henceforward in Jonathan's soul there is the conflict of loyalties between friendship and family (see on ch. 20). Jonathan's clothes and armor were part of his "soul"; these he gave to David. Similarly, Elisha takes up the mantle of Elijah (2 Kings 2¹³), and in the sixth book of the Iliad, Diomed and Glaucus publicly exchange armor.

6-30. Saul's Jealousy of David. It did not take long to arouse Saul's jealousy against David. The song, sung antiphonally by the women, could not have been composed early in David's career. The song was not necessarily a taunt at Saul; David's victories were Saul's victories while David served him. Nevertheless, it recognized David's superiority. Saul, moody and morbid, was easily carried to extremes. 10. For prophesied read behaved like a madman. This story is repeated, presumably from another source, in 19^{9f.} In 2 Sam. 21⁸, apparently the same man named in v. 19 is described as Michal's husband. It seems that etiquette required that Saul should not take the initiative (v. 22). See further under ch. 19.

CHAPTER XIX

1-17. Saul in Jealousy Seeks to Kill David. David, it appears, would overhear the conversation. H. P. Smith thinks that in the original story this attempt on David's life was on the night after his wedding with Michal. For v. 13 see on 15²³. Pillow of goats (v. 16)—Reimpell suggests a mosquito-net or wig. Michal pleads that her life would have been in danger had she prevented David (v. 17).

Teaching of chs. 18 and 19. The editor's interest in this section is in the inevitable way in which God's repudiation of Saul and blessing of David work out. Saul by virtue of God's Spirit had delivered Jabesh and vanquished the Philistines and had been regal in soul and power; but now he was rejected; his power was gone; he was a less successful warrior than David (18⁷); and Saul realized this (18²⁸); Saul had no personal grudge against David, therefore he could be reconciled to him (18¹⁷); but he was bound to hate him in his struggle against the inevitable. David meanwhile has won the affection of Jonathan and of Michal; all the king's efforts to trap him are unsuccessful or rebound to David's glory, for the Lord is with him. These narratives, therefore, are the stuff of a great tragedy such as the Greek tragedians loved to deal with. But the Hebrew writer is less fatalistic than the Greek, for Saul's rejection is his own fault; in God's world the fault, as in King Lear, brings its inevitable doom with it. Saul is not the wicked man; he is the heroic figure who yet has missed his destiny and wrecked his life through self-will (see further on 1 Sam. 28, 2 Sam. 1).

18-24. David Compelled to Flee. To escape Saul's anger, David first took refuge with Samuel. These verses appear to be late, giving a second explanation of the famous proverb (v. 24) found also in 10¹². The supernatural protection of David here described is very different from the stories of his hard struggles against odds through long years of which we read in the succeeding chapters. Naioth is probably not the name of a village but some building, possibly the prophetic school in Ramah. The tradition which connects Samuel with the prophets, and the prophets with the founding of the Hebrew monarchy, is probably accurate. Prophesied means "fell into the prophetic frenzy" (v. 20). We can see from this and v. 24 how little of religious worth there was in this experience by itself, but all later mysticisms in all religions that lead to the ecstatic trance without issuing in any deeper understanding or ethical insight are of the same sort. These ecstatic feeling-states are often surrounded by a halo or seeming spiritual exaltation, but in reality they belong to the most primitive stages of religion, if to religion at all (see on ch. 11).

CHAPTER XX

The Covenant Established Between David and Jonathan. The first part of v. 1 is an editorial note connecting with the preceding. The subsequent story cannot be from the same source as 19¹¹⁻¹⁷, for in that case there could be no doubt of Saul's intentions in the minds of David and Jonathan. The festival of the new moon was always a solemn observance (v. 5). Since v. 10 implies that David and Jonathan cannot safely be seen together, v. 11 may be an interpolation. A somewhat clearer translation of v. 13, suggested by H. P. Smith, would be: But if there be evil, God do so to Jonathan and more also if I bring the evil upon thee; but I will uncover thine ear. . . .

Jonathan appears to be convinced that ultimately David will sit upon the throne of Israel. A better translation of vv. 14, 15 would be . . . kindness of the Lord; and if I die, thou shalt not cut off . . . for ever. The rest of v. 15 and v. 16 is obscure; perhaps, and when the Lord hath . . . of the earth, if the name of Jonathan should be cut off from the house of David, let the Lord require it at David's hand. Saul appears to think (v. 30) that Jonathan has connived at David's escape upon a mere pretext. Vv. 40-42 appear to be a later addition; for the point of the shooting was that David was in hiding and Jonathan could not meet him personally. In v. 41 follow the margin.

Some of the tragic pathos of the idyllic friendship between David and Jonathan is lost upon us because in modern times the bonds of family have grown relatively loose. The modern point of view is put by Juliet:

"'Tis but thy name that is my enemy;
Thou art thyself, though not a Montague.
What's Montague? it is nor hand, nor foot,
Nor arm, nor face, nor any other part Belonging to a man. O, be some other name!"

This is modern because of its individualism; a name is a title only, not a reality. No Hebrew could speak like that. The name is the person; those who bear the same name share in the same soul. If two men whose families are at enmity have entered into a covenant with one another, they have by that covenant created an inward conflict for themselves that hardly admits of a solution (see on 18¹⁻⁵). We understand the situation better on the national scale. Jonathan's friendship with David was a sort of treason. Yet Jonathan is not blameworthy for this; though David is his brother, he must die fighting by his father's side, and bear the taunts of his father (v. 20) as one who had brought shame on the family soul; for the greatness of his family lay in the royal state and eminence in Israel, which his love for David has prejudiced (see on 22¹).

Some modern scholars have supposed that David was really guilty of treasonable intentions. But David's loyalty seems sufficiently attested by his unbroken friendship with Jonathan and by the dirge he wrote when Saul and Jonathan had fallen on Mount Gilboa (2 Sam. 1^{18f.}). If, however, there had been a breach between Saul and the prophetic party represented by Samuel, and if the Philistine war was not prospering, and if Saul was largely incapacitated from the kingship by reason of his melancholia, it is not impossible that many would wish that another might take the reins from his failing grasp; that other would surely be Jonathan, the hero of Michmash. If this were so (but it is only a guess), David may well have favored the movement; but there is nothing to prove or make likely his disloyalty to Saul or Jonathan.

Saul did not die insane; his "madness" showed itself in fits of deep melancholia and in outbursts of ungovernable temper; it led him to suspect those about him and to break with his best friends. It was not inconsistent with a real devotion to the Lord's cause and with steadfastness and courage in the work he had undertaken. It is the kind of "madness" that is often found among religious people and has ruined and embittered many lives. This melancholia and jealousy are the marks of a man whose interest is still largely centered in himself; music might soothe him for a time, fits of repentance might follow fits of temper, but there was no real healing for him unless he could win real and complete freedom by being lost in a cause, by an enthusiasm for others which could burn up all smaller and pettier concerns. No Scriptures more surely than the story of Saul were written for our learning.

CHAPTERS 21 TO 27: FURTHER ADVENTURES OF DAVID

CHAPTER XXI

1-9. David in Flight; Assisted by Ahimelech. In his flight David appears at Nob, just north of Gibeon, without escort, food or arms; Ahimelech is anxious to know what such a visit may mean. This story seems to follow immediately after 19¹¹⁻¹⁷. Nob may have been the Gibeonite sanctuary (see 2 Sam. 21¹⁻¹⁴). The tradition that Ahimelech was descended from Eli may not be reliable. The soldier's task was to fight the wars of the Lord; therefore while on active service he was in a specially holy state, or, as we might say, was temporarily "in holy orders," which involved among other things abstinence from sexual indulgence. If David and his men, says the priest, have been loyal to these prescriptions there is no reason why they should not have the shew-bread. David satisfies the priest on this point; but his answer is obscure, and the text uncertain. The office that Doeg held at the court is uncertain.

10-15. David Feigns Madness at Gath. Pursued by Saul, David takes refuge with the king of Gath, in Philistia. That David ultimately became the vassal of the Philistines is sure; but this passage, which is a variant of 27^{1f.}, is out of place here. David would not go straight to Gath with Goliath's sword. That the passage is late seems indicated also by the strange reference to David as king in v. 11. It was written, suggests Gressmann, by someone who disliked the idea of David dwelling among the enemy and made a jest of it—as if there were not enough lunatics already among the Philistines! See further under ch. 24.

CHAPTER XXII

1-5. David's Regard for His Family. David had to look out not only for himself but also for his family. For cave read stronghold. Adullam was located some twelve miles southwest of Jerusalem. If David was in disgrace at court, his family at home would be in danger; a man and his family were one, each member of the family being, as it were, a manifestation or incorporation of the common family soul. This sense of family and racial solidarity lies behind Paul's teaching of the unity of the race in Adam and of the new race in Christ (see Dodd, The Meaning of Paul for To-day, ch. 8). David appears to have had Moabite blood in his veins (Ruth 4²¹; see also on 2 Sam. 8²).

6-23. Saul's Vengeance on the Priests at Nob. When Saul learned that the priests at Nob had helped David he swore vengeance upon them. For in Ramah read on the height. Saul is surrounded by Benjamites; he was presumably little more than the Benjamite chieftain, recognized as king by Israel as a whole only for purposes of war. He appeals to Benjamite prejudices and jealousies; upon Benjamite loyalty at least he might hope to depend. Saul's massacre of the priests at Nob would seem to be the ferocious act of a man out of his mind (v. 18). Possibly he suspected these priests of being involved in a conspiracy in favor of David (or Jonathan); see on ch. 20. The tradition that the priests of Nob were descended from Eli is open to suspicion; perhaps more probably they were the local priests of Gibeon, and if so, the Gibeonites later exacted a fearful vengeance. (See 2 Sam. 21.) For Nob, v. 19, read (very probably) Gibeon (see on 10¹⁻⁸). In safeguard (v. 23)—cared for like a precious object intrusted to David's safekeeping. See further under ch. 24.

CHAPTER XXIII

Saul Pursues David. Saul gave David no rest; he pursued him from place to place. Keilah—a little town south of Adullam. Vv. 3, 4 were chosen by John Robinson for his text on the day of prayer and humiliation when the news came that permission was granted to settle in Virginia. The ephod (v. 9) is here the instrument of divination, not a garment as in 22¹⁸. See further under ch. 24.

CHAPTER XXIV

David Spares Saul's Life at En-Gedi. A narrative of an incident similar to one related in ch. 26: Saul falls into the power of David, who shows his magnanimity by sparing his life. The two chapters may represent two revisions of the same story; the one in ch. 26 may be closer to the original.

Teaching of chs. 21-24. This wonderfully graphic section consists of a number of disconnected stories of Saul's enmity against David and David's adventures. We read that "Jonathan strengthened David's hand in God" (23¹⁶), which means, "in the assurance that God was with him"; and the editor tells these stories to show how God was with David and what manner of man David was. By an excellent stratagem David overcame the hesitation of the priest at Nob and got not only food but an incomparable sword (211-9). Doom visits the innocent township of Nob, but David's obligations are satisfied by his care of Abiathar, the one survivor (2220-23). Another fine exploit is his tricking of the Philistines. Once David escaped almost by a miracle (2326f.). We are shown also David's religious scruples. Just as Saul's bodyguard declined to slay the sacred priests (2217), so David will not put forth his hand against the Lord's anointed. In the thought of ancient and, to some extent, modern times, the divinity that hedged a king is not a mere sentiment of respect but a divine reality. To lay hands on the king was to lay hands on one in a special relationship to God, a holy person; therefore it was sacrilege. In these democratic days we are learning to look behind the uniform and consider the man; we have little respect for titles and offices; but the real sublimation of David's scruple would seem to be the realization that every person, as man, has a special relationship to God, and therefore must never, either in business or in war or in pleasure, be treated as a pawn in the game. A rather different idea is seen in 2418f., where Saul recognizes that God delivered him into David's hand and that David, but for his generous magnanimity, might have slain him. Here David illustrates the Christian maxim, "Love your enemies."

CHAPTER XXV

The Folly of Nabal; David Marries Abigail. The relation of David to Nabal and the marriage of David to Abigail are here described at length. Carmel is the modern Kurmul, south of Ziph. In view of the fact that David was at the head of a band of freebooters the claim made in v. 7 is rather remarkable. David would also seem to have protected Nabal from other freebooters (v. 16). Some recognition was due to him. A good day (v. 8) is a feast day. Instead of unto the enemies of David (v. 22) read, with some of the ancient translations, unto David. Nabal means "fool." H. P. Smith suggests that the remark in v. 25 is as if she said his name was Brutus and he a brute. A present like the one referred to in v. 27 is in Hebrew called a "blessing," for it has a sacramental character (see on ch. 2). Perhaps in v. 37 a stroke is intended, and in the next verse a second. By his marriage to Abigail the outlaw David acquired social status and importance as a Calebite sheikh.

Nabal's name was Fool, and Folly was his nature. Nabal could be cheerful and expansive, it would seem, on occasion and when he was the center of the picture (v. 36), but with his wife and with his neighbors he was a churl and sullen as a mule; but not every Nabal has a wife like Abigail to save him from his folly. David was justly incensed at Nabal's discourtesy, and murder was in his heart; but he realized that this revenge would have been, to use Disraeli's phrase, "a just and unnecessary war," an offense to God; it is no part of a man's duty to stand upon his rights and avenge insults in this way; "Vengeance belongeth unto me," saith the Lord, "I will repay."

CHAPTER XXVI

David's Magnanimity. This narrative of David's magnanimity is generally supposed to be a different version of the same event as is described in ch. 24. If this is the case, we cannot be sure which account is nearer the facts; but there is something to be said in favor of the originality of the narrative in this chapter. For flea in v. 20 read my life. For the interpretation of the narrative, see under ch. 27.

CHAPTER XXVII

David Serves Achish, King of Gath. David, despairing of safety in Judah, enters the service of Achish, king of Gath. Perhaps Achish did not entirely trust David, and so sent him against the desert nomads rather than directly against Saul. Geshurites is almost certainly, and Girzites or Gizrites probably, a mistake; perhaps read upon the cattlefolds of the Hagrites and the Amalekites (v. 8). The Hagrites would be the descendants of Hagar. If David keeps his promise to his overlord, he is to be set over the king's bodyguard.

Teaching of chs. 26 and 27. In a literary sense, this section is not homogeneous, but the editor so uses his sources as to show the history, character, and religious ideas of David. We see how "primitive" in many regards was David's religious outlook and that of the writer who took him for his hero. David spares Saul's life on the ground that Saul, as the Lord's anointed, is a sacred and inviolable person (269). Again, personal vengeance is not for man; God will deal with the offender in his own way and his own good time (cf. 1 Cor. 5⁶, where Satan is the Lord's minister). To venture into the king's camp was an exploit of much risk and only accomplished by God's help (2612).

David, after taunting Abner (2615), protests his innocence to the king, and asks why he is thus treated; he lays no blame on the king, but ascribes the king's conduct to instigation either from God or from ill-disposed persons. If God is responsible, then it must be in his own inscrutable and arbitrary purpose, for David has done nothing to deserve it. But if God is angry for some reason or other, it will not be difficult to placate him; let him "smell a sacrifice"; i.e., let him accept a gift as apology and compensation, and let the incident be closed (26¹⁹ mg.). This is the most primitive form of expiation. The prophets later saw that even the sacrifice of man's most precious possession could not avail to wipe out sin, that God would be satisfied by no external act; he would be reconciled only to a man who did justly and loved mercy and walked humbly with him (Mic. 68). In the N.T. we come to an altogether new and different conception of religion—that God is reconciled with man already, and that it is for man to be reconciled with God by accepting his forgiveness and his will (2 Cor. 5¹⁸⁻²⁰).

If, on the other hand, it is men who have set Saul against David, David prays that the Lord's curse may be on them, for in banishing him from the Lord's own territory they have in effect told him to serve other gods, for only as a member of a community has one access to God; an individual cannot stand by himself; therefore, if a man went to live among a strange people, he would have to do homage to that people's gods (26¹⁹). It would seem to follow (though the conclusion is not drawn by the editor) that when a little later David became the vassal of Achish (27²), he must have worshiped the Philistine gods. It was the supreme achievement of the prophetic religion to discover that fellowship with God does not depend upon any place or temple or sacrament but is a matter of the heart, a personal relationship to God independent of place or circumstance (Jer. 29¹⁻¹⁴). The astonishing principle that religion is a matter of locality was apparently accepted by the Lutherans at Augsburg in 1555 A.D., when it was expressed in the formula cuius regio eius religio ("A man's religion goes with his region"), and to this day the King of England is an Episcopalian in England and a Presbyterian in Scotland.

It is plain that in spite of David's valor and prowess and occasional triumphs his position as an outlaw was impossible; he had no option but to become the vassal of the national enemy, the Philistines. Later ages were uneasy about this and, as in 21^{10f.}, loved to show his cleverness and how he tricked and spoiled the Philistines, as if his vassalage were a triumph rather than a humiliation. Once David had submitted to the Philistines he was safe from Saul (27⁴). In 27⁵ we see David's cunning; his request has the appearance of humility; in reality it is to further his designs. David is not regarded as deserving censure but praise for his lie to Achish when he told him that he had been engaged in forays against the men of Judah and their kindred. "God has given us tongues," said Heine, unkindly, of the French, "in order that we may say pleasant things to our fellow men." A man must have a "single eye" and no fear in his heart if he is to speak the truth. Once again David is too clever for Achish.

CHAPTER XXVIII

1, 2. David and Achish. David seems to promise Achish unlimited allegiance, but his heart's purposes are other.

3-25. The Story of the Witch of Endor. In fear of the Philistines Saul sought divine guidance. When he received no reply he turned for counsel to necromancy. Of the death of Samuel we have heard already in ch. 25. Saul had put away the 'oboth and "adepts." The 'oboth were spirits (in modern psychical language "controls," or objects used in necromancy). This form of divination was forbidden to Israel, presumably because it came from heathendom and could not be brought into relation with the God of Israel. Here again we see that Saul had been a scrupulous defender of Israel's religion. The urim and thummim would always give a Yes or No answer; therefore, if the urim are mentioned here (v. 6), the meaning must be that Saul could get no favorable answer. But since there is no mention of urim in v. 15, it is perhaps to be regarded as an addition here. Saw Samuel (v. 12), seems wrong. We should understand either that the name "Samuel" aroused the woman's suspicions, and then when she saw, or looked more closely at Saul, she recognized him, or that when she began to go into the trance, she knew that her interlocutor was the king himself. The word translated god or gods in v. 13 seems to mean no more than "a supernatural figure" or "spirit"; the departed are perhaps called "gods" because of their power over men. The essence of magic as opposed to true religion is that it exercises or claims to exercise a compulsive power over the other world.

Saul is not the villain of a melodrama but the central figure in a tragedy. His inspiration and sense of divine mission and divine good pleasure fail him just when once again he must fight for his life and the life of his people against the enemy. Saul is not afraid; he will do his duty; he will die with his face to the foe; his bitterness lies not in his outward lot but in the sense that God has rejected him; not a word will God speak to him of counsel or of comfort. In his desperation he turns to sources of illumination which in his happier and more glorious days he had condemned as illegitimate. The antique phraseology should not hide from us the fact that under these circumstances Saul did what so many in like case have done in recent years; he turned to spiritism. The "witch" of Endor was a "medium." A medium has the gift of reading or "tapping" what is in the mind, often the unconscious mind, of the person to whom she gives a sitting. She presumably goes into a trance and so describes the figure she sees that Saul recognizes that it is Samuel. She gives, as coming from Samuel, the answer to Saul which we should antecedently have expected anyone familiar with the situation to give, and Saul is prostrated in despair; only with difficulty is he persuaded to take food, and he goes into the battle a doomed man, knowing that he will be slain himself and, worse, his family will be blotted out also, and Israel will be defeated by the enemy.

We need not doubt that the phenomena of the spiritualist seance were familiar in Israel as they have been familiar in many parts of the world and many ages in Shamanism and other forms. A problem lies in the fact that Saul apparently did not doubt that he was actually in touch with Samuel, while he regarded the conjuring up of Samuel as an illegitimate practice. In these days it will be difficult to persuade men that if they can get into touch with the departed, it is wrong for them to do so. Into spiritistic claims it is impossible to enter here. Those who do not believe that converse with the departed is established will note that Samuel in the seance only says to Saul what his own conscience is presumed to have been telling him already; they will say, therefore, that the medium is only reading his unconscious thoughts. Those who believe in spiritism, on the other hand, will perhaps note that in this spirit-message there is much more of ethical and religious content than we have grown accustomed to expect.

CHAPTER XXIX

Achish Compelled to Dismiss David. David, mistrusted by the Philistine princes, is sent home by Achish. The word for adversary (v. 4), is "Satan" in the Hebrew. The Philistine leaders suggest that by treason to the Philistine cause David would have an admirable opportunity of being reconciled with Saul. Clearly, the writer of this narrative did not know the story that David had slain Goliath. After the words that are come with thee (v. 10) LXX adds, "and go to the place where I appointed you, and set no bitter (or pestilential) thought in thy heart, for in my sight thou art good." See further under ch. 30.

CHAPTER XXX

David Avenges an Amalekite Raid. When David reached home he found that the Amalekites had plundered Ziklag; he pursued and utterly defeated them. The captives were presumably to be sold in the Egyptian slave-market. David was perhaps to blame for leaving the town insufficiently guarded. The Besor (v. 9) flows into the sea south of Gaza. Of the next day (v. 17) must be a mistake, but the original text cannot be restored with certainty. V. 20 is unintelligible as it stands; perhaps the original stated that David's spoil consisted not only of the persons and flocks stolen from Ziklag but much other booty as well. David makes good and diplomatic use of his booty; he employs it for ingratiating himself with the sheikhs of Judah and of kindred tribes. Their acceptance of the gift (blessing) would bind them to David for the future. Bethel or Bethuel (v. 27) is in the neighborhood of Ziklag (Josh. 194). It is not the Bethel of Jacob (Gen. 2819).

Twice in chs. 29, 30 we see David in a very awkward predicament, and on each occasion he issues from it triumphant. We cannot tell what his plans were had he been compelled to take the field against Saul; not only does he escape from that dilemma but he leaves the camp loaded with compliments from his overlord. On his return home he is nearly stoned by his followers for the disaster that has overtaken Ziklag; for a moment, we understand, he was overwhelmed, but he strengthened himself in the Lord his God (v. 6). This phrase, like the earlier phrase that Jonathan strengthened David's hand in God (23¹⁶), is the kind of expression used by men who know what it is to stand alone or nearly alone against the world in the consciousness of right and of God's favor. No man has really found religion for himself who cannot, when his back is to the wall, strengthen himself in the Lord his God. The N.T. parallel is "The Lord stood by me" (2 Tim. 4¹⁷). David's character and sense of fair play are shown in the regulation of vv. 24f. The writer clearly did not know the (presumably later) tradition that this ordinance came from Moses (Num. 31²⁷).

CHAPTER XXXI

The First Account of Saul's Death. (Cf. 2 Sam. 15-16.) This chapter continues the narrative from 28²⁵. Saul entered the conflict without hope. The LXX states that Saul was wounded in the stomach. The context requires something like this. Saul is wounded and is afraid of falling alive into the hands of the Philistines. V. 4 as it stands is unintelligible; the Philistines would not abuse him, i.e., mutilate and desecrate his body after death any the less because his armor-bearer had slain him. Omit, therefore, the words and thrust me through after lest these uncircumcised come, and understand by abuse such treatment as, for instance, Samson received at the hands of the Philistines (Judg. 16²⁵). The news of the victory has to be brought to the Philistine gods in their temples. We may compare with this the way in which Hezekiah took the Assyrian letter into the Temple to "spread it out" before the Lord (2 Kings 19¹⁴). For burnt them (v. 12) read probably raised the dirge. Cremation was not an Israelite custom; and by their bones in the next verse we are hardly to understand charred bones. The tamarisk tree was undoubtedly a well-known sacred tree. See further under 2 Sam. 1.

SECOND SAMUEL

CHAPTER I

1-16. A Second Account of Saul's Death. The account is derived from a different source from that used for 1 Sam. 31. An Amalekite brings the news of Saul's death to David at Ziklag, claiming to have slain him. David and his men mourn the death of Saul, and the messenger and alleged slayer is put to death. It was usual for kings to go into battle in their regalia. It is not likely that, if the account of Saul's death in the previous chapter is authentic, an Amalekite would have chanced to find the dead Saul and make off with the crown and bracelet. If, therefore, the Amalekite did, in fact, bring these things to David, his own account of Saul's death is the more probable. The two narratives are in some parts irreconcilable. Gressmann accepts vv. 1-4, 8, 11, and 12 as an ancient and credible tradition; the other verses he regards as later and unhistorical.

17-27. David's Dirge Over the Death of Saul and Jonathan. This is one of the most beautiful elegies in all literature. There is no cogent reason why we should doubt David's authorship of it. The text of v. 18 is corrupt; and the meaning, especially of the first part of the verse, must remain uncertain. It is generally thought that the first part gives the first lines of the song. The book of Jashar is the book of the Upright, possibly Jehovah; or, if the reference is to men, the book of the Heroes. The reference is presumably a marginal note that has come into the text. Perhaps we should read . . . and said (the sons of Judah should be taught it; it is to be found in the Book of Heroes). The same book is mentioned in Josh. 10¹³ as a collection of poetry.

The text of the dirge appears to be corrupt in several places and the meaning is not always clear. Following the announcement of the theme (v. 19) the author deprecates the spread of the news, for it will cause the enemies to rejoice; he pronounces a curse upon Mount Gilboa, where the heroes were slain; he glorifies the departed warriors and exhorts the daughters of Israel to lament and closes with an expression of his personal bereavement in the death of Jonathan. Neither fields of offerings (v. 21) is unintelligible. Perhaps treacherous fields or fields of death. The second part of the verse is obscure; the reference apparently is to the armor growing tarnished and rusty upon the battlefield. For delicately (v. 24) read and with linen. V. 25 should possibly be omitted; it is either corrupt or a mere variant of v. 19. V. 26 means, probably, man's love for woman, not vice versa.

Some of the traditions incorporated in Samuel show a strong bias against Saul and the brief Benjamite monarchy; but in this chapter and elsewhere we find for the most part a kindlier and doubtless juster judgment. The tragedy on Mount Gilboa is lightened by the action of the men of Jabesh (1 Sam. 31¹¹⁻¹³), who remember Saul's early prowess and the hopes of his first days, and by David's noble tribute; Saul, he says, like Jonathan, was beloved and worthy of love; he was an heroic warrior, swifter than an eagle, stronger than a lion (vv. 22f.). Yet, says the editor, inasmuch as Saul failed in his task, God rejected him; his sin is said to have been "rebellion" (1 Sam. 15²³) or self-will; he could not distinguish between God's will for him and what he thought God's will ought to have been. That this confusion should have arisen is not altogether strange in view of the environment in which Saul placed himself. Beyond doubt many lives of high promise and power have been rendered futile by just such self-will and unteachableness.

David's elegy shows him to have been a true poet. The claim made by many commentators that the poem is entirely without religious content is just only insofar as there is no reference to God or to religion. But when we reflect that in David's references to Saul there is not one word of bitterness or resentment at his own treatment, not a shadow of relief or satisfaction, we must conclude that the author must have been a man whose outlook was fundamentally religious in that he was delivered from personal pettiness and all that savored of mere personal ambition.

CHAPTERS 2 TO 6: DAVID KING OF JUDAH

CHAPTER II

1-4. David Becomes King at Hebron. Gradually David had come to be recognized as the outstanding hero of Judah. It is not strange, therefore, that after the death of Saul he should be made king of his own tribe. Hebron was in the heart of the country that was well disposed toward David, difficult to reach from the coast, and, unlike Bethlehem which he might have chosen, out of reach of the fortress of Jerusalem. While it was a new thing for a tribe to have a "king," his tribesmen may have hoped that David would found a Judean monarchy to take the place of the Benjamite rule of Saul. David remained a Philistine vassal for the present. As the friend of Achish he was the safest leader of Judah, and if the war with the Philistines was to be taken up anew, who could lead them as David could? On the other hand, would it be safe to arouse the enmity of a strong leader like David?

5-11. The Gileadites Make Ish-bosheth Their King. The message sent to the Gileadites would please the friends of Saul; but they were not ready to turn to David as their ruler. They made Ish-bosheth (v. 10) or Ishbaal (1 Chr. 8:33), the only surviving son of Saul, king over North Israel. All the initiative is with Abner; Ishbaal—for that was his proper name—seems to have been only a boy. Mahanaim, the new capital, was located across the Jordan, and would be safe from David and the Philistines. While Ishbaal is called king of Israel, actually he seems to have reigned only over his Benjamite following. He also, we may suppose, would have to recognize Philistine suzerainty.

12-32. Abner's Opposition to David. (See also 31.) It was inevitable that the two kingdoms should soon come into conflict. Of the many battles fought one is related at length, the battle of Gibeon, because of its bearing on later history. It is commonly assumed that Abner was the aggressor, but since the battle was fought in Benjamite territory it is not impossible that David and his men were the offenders. The proposition of a tournament in which individual skill and valor might be tested is in line with Oriental custom.

Asahel's motive in pursuing Abner, and Abner alone (v. 19), was the desire for the glory that would accrue to him from slaying so notable a warrior. Abner's unwillingness to kill Asahel is presumably his realization that such an act, however justifiable, would involve a blood-feud with Asahel's family, which in its turn would make a general pacification more difficult. Abner apparently intended to wound, not to kill. But for Abner's appeal (v. 26), which was in effect an appeal for quarter, the pursuit, says Joab, would have gone on till next day. The continuation of the battle would have meant practically the wiping out of Israel or at least of Benjamin; from this the conscience of Judah might well recoil. If all the young men of Benjamin were destroyed, then the soul of Benjamin would be destroyed; Benjamin would be murdered. Individual life was cheap in ancient Israel, but the annihilation of a whole tribe or family was regarded much as we regard murder. The Arabah (v. 29) is the Jordan Valley. We can gauge the magnitude of the combat from the fact that the casualties were only some three hundred and eighty men.

CHAPTER III

1-11. The Weakening of the House of Saul. Events moved rapidly toward a reunion of Israel and Judah under David. Before taking up the events culminating in the reunion the editor inserts the names of six sons of David born to him by as many wives in Hebron. Abner, conscious of his power, trespassed on the prerogative of his king, and a quarrel ensues. The successor to the throne was naturally heir to his predecessor's harem. Abner's act was therefore treasonable.

12-19. Abner Proposes Submission to David. Thwarted in his desires, Abner opened negotiations with David for the submission of all Israel. David insists on the return of Michal; she is brought back and Abner continues his scheme. V. 12 is not quite clear. Perhaps, all Israel is at my disposal to give it to whomsoever I will. The restoration of Michal would give David standing as Saul's heir. "Usurpers," says Matthew Henry, "must expect to resign"; but Paltiel was innocent according to the ideas of the time. The idea of the permanence of the home was a spiritual achievement that came late.

20-39. Abner Completes Negotiations with David. When Joab, absent from Hebron at the time, returned he bitterly complained because David had not caused the death of Abner. When he could not move the king he himself slew Abner. We may perhaps suspect that, apart from the blood-feud, Joab was jealous of the great leader. If Abner came over to David's side, could David make so renowned a warrior less than commander-in-chief? David declares his innocence, and expresses his grief over the assassination of Abner in a dirge. There is no reason to doubt David's authorship of the dirge in vv. 33, 34. Was the noble and generous Abner, then, to die a rake's death, i.e., probably, an untimely death? Length of days Abner of all men might have expected! Was Abner to die the death of a common criminal? Read as one putteth away criminals wast thou put away. David, the fearless warrior, showed on many occasions that he had no great moral courage in dealing with members of his own family or court. (On Joab's blood-feud with Abner see p. 75.)

CHAPTER IV

The Murder of Ishbosheth. The death of Abner removed the main support of Ishbaal (see 28 mg.). Two of his officers murdered him and brought his head to David, expecting a reward. But David treated them as he had the confessed slayer of Saul. The note (v. 4) about Mephibosheth, or Meribbaal (for so we should read his name; cf. 1 Chr. 8³⁴ 9⁴⁰), appears to be out of place. In vv. 6, 7 follow the LXX version as suggested in R.V. mg.

The chief figure in chs. 2, 3 and 4 is Abner. David fought hard, but he was not of those who belittle and detract their opponents; Abner was, he said, a prince among men, one who deserved to die in harness in the battle, or in peace and honor in a ripe old age (33^{1f.}). There seems no doubt of David's innocence and detestation of Abner's murder. Abner was to have brought all Israel to David's side, and now the plan was spoiled. As David had treated the Amalekite (11⁵), so now he treats the murderers of Ishbaal (41²). David's generous and honorable feeling is connected with religion. He swears by the Lord, who has redeemed him out of all adversity (49). God's cause is not to be served by shady or dishonorable devices.

CHAPTER V

1-5. David King Over All Israel. With Ishbaal slain, it was perfectly natural that the north should turn to David. He was anointed king over all Israel. "The Lord's anointed" may be king "by divine right," but he is a constitutional, not an absolute monarch, for his kingship is based upon a solemn covenant with his subjects; this covenant doubtless set forth the king's duties as well as his privileges. The anointing is a solemn religious act, but it is performed, not by the priests but by the heads of the tribes (v. 3).

CHAPTERS 5⁶ TO 623: JERUSALEM THE NEW CAPITAL

6-16. David Captures the Fortress of Jerusalem and Makes It His Capital. The capture of Jerusalem was of the utmost importance to David. Not only was it a nearly impregnable fortress, but a national kingdom was almost impossible if the northern tribes were separated from Judah by an enemy fortress. Moreover, Jerusalem was central and had no traditions which would arouse tribal jealousies. The reference in v. 6 to the blind and the lame is not intelligible. Two alternatives to be considered are (a) that, with the R.V. and A.S.V. mg., we should understand v. 6 to mean that Jerusalem is so strong naturally that cripples could defend it, and assume that the text of v. 8 is hopelessly corrupt, having possibly once contained the information we get in 1 Chr. 11⁶; or (b) that we should assume that the reference is to some ancient pre-Israelite Jerusalem tradition or prophecy to the effect that Jerusalem could only be taken under certain hardly attainable conditions, such, for instance, as would imply that the conquering king was a divine hero ushering in the golden or Messianic age. The latter interpretation in some form is perhaps more probable. Possibly, however, the reference to the lame and blind covers merely a taunt at David, the point of which is now lost. The capture of Jerusalem by the Hebrews is an event of world-historical importance. Three religions look to Jerusalem as a holy city—Judaism, Christianity, and Islam; moreover, David's capture of the city nearly three thousand years ago has created some of the most perplexing political problems of to-day.

The following identifications may be suggested: city of David (v. 9) was on the low southwestern hill of the present Jerusalem; water-course (v. 8)—perhaps the modern "Warren's shaft," a tunnel forty feet long bringing inside the walls the overflow of the Gihon spring (Duncan, Z.A.T.W., 1924, pp. 222ff.); Millo (v. 9)—probably a fort on the southeast hill (see notes on 1 Kings 11²⁷ and Z.A.T.W., ibid.). Not Hiram but Abibaal would seem to have been king of Tyre at this time (v. 11).

17-25. David Breaks with the Philistines. David's assumption of the united monarchy meant a breach with the Philistines. If Jerusalem was captured before the Philistine war, the hold must be Jerusalem; more probably the Philistine war came first, and perhaps Adullam is meant. Rephaim (v. 18) is the valley between Jerusalem and Bethlehem; Baal-perazim (v. 20) lay probably west of Jerusalem. David captured the Philistine idols as once the Philistines had captured the ark. For Rephaim (v. 22) read perhaps Bekaim, south of Gibeon. Tree-divination is common in antiquity, but here we get the magnificent conception that David is not to be precipitate, as Saul had been; he is to await God's time; when he hears the sound of marching in the tops of the balsam trees, he is to recognize the token that the Lord himself is marching to do battle for his people, then David is to bestir himself and follow. This method of determining the divine will is found among many primitive peoples.

CHAPTER VI

David Brings the Ark to Jerusalem; Michal's Scorn. David attempted to bring the ark to the captured stronghold, but an accident, interpreted as an expression of divine anger, interfered temporarily. A second attempt was successful. If Jerusalem was to be the political capital, it must be made the religious capital also. The ark (see on 1 Sam. 4) was the religious symbol of all the tribes and would tend, therefore, to draw their interest and devotion to Jerusalem. For fir-wood (v. 5) read songs. Harps, lutes, tambourines, triangles (?) and castanets correspond roughly to the instruments named. V. 6 is unintelligible in the Hebrew; the English translation seems illegitimate; for put forth his hand read perhaps slipped against, and for stumbled read had been dunging (Arnold, Ephod and Ark, pp. 45, 63). For error (v. 7) we may read slip, and suppose, if we will, that Uzzah broke his head upon the hard threshing floor. The king, according to the older ideas, was, of course, chief priest (cf. vv. 17f.). Thus he wore the priestly garment, the linen ephod (v. 14). For play (v. 21), read dance. Presumably David, in fact, separated from Michal.

David inaugurates his reign by defeating the Philistines and making Jerusalem his capital; the editor is far more interested in the religious than in the political side of the history; he gives little space to that great series of battles which broke the Philistine power forever (see Isa. 2821); he mentions the capture of Jerusalem, a notable exploit, very briefly, but describes in detail the bringing up of the ark. Here, again, we find primitive traditions of the arbitrary and wonder-working power of the ark to bless (v. 11) or to destroy (v. 7; see notes on 1 Sam. 6). Of great interest is the account of the sacred processional dance with which the ark is brought up to Jerusalem, a festival probably repeated on a smaller scale every year in Jerusalem at the great New Year feast of the Lord's Enthronement; no less than five different words are used to describe the motions; they may be translated, "dancing," "rotating," "jumping," "whirling," and "skipping"—the last in 1 Chr. 1529 (Oosterley, The Sacred Dance, pp. 36, 54).

Ecclesiastical custom is always conservative; the priest's garment, the ephod, was doubtless the most primitive garment, a scanty loin-cloth. It is not clear whether the editor's sympathy is with Michal, "that much tried lady," as Bennett calls her; she here stands for the principle that religious custom must advance with the advance of civilization, and that a living church must not be tied to the customs and traditions that come from less enlightened ages. Or perhaps she stands for mere respectability in religion; that at least is David's defense; he protests against a religion of cold decorum; a man must be ready to be "a fool for Christ's sake" (1 Cor. 410); but was David's "folly" of this kind? A processional dance of the kind described here is rich in emotional color, but poor in intellectual content, and we can gather little of the religious ideas associated with the bringing up of the ark. It is possible that it was for this occasion that Psa. 247-10 and 132 were indited (but see comments on these psalms.)

We know tantalizingly little about the religious traditions of Jerusalem prior to the capture of the city by David, but that they may have been of spiritual worth to the conquerors we may perhaps guess from such traditions as survive of the priest-king Melchizedek (Gen. 1418f. Psa. 1104 Heb. 7). The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews lived too late to be a trustworthy medium of tradition; he shows, rather, the impression this mysterious figure, who ruled Jerusalem in the time of Abraham, made on the Hebrew people. The tradition in Gen. 14 points to a relatively noble and pure religion; Melchizedek is priest of "God Most High"; this is no animistic deity, no mere nature god or tribal god. Again, the ancient but corrupt Psa. 110 suggests the possibility of Messianic or quasi-Messianic ideas being derived from the old Jerusalem tradition (cf. note on 56-16).

CHAPTER VII

1-18a. Why David Built No Temple. David, disturbed by the fact that the dwelling place of Jehovah was simply a tent, determines to build a temple; the prophet Nathan, whom he consults, at first approves, then opposes the plan. However, in recognition of David's desire a promise is made to him that his dynasty will endure forever. For tribes (v. 7) read judges. Sitting was not the usual posture for prayer, but the text in v. 18a may be right (cf. 1 Kings 1842.)

This chapter, which is of composite origin, contains very ancient tradition. Solomon's Temple became the pride and joy of Israel and powerfully influenced the religious development. Later ages who idealized David had to explain why David did not build the Temple;

the answer given was that he made all the preparations for building it, but as a "man of blood" he was not allowed to undertake the actual building (1 Chr. 22st). Here (vv. 1-7) we get an entirely different tradition. David proposes to build a temple and consults the prophet Nathan; at first the prophet warmly approves, but when he has thought over the proposal and has slept on it, he comes back with a different message. The God of Israel, represented by his ark, had been housed in a portable tent throughout the days of Moses; these were the great days of Israel, when pre-eminently the hand of the Lord had been mighty to save. All the associations of the tent, therefore, were inspiring and uplifting; but a temple would be an innovation, a breach with tradition; all the associations of a temple were heathen. A temple, therefore, might be aesthetically splendid but spiritually disastrous. There are elsewhere traces of a protest against the idea of a temple. Solomon's Temple, even if erected solely to the glory of the God of Israel, had to be built by heathen workmen and on the model of heathen temples; it became, in fact, a snare to the Hebrews, so that later prophetic voices had to take up Nathan's burden (see Jer. 7 Ezek. 8, 9 Mk. 13^{1f.}). Perhaps Nathan stood for conservatism and against progress, and perhaps a tent might have become a fetish no less than the Temple; but "consecrated bricks and mortar," more splendid services and ceremonies, do not necessarily tend to an increase of true religion. A tent is better than a temple as a symbol of the Christian Church, the pilgrim people of God, who have here no abiding city.

18b-29. David's Prayer and Thanksgiving. The rest of the chapter is really a psalm, though it is a matter of dispute how far it is actually metrical. No reporter was present at David's private devotions, and the psalm is to be treated as a religious composition possibly or probably dating, in the main, from David's time. In its context the chief point lies in its play upon the word house. David would build God a house; that is not to be; but God will build David a house, i.e., sons and posterity to follow him. In the N.T. also the house which God builds and for which God cares is in the souls of men; for it is men that are "the temple of the Holy Spirit" (1 Cor. 3¹⁶). We cannot say that the passage is personally Messianic; only the permanence of the Davidic dynasty is promised; but as the days darkened for Israel, this treasured promise tended to take on a more supernatural coloring, till men began to look for one who should be of "the root and the offspring of David, and the bright and morning star."

CHAPTERS 8 TO 10: THE GROWTH OF DAVID'S EMPIRE

CHAPTER VIII

An Account of David's Wars. David conquers in succession Philistia, Moab, Zobah, Damascus, and Edom. The narrative is supplemented by a list of David's officials. In v. 1b read and he took the ark from Gath out of the hand of the Philistines (cf. 1 Chr. 18¹). The treatment of Moab would be regarded as a military precaution, not as an atrocity; it is to be hoped that many modern military precautions will before long be reckoned atrocities and discarded. The attack upon Moab seems strange in view of 1 Sam. 22^{3f.} The end of v. 3 should probably read when he [David] turned his hand against the Euphrates. Betah and Berothai, (v. 8), are unknown, probably in the Antilebanon district. For Joram (v. 10), read Badoram. Dedicate (v. 11) probably means little more than "place in the royal treasury with a religious service of thanksgiving." The spoils of war were the spoils of the God of Israel; wealth thus dedicated might be used again for the Lord's battles and in cases of national emergency. For Syria (v. 12) read Edom. Similarly, in v. 13. In Hebrew the two words look very much the same. Valley of Salt is the depression south of Dead Sea. Recorder (v. 16), perhaps private adviser. Scribe (v. 17), presumably keeper of the court records. Hitherto the story of Israel had been conserved by ballad-singers, priests in their oral instruction and professional story-tellers; here first we come to exact historical records. There is no justification for the R.V. marginal translation chief ministers in v. 18. It was a much later theory that confined the priesthood to the supposed descendants of Aaron. Cherethites and Pelethites, i.e., Cretans and Philistines, formed David's bodyguard.

CHAPTER IX

David's Kindness to Mephibosheth. David shows kindness to the surviving son of Jonathan. Lo-debar was across Jordan, presumably near Mahanaim. See further under ch. 10.

CHAPTER X

David Overcomes Ammon and Syria. Insulted by the new king of Ammon, David makes war against him. Syria joins the Ammonites, but both nations suffer defeat. Beth-rehob (v. 6), probably in the Lebanon district. Maacah, at the foot of Hermon. Tob or Istob (v. 8), probably in the same region. The name of the Syrian ruler should be read Hadadezer (v. 16). The location of Helam is unknown, perhaps in the Yarmuk Valley. Rabbah (11¹) was located on the upper Jabbok.

Teaching of chs. 8–10. This section, which deals with the astonishing growth of David's kingdom, made possible by the contemporary impotence of the Hittite, Assyrian and Egyptian empires, seems to us almost barren of religious significance; not so to the editor, who saw in these victories the hand of God; the victories proved David as a man after God's own heart. It was usual for a new dynasty to destroy all the family of the preceding dynasty. It is true that a cripple was slight menace to David, and that the invitation extended to Meribbaal to eat at the king's table may have been due to David's determination to keep an eye on him (not without reason, as the sequel shows; 2 Sam. 19^{25f.}); none the less, David spared not only Jonathan's sons but his grandson also, and, contrary to all custom, the house of Saul was allowed to grow and prosper in the land (see 1 Chr. 8^{34f.}). David's generosity, therefore, and his loyalty to Jonathan need not be questioned.

CHAPTERS 11 AND 12: DAVID TAKES BATHSHEBA

CHAPTER XI

David's Sin Against Uriah. During the Ammonite campaign David committed the sin against Uriah and Bathsheba which darkened his entire subsequent career. Uriah, as his name shows, was a worshiper of Israel's God, though of Hittite extraction; presumably his family had been in Jerusalem before its conquest by David (cf. Ezek. 16³). David fails in his scheme to make it appear that Uriah was the father of the child. For v. 9 see above on 1 Sam. 21¹⁻⁹. We notice that the ark is taken to battle as a palladium. See further under ch. 12.

CHAPTER XII

Nathan's Rebuke of David. Under Nathan's rebuke David repents, but the prophet makes it clear that he cannot escape punishment. Sin works in the body like a poison issuing in death. Death, therefore, is not so much the punishment of sin as its inevitable consequence. The poison is taken out of David's system and put into the child's! This conception of sin as a sort of physical affection of the soul is very crude, and the transference of the "sin" from David to his innocent baby seems to us, with our developed sense of individual responsibility and our weakened sense of the family as a psychic whole, to be immoral and shocking. But the underlying principle is clear: if suffering and sorrow did not inevitably follow upon sin, God's moral order of the world would be compromised. The Hebrew had no idea of what we call "the uniformity of nature" or the inexorable rule of natural law which largely dominates modern thinking, but he had a very vivid sense of history as the revelation of a moral order, which we often fail to observe (see art., Religion of Israel, pp. 167–9).

15b–25. David's Grief; His Faith in the Future. As announced by Nathan, the child of Bathsheba died. The Hebrew conception of life after death is difficult for us to grasp. The Hebrews shared the widespread belief that the departed lived a shadowy and unsubstantial existence after death in the underground realm called "Sheol," from which there was no escape. Such was the fate of the individual soul; but the most important fact about a man was not that he was an individual but that he belonged to a family, manifested and partook of the family-soul; after death he was, as it were, merged in the family, and if the family continued on earth, the whole family prospered. The Hebrews had no theoretical doctrine of a corporate or family-soul; some such term, however, is necessary to express their feeling that not the individual but the family is the real unity. David expresses the hope that he will be reunited with the child in Sheol. (See art., Religion of Israel, p. 173.)

26–31. Return to the War Against Ammon. In v. 26 either we should read water-city for royal city, and understand the city water supplies to be meant, or the royal city will be the royal quarter of the city. Once the water-supplies were captured, the city as a whole could not hold out long. The glory of the victory must be assigned to David (v. 28). This seems to us to smack of unreality, and rightly so; but to the ancient with his idea of national solidarity and of the nation's individualization in the king this seemed the only natural point of view; and even in our own day is it not true that those who do the work do not always get the praise? For of their king (v. 30) read of Milcom, their god. Also read and in it was a precious jewel; with this jewel (not the whole crown) David adorned his head. The captives were employed as state slaves.

Teaching of chs. 11 and 12. David's great sin, as has been frequently pointed out, would have been forgotten but for his repentance. That the king should be at liberty to take into his harem whom he would was doubtless an accepted maxim in the world of that day. The remarkable thing is not that David should have taken Bathsheba, but that he should have recognized and confessed that it was a sin. For such conduct was intolerable to Israel's God, and Israel's God alone; it was a crime against God (12⁹). David, it will be noted, only contrived murder when his other efforts to avoid a court scandal had been thwarted by the steadfastness of Uriah. Bathsheba must have been a remarkable woman; she was David's favorite wife, who kept her ascendancy over him long after her youthful charms had vanished, and she was the mother of Solomon. Her part in this story is neither praiseworthy nor blameworthy; according to the ideas and etiquette of the time, she had no option. While there is no glossing over of David's sin, David's sincerity and insight are clearly displayed; he was humble enough to allow the prophet to speak and to accept, apparently without resentment, what he said. Moreover, his repentance was real and genuine.

Very remarkable too is his conduct with regard to the child; with prayer, fasting, and humiliation he beseeches God to spare the child; his earnestness and passion were so great that no one dared to bring him news of the child's death. But when he knows, he declines to have part in any of the mourning ceremonies which tradition and etiquette required. He shows himself impatient of formalities in religion and social life; everyone knew what he felt in his heart about the child. It is still customary to reserve tributes and kindly sayings and outward marks of affection till the object of them is dead. Christians at least should not be shocked at David's conduct. "Why," asks Ruskin, "should we wear black for the guests of God?" It would be better to pray for people when they are alive and to "anoint them beforehand for the burying" than to wait till they are gone, and only sad formalities remain.

Nathan undoubtedly risked his life in thus rebuking David. This is the true prophet who unasked, unwanted, and without regard to his personal danger rebukes sin, even in high places, in the name of the living God. But Nathan did more than denounce; he convinced. His parable came home to the king, so that the king could not but agree with the prophet's verdict. There have been many prophets in all ages to denounce vice, crime, and injustice, and to win the applause of those who are not guilty; but the true prophetic appeal is not against evil so much as to conscience. In this way the gentle John Woolman was perhaps more truly a prophet than most would-be reformers of men and morals.

CHAPTERS 13 AND 14: PROBLEMS OF THE BLOOD-FEUD

CHAPTER XIII

19. The Violation of Tamar. The violations of Tamar by Amnon was avenged by Absalom. As a result the latter was compelled to flee the country, but later, through the efforts of Joab, was recalled. For sister we should say half-sister. Court etiquette was strict; Tamar lived in Absalom's palace; how was Amnon to get her to his palace? If Amnon was sick, it would be proper for Tamar to go to his house. Amnon was to ask for certain cakes which, as was suggested, Tamar could make better than anyone else. In his sight (v. 8)—apparently from his bedroom Amnon could see into the outer room. "Folly" is the conduct of those who have no fear of God in their hearts. Israel (here represented by Tamar) is a civilized country; in those days there was no civilization apart from the fear of God. Fools, "wastrels." Tamar does not refuse to marry Amnon (v. 13). Marriage with a half sister was only later forbidden (Deut. 27^{22f}. Lev. 18⁹ 20¹⁷). The garment was a long robe "with long sleeves" rather than multi-colored.

20-39. Absalom's Revenge. Absalom bode his time, but finally slew Amnon. After the murder he fled. LXX adds to v. 21, "but he grieved not the spirit of Amnon his son, for he loved him because he was his first-born." The sheep-shearing was a time of festival and rejoicing. The king of Geshur was Absalom's grandfather. Geshur lies southeast of Hermon. The close of v. 39 might be rendered freely, he had recovered from the death of Amnon. See further under ch. 14.

CHAPTER XIV

The Recall of Absalom by David. Joab devised a scheme which finally led to the recall of Absalom by David. "Wise" women (cf. 20¹⁶) were probably those who were thought to have contact with spirits (witches), who interpreted dreams and signs and were credited with magic powers. The woman is put off with a vague promise. The iniquity (v. 9) would consist in the protection of a man guilty of murder; see below on blood-revenge. David has promised to protect the woman's son though he is a murderer; the woman now points the moral: Absalom, as heir-apparent, is the son of the people; David should protect him similarly, though he is a murderer; as long as he is banished, he is as good as dead to the nation.

The argument is not logically cogent; the woman has pleaded that her son, as her only remaining son, should be protected lest, in the event of his death, the family should die out. But Absalom is not the only possible heir of David, his last remaining son. In the East, as Hindu, Buddhist, and Jewish writings amply testify, an illustration, a parable, is convincing where a syllogism brings no conviction. This fundamental difference between Eastern and Western ways of thought should be borne in mind in the interpretation of N.T. parables also. The first part of v. 11 seems to mean that Amnon is dead, and it is useless to "cry over spilt milk." V. 14b is corrupt; possibly the wise woman indicates that God will not punish David for recalling Absalom. Vv. 15-17 may be a later addition; if not, they should probably be transposed to a position between vv. 7 and 8. V. 26 makes it clear that the hair was heavy, but the exact weight we cannot now determine. With v. 27 contrast 18¹⁸.

Teaching of chs. 13 and 14. The theme of this section is the obligations of the blood-feud and difficult situations in connection with it. The family must avenge insults offered to its members upon the members of the guilty family. The blood-feud, which is intolerable in an organized and policed community, may well be necessary where crime would be unrestricted did not family or tribe take up the cause of the wronged. Absalom, according to the decencies and obligations of the time, was bound to avenge Tamar. But the blood-feud operates between families or tribes; an intolerable complication is involved when the offense takes place within the family, for there is a solemn obligation upon all members of the family to stand by one another. Here Amnon is the guilty party and Absalom's action was forced upon him by his father's inaction. David was angry, but did nothing. He might have insisted that Amnon should marry Tamar, or he might have cut off Amnon from the family. He did neither. When Absalom took vengeance into his own hands David was in a serious dilemma; he could neither blame Absalom nor could he countenance him, for this was murder within the family. David again showed his moral weakness by compromising.

The problem of the blood-feud introduced by the "wise woman" was somewhat different. It was right that blood should be avenged; but to slay the guilty member of a family is one thing, to blot out the whole family, leaving it without posterity, is another; what if the legitimate blood-feud involved the illegitimate annihilation of the family? David, apparently with some compunction, promises to defend the cause of the widow's family as a whole by refusing to allow the blood-feud in this case to be carried through. These problems in their ancient dress have long since ceased to interest us, but we also are often aware of the problem of a "conflict of loyalties," as, for instance, where a man can be loyal to his family as a whole only by not exposing one member of it, or to his state by being disloyal to the interests of a wider group, or to his denomination by being disloyal to the church of all believers. These chapters offer no solution of such problems, but they indicate the wretched consequences of David's weakness.

Amnon did violence to Tamar, and then turned her out "into the street"; public opinion to-day as in David's time would unanimously condemn Amnon, but see Jn. 8¹⁻¹¹. We read that Amnon's love for Tamar immediately turned to hatred (13¹⁵); perhaps for this reason David did not insist upon his marrying her. It is to be observed that when persons marry upon a basis of merely physical attraction without real mutual respect and without any regard to common ideals for life, those marriages tend to be miserable and to end in disaster. (See art., Bible Customs, p. 75.)

CHAPTERS 15 TO 18: ABSALOM'S REBELLION AND HIS DEATH

CHAPTER XV

1-12. The Ambition of Absalom Carries Him Away. First, he assumes the position of heir-apparent, and finally has himself anointed king at Hebron. Absalom, the Israelite Alcibiades, as Gunkel calls him, came forward as heir-apparent with all the pomp and magnificence to which the position would entitle him. It is likely that Bathsheba had used the time of Absalom's disgrace to get Solomon recognized as David's heir, and that Absalom's only hope of the succession lay in open rebellion. The king was the final court of appeal (v. 2). The first court was constituted by the elders of the township or by the local priest. It is likely that the country was better organized for war than for peace, and that the delays of the law were grievous for those who appealed to the king. In v. 7 some of the ancient versions read "four" for "forty," which is probably original. Absalom had already shown in the case of Amnon that he knew how to bide his time. Hebron was his family home. Just as there is felt to be a distinction, hard to define, between, for instance, Our Lady of Lourdes and Our Lady of Winchester and Notre Dame de Paris, so there was a distinction felt between "Our Lord of Hebron" and "Our Lord of Jerusalem" or "of Bethel." The Hebrew in v. 12 says sent, not sent for; we are not told where Ahitophel was sent. Presumably he was sent on some confidential journey to foment the rebellion. If, as is not impossible, Ahitophel was Bathsheba's grandfather, he may have felt himself bound to avenge Uriah if he could. Gilgah was near Adullam.

13-18. David Taken by Surprise. David was taken by surprise, but there was neither weakness nor indecision in his flight; he could not hold Jerusalem, for there was no time to summon the militia, and the bodyguard was insufficient for the purpose if he could not rely upon the loyalty of the populace. Numerous details connected with the flight are recorded in chs. 15 and 16. The presence of his wives and household would delay his retreat and was a risk, but David would not leave them to their fate. The ten women left were his own concubines (16^{21f.}). The king headed the procession from the palace and his supporters followed him; a halt was made at Beth-merhak (v. 17), perhaps the last house at the city gate. Here the procession reforms; the general body of supporters are in the van; then follows the bodyguard, and finally the king.

19-23. David generously advises Ittai to seek his fortune with the new king. Read, in v. 19, an exile from thine own place. Ittai (or Ateas), it appears, was a newcomer to Jerusalem; he had apparently taken service under David much as David in earlier years had taken service under Achish. The little ones are the noncombatants in his train.

24-29. The Ark Sent Back to Jerusalem. The ark was considered the symbol of the presence of Jehovah. Hence the priests brought it along. But David ordered it back to Jerusalem. Probably omit in v. 24, and all the Levites with him, and understand that after the passage of the Kidron the procession was met by Zadok and Abiathar with the ark. They put down the ark while the procession passed. Abiathar no longer carries "the ephod." V. 27 is not quite clear. David bids both Zadok and Abiathar each with his son to remain in Jerusalem. It would be advantageous to have some friends in the city. The expression the fords of the wilderness is obscure; the place appointed by David was west of the Jordan (cf. 17¹⁶).

30-37. Mission of Hushai. When David learned of the disloyalty of Ahitophel he sends his friend Hushai back to counteract the influence of the traitor and advises him to co-operate with Zadok and Abiathar.

See further under ch. 16.

CHAPTER XVI

1-4. Ziba Brings an Accusation. David, it seems, had only just passed over the top of the Mount of Olives when Absalom reached Jerusalem. David accepted Ziba's story. Possibly Meribaal hoped that Absalom's rule would be a Judæan monarchy only, and that the rest of Israel would return to the house of Saul. It is by no means certain, however, that the story of Ziba can be accepted as true.

5-14. Shimei Curses David. One of the unpleasant incidents of the flight was the cursing of David by Shimei, a fellow tribesman of Saul of the tribe of Benjamin. If the incident recorded in 21-9 came early in David's reign the reference might be to events recorded there, or Shimei may be accusing David of complicity in the death of Ishbaal. The name of the place where the halt was made has been lost. Only a very brief halt would be possible till the Jordan was safely crossed.

15-23. Absalom's Final Breach with David. In v. 15 the narrative leaves David, in order to record what was happening in Jerusalem. Apparently, the populace sided with the usurper; and the counsel he receives is to push forward as speedily as possible. The act suggested in v. 21 would make the breach with David irremediable; it would be not only an insult to David but a definite claim upon the throne.

Teaching of chs. 15 and 16. One must admire the literary artistry of these and the following chapters dealing with Absalom's rebellion; their author is likely to be one who actually took part in the events of the time. The story lights up the character and religion of David as it was revealed in the hour of darkness. David was caught unawares by Absalom's rebellion, but, in spite of his love for his son, he never thinks of yielding to him. Retreat from the city is a military necessity, but he is careful to leave spies behind. Zadok and Abiathar remaining with the ark would not be suspected; Hushai, on the other hand, must play a double game. A man's friends are revealed by misfortune, and the story is therefore full of contrasts; Ittai, Abiathar, Zadok, and Hushai on the one side, Mephibosheth, Shimei, Ahitophel on the other. To Ittai David shows his thoughtful and singular generosity. Ittai is free to welcome Absalom if he will, and that at the moment when David's cause seemed desperate. The heathen Ittai's spontaneous and devoted loyalty warms David's heart when his own family is in arms against him. David's religion is shown in his refusal to take the ark with him. We have had many stories dealing with the miraculous power of the ark; had David shared in this superstition, he would have preferred the presence of the ark to the advantage of having Zadok and Abiathar in the city. If God was with him, he said, he would not need the symbol of God's presence; if God was not with him, the symbol would not help him. This is a far-reaching principle in religion. At Bahurim, says Gressmann, David found his Gethsemane.

As kinsman of Saul Shimei assumed the blood-feud with David, but David had spared his life, and the meanness of his soul is obvious. But David's heart was too full of greater troubles to be concerned about peccadillos; in his calamity he recognizes the hand of God; he humbles himself; he does not refuse to drain to the dregs the cup of bitterness which God gives to him to drink; are not his sins and weaknesses being visited upon him? God has brought him to this, and God will deliver him if it is his will. In his calamity and sore need David does not curse his fate nor curse God nor feel bitterness even toward his enemies. There are many actors in the scene, and David must play his part; but the real meaning of it all is, as David sees it, that God is dealing with his soul, and he must deal not with men but with God in his trouble. This is religion, to see behind outward circumstances the hand of God, and amid the Babel of confusing voices to hear his voice and deal directly with him.

CHAPTER XVII

1-14. Ahitophel and Hushai. Hushai, the friend of David, counteracts the impression made by Ahitophel. David, it would seem, had left Jerusalem only about an hour before Absalom arrived; if Ahitophel could overtake him in his flight before he could get into position beyond Jordan, David's cause was lost. V. 3 appears to be corrupt; perhaps it should read, I will bring back all the people to thee as a bride to her husband; the life of one man only thou seekest; with all the rest thou wilt be at peace. Hushai's object is by any means to gain time for David; he suggests that an initial reverse, even if insignificant in itself, would ruin Absalom's cause, for it would be magnified by rumor.

15-29. David Crosses Jordan; Absalom Follows Him. Warned of his danger, David settled east of the Jordan, among the people who after the death of Saul had clung to Ishbaal. En-Rogel was situated where the Kidron and Benhinnom valleys meet. For Israelite (v. 25) we should probably read Ishmaelite. Nahash may be a mistake for "Jesse." Omit in v. 28 parched pulse. See further under ch. 18.

CHAPTER XVIII

1-18. David Defeats Absalom; Absalom's Death. The armies of David and Absalom finally met. David proposed to go with his men, but was persuaded to remain in a place of safety. He charged his officers to deal gently with Absalom. Absalom's army was defeated and Absalom was slain. For forest of Ephraim (v. 6), perhaps read simply jungle. Ephraim might be a mistake for "Mahanaim." Absalom's head was caught in a fork in the branches.

The servants would be the bodyguard. V. 15 seems pointless if Absalom were already dead; and the Hebrew word does not mean "darts"; therefore it may possibly be right to read in v. 14 (after Klostermann): grasped three branches with his hand and tore him down from the heart of the oak, and Absalom was still alive when he fell from the oak. Once Absalom was dead, there was no need to continue the slaughter of brother Israelites. The origin of the custom referred to in v. 17 (cf. Josh. 7²⁶ 8²⁹) may have been to prevent the slain man's ghost from rising to bring ill luck on those who had killed him, but we cannot be sure that in David's time the origin of the custom was remembered. The word translated "monument" (v. 18) means "hand" (see on 1 Sam. 15¹²); this pillar was probably a sacred stone rather than a mere memorial. Absalom had perhaps arranged for services (like masses for his soul) to be solemnized there. The statement that Absalom had no son (cf. 14²⁷) may be a later addition.

19-33. David's Grief for Absalom. These verses describe David's grief on receiving the news of Absalom's death. The Plain (v. 23) is the Jordan Valley, which offered an easier road though less direct. Not all is well but all hail (v. 28); the word in Hebrew corresponds with the Arabic greeting, "salaam."

Teaching of chs. 17 and 18. Theme: in the providence of God Absalom's rebellion ends disastrously for him. The first part of the story deals with the duel between Hushai and Ahitophel. Ahitophel was a man renowned for his counsel (15³¹ 16²³). By this is meant more than that Ahitophel was a man of great sagacity; it implies also that he was a man of great force of character with the gift of persuading men to accept his counsel and the power to carry it through; in this force of accomplishing themselves the counsels of Ahitophel were like the oracles of God (16²³). But in God's providence (this is the meaning of 17¹⁴) Absalom accepted Hushai's counsel and rejected Ahitophel's. When it finally came to the battle again God gave the victory to David; indeed, the country itself slew more than the sword (18⁸). But the victory almost ends in disaster; so overwhelmed is David with the death of Absalom that the victorious army slinks back as if it were defeated (19³). David had already gone far to lose the favor of the people, or Absalom's rebellion would not so nearly have succeeded. If he should now turn his victory into a cause of mourning and be more indignant with those who had ventured with him and saved him than with those who had rebelled, he would be a king with no loyal subjects, and the situation would be worse than ever before (19^{1f}). The situation is saved by Joab, who expostulates with the king and gains his point. David's affection for Absalom his son, in spite of all the past, is touching and reveals his noble character; and it may be that he blamed himself for what had happened. Had he been firmer with Amnon, how differently all might have gone! Absalom's estrangement from his father was the father's fault. David's attitude reveals weakness and indecision. What did he mean to do had Absalom been taken alive? He had put himself unreservedly in God's hands and God had given him the victory, and now he was repining. Moreover, his attitude was grossly unfair to his loyal men.

CHAPTERS 19 AND 20: THE SETTLEMENT AFTER ABSALOM'S REBELLION

CHAPTER XIX

1-23. Joab's Counsel; Shimei's Confession.

The chapter recounts various happenings connected with David's return. At first he seems inconsolable and loses all interest in government affairs. Joab rebukes him, and David, seeing the force of Joab's words, seeks to control himself and resumes his public duties. David remained beyond the Jordan waiting to be invited back. Absalom's death had thrown the country into confusion. Northern Israel was much more anxious for David's return than his own tribe. David evidently feels that he must exercise diplomacy with Judah and offer more than an amnesty, for he undertakes to put Amasa in Joab's place as commander-in-chief. Vv. 17 and 18 are obscure. Apparently, Ziba and his family rushed down to the Jordan and made themselves exceedingly busy helping the ferry to and fro.

24-43. David's Kindness to Mephibosheth and Barzillai. The incidents narrated in the closing paragraphs of the chapter throw light on the real character of David and on the far-reaching results of Absalom's revolt. Follow marginal reading in v. 25; for to Jerusalem read from Jerusalem. In v. 31 translate not over Jordan but to the Jordan. Chimham is presumably Barzillai's son. Among those who were present to escort the king there were twice as many from Judah as from the rest of Israel. V. 41 refers to all the men of Israel who were there; there was a quarrel about precedence and attendance on the king. Judah protests that they have not been bribed, neither are they recipients of any royal favoritism. Indeed, their enthusiasm for the cause of Absalom may have been due to David's failure to show them partiality. For we have also more right in David than ye read we are the first-born before you (v. 43). Judah, which indeed hardly appears in Israelite history till David's time, was regarded by the other tribes as a parvenu. For the moment Judah prevails. See further under ch. 20.

CHAPTER XX

1-3. Conflict Between Benjamin and Judah.

The long-time conflict between north and south was accentuated by Absalom's rebellion and the events growing out of it. The revolt led by Sheba marks the last effort of Benjamin to regain the honor of the monarchy for itself, Saul having been a member of that tribe. So serious was the quarrel that only Judah attended the king to Jerusalem.

4-13. The Murder of Amasa. Joab shows the same cruelty in dealing with Amasa as he did in dealing with Abner (see 327-30). Joab's device is obscure. Came to meet them seems to mean came up with them (v. 8). It is probable (after Klostermann) that Joab in addition to his ordinary sword which he wore outside his military garment held also in his left hand another sword inside. The former fell to the ground and allayed any suspicion Amasa may have had. The soldier stood by the corpse and pointed the moral; to delay would mark a man as partisan against Joab, whose star was in the ascendancy again. Joab seems to have assumed the commandership which David had intrusted to Abishai, markedly passing over Joab.

14-22. Death of Sheba and End of the Revolt. The revolt was of short duration. With the death of Sheba peace was restored. The subject of the obscure v. 14 seems to be Sheba, who made his way up to Abel-beth-maacah, which is probably one of the northernmost Israelite towns in the upper Jordan Valley. The last part of the verse probably stated that his following was very small, perhaps that it consisted only of Benjamites. The wise woman's saw is obscure; does it end with the verse or with faithful in Israel? (V. 19). Its point seems to be that Abel had an old reputation for loyalty to Israelite traditions and institutions. Will Joab destroy a mother-city in Israel? A mother-city presumably because it was surrounded by smaller semi-dependent townships.

23-26. David's Officers. The officers of the administration are again given, with some variations from 816-18. We hear nothing of Joab's reinstatement; presumably David accepted the fact that Joab was the inevitable commander-in-chief. For tribute (taskwork, A.S.V., v. 24) read corvée. As regards these offices, see on 816-18. The names here are in part different from the earlier list. Doubtless, David changed his officers from time to time. Ira, who came of a Gileadite clan (cf. 23³⁸ 1 Chr. 25³), certainly did not belong to the Aaronic priesthood. He takes the place of David's sons in the other list.

Teaching of chs. 19 and 20. These chapters deal with the restoration of David to his former power. The death of Absalom did not end David's troubles. The pacification of the country was no easy matter. Judah had espoused Absalom's cause and feared reprisals. When they were assured on this head and David went out of his way to conciliate them, he thereby offended the northern tribes. His journey from the Jordan was hardly a triumphal procession, for the northern tribes refused to escort him, and one of them raised the signal for revolt in the words which, as Gressmann says, became "the Marseillaise" of Israel (20¹). This revolution, however, was quickly and easily suppressed, and the bitterness between north and south seemed to be healed or at least allayed.

David's character again is revealed in the incidents of his return. With Judah he was diplomatic; with Shimei generous beyond the common manner of kings; there was to be a general amnesty to mark his return (19²²). He seems to have suspected Meribbaal of treason, but gives him the benefit of the doubt. (Samuel uses "Mephibosheth"; in Chronicles the name is spelled "Meribbaal".) The figure drawn with the greatest sympathy is that of Barzillai, the aged country gentleman who has supported David in adversity, and now, coming down to escort David across the river, courteously declines the honors that David would heap upon him, asking only that his son may be taken to court (19^{31f.}). Upon Joab, and only Joab, was David severe, and that unjustly. Joab had used great plainness with the king (19¹⁻⁸), but David knew that he had spoken wisely and took his advice; yet he degrades Joab and offers his post to Amasa, Absalom's general. So it comes that Joab is in a way the hero of these chapters rather than David himself, and at the end we find Joab once again commander-in-chief, in virtue, it would seem, of the force of his character rather than the wish of David; and what a character! Fierce and relentless, slayer of Abner and Amasa and Absalom (murderer only of Amasa and even here "with extenuating circumstances," for Joab had been grievously wronged by the king); a soldier of many campaigns, and all of them successful; the hero of the capture of Jerusalem (1 Chr. 11⁶); forceful in counsel in the recall of Absalom and after Absalom's death; a man of courage and resource, of integrity and unswerving loyalty. He has been called "the Wallenstein of Israel." It was not for nothing that Jesus chose men like Peter and Simon the Zealot to be his disciples; they had much to learn, but they were the stuff of heroes.

CHAPTERS 21 TO 24: AN APPENDIX

These four chapters are in the nature of an appendix, consisting in part of extracts from old records of the reign of David, in part of lists of David's heroes and their exploits, and in part of poems credited to David.

CHAPTER XXI

1-14. The Vengeance of the Gibeonites on Saul. The narrative of the prolonged famine and David's method of pacifying Jehovah throws much light upon the religious ideas of this early period. A massacre of the Gibeonites was in contravention of the covenant in Josh. 9; there is good reason to think that these Gibeonites were the priests of Nob (1 Sam. 22¹⁸; see on 1 Sam. 10¹⁻⁸).

The narrative in vv. 1-14 is of unusual religious interest. S. A. Cook speaks of "the pacification of the Gibeonites" here, and rightly, but the point of the story is much more "the pacification of God"; for we have to do with human sacrifice to avert the anger of God as shown in a prolonged famine. A prolonged drought would be ascribed inevitably to divine displeasure. The oracle was consulted as to the cause of God's wrath, and the answer was, Saul's treacherous massacre of the Gibeonites. Inasmuch as more than six years at the very least must have passed since Saul's death, and presumably still longer since the crime, there is some ground for Gressmann's suggestion that David himself hinted to the priests that this might be the cause of the trouble in order that he might have a good and pious excuse for exterminating the house of his predecessor, a usual proceeding for a new dynasty in those days. This, however, is only a guess. The suggestion is at least as likely to have come from Abiathar, sole survivor of the priests of Nob. When "atonement," i.e., expiation or satisfaction, had been made by this human sacrifice on a large scale, God was intreated for the land; i.e., God put away his anger and sent rain (v. 14). That an expiatory sacrifice is intended is shown also by the phrase that Saul's sons were hanged up unto the Lord (vv. 6, 9).

This may appear barbaric religion. But is it fundamentally different from notions that have at times appeared in Christendom in connection with ideas of the atonement? For instance, "the blood that flowed from Calvary down and smoothed the Father's angry frown."

Yet we may find elements of truth and value in the sense of the seriousness of sin, in the realization that a family must pay the debts as well as receive the advantages of its forbears. In the N.T. we find an altogether different and new conception of religion, namely, that the task of religion is not the reconciling of God with man, but of man with God.

If a man's body was unburied, he could not rest in Sheol; to lack burial, therefore, was the most cruel fate. The heroism of Rizpah touched even that rough age as it has touched all ages since; her name is immortal as the type of a mother's love. The Greek parallel to the story of Rizpah is Sophocles' Antigone (see also Tennyson's poem Rizpah). Rizpah's fidelity was rewarded, for her sons were duly and decently buried at the royal command.

15-22. The Exploits of David and His Men During the Philistine Wars. The most interesting verse is 19, which credits the slaying of Goliath, not to David but to Elhanan. Is it likely that, if this feat had been performed by David, it would have been ascribed to this obscure person? On the other hand, David might easily be credited with what one of his heroes had done. (See notes on 1 Chr. 20.)

CHAPTER XXII

A Hymn of Thanksgiving. This poem is found in a somewhat later recension, in Psa. 18 (see the comments there). It purports to be a triumphal hymn sung doubtless to the accompaniment of sacrifice and festivity to celebrate David's victories. The hymn may have been adapted here and there for the liturgical purposes for which it was afterward used, but there is no good reason for doubting the substantial accuracy of the heading in v. 1.

CHAPTER XXIII

1-7. David's Last Words and Testament. There is no good reason for doubting that this psalm comes from the time of David, even if it was not indited by him on his deathbed. The text is in some confusion; presumably vv. 1-5 ran originally somewhat as follows (though much of the reconstruction is guess-work):

Thus saith David the son of Jesse,
Thus saith the man upraised on high,
The anointed of Jacob's God,
Lover of Israel's psalmody.

The Spirit of the Lord spake in me,
And his word was upon my tongue;
Jacob's God said to me,
Israel's Rock spake:

He that ruleth men righteously,
Who reigneth in God's fear,
He shineth like the morning light,
Like the sun on a cloudless morn,
Which maketh the green earth resplendent after rain.

But the godless are as wild thistles,
They are not grasped by the hand,
No man toucheth them,
Except with iron tools;
They are fuel for the fire.

Surely my house is not so with God;
He ordereth and sustaineth it;
For an everlasting covenant hath he made with me,
In him is all my salvation and my joy.

8-39. A List of David's Heroes. The paragraph is similar in nature to 21¹⁵⁻²² and may be derived from the same document. It is a list of men who distinguished themselves in David's service and in consequence were made members of a separate group. For the same was Adino the Eznite (v. 8) read he lifted up his spear. The pouring out (v. 16) was in a sacramental libation. After mighty deeds (v. 20) read, probably, he followed two young lions into their lair and slew them there; he went down also and slew the old lion. . . .

In this chapter we have further fragments, first a psalm purporting to be David's last words, then a number of exploits performed by men who belonged to "the Three" or "the Thirty," probably popular honorific titles given to the notable sportsmen of the day. Two sections only have religious significance. The burden of David's psalm is not less moving for being simple; it says little more than that it is good to be good; but man can hardly say a profounder word than that.

It was for David a rare experience to be offered that which had been obtained at the risk of men's lives; for us the experience is common. The mining industry, deep-sea fishery, a thousand occupations and industries which minister to our daily comfort and convenience, are carried on at peril of men's lives. "The oppression of the slaves which I have seen in several journeys southward on this continent," says John Woolman, "and the report of their treatment in the West Indies, have deeply affected me, and a care to live in the spirit of peace and minister no just cause of offense to my fellow creatures having from time to time livingly revived in my mind, I have for some years past declined to gratify my palate with those sugars."

CHAPTER XXIV

